

THE BROADVIEW ANTHOLOGY OF BRITISH LITERATURE

Concise Edition, Volume A

THIRD EDITION

The Broadview Anthology of
BRITISH LITERATURE

Concise Edition

Volume A

Third Edition

The Broadview Anthology of British Literature: Concise Edition

The Medieval Period

The Renaissance and the Early Seventeenth Century

The Restoration and the Eighteenth Century

The Broadview Anthology of

BRITISH LITERATURE

Concise Edition

Volume A

Third Edition

GENERAL EDITORS

Joseph Black, University of Massachusetts

Leonard Conolly, Trent University

Kate Flint, University of Southern California

Isobel Grundy, University of Alberta

Don LePan, Broadview Press

Roy Liuzza, University of Tennessee

Jerome J. McGann, University of Virginia

Anne Lake Prescott, Barnard College

Barry V. Qualls, Rutgers University

Claire Waters, University of California, Davis

broadview press

BROADVIEW PRESS — www.broadviewpress.com
Peterborough, Ontario, Canada

Founded in 1985, Broadview Press remains a wholly independent publishing house. Broadview's focus is on academic publishing; our titles are accessible to university and college students as well as scholars and general readers. With over 600 titles in print, Broadview has become a leading international publisher in the humanities, with world-wide distribution. Broadview is committed to environmentally responsible publishing and fair business practices.

© 2017 Broadview Press

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced, kept in an information storage and retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or otherwise, except as expressly permitted by the applicable copyright laws or through written permission from the publisher.

LIBRARY AND ARCHIVES CANADA CATALOGUING IN PUBLICATION

The Broadview anthology of British literature. Volume A / general editors, Joseph Black, University of Massachusetts, Leonard Conolly, Trent University, Kate Flint, University of Southern California, Isobel Grundy, University of Alberta, Don LePan, Broadview Press, Roy Liuzza, University of Tennessee, Jerome J. McGann, University of Virginia, Anne Lake Prescott, Barnard College, Barry V. Qualls, Rutgers University, Claire Waters, University of California, Davis. -- Concise edition, Third edition.

(Broadview anthology of British literature)
Includes bibliographical references and indexes.
ISBN 978-1-55481-312-4 (paperback)

1. English literature. I. Black, Joseph, 1962-, editor
II. Series: Broadview anthology of British literature (Series)

PR1109 B772 2016 820.8 C2016-906962-1

Broadview Press handles its own distribution in North America

PO Box 1243, Peterborough, Ontario K9J 7H5, Canada
555 Riverwalk Parkway, Tonawanda, NY 14150, USA
Tel: (705) 743-8990; Fax: (705) 743-8353
email: customerservice@broadviewpress.com

Distribution is handled by Eurospan Group in the UK, Europe, Central Asia, Middle East, Africa, India, Southeast Asia, Central America, South America, and the Caribbean. Distribution is handled by Footprint Books in Australia and New Zealand.

Broadview Press acknowledges the financial support of the Government of Canada through the Canada Book Fund for our publishing activities.

Typeset by Kathryn Brownsey
Cover design by Lisa Brawn

PRINTED IN CANADA

Canada

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS AND WRITERS

MANAGING EDITOR	Don LePan
ASSISTANT MANAGING EDITOR	Laura Buzzard
DEVELOPMENTAL EDITORS	Laura Buzzard, Jennifer McCue
EDITORIAL COORDINATOR	Jennifer McCue
GENERAL ACADEMIC AND TEXTUAL EDITORS	Laura Cardiff, Joe Davies, Colleen Franklin
DESIGN COORDINATOR	Kathryn Brownsey

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

Katherine O. Acheson	Maura Giles Watson	Maureen Okun
Suzy Anger	Stephen Glosecki	Phil Palmer
Melissa Bachynski	Amanda Goldrick-Jones	Jude Polsky
Robert Barrett	Erik Gray	Anne Lake Prescott
Sandra Bell	Isobel Grundy	Joyce Rappaport
Emily Bernhard Jackson	Stephen Guy-Bray	Joseph Rezek
Joseph Black	Douglas Hayes	Herbert Rosengarten
Carol Blessing	Peter C. Herman	Nora Ruddock
Robert Boenig	Heather Hill-Vasquez	Jason Rudy
Sarika Bose	John Holmes	Janice Schroeder
Matthieu Boyd	Diane Jakacki	Chester Scoville
Benjamin Bruch	Eleanor Johnson	John T. Sebastian
Laura Buzzard	Susan Kattwinkel	Kelly Stage
Paul Johnson Byrne	Michael Keefer	Emily Steiner
Michael Calabrese	Amy King	Ashley Streeter
Laura Cardiff	David Klausner	Martha Stoddard-Holmes
Lisa Celovsky	Scott Kleinman	Julie Sutherland
Noel Chevalier	Chris Koenig-Woodyard	David Swain
Mita Choudhury	Gary Kuchar	Carol Symes
Youngjin Chung	Roger P. Kuin	Andrew Taylor
Thomas J. Collins	Lydia K. Lake	Peggy Thompson
Leonard Conolly	Don LePan	Jane Tolmie
Darryl Domingo	Ruth Lexton	Rebecca Totaro
Annmarie Drury	Roy Liuzza	David Townsend
Dianne Dugaw	Marie Loughlin	Yevgeniya Traps
Siân Echard	D.L. Macdonald	Martine van Elk
Rose Eckert-Jantzie	Hugh Magennis	Fred Waage
Warren Edminster	Anne McWhir	Craig Walker
Rachel Eisendrath	Tobias Menely	Claire Waters
Garrett Epp	Britt Mize	David Watt
Michael Faletta	Alexander Mueller	William Weaver
Christina Fawcett	Ian Munro	Vivienne Westbrook
Christina Fitzgerald	Sarah Neville	David Williams
Adrienne Fitzpatrick	Meghan Nieman	Adrienne Williams Boyarin
Andrew Fleck	David Oakleaf	James Winny
Melissa Free

CONTRIBUTING WRITERS

Victoria Abboud
Jane Beal
Jennifer Beauvais
Rachel Bennett
Emily Bernhard Jackson
Rebecca Blasco
Jess Boland
Matthieu Boyd
Julie Brennan
Andrew Bretz
Laura Buzzard
Paul Johnson Byrne
Laura Cardiff
Emily Cargan
Darryl Domingo
Victoria Duncan
Adrienne Eastwood
Wendy Eberle-Sinatra
Zachary Edwards
Peter Enman
Emily Farrell
Christina Fawcett
Joanne Findon
John Geddert

Jane Grove
Camille Isaacs
Erik Isford
Shoshannah Jones Square
Stephanie King
Chris Koenig-Woodyard
Gabrielle L'Archeveque
Philip Laven
Jessica Legacy
Don LePan
Anna Lepine
Kelly Loewen
John McIntyre
Brett McLenithan
Carrie Nartkler
Byron Nelson
Robin Norris
Kenna Olsen
Kendra O'Neal Smith
Laura Pellerine
Tiffany Percival
Virginia Philipson
Allison Pitcher
Jude Polsky

Andrew Reszitaryk
Dave Ross
Nora Ruddock
Jason Rudy
Anne Salo
Janice Schroeder
Carrie Shanafelt
Nicole Shukin
Helena Snopek
James Soderholm
Anne Sorbie
Martha Stoddard-Holmes
Jenna Stook
Ashley Streeter
Alexandria Stuart
Candace Taylor
Kaitlyn Till
Yevgeniya Traps
David Van Belle Deirdra Wadden
Shari Watling
Matthew Williams
Bj Wray
Nicole Zylstra

LAYOUT AND TYPESETTING

Kathryn Brownsey Susan Chamberlain

ILLUSTRATION FORMATTING AND ASSISTANCE

Cheryl Baldwin Lisa Brawn Eileen Eckert

PRODUCTION COORDINATORS

Tara Lowes Tara Trueman

PERMISSIONS COORDINATORS

Merilee Atos Emily Cargan Jennifer Elsayed
Chris Griffin Amy Nimegeer

PROOFREADERS

Jennifer Bingham Joe Davies Lucy Conolly
Judith Earnshaw Martin Boyne Lynn Fraser
Anne Hodgetts Amy Neufeld Lynn Neufeld

EDITORIAL ADVISORS

- Rachel Ablow, University at Buffalo, SUNY
 Phanel Antwi, University of British Columbia
 Dabney Bankert, James Madison University
 Stephen C. Behrendt, University of Nebraska
 Sumangala Bhattacharya, Pitzer College
 Kim Blank, University of Victoria
 Rita Bode, Trent University
 Andrew Bretz, Wilfred Laurier University
 David Brewer, Ohio State University
 Susan Brown, University of Guelph
 Catherine Burroughs, Wells College
 Elizabeth Campbell, Oregon State University
 William Christmas, San Francisco State University
 Nancy Cirillo, University of Illinois, Chicago
 Joanne Cordon, University of Connecticut
 David Cowart, University of South Carolina
 Alexander Dick, University of British Columbia
 Len Diepeveen, Dalhousie University
 Daniel Fischlin, University of Guelph
 Robert Forman, St. John's University
 Mark Fulk, Buffalo State College, SUNY
 Julia Garrett, University of Wisconsin
 Barbara Gates, University of Delaware
 Dawn Goode, James Madison University
 Chris Gordon-Craig, University of Alberta
 Natalie Grinnell, Wofford College
 Stephen Guy-Bray, University of British Columbia
 Tassie Gwilliam, University of Miami
 Elizabeth Hodgson, University of British Columbia
 John Holmes, University of Reading
 Romana Huk, University of Notre Dame
 Michael Keefer, University of Guelph
 Gordon Kipling, University of California,
 Los Angeles
 Emily Kugler, University of California, San Diego
 Sarah Landreth, University of Ottawa
 William Liston, Ball State University
 Paula Loscocco, Lehman College
 Kathleen Lundeen, Western Washington University
 Peter Mallios, University of Maryland
 Carl G. Martin, Norwich University
 Martin McKinsey, University of New Hampshire
 Rod Michell, Thompson Rivers University
 Byron Nelson, West Virginia University
 Robin Norris, Carleton College
 Michael North, University of California,
 Los Angeles
 Lesley Peterson, University of North Alabama
 John Pollock, San Jose State University
 Joseph Rezek, Boston University
 Jason Rudy, University of Maryland
 Andrew Scheil, University of Minnesota
 Carol Senf, Georgia Tech
 Ken Simpson, Thompson Rivers University
 Sharon Smulders, Mount Royal University
 Goran Stanivukovic, St. Mary's University
 Marni Stanley, Vancouver Island University
 Tim Stretton, St. Mary's University
 Nicholas Watson, Harvard University
 Kevin Whetter, Acadia University
 Julian Yates, University of Delaware

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2022 with funding from Kahle/Austin Foundation

CONTENTS

PREFACE	XXXIX
-------------------	-------

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS	XLVII
---------------------------	-------

THE MEDIEVAL PERIOD

INTRODUCTION TO THE MEDIEVAL PERIOD	1
History, Narrative, Culture	2
Before the Norman Conquest	5
Celts in Medieval Britain and Ireland	5
Roman Britain	6
Early Anglo-Saxon Britain	6
Celtic Culture	7
Celtic Christianity	10
Later Anglo-Saxon Britain	10
Invasion and Unification	13
After the Norman Conquest	14
The Normans and Feudalism	14
Henry II and an International Culture	17
Wales, Scotland, Ireland: Norman Invasions and Their Aftermath	22
The Thirteenth Century	23
The English Monarchy	26
Cultural Expression in the Fourteenth Century	28
Fifteenth-Century Transitions	31
Language and Prosody	33

HISTORY OF THE LANGUAGE AND OF PRINT AND MANUSCRIPT CULTURE	40
---	----

BEDE	41
from Ecclesiastical History of the English People	42
A Description of the Island of Britain and Its Inhabitants	42
The Coming of the English to Britain	44
The Life and Conversion of Edwin, King of Northumbria; the Faith of the East Angles	46
Abbess Hild of Whitby; the Miraculous Poet Cædmon	51
Cædmon's Hymn in Old and Modern English	55

EARLY IRISH LYRICS	57
The First Satire	59
[A Bé Find, in rega lim] Fair lady, will you go with me	59
[Messe ocus Pangur Bán] Me and white Pangur	60
[Is acher in gáith innocht] The wind is wild tonight	62

[Techt do Róim] Going to Rome?	62
The Lament of the Old Woman of Beare	62
EXETER BOOK ELEGIES	64
The Wanderer	66
The Seafarer	68
The Wife's Lament	70
The Ruin	70
THE DREAM OF THE ROOD	72
EXETER BOOK RIDDLES	76
Riddle 1	76
Riddle 2	77
Riddle 3	77
Riddle 7	78
Riddle 14	78
Riddle 26	78
Riddle 43	79
Riddle 44	79
Riddle 45	79
Riddle 47	79
Riddle 85	79
Riddle 86	79
Riddle 95	80
BEOWULF	81
IN CONTEXT: Background Material	128
Glossary of Proper Names	128
Genealogies	131
The Geatish-Swedish Wars	132
ÆLFRIC OF EYNHAM (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
The Passion of Saint Edmund, King and Martyr
GEOFFREY OF MONMOUTH	133
from A History of the Kings of Britain	134
THE FOUR BRANCHES OF THE MABINOGI	156
The First Branch: Pwyll Pendueic Dyfed: Sage, Prince of Dyfed	158
The Second Branch: Branwen uerch Llyr: Blanche Crowe, Daughter of Llyr	170
The Third Branch: Manawydan, son of Llyr (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
The Fourth Branch: Math, son of Mathonwy (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)

MARIE DE FRANCE	179
Bisclavret (The Werewolf)	180
Lanval	188
MIDDLE ENGLISH LYRICS	203
Sumer is icumen in	205
Foweles in the frith	205
Betwene Mersh and Averil	205
Stond well, moder, under Rode	206
I lovede a child of this cuntree	207
I have a gentil cock	207
I sing of a maiden	208
Adam lay ibounden	208
Farewell this world, I take my leve forever	208
Bring us in good ale	209
Of all creatures women be best	210
My lefe is faren in a lond	210
CONTEXTS: THE CRISES OF THE FOURTEENTH CENTURY	211
The Great Famine	212
from Anonymous (the “Monk of Malmesbury”), Life of Edward the Second . . .	212
The Hundred Years’ War	213
from Jean Froissart, Chronicles	213
from Prince Edward, Letter to the People of London (1356)	215
The Black Death	216
from Ralph of Shrewsbury, Letter, 17 August 1348	216
from Henry Knighton, Chronicle	216
The Uprising of 1381	218
from Regulations, London (1350)	218
from Statute of Laborers (1351)	219
from Statute (1363)	220
from Jean Froissart, Chronicles , Account of a Sermon by John Ball	221
John Ball, Letter to the Common People of Essex, 1381	222
from Henry Knighton, Chronicle	222
(additional selections on sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
SIR ORFEO (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
IN CONTEXT: Sir Orfeo
from King Alfred’s translation of Boethieus’s Consolation of Philosophy from Walter Map, De Nugis Curialium , Distinctio IV, cap. 8 from The Wooing of Étaín
SIR GAWAIN AND THE GREEN KNIGHT	225
IN CONTEXT: Illustrations from the Original Manuscript	291
IN CONTEXT: The Thorn and the Yogh	292

JOHN GOWER (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Confessio Amantis
from Book 5
IN CONTEXT: from Geoffrey Chaucer, The Legend of Good Women
The Legend of Hypsipyle and Medea
The Legend of Medea
GEOFFREY CHAUCER	293
To Rosemunde	296
from The Canterbury Tales	297
The General Prologue	297
The Knight's Tale (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
The Miller's Prologue and Tale	316
The Wife of Bath's Prologue and Tale	329
The Pardoner's Prologue and Tale	351
The Prioress's Prologue and Tale	364
The Nun's Priest's Prologue and Tale	371
Chaucer's Retraction	384
Complaint of Chaucer to His Purse	386
JULIAN OF NORWICH	387
from A Vision Shown to a Devout Woman	388
Section 1	388
Section 2	390
Section 3	391
Section 4	392
Section 10	395
Section 11	396
Section 12	397
Section 13	398
from A Revelation of Love	400
Chapter 50 (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Chapter 51 (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Chapter 58	400
Chapter 60	401
Chapter 86	403
MARGERY KEMPE	404
from The Book of Margery Kempe	405
The Proem	405
The Preface	407
from Book 1	407
Chapter 1	407
Chapter 2	408
Chapter 3	409

from Chapter 4	411
from Chapter 11	412
Chapter 50	413
Chapter 52	414
Chapter 53	417
Chapter 54	418
from Chapter 55	420
CONTEXTS: RELIGIOUS AND SPIRITUAL LIFE	422
Celtic Christianity	422
Church and Cathedral	426
Religion for All: The Apostle's Creed, the Pater Noster, and the Hail Mary	427
from Robert Manning of Brunne, Handlyng Synne	429
from William of Pagula, Priest's Eye	430
from The Canons of the Fourth Lateran Council	433
Sin, Corruption, and Indulgence	434
from William Langland, Piers Plowman (B-text)	434
from Passus 1	436
from Passus 5	437
from Passus 7	437
from Thomas Wimbleton, Sermon	438
Lollardy	438
from Account of the Heresy Trial of Margery Baxter	439
The Persecution of the Jews	440
from Thomas of Monmouth, The Life and Miracles of St. William of Norwich	440
from Roger Howden, Chronicle	442
from The Ordinances of the Jews	442
from The Charter of King John to the Jews	443
from The Ordinances of Henry III	443
Edward I's Order	443
 MEDIEVAL DRAMA
THE YORK CRUCIFIXION	445
HROSVITHA OF GANERSHEIM (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Abraham
THE WAKEFIELD MASTER	453
The Second Shepherds' Play	454
IN CONTEXT: Biblical Source Material	472
from the Douay-Rheims Bible, Luke 2.8–21	472
EVERYMAN	473

SIR THOMAS MALORY	487
from Morte Darthur	490
from Book 1: From the Marriage of King Uther unto King Arthur	490
Book 4: The Tale of Sir Gareth of Orkney (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Book 5: Sir Tristram de Lyones (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Book 6: The Noble Tale of the Sankgreal (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Book 7: The Tale of Sir Launcelot and Queen Guinevere
(sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Book 8: The Death of King Arthur	497
IN CONTEXT: Early Editions of Morte Darthur	538
Caxton's Preface	538
Illustrating Morte Darthur	541

THE RENAISSANCE AND THE EARLY SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

INTRODUCTION TO THE RENAISSANCE AND THE EARLY SEVENTEENTH CENTURY	542
Humanism	544
Scientific Inquiry	545
The Reformation in England	547
Wales, Scotland, Ireland	552
Edward VI, Mary I, and Elizabeth I	555
Elizabeth I and Gender	555
Homoeroticism and Cross-Dressing	559
Economy and Society in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries	561
"The Round Earth's Imagined Corners"	570
The Stuarts and the Civil Wars	572
Literary Genres	577
Literature in Prose and the Development of Print Culture	577
Poetry	584
The Drama	587
The English Language in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries	591

HISTORY OF THE LANGUAGE AND OF PRINT CULTURE	594
--	-----

SIR THOMAS MORE (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
(Also available as a stand-alone volume) from Utopia: The Best State of a Commonwealth and the New Island of Utopia
from Book 1
from Book 2
Chapter 1
from Chapter 2: The Cities, and Especially Amaurote from Chapter 4: Crafts and Occupations from Chapter 5: Their Dealings With One Another from Chapter 6: Traveling from Chapter 7: Slavery

from Chapter 8: Warfare from Chapter 9: The Religions in Utopia
WILLIAM TYNDALE	596
Tyndale's English Bible, King James Bible, Geneva Bible, Douay-Rheims Bible	599
Genesis: Chapter 1	599
Matthew: Chapter 5	603
SIR THOMAS WYATT	610
Sonnets	611
10 ("The long love that in my thought doth harbour")	611
29 ("The pillar perished is whereto I leant")	611
31 ("Farewell, Love, and all thy laws forever")	611
Epigrams	612
38 ("Alas, madam, for stealing of a kiss")	612
48 ("Vulcan begat me; Minerva me taught")	612
60 ("Tagus, farewell, that westward with thy streams")	612
Ballads	612
80 ("They flee from me that sometime did me seek")	612
94 ("Blame not my lute, for he must sound")	613
Songs	613
109 ("My lute, awake! Perform the last")	613
123 ("Who list his wealth and ease retain")	614
Epistolary Satires	614
149 ("Mine own John Poyns, since ye delight to know")	614
IN CONTEXT: Epistolary Advice	616
HENRY HOWARD, EARL OF SURREY	619
Love, that Doth Reign and Live within My Thought	620
Set Me Whereas the Sun Doth Parch the Green	620
Alas! So All Things Now Do Hold Their Peace	621
So Cruel Prison How Could Betide	621
Wyatt Resteth Here	622
from Certain Books of Virgil's Aeneis: Book 2	622
THE ELIZABETHAN SONNET AND LYRIC	624
The Continental Background	625
Francesco Petrarch	625
from Rime Sparse	625
134 ("Pace non trovo et non ò da far guerra")	625
134 ("I find no peace and all my war is done")	625
140 ("Amor, che nel penser mio vive et regna")	626
140 ("Love, that doth reign and live within my thought")	626
189 ("Passa la nave mia colma d'oblio")	626
189 ("My galley chargèd with forgetfulness")	626
190 ("Una candida cerva sopra l'erba")	627

190 ("Whoso list to hunt, I know where is a hind")	627
Gaspara Stampa	627
132 ("Quando io dimando nel mio pianto Amore")	627
132 ("When in my weeping I inquire of Love")	627
Joachim Du Bellay	628
from L'Olive augmentée	628
113 ("Si nostre vie est moins qu'une journée")	628
113 ("If this, our life, be less than but a day")	628
from Les Regrets	628
31 ("Heureux qui, comme Ulysse, a fait un beau voyage")	628
31 ("Blest he who like Ulysses voyaged fair and wide")	628
Pierre de Ronsard	629
("Je vouldroy bien richement jaunissant")	629
("I would in rich and golden coloured rain")	629
("Quand vous serez bien vieille, au soir à la chandelle")	630
("When you are very old, by candle's flame")	630
Anne Lock	630
from A Meditation of a Penitent Sinner	630
("Long have I heard, and yet I hear the sounds")	630
("Look on me, Lord: though trembling I beknowe")	630
Samuel Daniel	631
from Delia	631
6 ("Fair is my love, and cruel as she's fair")	631
28 ("Raising my hopes on hills of high desire")	631
33 ("When men shall find thy flower, thy glory pass")	631
Michael Drayton	631
from Idea	631
6 ("How many paltry, foolish, painted things")	631
61 ("Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part")	631
63 ("Truce, gentle Love, a parley now I crave")	632
William Shakespeare	632
from Romeo and Juliet (Act 1, Scene 5)	632
Sir John Davies	632
from Gulling Sonnets	632
3 ("What eagle can behold her sun-bright eye")	632
John Davies of Hereford	632
from The Scourge of Villany	632
("If there were, oh! an Hellespont of cream")	633
Richard Barnfield	633
from Cynthia	633
14 ("Here, hold this glove (this milk-white cheverel glove)")	633
17 ("Cherry-lipped Adonis in his snowy shape")	633
George Gascoigne	633
Gascoigne's Lullaby	633

Anonymous	634
Ode ("Absence, hear thou my protestation")	636
LITERATURE IN IRELAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES	635
Ireland and Scotland	637
Gofraidh Fionn Ó Dálaigh	637
from "To Domhnall"	637
Isabel, Countess of Argyll	639
There's a young man in pursuit of me / Atá fleasgach ar mo thí	640
Woe to the one whose sickness is love / Is mairg dá ngalar an grádh	640
Woe to the One Whose Sickness Is Love (alternative translation)	641
Anonymous	641
Lament for MacGregor of Glenstrae, who was beheaded in 1570	641
Tadhg Dall Ó hUiginn	642
from "The Battle of Drumleene"	642
Enniskillen	643
A Satire	647
Geoffrey Keating	648
O Woman Full of Wiles	648
Bear with Thee, O Letter, My Blessing	649
On the Miseries of Ireland	649
from History of Ireland	650
Dáibhí Ó Bruadair	651
Gone Are All the Noble Poets	651
After the Death of the Poets	651
Geoffrey O'Donoghue of the Glens	651
This caps all their tricks, this statute from overseas	652
Aodhagán Ó Rathaille	652
The Ruin that Befell the Great Families of Ireland	652
Lady Anne Lindsay	654
Auld Robin Gray	654
IN CONTEXT: English Invasions of Ireland (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Edmund Spenser, A View of The Present State of Ireland from Oliver Cromwell, Letter to the English Parliament (17 September 1649) from Father Thomas Quinn, Letter to the Vatican (28 August 1656)
Wales	655
Dafydd ap Gwilym	655
The Skylark	655
The Gull	656
Trouble at an Inn	656
Morfudd Like the Sun	657
The Mirror	658
The Ruin	659
The Poet and the Grey Friar	659

Tudur Penyllyn	661
Conversation between a Welshman and an Englishwoman / Ymddiddan Rhwyng Cymro a Saesnes	661
Gwerful Mechain	662
To the Vagina	662
To Her Husband, for Beating Her	663
White Flour, Earthflesh, Cold Fleece	663
Christ's Suffering (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Elis Gruffydd	663
from Chronicle	664
The Story of Gwion Bach, Who Became Taliesin (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Llywelyn and the Fool	664
Siôn Cent	665
from The Illusion of the World / Hud a Lliw y Byd	665
EDMUND SPENSER	667
from The Faerie Queene	668
from Book 1	670
Canto 1	671
Canto 2	678
Canto 3	685
Canto 4	691
Canto 5: Summary	698
Canto 6: Summary	698
Canto 7: Summary	698
Canto 7 (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Canto 8: Summary	699
Canto 8 (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
from Canto 9	699
Canto 9 (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Canto 10: Summary	704
Canto 10 (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Canto 11	704
from Book 2	712
from Canto 12	712
from Book 3 (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Canto 6
Letter to Sir Walter Raleigh on The Faerie Queene	718
IN CONTEXT: The Redcrosse Knight (Illustration)	722
IN CONTEXT: Christian Armor	722
from Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians, 6.11–17 (Geneva Bible)	722
from Desiderius Erasmus, Enchiridion militis Christiani [Handbook of the Christian Soldier]	723

IN CONTEXT: Spirituality and The Faerie Queene	724
Heading to the Song of Solomon (Geneva Bible)	724
from Amoretti	725
1 ("Happy ye leaves when as those lilly hands")	725
3 ("The soverayne beauty which I doo admyre")	725
6 ("Be nought dismayd that her unmovèd mind")	725
15 ("Ye tradefull Merchants, that with weary toyle")	725
22 ("This holy season fit to fast and pray")	725
26 ("Sweet is the Rose, but growes upon a brere")	726
34 ("Lyke as a ship that through the Ocean wyde")	726
37 ("What guyle is this, that those her golden tresses")	726
54 ("Of this worlds Theatre in which we stay")	726
64 ("Comming to kisse her lyps, (such grace I found)")	726
67 ("Lyke as a hunstman after weary chace")	727
68 ("Most glorious Lord of lyfe that on this day")	727
69 ("The famous warriors of the anticke world")	727
70 ("Fresh spring the herald of loves mighty king")	727
74 ("Most happy letters fram'd by skilfull trade")	727
75 ("One day I wrote her name upon the strand")	728
80 ("After so long a race as I have run")	728
82 ("Joy of my life, full oft for loving you")	728
89 ("Lyke as the Culver on the barèd bough")	728
Epithalamion (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
SIR PHILIP SIDNEY	729
from Astrophil and Stella	731
1 ("Loving in truth, and fain in verse my love to show")	731
2 ("Not at first sight, nor with a dribbèd shot")	731
7 ("When Nature made her chief work, Stella's eyes")	731
18 ("With what sharp checks I in myself am shent")	731
20 ("Fly, fly, my friends, I have my death wound; fly!")	731
21 ("Your words, my friend, (right healthful caustics) blame")	732
22 ("In highest way of heav'n the Sun did ride")	732
23 ("The curious wits seeing dull pensiveness")	732
24 ("Rich fools there be, whose base and filthy heart")	732
25 ("The wisest scholar of the wight most wise")	733
26 ("Though dusty wits dare scorn astrology")	733
27 ("Because I oft in dark abstracted guise")	733
31 ("With how sad steps, oh Moon, thou climb'st the skies")	733
34 ("Come, let me write. 'And to what end?' To ease")	733
39 ("Come, Sleep! O Sleep, the certain knot of peace")	733
41 ("Having this day my horse, my hand, my lance")	734
45 ("Stella oft sees the very face of woe")	734
47 ("What, have I thus betrayed my liberty?")	734
48 ("Soul's joy, bend not those morning stars from me")	734

49 ("I on my horse, and Love on me doth try")	735
50 ("Stella, the fullness of my thoughts of thee")	735
51 ("Pardon mine ears, both I and they do pray")	735
52 ("A strife is grown between Virtue and Love")	735
53 ("In marital sports I have my cunning tried")	735
54 ("Because I breathe not love to every one")	736
55 ("Muses, I oft invoked your holy aid")	736
61 ("Oft with true sighs, oft with uncallèd tears")	736
69 ("O joy too high for my low style to show!")	736
71 ("Who will in fairest book of Nature know")	736
94 ("Grief find the words, for thou hast made my brain")	737
95 ("Yet Sighs, dear Sighs, indeed true friends you are")	737
96 ("Thought, with good cause thou lik'st so well the Night")	737
97 ("Dian, that fain would cheer her friend the Night")	737
98 ("Ah bed, the field where joy's peace some do see")	738
99 ("When far-spent night persuades each mortal eye")	738
100 ("Oh tears, no tears, but rain from Beauty's skies")	738
101 ("Stella is sick, and in that sickbed lies")	738
102 ("Where be those roses gone, which sweetened so our eyes?")	738
103 ("Oh happy Thames, that didst my Stella bear")	739
104 ("Envious wits, what hath been mine offence")	739
105 ("Unhappy sight, and hath she vanished by")	739
106 ("Oh absent presence, Stella is not here")	739
107 ("Stella, since thou so right a princess art")	740
108 ("When Sorrow (using mine own fire's might)")	740
from The Defence of Poesy	740
IN CONTEXT: The Abuse of Poesy	755
from Plato, The Republic , from Book 2	755
from Stephen Gosson, The School of Abuse	757 from The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
from Book 1
IN CONTEXT: An Emblem Honoring Sir Philip Sidney (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
from Geoffrey Whitney, A Choice of Emblems
ELIZABETH I, QUEEN OF ENGLAND	759
Written on a Wall at Woodstock	760
Written in Her French Psalter	761
The Doubt of Future Foes	761
On Monsieur's Departure	761
Poems Exchanged between Sir Walter Raleigh and Elizabeth I	761
[Raleigh to Elizabeth]	762
[Elizabeth to Raleigh]	762
When I Was Fair and Young	763
To Our Most Noble and Virtuous Queen Katherine	763

The answer of the Queen's Highness to the petitions proponed unto her by the Lower House concerning her marriage (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Letters to the Duke of Anjou (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Speech to the House of Commons, 28 January 1563	764
from Speech to a Parliamentary Delegation, 5 November 1566	766
IN CONTEXT: Elizabeth and Marriage (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) Letter to Elizabeth I from William Cecil, Lord Burghley Regarding Her Proposed Marriage
from Speech to Parliament, 29 March 1586	768
IN CONTEXT: Elizabeth and Catholicism (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Pope Pius V, The Bull of Excommunication Against Elizabeth
Elizabeth and Mary, Queen of Scots	769
from Letter from Elizabeth I to Mary, Queen of Scots, 24 February 1567	769
Letter from Elizabeth I to Mary, Queen of Scots, 12 October 1586	770
Letter from Mary, Queen of Scots to Henry III, 8 February 1587	771
Letter from Elizabeth I to James VI, 14 February 1587	771
To the Troops at Tilbury	772
IN CONTEXT: The Speech at Tilbury (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Thomas Deloney, "The Queen's Visiting of the Camp at Tilbury"
Two Letters from Elizabeth to Catherine de Bourbon	772
Letter from Elizabeth I to Essex in Ireland, 19 July 1599	773
IN CONTEXT: Tyrone's Rebellion (The Nine Years' War)
(sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
[Articles intended to be stood upon by Tyrone, Nov–Dec 1599]
The Golden Speech	776
IN CONTEXT: The Defeat of the Spanish Armada	778
CONTEXTS: CULTURE: A PORTFOLIO	780
Music	780
from Izaak Walton, The Compleat Angler	781
Painting	781
from Nicholas Hilliard, A Treatise Concerning the Art of Limning	782
from A Letter to F.P. Verney from the Countess of Sussex	782
Oliver Cromwell, Instructions to His Painter, as Reported by George Vertue, Notebooks	782
Games and Pastimes	783
Selected Illustrations	783
Food and Drink	785
from An Anonymous Venetian Official Traveling in England, A Relation, or Rather a True Account, of the Island of England	786
from Fynes Moryson, Itinerary	786
Selected Illustrations	787
from Sarah Longe, Mrs. Sarah Longe Her Receipt Book	787
from William Harrison, Chronologie	787

Children and Education	787
Selected Illustrations	788
The Supernatural and the Miraculous	790
from Reginald Scot, The Discovery of Witchcraft	791
from George Gifford, A Discourse of the Subtle Practices of Devils by Witches and Sorcerers	791
from Joseph Hall, Characters of Virtues and Vices	792
from Sir John Harington, "Account of an Audience with King James I," as recorded in Nugae Antiquae	792
Anonymous Broadsheet, "The Form and Shape of a Monstrous Child"	793
Crime	793
Selected Illustration	794
from "A True Report of the Late Horrible Murder Committed by William Sherwood"	794
Print and Manuscript Culture	795
Selected Illustrations	795
Emblems	801
from Geffrey Whitney, A Choice of Emblems	801
 AEMILIA LANYER	 804
To the Virtuous Reader	805
Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum [complete text] (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum	806
"Invocation"	806
"Eve's Apology in Defense of Women"	806
The Description of Cooke-ham	807
To the Doubtful Reader	810
 SIR WALTER RALEGH	 811
A Vision upon this Conceit of the Fairy Queen	812
Sir Walter Raleigh to His Son	812
The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd	813
The Lie	813
Nature that Washed Her Hands in Milk	814
[The Author's Epitaph, Made by Himself]	815
from The Discovery of the Large, Rich, and Beautiful Empire of Guiana	815
Part 1, Preface	815
from Part 5	816
Letter to His Wife	821
 FRANCIS BACON	 823
from Essays	825
Of Truth	825
Of Marriage and Single Life	826
Of Studies (1597)	827

Of Studies (1625)	828
Of Love	829
CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE	831
Hero and Leander	832
The Passionate Shepherd to His Love	845
The Tragical History of Doctor Faustus ("A" Text)	846
IN CONTEXT: Dr. Faustus	875
from Anonymous, The History of the Damnable Life, and Deserved Death of Dr. John Faustus	875
from Henricus Cornelius Agrippa, De Occulta Philosophia (Of Occult Philosophy)	878
In Context: Dr. Faustus , the "B" Text (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE	880
Sonnets	884
1 ("From fairest creatures we desire increase")	886
2 ("When forty winters shall besiege thy brow")	886
12 ("When I do count the clock that tells the time")	886
15 ("When I consider everything that grows")	886
16 ("But wherefore do not you a mightier way")	887
18 ("Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?")	887
19 ("Devouring time, blunt thou the lion's paws")	887
20 ("A woman's face with nature's own hand painted")	887
23 ("As an unperfect actor on the stage")	888
29 ("When in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes")	888
30 ("When to the sessions of sweet silent thought")	888
33 ("Full many a glorious morning have I seen")	888
35 ("No more be grieved at that which thou hast done")	889
36 ("Let me confess that we two must be twain")	889
55 ("Not marble, nor the gilded monuments")	889
60 ("Like as the waves make towards the pebbled shore")	889
64 ("When I have seen by time's fell hand defaced")	890
65 ("Since brass, nor stone, nor earth, nor boundless sea")	890
71 ("No longer mourn for me when I am dead")	890
73 ("That time of year thou mayst in me behold")	890
74 ("But be contented when that fell arrest")	891
80 ("O how I faint when I of you do write")	891
87 ("Farewell—thou art too dear for my possessing")	891
93 ("So shall I live supposing thou art true")	891
94 ("They that have power to hurt and will do none")	892
97 ("How like a winter hath my absence been")	892
98 ("From you have I been absent in the spring")	892
105 ("Let not my love be called idolatry")	892
106 ("When in the chronicle of wasted time")	893

109 ("O never say that I was false of heart")	893
110 ("Alas, 'tis true, I have gone here and there")	893
116 ("Let me not to the marriage of true minds")	893
117 ("Accuse me thus: that I have scanted all")	894
127 ("In the old age black was not counted fair")	894
128 ("How oft when thou, my music, music play'st")	894
129 ("Th'expense of spirit in a waste of shame")	894
130 ("My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun")	895
135 ("Whoever hath her wish, thou hast thy Will")	895
136 ("If thy soul check thee that I come so near")	895
138 ("When my love swears that she is made of truth")	895
143 ("Lo, as a careful housewife runs to catch")	895
144 ("Two loves I have, of comfort and despair")	896
146 ("Poor soul, the centre of my sinful earth")	896
147 ("My love is as a fever, longing still")	896
153 ("Cupid laid by his brand, and fell asleep")	897
154 ("The little love-god lying once asleep")	897
Twelfth Night (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
(Also available as a stand-alone volume)
The Merchant of Venice (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
(Also available as a stand-alone volume)
IN CONTEXT: Jews and Christians (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
King Lear (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
(Also available as a stand-alone volume)
IN CONTEXT: The Shakespearean Theater (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)

BEN JONSON	900
To the Reader	902
To My Book	902
On Something that Walks Somewhere	902
To William Camden	903
On My First Daughter	903
To John Donne	903
On My First Son	903
On Lucy, Countess of Bedford	904
Inviting a Friend to Supper	904
To Penshurst	905
Song: To Celia	906
To the Memory of My Beloved, The Author, Mr. William Shakespeare, And What He Hath Left Us	907
Ode to Himself	908
My Picture Left in Scotland	909
To the Immortal Memory and Friendship of That Noble Pair, Sir Lucius Cary and Sir H. Morison	909
Karolin's Song	911

Hymn to Cynthia	911
Clerimont's Song	912
JOHN DONNE	913
from Songs and Sonnets	915
The Good-Morrow	915
Song ("Go, and catch a falling star")	915
Woman's Constancy	915
The Sun Rising	916
The Canonization	916
Song ("Sweetest love, I do not go")	917
Air and Angels	918
Break of Day	918
The Anniversary	918
Twicknam Garden	919
A Valediction: of Weeping	919
The Flea	920
A Nocturnal upon St. Lucy's Day, Being the Shortest Day	920
The Bait	921
The Apparition	921
A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning	922
The Ecstasy	922
The Relic	923
from Elegies	924
1: Jealousy	924
8: The Comparison	924
19: To His Mistress Going to Bed	925
from Satires	926
3 ("Kind pity chokes my spleen; brave scorn forbids")	926
from Verse Letters	928
To Sir Henry Wotton	928
An Anatomy of the World: The First Anniversary	929
from Holy Sonnets	935
2 ("As due by many titles I resign")	935
5 ("I am a little world made cunningly")	935
6 ("This is my play's last scene, here heavens appoint")	935
7 ("At the round earth's imagined corners, blow")	935
9 ("If poisonous minerals, and if that tree")	936
10 ("Death be not proud, though some have called thee")	936
13 ("What if this present were the world's last night?")	936
14 ("Batter my heart, three personed God; for you")	938
18 ("Show me, dear Christ, Thy spouse, so bright and clear")	938
19 ("Oh, to vex me, contraries meet in one")	938
Good Friday, 1613. Riding Westward	939
A Hymn to God the Father	939

Hymn to God, My God, in My Sickness	940
from Devotions	940
Meditation 17	940
LADY MARY WROTH	942
from Pamphilia to Amphilanthus	943
1 ("When night's black mantle could most darkness prove")	943
6 ("My pain, still smothered in my grieved breast")	943
7 ("Love leave to urge, thou know'st thou hast the hand")	944
13 ("Dear, famish not what you your self gave food")	944
14 ("Am I thus conquered? have I lost the powers")	944
15 ("Truly poor Night thou welcome art to me")	944
22 ("Like to the Indians, scorched with the sun")	944
23 ("When every one to pleasing pastime hies")	945
35 ("False hope which feeds but to destroy, and spill")	945
Song [Love, a child, is ever crying]	945
A Crown of Sonnets Dedicated to Love	945
77 ("In this strange labyrinth how shall I turn?")	945
78 ("Is to leave all, and take the thread of love")	946
79 ("His flames are joys, his bands true lovers' might")	946
80 ("And be in his brave court a glorious light")	946
81 ("And burn, yet burning you will love the smart")	946
82 ("He may our prophet, and our tutor prove")	946
83 ("How blest be they, then, who his favours prove")	947
84 ("He that shuns love, doth love himself the less")	947
85 ("But where they may return with honour's grace")	947
86 ("Be from the court of Love, and Reason torn")	947
87 ("Unprofitably pleasing, and unsound")	947
88 ("Be giv'n to him who triumphs in his right")	948
89 ("Free from all fogs, but shining fair, and clear")	948
90 ("Except my heart, which you bestowed before")	948
Railing Rhymes Returned upon the Author by Mistress Mary Wroth	948
IN CONTEXT: The Occasion of "Railing Rhymes"	949
Edward Denny, Baron of Waltham, "To Pamphilia from the Father-in-Law of Seralius"	949
THOMAS HOBBS	950
from Leviathan; Or the Matter, Form, & Power of a Commonwealth, Ecclesiastical and Civil	951
The Introduction	951
Chapter 13: Of the Natural Condition of Mankind as Concerning Their Felicity and Misery	952

ROBERT HERRICK	955
The Argument of His Book	956
Delight in Disorder	956
His Farewell to Sack	957
Corinna's Going A-Maying	958
To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time	959
The Hock-Cart, or Harvest Home	959
Upon Julia's Clothes	960
GEORGE HERBERT	961
The Altar	962
Redemption	962
Easter Wings	963
Affliction (1)	964
Prayer (1)	965
The Temper (1)	965
Jordan (1)	965
Church-Monuments	966
The Windows	966
Denial	967
Vanity (1)	967
Virtue	968
The Pearl	968
Man	969
Jordan (2)	969
Time	970
The Bunch of Grapes	970
The Collar	971
The Pulley	971
The Flower	972
Discipline	972
Death	973
Love (3)	973
ANDREW MARVELL	974
The Coronet	975
Bermudas	976
A Dialogue between the Soul and Body	976
The Nymph Complaining for the Death of Her Fawn	977
To His Coy Mistress	979
The Picture of Little T.C. in a Prospect of Flowers	980
The Mower against Gardens	980
Damon the Mower	981
The Garden	983
An Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland	984

KATHERINE PHILIPS	987
A Married State	988
Upon the Double Murder of King Charles	989
On the Third of September, 1651	989
To My Excellent Lucasia, on Our Friendship	990
Friendship's Mystery, To My Dearest Lucasia	990
On the Death of My First and Dearest Child, Hector Philips	991
Friendship in Emblem, or the Seal, To My Dearest Lucasia	991
JOHN MILTON	993
L'Allegro	995
Il Penseroso	998
Lycidas	1001
Sonnets	1004
7 ("How soon hath Time the subtle thief of youth")	1004
16: To the Lord General Cromwell	1005
18: On the Late Massacre in Piedmont	1005
19 ("When I consider how my light is spent")	1005
23 ("Methought I saw my late espoused saint")	1006
from Areopagitica: A Speech of Mr. John Milton for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing, to the Parliament of England	1006
from Paradise Lost	1015
The Verse	1017
Argument to Book 1	1017
Book 1	1017
Argument to Book 2	1030
Book 2	1030
Argument to Book 3	1044
from Book 3	1045
Argument to Book 4	1050
Book 4	1050
Argument to Book 5	1064
from Book 5	1064
Argument to Book 6	1065
Argument to Book 7	1066
from Book 7	1066
Argument to Book 8	1066
from Book 8	1067
Argument to Book 9	1071
Book 9	1071
Argument to Book 10	1086
Book 10	1086
Argument to Book 11	1101
Argument to Book 12	1101
from Book 12	1101

IN CONTEXT: Illustrating Paradise Lost	1105
Samson Agonistes (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
IN CONTEXT: The Biblical Version of the Samson Story (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)

THE RESTORATION AND THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

INTRODUCTION TO THE RESTORATION AND THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY	1108
Religion, Government, and Party Politics	1109
Empiricism, Skepticism, and Religious Dissent	1112
Industry, Commerce, and the Middle Class	1115
Ethical Dilemmas in a Changing Nation	1119
Print Culture	1124
Poetry	1128
Theater	1132
The Novel	1135
The Development of the English Language	1142
HISTORY OF THE LANGUAGE AND OF PRINT CULTURE	1145
MARGARET CAVENDISH	1146
The Poetess's Hasty Resolution	1148
An Excuse for so Much Writ Upon My Verses	1148
A World Made by Atoms	1148
The Four Principal Figured Atoms Make the Four Elements, as Square, Round, Long, and Sharp	1149
What Atoms Make a Palsy, or Apoplexy	1149
All Things Are Governed by Atoms	1149
The Motion of the Blood	1150
Of Many Worlds in this World	1150
A World in an Earring	1150
A Dialogue betwixt the Body and the Mind	1151
A Dialogue between an Oak, and a Man Cutting Him Down	1152
A Dialogue betwixt Peace, and War	1154
Earth's Complaint	1155
The Hunting of the Hare	1155
Nature's Cook	1156
A Woman Drest by Age	1157
Of the Theme of Love	1157
from The Description of a New World, Called the Blazing World	1157
from Sociable Letters	1163
55	1163
143	1164
163	1164

JOHN DRYDEN	1165
Absalom and Achitophel: A Poem	1167
Mac Flecknoe	1182
To the Memory of Mr. Oldham	1186
A Song for St. Cecilia's Day	1187
from An Essay of Dramatic Poesy	1188
SAMUEL PEPYS	1199
from The Diary	1201
IN CONTEXT: Other Accounts of the Great Fire	1225
from The London Gazette (3–10 September 1666)	1225
APHRA BEHN	1230
The Disappointment	1231
Oroonoko; or, The Royal Slave. A True History	1233
WILLIAM WYCHERLEY	1270
The Country Wife	1271
JOHN WILMOT, EARL OF ROCHESTER	1323
A Satire on Charles II	1324
A Satire against Reason and Mankind	1325
Love and Life: A Song	1327
The Disabled Debauchee	1328
A Letter from Artemisia in the Town to Chloe in the Country	1329
The Imperfect Enjoyment	1332
Impromptu on Charles II	1333
IN CONTEXT: The Lessons of Rochester's Life	1334
DANIEL DEFOE	1335
A True Relation of the Apparition of One Mrs. Veal	1337
from Robinson Crusoe	1342
from Chapter 3	1342
Chapter 4	1346
Chapter 5	1356
Chapter 6	1363
IN CONTEXT: Illustrating Robinson Crusoe	1370
from A Journal of the Plague Year	1372
ANNE FINCH, COUNTESS OF WINCHILSEA	1382
from The Spleen: A Pindaric Poem	1383
The Introduction	1384
A Letter to Daphnis	1385
To Mr. F., Now Earl of W.	1385
The Unequal Fetters	1387

By neer resemblance that Bird betray'd	1387
A Nocturnal Reverie	1388
JONATHAN SWIFT	1389
The Progress of Beauty	1391
A Description of a City Shower	1392
Stella's Birthday, written in the year 1718	1393
Stella's Birthday (1727)	1394
The Lady's Dressing Room	1395
Verses on the Death of Dr. Swift	1397
from Gulliver's Travels	1405
Part 1: A Voyage to Lilliput	1407
Part 2: A Voyage to Brobdingnag	1436
Part 3: A Voyage to Laputa (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Part 4: A Voyage to the Country of The Houyhnhnms	1468
A Modest Proposal	1503
IN CONTEXT: Sermons and Tracts: Backgrounds to A Modest Proposal	1508
from Jonathan Swift, "Causes of the Wretched Condition of Ireland"	1508
from Jonathan Swift, A Short View of the State of Ireland	1510
ALEXANDER POPE	1513
An Essay on Criticism [complete text] (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
from An Essay on Criticism	1515
The Rape of the Lock: An Heroi-Comical Poem in Five Cantos	1521
Elegy to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady	1534
Eloisa To Abelard	1535
from An Essay on Man	1540
The Design	1540
Epistle 1	1541
Epistle 2	1545
An Epistle from Mr. Pope to Dr. Arbuthnot	1549
LADY MARY WORTLEY MONTAGU	1557
Saturday; The Small Pox	1558
The Reasons that Induced Dr. S. to Write a Poem Called The Lady's Dressing Room	1560
The Lover: A Ballad	1561
Epistle from Mrs. Y[onge] to Her Husband	1562
Selected Letters (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
To Wortley, 28 March 1710
To Philippa Mundy, 25 September 1711
To Philippa Mundy, c. 2 November 1711
To Wortley, c. 26 July 1712
From Wortley, 13 August 1712
To Wortley, 15 August 1712
To Lady Mar, 17 November 1716

To Lady——, 1 April 1717
To Lady Mar, 1 April 1717
To [Sarah Chiswell], 1 April 1717
To Alexander Pope, September 1718
To Sir James Steuart, 14 November 1758
ELIZA HAYWOOD	1564
Fantomina: or, Love in a Maze	1565
IN CONTEXT: The Eighteenth-Century Sexual Imagination	1580
from A Present for a Servant-Maid	1580
from Venus in the Cloister; or, The Nun in Her Smock	1583
CONTEXTS: PRINT CULTURE, STAGE CULTURE	1584
from Nahum Tate, The History of King Lear	1586
from Act 5	1586
from Colley Cibber, An Apology for the Life of Mr. Colley Cibber	1587
from Jeremy Collier, A Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage	1588
Introduction	1588
from Chapter 1: The Immodesty of the Stage	1588
from Chapter 4: The Stage-Poets Make Their Principal Persons Vicious and Reward Them at the End of the Play	1589
from Joseph Addison, The Spectator No. 18 (21 March 1711)	1590
from The Licensing Act of 1737	1591
from The Statute of Anne	1592
from James Boswell, The Life of Samuel Johnson	1594
Joseph Addison, The Tatler No. 224 (14 September 1710)	1594
from Samuel Johnson, The Idler No. 30 (11 November 1758)	1596
from Clara Reeve, The Progress of Romance	1597
from James Lackington, Memoirs of the Forty-Five First Years of the Life of James Lackington, Bookseller	1598
from Thomas Erskine, Speech as Prosecution in the Seditious-Libel Trial of Thomas Williams for Publishing Age of Reason, by Thomas Paine	1600
CONTEXTS: EARLY EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY PERIODICALS	1601
Daniel Defoe, Introduction, A Weekly Review of the Affairs of France No. 1 (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Richard Steele, The Tatler No. 21 [The Gentleman; The Pretty Fellow] (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
from Joseph Addison, The Tatler No. 155 [The Political Upholsterer] (6 April 1710)	1603
from The Female Tatler No. 1 [Introduction, Advertisement] (8 July 1709)	1604
Richard Steele, The Spectator No. 11 [Inkle and Yarico] (13 March 1711)	1606
Joseph Addison, The Spectator No. 112 [Sir Roger at Church] (19 July 1711)	1609

from Joseph Addison, The Spectator No. 127 [On the Hoop Petticoat] (26 July 1711)	1609
John Hughes, The Spectator No. 302 [Emilia] (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
The Walpole Print War (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Bolingbroke, "Remarks on the History of England: Letter 5," The Craftsman No. 215
James Pitt, "A Continuation of the Observations on Mr. Oldcastle's Remarks upon the English History," The London Journal No. 577
Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, The Nonsense of Common-Sense No. 5 (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
[On Publishing] (17 January 1738) from Eliza Haywood, The Female Spectator Book 1 [The Author's Intent] (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
from Eliza Haywood, The Female Spectator Book 1 [Erminia] (April 1744)	1615
Samuel Johnson, The Rambler No. 148 [On Parental Tyranny] (17 August 1751) (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Samuel Richardson, The Rambler No. 97 [Change in the Manners of Women] (19 February 1751) (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Samuel Johnson, The Rambler No. 114 [On Capital Punishment] (20 April 1751). 1617
Samuel Johnson, The Rambler No. 170 [Misella, A Prostitute] and No. 171 [Misella's Story Continued] (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Henry Fielding, The Covent-Garden Journal No. 4 [A Modern Glossary] (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Henry Fielding, The Covent-Garden Journal No. 6 [Mortality of Print] (21 January 1752) (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
JAMES THOMSON	1621
Winter	1622
Rule, Britannia	1628
SAMUEL JOHNSON	1629
The Vanity of Human Wishes	1631
On the Death of Dr. Robert Levett	1636
from The Rambler	1636
No. 4 [On Fiction] (31 March 1750)	1636
No. 60 [On Biography] (13 October 1750)	1639
No. 155 [On Becoming Acquainted with Our Real Characters] (10 September 1751)	1641
from The Idler	1644
No. 31 [On Idleness] (18 November 1758)	1644
No. 49 [Will Marvel] (24 March 1759)	1645
No. 81 [On Native Americans] (3 November 1759)	1646
from A Dictionary of the English Language	1648
from The Preface	1648
Selected Entries	1650

from The Preface to The Works of William Shakespeare	1651
from Lives of the English Poets	1658
from John Milton	1658
from Alexander Pope	1662
Letters	1665
To Mrs. Thrale, 10 July 1780	1665
To Mrs. Thrale, 19 June 1783	1666
To Mrs. Thrale, 2 July 1784	1667
To Mrs. Thrale, 8 July 1784	1667
THOMAS GRAY	1669
Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College	1670
Ode on the Death of a Favourite Cat	1672
Sonnet on the Death of Mr. Richard West	1672
Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard	1673
The Bard (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
CHRISTOPHER SMART	1676
from Jubilate Agno	1677
[My Cat Jeoffry]	1677
CONTEXTS: TRANSATLANTIC CURRENTS	1679
Slavery	1681
from Richard Ligon, A True & Exact History of the Island of Barbados	1681
from John Woolman, "Considerations on the Keeping of Negroes"	1682 from John Bicknell and Thomas Day, "The Dying Negro, A Poem" (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from William Cowper, The Task (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Book 2
from Book 4
Hannah More, "Slavery: A Poem"	1684
Ann Yearsley, "A Poem on the Inhumanity of the Slave-Trade"	1688
Immigration to America	1694
from Ebenezer Cooke, The Sotweed Factor (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
from William Moraley, The Infortunate: The Voyage and Adventures of William Moraley, an Indentured Servant	1694 from Gottlieb Mittelberger, Journey to Pennsylvania (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
from Lady Lucan, "On the Present State of Ireland"	1696
from Commissioners of the Customs in Scotland, Report on the Examination of the Emigrants from the Counties of Caithness and Sutherland on Board the Ship Bachelor of Leith Bound to Wilmington in North Carolina	1698
from Benjamin Franklin, Information to Those Who Would Remove to America .	1700 from J. Hector St. John Crèvecoeur, Letters from an American Farmer (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Anonymous, Look Before You Leap (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)

from The Preface
from Israel Potter, Life and Remarkable Adventures of Israel R. Potter (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) General Wolfe and the Fall of Quebec (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Tobias Smollett, "Anecdotes Relating to the Battle of Quebec" (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Thomas Cary, "Abram's Plains" (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Horace Walpole, Memoirs of the Last Ten Years of the Reign of King George II (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Colonists and Native People	1703 from Mary Rowlandson, A Narrative of the Captivity and Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from William Penn, "A Letter from William Penn, Proprietary and Governor of Pennsylvania in America, to the Committee of the Free Society of Traders of that Province Residing in London" (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline) from Samson Occom, A Short Narrative of My Life (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
Benjamin Franklin, "Remarks Concerning the Savages of North America" (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
William Wordsworth, "Complaint of a Forsaken Indian Woman" (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
from Susannah Johnson, The Captive American, or A Narrative of the Suffering of Mrs. Johnson During Four Years Captivity with the Indians and French	1704 from the Introduction	1704
from Chapter 1	1704
from Chapter 3	1706
from Chapter 4	1706
from Chapter 5	1706
American Independence	1708
from Edmund Burke, "Speech on Conciliation with the Colonies"	1708 from Samuel Johnson, Taxation No Tyranny; an Answer to the Resolutions and Addresses of the American Congress (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
from Benjamin Franklin, The Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin	1710 from Richard Price, Observations on the Nature of Civil Liberty, the Principles of Government, and the Justice and Policy of the War with America (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
from Part 2
from Section 1, Of the Justice of the War with America from Section 3, Of the Policy of the War with America
Thomas Jefferson, "A Declaration by the Representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress Assembled"	1711

- from Thomas Paine, The American Crisis 1715
- Number 1 1715
- from Richard Price, Observations on the Importance of the American Revolution. 1715
- from Judith Sargent Murray, "The Gleaner Contemplates the Future Prospects of Women in this 'Enlightened Age'" (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)

CONTEXTS: THE ABOLITION OF SLAVERY (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)

- from John Newton, A Slave Trader's Journal
- from Quobna Ottobah Cugoana, Thoughts and Sentiments on the Evil and Wicked Traffic of the Slavery and Commerce of the Human Species
- from Alexander Falconbridge, Account of the Slave Trade on the Coast of Africa
- William Cowper, "Sweet Meat Has Sour Sauce" or, The Slave-Trader in the Dumps
- from William Wilberforce, "Speech to the House of Commons," 13 May 1789
- Proponents of Slavery
 - from Rev. Robert Boncher Nicholls, Observations, Occasioned by the Attempts Made in England to Effect the Abolition of the Slave Trade
 - from Anonymous, Thoughts on the Slavery of Negroes, as It Affects the British Colonies in the West Indies: Humbly Submitted to the Consideration of Both Houses of Parliament
 - from Gordon Turnbull, An Apology of Negro Slavery; or, the West India Planters Vindicated from the Charge of Inhumanity
- from Mary Wollstonecraft, A Vindication of the Rights of Men
- Anna Laetitia Barbauld, "Epistle to William Wilberforce, Esq., on the Rejection of the Bill for Abolishing the Slave Trade"
- William Blake, Images of Slavery
- from Samuel Taylor Coleridge, On the Slave Trade
- from William Earle, Obi; or, the History of Three-Fingered Jack
- Mary Robinson, Poems on Slavery
 - "The African"
 - "The Negro Girl"
- from Dorothy Wordsworth, The Grasmere Journal
- from Thomas Clarkson, The History of the Rise, Progress and Accomplishment of the Abolition of the African Slave Trade
- from Matthew Gregory Lewis, Journal of a West India Proprietor

- WILLIAM COWPER 1718
- Light Shining Out of Darkness 1719
- from The Task (sites.broadviewpress.com/babl)
 - Advertisement
 - from Book 1: The Sofa
 - from Book 6: The Winter Walk at Noon
- The Castaway 1719
- The Retired Cat (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
- On the Loss of the Royal George (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
- My Mary (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)

LABORING-CLASS POETS (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)

- Stephen Duck
 - The Thresher's Labour
- Mary Collier
 - The Woman's Labour: To Mr. Stephen Duck
- Mary Leapor
 - An Epistle to a Lady
 - To a Gentleman with a Manuscript Play
 - Crumble Hall
- Elizabeth Hand
 - On the Supposition of an Advertisement Appearing in a Morning Paper, of the Publication of a Volume of Poems, by a Servant Maid
- Robert Bloomfield
 - The Farmer's Boy

HESTER THRALE PIOZZI (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)

- from Hester Thrale's Journal
 - 31 December 1773
 - 30 September 1774
 - 2 October 1774
 - 23 July 1776
 - 7 January 1777

- OLAUDAH EQUIANO OR GUSTAVUS VASSA 1721
 - from The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano 1722
 - Chapter 1 1722
 - Chapter 2 1729
 - Chapter 5 (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
 - Chapter 7 (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
 - IN CONTEXT: Reactions to Olaudah Equiano's Work 1737
 - from The Analytic Review (May 1789) 1737
 - from The Gentleman's Magazine (June 1789) 1737
 - from The Monthly Review (June 1789) 1738
 - from The General Magazine and Impartial Review (July 1789) 1738

- PHILLIS WHEATLEY 1739
 - To Maecenas 1740
 - To the University of Cambridge, in New-England 1741
 - To the King's Most Excellent Majesty 1742
 - On Being Brought from Africa to America 1742
 - On the Death of a Young Lady of Five Years of Age 1742
 - On the Death of a Young Gentleman 1743
 - An Hymn to the Morning 1743
 - On Recollection 1743
 - On Imagination 1744

To the Right Honourable William, Earl of Dartmouth, His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for North-America	1745
To S.M., a Young African Painter, On Seeing His Works	1746
A Farewell to America. To Mrs. S.W.	1746
To His Excellency General Washington	1748
On the Death of General Wooster	1749
On the Death of the Rev. Mr. George Whitefield	1749
Selected Letters	1752
To Obour Tanner, 19 May 1772	1752
To Selina Hastings, 27 June 1773	1753
To Colonel David Wooster, 18 October 1773	1753
To Obour Tanner, 30 October 1773	1754
To Samson Occom, 11 February 1774	1755
IN CONTEXT: Preface to Phillis Wheatley's Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral	1756
IN CONTEXT: Reactions to Phillis Wheatley's Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral	1757
Letter from Ignatius Sancho to Jabez Fisher, 27 January 1778	1758
from Thomas Jefferson, Notes on the State of Virginia (1784)	1758

APPENDICES

READING POETRY	1760
MAPS	1780
MONARCHS AND PRIME MINISTERS OF GREAT BRITAIN	1788
GLOSSARY OF TERMS	1793
BRITISH MONEY (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
TEXTS AND CONTEXTS: CHRONOLOGICAL CHART (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
BIBLIOGRAPHY (sites.broadviewpress.com/bablonline)
PERMISSIONS ACKNOWLEDGMENTS	1816
INDEX OF FIRST LINES	1819
INDEX OF AUTHORS AND TITLES	1825

PREFACE

CONCISE EDITION

Each of the two volumes of the Concise Edition of The Broadview Anthology of British Literature has now become more popular than any of the six volumes of the full anthology. More and more frequently we hear academics saying that they are reluctant to choose a full anthology—whether the Broadview, the Norton, or another anthology—for a British literature survey course, but that they want a concise anthology that offers more than do competitors such as Norton’s Major Authors edition. The two-volume Concise Edition of The Broadview Anthology is certainly less comprehensive than the full six volumes of The Broadview Anthology—but it nevertheless offers tremendous breadth as well as real depth of coverage.

In preparing this third edition of the Concise Volume A, we have benefited from the advice of academics who gave us feedback not only on the first and second editions of the Concise A, but also on recent editions of the single-period volumes of the full anthology. Some of the most significant changes to this edition of the Concise A were prompted by an article by Matthieu Boyd that appeared in 2013 in the journal Pedagogy: Critical Approaches to Teaching Literature, Language, Composition, and Culture. In “The Languages of British Literature and the Stakes of Anthologies,” Boyd argues that the (then-extant editions of) leading anthologies of British literature—Broadview’s very much included—have been weak in their coverage of Celtic literatures. He makes a persuasive argument—and we were persuaded. We had to admit that, in its first two editions, our anthology had tended to pay too little attention to Celtic literary traditions and, when those traditions were brought in, had tended to focus too much on the ways in which Celtic traditions have influenced English literary traditions, without taking enough account of the intrinsic value of the Celtic literary works themselves. We are now indebted to Boyd for helping us to address these issues; in addition to offering helpful advice he has prepared fresh translations of a number of works for the anthology. Included in the anthology’s Concise form are Boyd’s translations of two of the four branches of the Mabinogi, as well as a selection of Early Irish lyrics; Celtic literature from the fourteenth to eighteenth centuries is represented by a substantial sampling of “Literature in Ireland, Scotland, and Wales.”

A number of other important changes have also been made for this third edition. The Concise volume now offers several additional highlights from the medieval period, including the Exeter Book Riddles, selections from Geoffrey of Monmouth’s A History of the Kings of Britain, Marie de France’s Bisclavret, the York Crucifixion Play, and Everyman. In later periods, authors new to the Concise volume include Margaret Cavendish and Phillis Wheatley. We have also expanded the selection of contextual materials to better represent print culture—in the early modern period with a selection of emblems and manuscripts, and in the early eighteenth century with a “Contexts” section on periodicals. And since the Concise A’s second edition, we have revised our representation of numerous authors—including Julian of Norwich, Thomas Malory, Edmund Spenser, and Philip Sidney—and have expanded our representation of others, including Lady Mary Wroth, George Herbert, John Milton, Elizabeth I, and Thomas Gray.

In order to allow space for this depth and variety without making an already very substantial volume too much longer, we have maintained our practice of leaving many long works out of the bound book portion of the anthology. A number of such works are available both on the anthology’s website and separately as stand-alone editions. Any of those—or any one of our hundreds of other stand-alone editions—may readily be combined with one or more anthology volumes in a shrink-wrapped package at no additional cost to the student. Both through the anthology itself (its bound book and its website components) and through the option of combining the anthology with stand-alone volumes, then, we are trying to offer the greatest possible degree of flexibility to instructors in their choice of longer works.

As in the previous edition of this volume, we have taken a similar approach with Shakespeare. In recognition of the fact that those who wish to teach a Shakespeare play will always be likely to prefer a selection other than the one or two choices provided in an anthology, we provide a very substantial selection of Shakespeare's sonnets within the core anthology, while making available at no additional cost any one of a selection of excellent teaching editions—including King Lear, Twelfth Night, The Merchant of Venice, As You Like It, and A Winter's Tale. Our hope is that by taking this approach we will be able to provide instructors with a Shakespeare play (or plays) that they would really like to teach, without taking up space in the anthology with plays that they have no interest in teaching.

As with the first and second editions, we have been pleased that a substantial majority of those we consulted have shared our own feeling that it would be a shame to take an entirely "major authors" approach to a concise edition—to include only those authors and works already established as canonical. Obviously, the emphasis in any concise anthology will inevitably be more on the canonical than is the case with a more comprehensive anthology. But we have wanted to provide some alternatives for those instructors who prefer, even within the restricted compass of a two-term British literature survey, to teach one or two lesser-known works alongside a good selection of the "greatest hits." Readers will thus find in these pages John Wilmot and Aemelia Lanyer as well as William Shakespeare and Christopher Marlowe; Eliza Haywood and Anne Finch as well as Jonathan Swift and Alexander Pope; Augusta Webster and Algernon Charles Swinburne as well as Alfred, Lord Tennyson and Matthew Arnold; Katherine Mansfield as well as T.S. Eliot and Virginia Woolf.

A particularly well-received feature in the full anthology has been the inclusion of a wealth of contextual materials. Inevitably, many of these have been dropped in the concise edition, but we have resisted any impulse to cut all the "contexts" to make way for the texts themselves; even within the confines of the shorter version of the anthology, we felt it important to offer a selection of materials to help illuminate some of the historical and cultural background.

The central principles of the full anthology are of course retained in this concise edition. The introductory materials and the annotations are unchanged, as are the supplementary materials.

A FRESH APPROACH

To those with some awareness of the abundance of fresh material and lively debate in the field of English Studies in recent generations, it may seem surprising that this abundance has not been more fully reflected in the number of available anthologies. Thirty-five years ago there were two comprehensive anthologies designed for courses surveying British Literature: The Norton Anthology of English Literature and one alternative. In the years before the 2006 publication of The Broadview Anthology there were still two choices available—the Norton and one alternative. Over that time span The Longman Anthology of British Literature had replaced The Oxford Anthology of English Literature in the role of "alternative," but there had been no expansion in range of available choices to match the expansion of content and of approach that had come to characterize the discipline itself. The number of available handbooks and guides to writing had multiplied steadily (to the point where there are literally hundreds of available choices), while the number of comprehensive anthologies of British literature had remained at two.

For those of us who have worked on The Broadview Anthology of British Literature, it is not difficult to understand why. The very expansion of the discipline makes the task of assembling and editing an anthology that fully and vibrantly reflects the ways in which the British literary tradition is studied and taught an extraordinarily daunting one. The sheer amount of work involved is enormous, but so too is the amount of expertise that needs to be called on. With that background very much in mind, we charted a new course when it came to the preparation of The Broadview Anthology of British Literature. Rather than dividing up the work among a relatively small number of academics, and asking each of them to handle on their own the work of choosing, annotating, and preparing introductions to texts in their own areas of specialization, we involved a large number of contributors in the process (as the pages following the title page to this volume attest), and encouraged a high degree of collaboration at every level. First and foremost were (and are) the distinguished academics who serve as our General Editors for the project, but in all there were literally hundreds of people involved at various stages in researching, drafting headnotes or annotations, reviewing material, editing material, and finally carrying out the work of designing and typesetting the texts and other materials. That approach allowed us to draw on a diverse range of talent, and to prepare a large anthology with unusual speed. It also facilitated the maintenance of a high degree of consistency. Material was reviewed and revised in-house at Broadview, by outside editors (chief among them Colleen Franklin, an academic with a wide-ranging background and also a superb copy editor), by a variety of academics with an extraordinarily diverse range of backgrounds and academic specialties, and by our team of General Editors for the project as a whole. The aim was not only to ensure accuracy but also to make sure that the same standards were applied throughout the anthology to matters such as extent and coverage in author introductions, level of annotation, tone of writing, and student accessibility.

We have followed those same principles in the preparation of this third edition. Our General Editors have throughout taken the lead in the process of making selections. Along the way we have been guided by several core principles. We have endeavored to provide a selection that is broadly representative, while also being mindful of the importance of choosing texts that have the capacity to engage readers' interest today. Where inexpensive editions of works are available in our series of paperback Broadview Editions, we have often decided to omit them here, on the grounds that those wishing to teach one or more such works may easily order them in a combination package with the anthology; on these grounds we have decided against including Frankenstein, Pride and Prejudice, or Heart of Darkness. (However, we have included selections from The Last Man to represent Shelley and the first four chapters of Pride and Prejudice to represent Austen.)

Any discussion of what is distinctive about The Broadview Anthology of British Literature must focus above all on the contents. In every section of the anthology there is material that is distinctive and fresh—including not only selections by lesser-known writers but also less familiar selections from canonical writers. The anthology takes a fresh approach also to a great many canonical texts. Perhaps most notably, the Medieval section of the anthology includes not only Roy Liuzza's translation of Beowulf (widely acclaimed as the most engaging and reliable translation available), but also new translations by Liuzza of many other works of Old English poetry and prose. Also included in the Medieval section are new translations by Claire Waters of Marie de France's Lanval and Bisclavret.

In a number of these cases the distinctive form of the anthology facilitates the presentation of content in an engaging and practical fashion. Notably, the adoption of a two-column format allows for some translations (the Waters translation of Marie de France's Lanval, the James Winny translation of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight) to be presented in parallel column format alongside the original texts, enabling readers to experience something of the flavor of the original while providing convenient access to an accessible translation. Similarly, passages from four translations of the Bible are laid out parallel to one another for ready comparison.

The large trim size and two-column format also allow for greater flexibility in the presentation of visual materials. Throughout we have aimed to make this an anthology that is fully alive to the connections between literary and visual culture, from the discussion of the CHI-RHO page of the Lindisfarne Gospels in the Medieval section of the anthology (and the accompanying color illustration) to the inclusion in the twentieth-century section of several skits from "Monty Python's Flying Circus" that may be discussed in connection with film or television versions. Along the way appear several full-page illustrations from the Ellesmere manuscript of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales and illustrations to a wide variety of other works, such as Robinson Crusoe and Gulliver's Travels.

CONTEXTUAL MATERIALS

Visual materials are also an important part of the background materials that form a significant component of the anthology. These materials are presented in two ways. Several "Contexts" sections on particular topics or themes appear in each volume of the anthology. Presented independent of any particular text or author, these include broadly based groupings of material on such topics as "Religion and Spiritual Life," "Print Culture, Stage Culture," "The New Art of Photography," "The Abolition of Slavery," "Work and Poverty in Victorian England," and "The Place of Women in Society." The groups of "In Context" materials each relate to a particular text or author. They range from the genealogical tables provided as a supplement to Beowulf; to materials on "The Eighteenth-Century Sexual Imagination" (presented in conjunction with Haywood's Fantomina); to the Easter 1916 Proclamation of the Irish Republic and rebellion leader Padraic Pearse's statement, which accompany W.B. Yeats's "Easter 1916." For the most part these contextual materials are, as the word suggests, included with a view to setting texts in their broader literary, historical, and cultural contexts; in some cases, however, the materials included in "Contexts" sections are themselves literary works of a high order. The autobiographical account by Eliza M. of nineteenth-century life in Cape Town, for example (included in the section in Volume 5 on "Race and Empire"), is as remarkable for its literary qualities as it is for the light it sheds on the realities of colonial life. In the inclusion of texts such as these, as well as in other ways, the anthology aims to encourage readers to explore the boundaries of the literary and the non-literary, and the issue of what constitutes a "literary text."

WOMEN'S PLACE

A central element of the broadening of the canon of British literature in recent generations has of course been a great increase in the attention paid to texts by women writers. As one might expect from a publisher that has played an important role in making neglected works by women writers widely available, this anthology reflects the broadening of the canon quantitatively, by including a substantially larger number of women writers than have earlier anthologies of British literature. But it also reflects this broadening in other ways. In many anthologies of literature (anthologies of British literature, to be sure, but also anthologies of literature of a variety of other sorts) women writers are set somewhat apart, referenced in introductions and headnotes only in relation to issues of gender, and treated as important only for the fact of their being women writers. The Broadview Anthology strenuously resists such segregation; while women writers are of course discussed in relation to gender issues, their texts are also presented and discussed alongside those by men in a wide variety of other contexts, including seventeenth-century religious and political controversies, the abolitionist movement, and World War I pacifism. Texts by women writers are front and center in the discussion of the development of realism in nineteenth-century fiction.

"BRITISH," "ENGLISH," "IRISH," "SCOTTISH,"
"WELSH," "OTHER"

The broadening of English Studies, in conjunction with the expansion and subsequent contraction of British power and influence around the world, has considerably complicated the issue of exactly how inclusive anthologies should be. In several respects this anthology (like its main competitors) is significantly more inclusive than its title might suggest to some readers. We endeavor to portray the fluid multilingual and multicultural reality of the medieval period through the inclusion not only of works in Old and Middle English but also of works in Latin, in French, in Irish, in Welsh, and in Scots. In later periods the word "British" becomes deeply problematic in different respects, but on balance we have preferred it to the only obvious alternative, "English." There are several objections to the latter in this context. Perhaps most obviously, "English" excludes authors or texts not only from Ireland but also from Scotland and from Wales, both of which retain to this day cultures quite distinct from that of the English. "English literature," of course, may also be taken to mean "literature written in English," but since the anthology does not cover all literature written in English (most obviously in excluding American literature), the ambiguity would not in this case be helpful.

The inclusion of Irish writers presents a related but even more tangled set of issues. Through most of the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries almost the whole of Ireland was under British control—but for the most part unwillingly. In the last of the six periods covered by the anthology, Ireland was partitioned, with Northern Ireland becoming a part of the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland declared independent of Britain on 6 December 1921. Less than two months earlier, James Joyce had completed Ulysses, which was first published as a complete work the following year (in Paris, not in Britain). It would be obviously absurd to regard Joyce as a British writer up to just before the publication of Ulysses and an Irish writer thereafter. And arguably he and other Irish writers should never be regarded as British, whatever the politics of the day. If on no other grounds than their overwhelming influence on and connection to the body of literature written in the British Isles, however, we have included Irish writers—among them Swift, Wilde, Shaw, Beckett, and Heaney as well as Joyce—in this anthology. We have also endeavored to give a real sense in the six period introductions of the anthology, in the headnotes to individual authors, and in the annotations to the texts themselves, of the ways in which the histories and the cultures of England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, much as they interact with one another, are also distinct.

Also included in this anthology are texts by writers from areas that are far removed geographically from the British Isles but that are or have been British possessions. Writers such as Olaudah Equiano and Mary Prince are included, as they spent all or most of their lives living in what were then British colonial possessions. Writers who came of age in an independent United States, on the other hand, are not included, unless (like T.S. Eliot) they subsequently put down roots in Britain and became important British literary figures. Substantial grey areas, of course, surround such issues. One might well argue, for example, that Henry James merits inclusion in an anthology of British literature, or that W.H. Auden is more an American poet than a British one. But the chosen subject matter of James's work has traditionally been considered to mark him as having remained an American writer, despite having spent almost two-thirds of his life in England. And Auden so clearly made a mark in Britain before crossing the Atlantic that it would seem odd to exclude him from these pages on the grounds of his having lived the greater part of his adult life in America.

One of our competitors includes Sylvia Plath in their anthology of British literature; Plath lived in England for only five of her thirty years, though, and her poetry is generally agreed to have more in common with the traditions of Lowell, Merwin, and Sexton than with the currents of British poetry in the 1950s and '60s.

As a broad principle, we have been open to the inclusion of twentieth- and twenty-first-century work in English not only by writers from the British Isles but also by writers from British possessions overseas, and by writers from countries that were once British possessions and have remained a part of the British Commonwealth. In such cases, we have often chosen selections that relate in one way or another to the tradition of British literature and the British colonial legacy. For example, the Chinua Achebe story in the anthology concerns the divide between British colonial culture and traditional Nigerian culture.

THE HISTORY OF LANGUAGE, AND OF PRINT CULTURE

Among the liveliest discussions at meetings of our General Editors were those concerning the issue of whether or not to bring spelling and punctuation into accord with present-day practice. We finally decided that, in the interests of making the anthology accessible to the introductory student, we should in most cases bring spelling and punctuation in line with present-day practice. An important exception has been made for works in which modernizing spelling and punctuation would alter the meaning or the aural and metrical qualities. In practice this means that works before the late sixteenth century tend to be presented either in their original form or in translation, whereas later texts tend to have spelling and punctuation modernized. But where spelling and punctuation choices in later texts are known (or believed on reliable authority) to represent conscious choice on the part of the author rather than simply the common practice of the time, we have in those cases, too, made an exception and retained the original spelling and punctuation. (Among these are texts by Edmund Spenser, William Cowper, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, William Blake, Emily Brontë, and Bernard Shaw.)

Beyond this, we have endeavored to provide for readers a real sense of the development of the language and of print culture. To that end we have included in each volume examples of texts in their original form—in some cases through the use of pages shown in facsimile, in others by providing short passages in which spelling and punctuation have not been modernized. A list of these appears after each period introduction in the anthology.

We have also included a section of the history of the language as part of the introduction to each period. And throughout the anthology we include materials—visual as well as textual—relating to the history of print culture.

A DYNAMIC AND FLEXIBLE ANTHOLOGY

We at Broadview recognize that, although time constraints, make the concise anthology a practical and economical text choice for many instructors, some may nevertheless want to teach a number of non-canonical works—not all of which may be included in our concise edition. For this reason, we offer those instructors the possibility of choosing some additional texts that are included in the full, six-volume Broadview Anthology of British Literature but not in the concise edition. Simply visit our website, peruse the full anthology's table of contents, and provide the publisher with a list of desired selections; Broadview will then make available to students through their university bookstore a custom-made coursepack with precisely those materials included.

The two concise volumes of the anthology may be shrink-wrapped together at a special price, and each volume may also be combined in a special-price shrink-wrapped package with one or more of the over 400 volumes in the Broadview Editions series.

THE BROADVIEW LIST

At the outset, one of the reasons we were able to bring a project of this sort to fruition in such a relatively short time is that we were able to draw on the resources of the full Broadview list: the many titles in the Broadview Editions series, and also the considerable range of other Broadview anthologies. As the contributors' pages and the permissions acknowledgments pages indicate, a number of Broadview authors have acted as contributing editors to this volume, providing material from other volumes that has been adapted to suit the needs of the present anthology; we gratefully acknowledge their contribution.

As it has turned out, the number of cases where we have been able to draw on the resources of the Broadview list in the full sense, using in these pages texts and annotations in very much the same form in which they appear elsewhere, has been relatively small; whether because of an issue such as the level of textual modernization or one of style of annotation, we have more often than not ended up deciding that the requirements of this anthology were such that we could not use material from another Broadview source as-is. But even in these cases we often owe a debt of gratitude to the many academics who have edited outstanding editions and anthologies for Broadview. For even where we have not drawn directly from them, we have often been inspired by them—inspired to think of a wider range of texts as possibilities than we might otherwise have done, inspired to think of contextual materials in places where we might otherwise not have looked, inspired by the freshness of approach that so many of these titles exemplify.

EDITORIAL PROCEDURES AND CONVENTIONS

APPARATUS: The in-house set of editorial guidelines for The Broadview Anthology of British Literature now runs to over 40 pages, covering everything from conventions for the spacing of marginal notes, to the use of small caps for the abbreviations CE and BCE, to the approach we have adopted to references in author headnotes to name changes. Perhaps the most important core principle in the introductions to the various volumes, in the headnotes for each author, in the introductions to "Contexts" sections, and in annotations throughout the anthology, is to endeavor to provide a sufficient amount of information to enable students to read and interpret these texts, without making evaluative judgments or imposing particular interpretations. In practice that is all a good deal more challenging than it sounds; it is often extremely difficult to describe why a particular author is considered to be important without using language that verges on the interpretive or the evaluative. But it is a fine line that we have all agreed is worth trying to walk; we hope that readers will find that the anthology achieves an appropriate balance.

ANNOTATION: It is also often difficult to make judgments as to where it is appropriate to provide an explanatory annotation for a word or phrase. Our policy has been to annotate where we feel that most first- or second-year students are likely to have difficulty understanding the denotative meaning. (We have made it a practice not to provide notes discussing connotative meanings.) But in practice the vocabularies and levels of verbal facility of first- and second-year students may vary enormously, both from institution to institution and within any given college or university class. On the whole, we provide somewhat more annotation than our competitors, and somewhat less interpretation. Again, we hope that readers will find that the anthology has struck an appropriate balance.

THE ETHICS AND POLITICS OF ANNOTATION: On one issue regarding annotation we have felt that principles are involved that go beyond the pedagogical. Most anthologies of British literature allow many words or phrases of a racist, sexist, anti-Semitic, or homophobic nature either to pass entirely without comment, or to be glossed with apologist comments that leave the impression that such comments were excusable in the past, and may even be unobjectionable in the present. Where derogatory comments about Jewish people and money-lending are concerned, for example, anthologies often leave the impression that money-lending was a pretty unsavory practice that Jewish people entered by choice; it has been all too rare to provide readers with any sense of the degree to which English society consistently discriminated against Jews, expelling them entirely for several centuries, requiring them to wear physical marks identifying their Jewish status, prohibiting them from entering most professions, and so on. The Broadview Anthology endeavors in such cases, first of all, not to allow such words and phrases to pass without comment; and second, to gloss without glossing over.

DATES: We make it a practice to include the date when a work was first made public, whether publication in print or, in the case of dramatic works, made public through the first performance of the play. Where that date is known to differ substantially from the date of composition, a note to this effect is included in parentheses. With medieval works, where there is no equivalent to the “publication” of later eras, where texts often vary greatly from one manuscript copy to another, and where knowledge as to date of original composition is usually imprecise, the date that appears at the end of each work is an estimate of the date of the work’s origin in the written form included in the anthology. Earlier oral or written versions are of course in some cases real possibilities.

TEXTS: Where translations appear in this anthology, a note at the bottom of the first page indicates what translation is being used. Similar notes also address overall textual issues where choice of copy text is particularly significant. Reliable editions of all works are listed in the bibliographies for each period, which are included on The Broadview Anthology of British Literature website (<http://www.broadviewpress.com/babl/>) to facilitate ready revision. (In addition to information as to reliable editions, the bibliographies provide for each author and for each of the six periods a select list of important or useful historical and critical works.) Information on which editions have been drawn on in preparing texts for these pages is also included with the bibliographies. Copyright information for texts not in the public domain, however, is provided within the books in a section listing Permissions Acknowledgments.

INTRODUCTIONS: In addition to the introductory headnotes for each author included in the anthology, each “Contexts” section includes a substantial introduction, and each period includes an introduction to the period as a whole. These period introductions provide a sense not only of the broad sweep of literary developments in the period, but also of the historical, social, and political background, and of the cultural climate. Readers should be cautioned that, while there is inevitably some overlap between information presented here and information presented in the author headnotes, an effort has been made to avoid such repetition as much as possible; the general introduction to each period should thus be read in conjunction with the author headnotes. The general introductions aim not only to provide an overview of ways in which texts and authors included in these pages may connect with one another, but also to give readers a sense of connection with a range of other writers and texts of the period.

READING POETRY: For much of the glossary and for the “Reading Poetry” section that appears as part of the appendices to each volume, we have drawn on the superb material prepared by Herbert Rosengarten and Amanda Goldrick-Jones for The Broadview Anthology of Poetry; this section provides a concise but comprehensive introduction to the study of poetry. It includes discussions of diction, imagery, poetic figures, and various poetic forms, as well as offering an introduction to prosody.

MAPS: Also appearing within the books are maps especially prepared for this anthology, including, for each period, a map of Britain showing towns and features of relevance. Each volume also includes a map showing the counties of Britain and of Ireland, maps of both the London area and the inner city, and world maps indicating the locations of some of the significant places referenced in the anthology—and for the second volume, showing the extent of Britain’s overseas territories.

GLOSSARY: Some other anthologies of British literature include both glossaries of terms and essays introducing students to various political and religious categories in British history. Similar information is included in The Broadview Anthology of British Literature, but we have adopted a more integrated approach, including political and religious terms along with literary ones in a convenient general glossary. While we recognize that searching the web for information of this sort is often the student’s first resort (and we recognize too the value of online sources for the wealth of background reference information available there), we also recognize that information culled from the Internet is often far from reliable; it is our intent, through this glossary, through our introductions and headnotes, and through the wealth of accessible annotation in the anthology, to provide as part of the anthology a reliable core of information in the most convenient and accessible form possible.

OTHER MATERIALS: A chart of monarchs and prime ministers is also provided within these pages. A range of other adjunct materials may be accessed through The Broadview Anthology of British Literature website. “Texts and Contexts” charts for each volume provide a convenient parallel reference guide to the dates of literary texts and historical developments. “British Money” provides a thumbnail sketch of the world of pounds, shillings, and pence, together with a handy guide to estimating the current equivalents of monetary values from earlier eras.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The names of those on the Editorial Board that shaped this anthology appear on the title page, and those of the many who contributed directly to the writing, editing, and production of the project on the following two pages. Special acknowledgment for this new edition should go to Developmental Editor Jennifer McCue, who has been instrumental in tying together all the vast threads of this project and in making it a reality; to Senior Editor Laura Buzzard, who has led the way in drafting introductory materials and annotations for the new material, and done so with great skill and unfailing grace; to Kathryn Brownsey, who has been responsible for design and typesetting, and has continued to do a superb job and to maintain her good spirits even when faced with near-impossible demands; to Joe Davies, for the range of his general knowledge as well as for his keen eye as our primary proofreader for the entire project; to Merilee Atos, who has done superb work on the vast job of clearing permissions for the anthology; and to Leslie Dema, Debbie Kerkhof, and Christine Handley, who have ably and enthusiastically taken the lead with marketing matters.

The academic general editors and all of us in-house at Broadview owe an enormous debt of gratitude to the hundreds of academics who have offered assistance at various stages of this project. In particular we would like to express our appreciation and our thanks to the following:

Rachel Ablow, University of Rochester
Katherine Acheson, University of Waterloo
Bryan Alexander, Middlebury College
Sharon Alker, Whitman College
James Allard, Brock University
Ella Allen, St. Thomas University
Rosemary Allen, Georgetown College
Laurel Amtower, San Diego State University
Robert Anderson, Oakland University
Christopher Armitage, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill
Clinton Atchley, Henderson State University
Gerry Baillargeon, University of Victoria
John Baird, University of Toronto
William Baker, Northern Illinois University
Karen Bamford, Mount Allison University
John Batchelor, University of Newcastle
Lynn Batten, University of California, Los Angeles
Alexandra Bennett, Northern Illinois University
John Beynon, California State University, Fresno
Daniel Bivona, Arizona State University
Robert E. Bjork, Arizona State University
Scott Black, Villanova University

Rita Bode, Trent University
Robert Boenig, Texas A & M University
Rick Bowers, University of Alberta
Patricia Brace, Columbus State University
David Brewer, Ohio State University
William Brewer, Appalachian State University
Susan Brown, University of Guelph
Sylvia Brown, University of Alberta
Sheila Burgar, University of Victoria
Catherine Burroughs, Wells College
Rebecca Bushnell, University of Pennsylvania
Elizabeth Campbell, Oregon State University
Gregory Castle, Arizona State University
Cynthia Caywood, University of San Diego
Jane Chance, Rice University
Ranita Chatterjee, California State University, Northridge
William Christmas, San Francisco State University
Nancy Cirillo, University of Illinois, Chicago
Eric Clarke, University of Pittsburgh
Jeanne Clegg, University of Aquila, Italy
Thomas J. Collins, University of Western Ontario
Kevin Cope, Louisiana State University

- David Cowart, University of South Carolina
 Catherine Craft-Fairchild, University of St. Thomas
 Carol Davison, University of Windsor
 Alex Dick, University of British Columbia
 Len Diepeveen, Dalhousie University
 Mary Dockray-Miller, Lesley College
 James Doelman, Brescia University College, University of Western Ontario
 Frank Donoghue, Ohio State University
 Chris Downs, Saint James School
 Alfred Drake, Chapman University
 Julie Early, University of Alabama, Huntsville
 Siân Echard, University of British Columbia
 Garrett Epp, University of Alberta
 Joshua Eyler, Columbus State University
 Ruth Feingold, St. Mary's College, Maryland
 Dino Franco Felluga, Perdue University
 Joanne Findon, Trent University
 Daniel Fischlin, University of Guelph
 Christina Fitzgerald, University of Toledo
 Verlyn Flieger, University of Maryland
 Robert Forman, St. John's University
 Allyson Foster, Hunter College
 Roberta Frank, Yale University
 Jeff Franklin, University of Colorado, Denver
 Maria Frawley, George Washington University
 Mark Fulk, Buffalo State College
 Andrew Galloway, Cornell University
 Michael Gamer, University of Pennsylvania
 Barbara Gates, University of Delaware
 Jonathan C. Glance, Mercer University
 Susan Patterson Glover, Laurentian University
 Daniel Gonzalez, University of New Orleans
 Jan Gorak, University of Denver
 Chris Gordon-Craig, University of Alberta
 Ann-Barbara Graff, Georgia Tech University
 Mary Griffin, Kwantlen University College
 Michael Griffin, formerly of Southern Illinois University
 George C. Grinnell, University of British Columbia, Okanagan
 Elisabeth Gruner, University of Richmond
 Kevin Gustafson, University of Texas at Arlington
 Stephen Guy-Bray, University of British Columbia
 Ruth Haber, Worcester State College
 Margaret Hadley, University of Calgary
 Robert Hampson, Royal Holloway University of London
 Carol Hanes, Howard College
 Michael Hanly, Washington State University
 Lila Harper, Central Washington State University
 Joseph Harris, Harvard University
 Anthony Harrison, North Carolina State University
 Douglas Hayes, Lakehead University
 Jennifer Hellwarth, Allegheny University
 David Herman, Ohio State University
 Peter Herman, San Diego State University
 Kathy Hickock, Iowa State University
 John Hill, US Naval Academy
 Thomas Hill, Cornell University
 Elizabeth Hodgson, University of British Columbia
 Joseph Hornsby, University of Alabama
 Scott Howard, University of Denver
 Sylvia Hunt, Goergian College
 Tara Hyland-Russell, St. Mary's College
 Catherine Innes-Parker, University of Prince Edward Island
 Jacqueline Jenkins, University of Calgary
 John Johansen, University of Alberta
 Gordon Johnston, Trent University
 Richard Juang, Susquehanna University
 Michael Keefer, University of Guelph
 Sarah Keefer, Trent University
 Lloyd Kermode, California State University,
 Long Beach
 Brandon Kershner, University of Florida
 Jon Kertzer, University of Calgary
 Helen Killoran, Ohio University
 Gordon Kipling, University of California, Los Angeles
 Anne Klinck, University of New Brunswick
 Elizabeth Kraft, University of Georgia
 Mary Kramer, University of Massachusetts, Lowell
 Marilyn Lantz, East Mississippi Community College
 Kate Lawson, University of Waterloo
 Linda Leeds, Bellevue Community College
 Mary Elizabeth Leighton, University of Victoria
 Eric Lindstrom, University of Vermont
 William Liston, Ball State University
 Sharon Locy, Loyola Marymount University
 Peter Mallios, University of Maryland
 Arnold Markley, Penn State University
 Louis Markos, Houston Baptist University
 Pamela McCallum, University of Calgary
 Patricia McCormack, Itawamba Community College

Kristen McDermott, Central Michigan University
 John McGowan, University of North Carolina
 Brian McHale, Ohio State University
 Jim McKeown, McLennan Community College
 Thomas McLean, University of Otago, New Zealand
 Jodie Medd, Carleton University
 Rod Michell, Thompson Rivers University
 David Miller, Mississippi College
 Kitty Millett, San Francisco State University
 Britt Mize, Texas A&M University
 Richard Moll, University of Western Ontario
 Amy L. Montz, Texas A&M University
 Monique Morgan, McGill University
 John Morillo, North Carolina State University
 Lucy Morrison, Salisbury University
 Lorri Nandrea, University of Wisconsin-Steven's Point
 Byron Nelson, West Virginia University
 Carolyn Nelson, West Virginia University
 Claudia Nelson, Southwest Texas State University
 Holly Faith Nelson, Trinity Western University
 John Niles, University of Wisconsin, Madison
 Michael North, University of California, Los Angeles
 Mary Anne Nunn, Central Connecticut State University
 David Oakleaf, University of Calgary
 Tamara O'Callaghan, Northern Kentucky University
 Karen Odden, Assistant Editor for Victorian Literature and Culture (formerly of University of Wisconsin, Milwaukee)
 Erika Olbricht, Pepperdine University
 Patrick O'Malley, Georgetown University
 Patricia O'Neill, Hamilton College
 Delilah Orr, Fort Lewis College
 John Pagano, Barnard College
 Kirsten Parkinson, Hiram College
 Diana Patterson, Mount Royal College
 Cynthia Patton, Emporia State University
 Russell Perkin, St. Mary's University
 Marjorie G. Perloff, Stanford University
 Jim Persoon, Grand Valley State University
 John Peters, University of North Texas
 Todd Pettigrew, Cape Breton University
 Alexander Pettit, University of North Texas
 Jennifer Phegley, The University of Missouri, Kansas City
 John Pollock, San Jose State University
 Mary Poovey, New York University

Gautam Premnath, University of Massachusetts, Boston
 Regina Psaki, University of Oregon
 Katherine Quinsey, University of Windsor
 Geoff Rector, University of Ottawa
 Margaret Reeves, Atkinson College, York University
 Cedric Reverand, University of Wyoming
 Gerry Richman, Suffolk University
 John Rickard, Bucknell University
 Michelle Risdon, Lake Tahoe Community College
 David Robinson, University of Arizona
 Solveig C. Robinson, Pacific Lutheran University
 Laura Rotunno, Pennsylvania State University, Altoona
 Brian Rourke, New Mexico State University
 Nicholas Ruddick, University of Regina
 Jason Rudy, University of Maryland
 Donelle Ruwe, Northern Arizona University
 Michelle Sauer, Minot State University
 SueAnn Schatz, Lock Haven University of Pennsylvania
 Dan Schierenbeck, Central Missouri State University
 Norbert Schürer, California State University,
 Long Beach
 Debora B. Schwartz, California Polytechnic University
 Janelle A. Schwartz, Loyola University
 John T. Sebastian, Loyola University
 David Seed, University of Liverpool
 Carol Senf, Georgia Tech University
 Lynn Shakinovsky, Wilfred Laurier University
 John Sider, Westmont College
 Judith Slagle, East Tennessee State University
 Johanna Smith, University of Texas at Arlington
 Sharon Smulders, Mount Royal College
 Malinda Snow, Georgia State University
 Goran Stanivukovic, St. Mary's University
 Thomas Steffler, Carleton University
 Richard Stein, University of Oregon
 Eric Sterling, Auburn University Montgomery
 James Stokes, University of Wisconsin, Stevens Point
 Mary-Ann Stouck, Simon Fraser University
 Nathaniel Strout, Hamilton College
 Brad Sullivan, Western New England College
 Lisa Surridge, University of Victoria
 Joyce A. Sutphen, Gustavus Adolphus College
 Beth Sutton-Ramspeck, Ohio State University
 Nanora Sweet, University of Missouri, St. Louis
 Dana Symons, Simon Fraser University
 Andrew Taylor, University of Ottawa

Elizabeth Teare, University of Dayton
Doug Thorpe, University of Saskatchewan
Jane Toswell, University of Western Ontario
Herbert Tucker, University of Virginia
John Tucker, University of Victoria
Mark Turner, King's College, University of London
Eleanor Ty, Wilfrid Laurier University
Deborah Tyler-Bennett, Loughborough University
Kirsten Uszkalo, University of Alberta
Lisa Vargo, University of Saskatchewan
Gina Luria Walker, The New School, New York City
Kim Walker, Victoria University of Wellington
Miriam Wallace, New College of Florida
Hayden Ward, West Virginia State University
David Watt, University of Manitoba
Ruth Wehlau, Queen's University

Lynn Wells, University of Regina
Dan White, University of Toronto at Mississauga
Patricia Whiting, Carleton University
Thomas Willard, University of Arizona
Tara Williams, Oregon State University
Chris Willis, Birkbeck University of London
Lisa Wilson, SUNY College at Potsdam
Ed Wiltse, Nazareth College
Anne Windholz, Augustana College
Susan Wolfson, Princeton University
Kenneth Womack, Pennsylvania State University
Carolyn Woodward, University of New Mexico
Julia Wright, Wilfrid Laurier University
Julian Yates, University of Delaware
Arlene Young, University of Manitoba
Lisa Zeitz, University of Western Ontario

THE MEDIEVAL PERIOD

From a medieval perspective, the very title of this collection is interestingly problematic. The implication of deliberate choice in the term “anthology” (as opposed, for example, to a “miscellany”) reminds us that in any such collection decisions have been made about what does and does not “fit,” about lines of influence between works, and about defining the boundaries of a literary tradition. Medieval literature written in England, for instance, was by no means entirely, nor indeed mostly, written in English; works in Latin, Anglo-Norman French, Middle Welsh, and Old Irish all survive alongside works in the languages now known to us as Old and Middle English. Many of these non-English texts had a profound influence on the literary tradition in English; to the extent that we have had to omit such works here, we have created gaps in the story this anthology tries to tell.

The anthology’s designation of its literature as “British,” moreover, raises a terminological difficulty that is almost as old as the Middle Ages itself. “British” and “English” are by no means interchangeable terms in the medieval period, and the uses of these terms as labels for a language and literary tradition have always been entwined with political realities and national identities. Broadly speaking, the word “British” derives from the Roman name for early Celtic settlers in what we now call the British Isles; “English” refers to the Germanic invaders and settlers who began arriving in the fifth century, pushed the Celtic inhabitants to the west and the north (now Wales and Scotland), and eventually ruled the central part of the island. For many centuries, the English defined themselves by their difference from the British, and vice versa. At the same time, those who attempted to claim legitimate rulership of England made strategic use of the “British” tradition, perhaps most obviously in the ongoing traditions surrounding King Arthur, whose origins lie deep in British legendary history. But the intercultural appropriation between “British” and “English” has often worked both ways, and continues to do so: the Anglo-Irish poet Seamus Heaney laces his modern translation of Beowulf, a decidedly “English” poem, with idiosyncratic Ulsterisms and Celtic turns of phrase.

Finally, the very word “literature” (deriving from the Latin litterae, “letters”) implies an existence in writing, but a great deal of what remains in written form from the Middle Ages had a prior existence as, or owes enormous debts to, oral forms. Most of what we now read as literature, from romances to lyrics to sermons, was written to be heard, not read. Texts of vernacular works in the Middle Ages are by no means as solidly fixed—as “textual”—as works of modern literature, or as medieval works in Latin, for that matter; the circumstances of their creation and reception are, at least ostensibly, performative and communal, not silent and solitary like a modern student reading this book. Modern literary culture tends to regard the written text, fixed and inert, as the primary or “real” form of a literary work; for some medieval works, especially those from the earlier Middle Ages, the written text seems to be almost an afterthought, little more than an aid to the memory of the reader/performer who recreates the “real” work by voicing the text out loud.

At the same time, however, the concept of a collection that gathers the authoritative examples of a cultural tradition would have been very familiar to medieval readers, who made extensive use of such collections. Medieval manuscripts that contain multiple works may be anything from carefully planned volumes presented to a patron, to somewhat haphazard gatherings of texts, to collections composed by an individual for his or her own use; our current knowledge of medieval literary culture could rightly be said to rest on medieval anthologies. Thus a reader who first encounters these texts in an anthologized form will encounter them in a format not so unlike their original manuscript context. The single-text “monograph”—one work between two covers—is by no means the most common mode of transmission for medieval texts, and the effort to determine the relationships between texts in medieval manuscripts, the intentions of the creators of such compilations and their effect upon readers, is one of the most interesting and important areas of contemporary medieval literary studies.

The drawing of artificial lines, whether geographical or temporal, is a profound limitation on one's understanding of the history of western literature. At the same time, we cannot simply ignore the geographical facts—which are historical and political facts as well, insofar as the unity of the island of Britain was imagined and achieved—or the differences between one age and another, although the borders (both of historical periods and of kingdoms) may always be contested. This collection likewise relies on distinctions—sometimes arbitrary, sometimes necessary, some obvious and some obscure—to give it shape and contour, form and structure. In English literary history one of the most obvious divisions lies between the literature of the Anglo-Saxons—the English before the Norman Conquest (1066)—and that of the English after the Conquest. Within these two broadly drawn periods further divisions can be made: early Old English literature, as far as we can reconstruct it, differs markedly from literature after the reign of Alfred the Great (d. 899), who sought to begin a program of vernacular literacy and bestowed a certain royal authority on English as a quasi-official written language.

After the Conquest, although English manuscripts were produced and read in somewhat reduced numbers, Norman French was the language of courtly culture in England. In the absence of schools and pedagogical traditions, English began to manifest the changes that characterize “Middle” English. After this period of “early” Middle English—roughly from the century after the Conquest until the beginning of the fourteenth century—English began to take its place alongside the culturally more prestigious Latin (the language of the church) and French (the language of the court, of law, and of administration); authors increasingly chose to write literary texts in English for aristocratic readers. The fifteenth century saw a gradual re-development of a written “standard” English, and an outpouring of literary works (particularly of a devotional nature) that fostered and responded to rising literacy rates. With the advent of printing in the later fifteenth century, books became ever more widely available and the language increasingly standardized; in the sixteenth century, with the wider spread of printing in England, the standard became more and more fixed, even as the language was rapidly changing again, into what linguists call early Modern English.

HISTORY, NARRATIVE, CULTURE

Even a set of very broad periodizations like these raises questions about the relation between historical events and literary developments, or more generally speaking between culture and the imagination. Can we understand these literary works better by learning more about their historical context? Or can these works of the imagination shed light on that context and help us fill in its blank spaces? Which partner in the inseparable pairing of text and context will serve as the solid ground from which we can survey the other—which one is beyond interpretation? Has the human imagination changed so much that we only have access to it historically, and not immediately? On the other hand, what can we really know about the past, except what is said about it?

These questions vexed the minds of many medieval authors as well. Most modern scholars, like their medieval predecessors such as Isidore of Seville (a Spanish bishop who lived c. 560–636), are careful to note that history is not simply “what happened” in the past, but the stories we tell about what happened in the past. Events, objects, even stories, do not speak for themselves; they have to be arranged and explained, looked at and looked into, and gradually placed in a context constructed from our interpretations of other objects, events, and stories. In this sense, no matter how great our respect for objectivity or how carefully balanced our analysis may be, our study of the past says as much about us as it does about the past we try to study. And texts help us understand their context as much as contexts help us understand texts.

In his poem Ars Poetica the modern author Archibald MacLeish insisted that “a poem should not mean / But be,” but readers of literature from the distant past cannot indulge in the soothing luxury of that misconception. A rock can simply “be”; the remains of a stone wall, however, must “mean” something—they mark a boundary, claim a space, indicate a settlement. A rough diamond lying underground might “be”; but when it has been mined, cut, polished, weighed, set, valued, bought, and worn as jewelry, it is no longer “palpable and mute / as a globed fruit”; it has entered the noisy world of meaning. Similarly, a poem like Beowulf or Sir Gawain and the Green Knight does not simply exist as a self-evident story; like any work of the human imagination, it responds to and acts on the world in which it was created. Objects and events—the Sutton Hoo ship burial, Durham Cathedral, the Magna Carta, the Black Death of the fourteenth century—positively hum with meaning and intention and human consequences; they are inextricably caught in the web of signification and interpretation. Nothing goes without saying. Even a thing of astonishing beauty that we may enjoy simply for the aesthetic pleasure it gives us is not a self-contained object; it had a function in the society that made it, and part of its meaning—even the meaning of its beauty—lies in that function, which might range from the deepest of spiritual blessings to the purest gaudy display of its owner’s ability to possess and appreciate expensive objects. To ignore the cultures that surrounded, created, and consumed these objects—whether they are artifacts in a museum or texts in a book—would be a fundamental mistake.

The famous CHI-RHO page of the early eighth-century Lindisfarne Gospels (London, British Library, MS Cotton Nero D.iv, a color illustration of which appears elsewhere in this volume), offers one example of the kinds of context we might consider when looking at a medieval artifact. We may begin by admiring its beauty, enjoying its exotic strangeness or Celtic “alterity,” and marveling at the skill of its creators (whose names, as it happens, are recorded in the manuscript). Such an image could have a number of different effects on its viewers: it might impress those who can’t read with the beauty and value of God’s Word; it might attest to the devotion of the artists who made such a complex design, as well as their sophistication and expertise as craftsmen; it might display a religious house’s capability for such “conspicuous consumption” in the service of God. As we consider it more closely, we may find ourselves puzzled by the presence of a Greek monogram in a Latin text decorated in a distinctively “Insular” style in Northumbria c. 700. At least three cultures are on display here. The page insists on the intersection of English, Irish, and Latin cultures—as intricately woven together as the knotty patterns of its own design. Looking more closely, we can see an English interlinear gloss to the Latin text, written in much smaller script, added some 200 years later. Its presence creates yet another layer of meaning and raises further questions. Who would write in such a rich and beautiful book? Is the gloss a necessary addition, suggesting that the Latin text was not sufficiently accessible to those using the book? What might its presence tell us about the status of Latin as a learned language, or a sacred one, in medieval England? The questions arising from this single page of a manuscript remind us that it is not simply a work of remarkable beauty, but a complex artifact of cultural history.

Saint Luke, Lindisfarne Gospels. This page and a decorative “carpet page” precede the text of the gospel itself.

First text page, Gospel of Saint Luke, Lindisfarne Gospels. The text reads as follows: "Quoniam quidem multi conati sunt ordinare narrationem," "Since many have undertaken to put in narrative order ..."

Note: A reproduction of the CHI-RHO page from the Lindisfarne Gospels appears in the section of color illustrations.

The CHI-RHO page embodies, in a particularly striking way, the reciprocal relationship of text and context; while it has much to tell us about the world of its creators, what we know about their world must also be brought to bear on our understanding of the manuscript. To take another example, the poem Beowulf has been used to explain other texts (or objects, in the case of the early East Saxon ship-burial at Sutton Hoo; the poem was introduced as evidence in the inquest that determined the ownership and disposition of the priceless objects unearthed from that site in 1939); conversely, other texts and objects can be brought to bear on the obscurities of the text of Beowulf and used as explanatory tools. And of course the poem has a place in a series of cultural moments—the unknown moment of its creation, the moment of its transcription into the manuscript in which it survives, the moment of its rediscovery and publication, the modern moment in which it is studied today. Each of these contributes, in some way, to the “meaning” of Beowulf, and however tempting it may be to give priority to the more distant (and hence less familiar) contexts, no one of these cultural moments, strictly speaking, has a greater claim on the poem than another. We may wish to regard material objects as somehow more “real” than stories, but from the distant perspective from which we observe them now, they are not: these bright objects on a blank background are as mute and as meaningful, as mysterious and as communicative, as the anonymous stories surviving in single manuscripts by unknown hands.

So the questions we might ask as we approach these texts involve less what they “are” than what they “do,” what they might mean not only to their imagined original audience(s) but to us, and how that meaning might change as our knowledge develops. What draws us to these old tales? What do we derive from them? Can we understand them in anything like their original form, with our inevitably modern minds? To what extent can we negotiate the difference between the present and the past? This is a constant problem, a challenge for any reader of early literature. A reader of a contemporary novel is seldom aware of the complex web of cultural assumptions that sustains the narrative; these assumptions are transparent and automatic. For readers of early literature the assumptions are solid, opaque, at times impenetrable—but this awareness of the alterity of the reader to the text is, we think, a very healthy thing. It is always good to be reminded that meanings are not simply “there” in the text, waiting for the reader to stumble over them; they are kindled by the friction between the reader, the story, and the world they both inhabit. Medieval texts force this awareness upon us, but it serves us well as readers of any literary work.

The cultures of the Middle Ages are as varied as they are numerous, and diverse as well in the ways in which they interacted with one another. Moreover, the medieval period was one of continual change. Such change tended to occur at a slower pace than it does in our own time, but the medieval era saw vast and violent upheavals, and great cultural and social developments. From long habit, however, we refer to the millennium following the collapse of the Roman Empire in the fifth century CE as one period, the Middle Ages (or, using the Latinized form of the same phrase, the medieval period). At the end of this long expanse of time falls what we still sometimes call the Renaissance (or “rebirth”). This term reflects Renaissance writers’ and thinkers’ view of their own time. Many modern historians and literary scholars see the Renaissance of the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries as representing the final flowering of medieval culture rather than a dramatic break with the past; where historians in the Renaissance saw difference and division, historians of the period tend to see continuity and development.

Even so, many readers coming to the study of medieval literature or culture for the first time will be struck by a sense of strangeness in much of what they encounter. They will enter worlds in which nature is malevolent, not benign; in which Christ fights as a warrior; in which the walls of an ancient city are said to have been broken by fate; in which it is possible to have one’s head sliced off and carry it around before putting it back on; in which doubtful legal claims may be decided by the judgment of God through trial by ordeal or by battle; in which water may be thought to flow upward; and in which the middle of a literary text can be said to be inherently better from a moral point of view than the beginning or the end. Much as this introduction aims to convey, and offer a context for, the complexity and sophistication that often characterize medieval texts, it will also recognize that it is difficult—and perhaps even undesirable—for modern readers to lose entirely their sense of strangeness and even wonder in experiencing the products of medieval literature and medieval culture.

Just as the literature of the Middle Ages may seem unusual to us, many modern readers may be surprised by the marginal political status of England and the English language in the Middle Ages. Britain was geographically on the edge of the world, and at the periphery of the political life of the continent; England was for many centuries the object rather than the subject of imperial ambitions. The status of English varied considerably from one century to another, but it was never at any time the dominant global force it is today. The ways in which an extraordinarily diverse cultural and linguistic mix began, over the course of the Middle Ages, to produce the works presented here—as well as, ultimately, the language of this introduction—will be a major theme of these pages.

BEFORE THE NORMAN CONQUEST

CELTS IN MEDIEVAL BRITAIN AND IRELAND

We know very little with any certainty about the lives people lived in prehistoric Britain and Ireland, but scholars have been able to infer a certain amount about the languages they spoke. In all of Ireland and in much of Britain those languages belonged to one of two groups of “Insular” Celtic languages (i.e., those spoken “on the island,” distinguishing them from other Celtic languages spoken during the first millennium BCE throughout much of continental Europe). The Celtic languages, like Old English and Latin, belong to the Indo-European family of languages, but they have non-Indo-European elements presumably inherited from whoever was living in Ireland and Britain before the Celts arrived; according to the legendary history of Ireland there were many waves of immigrants. The two groups of Insular Celtic languages are Gaelic and British (also called Goedelic and Brythonic or Q-Celtic and P-Celtic). The languages of the Gaelic group still spoken today are all descended from Old Irish: they include Irish; Scottish Gaelic, spoken in the Highlands and islands of Scotland; and Manx, from the Isle of Man in the Irish Sea. (Originally, the Gaels lived only in Ireland; they raided in Britain during the Roman period, but did not begin to settle in Scotland, Man, and parts of Wales until the fourth or fifth century, as the Romans were leaving.) Languages of the British group include Welsh and Cornish; there were British Celtic kingdoms at least as far north as the Scottish Lowlands (these included Gododdin, near Edinburgh, and Strathclyde), and north of them were the Picts, who seem to have been British Celtic as well, although we have hardly any written evidence of their language. (Later, Breton, which is the Celtic language of Brittany in France, would emerge as another a British Insular Celtic language; it was brought over by British Celts who emigrated from Britain as the Anglo-Saxons were moving in.)

The “Celtic peoples” have often been imagined to be a more-or-less unified group, in large part because the artistic and literary heritage of Celtic culture that has come down to us displays points of connection—notably in certain characteristics of its narratives, and in the bold, decorative style of its visual arts. Much as “the Celts” may sometimes be a convenient umbrella category for us to apply, however, it is essential to be aware that the various medieval Celtic-speaking peoples did not identify themselves as being part of any such larger group; that they were often at odds with each other; and that they were never united by any overarching administrative authority. Individually, however, the Gaelic and British branches each possessed a distinct sense of identity. The Gaels traced their genealogy to Féníus Fársaid, who supposedly created the Irish language out of the best parts of the new languages created by God in the story of the Tower of Babel. The Britons claimed descent from Brutus, grandson (or, in some accounts, great-grandson) of the Trojan hero Aeneas. And each branch made distinctive contributions to literature: Arthurian legend and the “Breton lay” had their home in the British Celtic sphere, and the bardic schools of Ireland and Scotland had a literary standard of formal verse that prevailed throughout Gaelic regions.

ROMAN BRITAIN

The Romans invaded and conquered much of the island of Britain in the first century CE and over the next four centuries they were successful in establishing administrative structures throughout most of what is now England and Wales, making Britannia a province of the Roman Empire. Though far from the heart of the Empire, Britain was clearly a rich and valuable province, and much of the population, at least in the center of the island, was thoroughly Romanized. It is now thought that the island was densely populated; it enjoyed a thriving money economy and commerce, with a number of large urban centers including a settlement on the banks of the Thames River named Londinium, a network of roads, large villas in the Roman style, heated baths, water and sewage service in some areas, and sturdy traditions of Roman administration, education, and literacy. When Christianity spread throughout the Roman empire, it spread in Britain as well—Christian mosaics have been discovered on the site of a large fourth-century villa, and in 314 three British bishops attended a council in Arles, France.

EARLY ANGLO-SAXON BRITAIN

Roman Britain was highly fortified and well defended from its hostile neighbors, but at the turn of the fifth century the Roman legions stationed in Britain were withdrawn for deployment in the heart of the Empire, in part to defend Rome from the various barbarian tribes pouring across its eastern frontiers. Soon afterwards, the Scots and the Picts began to encroach upon the territories of the Romanized British. It is unclear who ruled the island during these years or how it was defended; the Britons were left to their own devices, and tradition portrays them as hapless and virtually helpless. The traditional story, told among other places in the writing of a sixth-century Briton named Gildas, tells how the Britons turned to the Germanic peoples of continental Europe for assistance. The Angles, Saxons, and Jutes, Germanic tribes who occupied the coastal areas of what is now northwestern Germany and Denmark, were quite willing to work as soldiers for hire, but once they had established themselves in Britain as allies of the Britons, they began to demand land of their own, seized power from their employers, slaughtered and dispossessed them, and soon established themselves in the eastern parts of the island.

Contemporary archaeological evidence suggests, however, that the Germanic migrations actually took place in numerous waves from the later fourth century on. Relations between these Germanic invaders, who were probably not numerous, and the British are hard to reconstruct, but it appears that British culture was eventually supplanted not simply because the British were driven out. Many of them intermingled with their Germanic conquerors and adopted the dress, language, and culture of their new ruling class so that whatever their cultural heritage, they became, to later archaeolo-gists and historians, indistinguishable from the Germanic Angles and Saxons. When the Romans had ruled, the Britons were Romanized; when the Saxons ruled, they were Saxonized. There are few words of British origin in Old English, the language of the Germanic invaders, and it is certainly significant that the Old English word wealh means both “slave” and “Welshman.”

The culture of the Angles, Saxons, and Jutes was quite different from that of the Romanized Britons. Though there is some evidence for continuing populations in Roman cities, the Germanic migrants were largely rural rather than urban, and built primarily in wood rather than stone—most of the great buildings of the Romans fell into ruin or were plundered for building materials. Society was apparently organized, at least during the migration period, around a male leader and warrior band rather than the hearth and family, or the city or state. If the characterization of the first century CE Roman historian Tacitus is to be believed, the continental Germanic tribes were a notably warlike culture: “they are not so easily persuaded to plow the earth and to wait for the year’s produce as they are to challenge an enemy and earn the honor of wounds,” Tacitus comments. “They actually think it tame and stupid to acquire by the sweat of toil what they might win by their blood.” Certainly later centuries regarded the Germanic tribes as particularly fierce. The Angles and Saxons had a writing system—runed carvings—but no culture of literacy in which it might be put to more than the simplest uses. Their economy was based on barter and gift-exchange, not money. Perhaps most importantly, the Angles and Saxons were pagan, worshipping a pantheon of northern gods such as Woden and Thor, and as they came to dominate Britain so the influence of Christianity moved (with the Britons themselves) to the margins.

But Christianity did not disappear as Britain became England (from engla-land, the land of the Angles). When Pope Gregory the Great sent Augustine (now known as Augustine of Canterbury, not to be confused with the more famous Augustine, bishop of Hippo in north Africa) on a mission to convert the English in 597, he met with extraordinary early success, in part no doubt because Christianity already had a strong presence in Britain. King Æthelberht of Kent, for example, who was Augustine’s first notable convert, was married to a Frankish Christian named Bertha. The expansion of English power over the west and southwest of the island undoubtedly brought many British Christians under English rule. Apart from any question of spiritual benefit, conversion to Christianity offered the appeal of new political alliances with other Christian kings, and the considerable power of Latin literacy, law, science, philosophy, and education. Nonetheless conversion was a significant cultural change, and the momentum of conversion wavered back and forth for a century or so, with large areas of resistance and a good deal of backsliding; Christianized England was not everywhere peaceful and prosperous or even thoroughly converted. By the beginning of the eighth century, however, the English were Christian enough to send missionaries like St. Boniface to preach the gospel to the pagan Saxons in Germany.

CELTIC CULTURE

In any consideration of the British isles in the early medieval period it is important to remain aware that the Romans never managed to conquer Ireland or what is now Scotland. Nor, though the Roman army occupied much of Wales, did Roman culture penetrate Wales in the way that it did much of England. To the north, the Romans constructed the rampart known as “Hadrian’s wall” during the second century CE as a defense against the Scottish and Pictish peoples they were unable to conquer—and the cultures of these peoples remained largely unaffected by the Roman presence on the island.

What was true of the Romans was also true of the Anglo-Saxons; the Germanic invaders did not manage to conquer either Scotland or Wales. And in Cornwall too an older British culture continued to develop, predominately unaffected by the Anglo-Saxons who were largely supplanting the old British culture in the rest of England. There has long been a tendency in discussions of British history and culture to treat “the Celts” as people living at the margins, far from the centers of culture—important largely for the influence they exerted on the development of “English” literature and culture. This approach is problematic in studying the literature and culture of any era, but it is particularly so in the early medieval period; we need to think differently about “the center” and “the margins” when studying a period in which the old Roman city of London was largely abandoned, while heroic cultures thrived in the Celtic-language areas on both sides of the Irish Sea. (The cosmic center for the early Irish, for example, was the hill of Tara, a seat of ancient kingship located northwest of what is now Dublin.) Celtic cultures are represented in this anthology by excerpts from the long poem Y Gododdin, and by the Four Branches of the Mabinogi.

To draw attention to the importance of early Celtic literature and culture in its own right is not to deny the powerful shaping influence it exerted on what would become English literature. Even after the Norman conquest Celtic influence persisted in re-workings of Irish and Welsh legends; in the survival of the genre of story known as the “Breton lay,” which gradually opened up to accommodate all manner of cross-cultural currents; and in the fragmentary histories of British kings and warlords who had led a temporarily successful resistance against the Anglo-Saxon invaders—stories that formed the kernel of truth at the heart of the legends of King Arthur, arguably the great political myth of the Middle Ages.

This early medieval stone structure, known as the Gallarus Oratory on the Dingle Peninsula, Ireland, is believed to have been a very early Christian church.

Page from the Gospel of St. Mark, Book of Kells (ninth century). The page size of the original is 9 ½ inches by 12 ½ inches. Like many early Insular manuscripts, the provenance of this book is uncertain. The monastery at Kells in County Meath, Ireland, was established by monks from the large monastery at Iona, off the coast of Scotland at the time of the Viking invasions early in the ninth century. Among the many hypotheses as to the book's origin are theories that the monks brought the book with them from Iona in its present (unfinished) state; that some work was done at Iona, some at Kells; and even that the book originated at Lindisfarne in the north-east of England. This uncertainty indicates the high degree of interaction among the monasteries of Ireland, Scotland, and northern England during this period.

CELTIC CHRISTIANITY

In Ireland the prehistoric era (the time before any written record) ended not with the coming of the Romans but with the coming of Christianity. In the early years of the fifth century Saint Patrick, a Roman Briton, traveled through Ireland as a missionary bishop, spearheading the conversion of Ireland—where Christianity quickly took on distinct characteristics. By 700 Christianity's place in Irish culture was secure; monarchs had adopted Christianity, the monastic movement had put down roots, and Christian-inspired literacy had become widespread, with Irish ecclesiastics writing both in Latin and in a written standard of Old Irish.

From the seventh century onward, the monastic and missionary culture of Irish Christianity began to look outward—and to influence the development of Christian culture elsewhere to a remarkable degree. The Irish abbot St. Columba founded the important monastery of Iona in Scotland in the mid-sixth century, and other Irish missionaries established numerous monasteries in northern England. Irish monks and monasteries had by that time made their presence felt not only in Scotland and in England but also in Gaul and, in smaller numbers, across much of continental Europe. (The well-known Irish poem “Pangur Bán,” included in this volume's selection of “Early Irish Lyrics,” was discovered in a notebook written by a ninth-century Irish scribe in a monastery on Lake Constance, at the foot of the Alps—and this was by no means an isolated case.) In the other direction, it was not uncommon for clerics from Britain and continental Europe to travel to Ireland in order to learn from Irish scholars.

From early on, Irish Christianity exhibited in several respects a different character from the Christianity that stemmed directly from Rome—and, in Britain, tensions between the churches of the Roman mission and the relatively independent Irish churches were often high. The Irish church emphasized missionary practice (“exile for Christ”) in ways not common elsewhere; the Irish church also followed different monastic customs—including a general tendency to rank abbots of major monastic federations above bishops—and kept a different calendar (the dating of Easter was for centuries the subject of considerable controversy). In most respects Irish practice was eventually brought into conformity with that of Rome. In some areas it was Irish practice that won out, however. The Irish church valued penance and confession to a degree that the Christian church elsewhere did not, for example, and in this respect the Irish approach eventually prevailed.

Much of the substance of doctrinal differences between early medieval Irish Christianity and that stemming from Rome is largely forgotten today. But much else of medieval Celtic Christianity—perhaps most notably, the impact of illuminated manuscripts in the Celtic tradition—is still vividly felt. The early monastic culture of Ireland produced an extraordinary flourishing of Christian decorative art. That flourishing finds its greatest expression in the Book of Kells, but many of the most enduring Christian documents, even those made in Northumbrian monasteries after the official rejection of the “Irish” model of Christianity at the Synod of Whitby (604), are manuscripts in the Celtic tradition.

One of the most remarkable of these is the Lindisfarne Gospels, mentioned above, dating from around 700. (A full-page illustration appears in the color pages of this volume.) Like the Book of Kells, this manuscript of the gospels is remarkable for the profusion and richness of its detailed illustrations; the motifs of intertwined lions of different colors, the zoomorphic shapes, and the sheer density of intricate detail of these gospel manuscripts make them central documents in the history both of Christian and of Celtic art.

LATER ANGLO-SAXON BRITAIN

As a point of contrast to the visually impressive Lindisfarne Gospels, it may be useful to consider a manuscript such as the Codex Amiatinus, a massive (75 lbs) copy of the Bible now in Florence. This manuscript, though visually more sedate than the Lindisfarne Gospels, contains a biblical text so closely similar to the original Latin translation of St. Jerome (known as the Vulgate Bible) that today it forms the basis for the scholarly reconstruction of Jerome's text. The Codex Amiatinus was made at the same time as the Lindisfarne Gospels, in the monastery of Wearmouth-Jarrow. While the Lindisfarne Gospels are a strong testimony to the Irish influence on Christian culture in England, the Codex Amiatinus is a powerful statement of Northumbrian monasticism's aspirations to a pure romanitas (as opposed to the practices of the Irish and British). It was in the context, then, of shifting forces and various traditions—the ideals of Roman orthodoxy, the influence of the Irish monasteries, and also the political pull of the Frankish world, and the remnants, however tattered, of the native British church—that England became a Christian nation.

When the Northumbrian historian Bede wrote his Ecclesiastical History of the English People around 725, religion was the only unity the English had; political unity had to grow out of this unity of religious practice. Near the beginning of his history, Bede lists the various languages of Britain: “At the present time [i.e., the early 700s], there are five languages in Britain, English, British, Irish, Pictish, and Latin, just as the divine law is written in five books, each in its own way devoted to seeking out and setting forth one and the same knowledge of sublime truth and true sublimity. The Latin tongue, through the study of the Scriptures, has become common to all the rest.” By “English” Bede refers to what we now call Old English; by “British” he means the Celtic language of the Britons, ancestor of modern Welsh. The fact that Bede counts Latin, the learned language of religion and science, among the languages of Britain, however, suggests that he is not speaking of cultures or ethnic divisions in the modern sense. His point is not so much anthropological as it is spiritual—Britain was the fortunate recipient of the unifying force of Latin Christianity—but it does remind us of the linguistic, cultural, and intellectual diversity to be found in Anglo-Saxon England.

The story that Bede recounts of the period from 597 to 700 is in some respects parallel to the story of Britain under Roman rule. As it had been under the Romans, the island became in important respects, an outpost of a distant empire—in this case, however, an empire founded on religion rather than on secular power. Just as Roman administrators in Britain had reported to their superiors in Rome, so too the archbishops of Canterbury and of York (the two pre-eminent centers of Christianity in Britain, as ordained by Pope Gregory the Great) derived their authority from the pope in Rome; the Roman church had inherited many of the bureaucratic systems, and some of the universalizing aspirations, of the Roman Empire and the Pope assumed the role and name of pontifex maximus (from which he retains the modern title “Pontiff”), the sacerdotal aspect of imperial power. England's was, to be sure, a missionary church, not always willing or able to follow the Roman church in all respects; the English church developed in a relationship, with varying degrees of tension and accommodation, between Christian conversion and secular Germanic culture, and from an early date the English church displayed distinctively local features. As a purely practical matter, too, communication was an enormous challenge in an era when a courier traveling across Europe on horseback could typically cover little more than thirty miles (fifty kilometers) per day. To send a message from London to Rome and receive a reply could thus be expected to take the better part of two months. And yet many people made the journey, and were expected to make it—the roads between England and Rome were familiar to bishops, pilgrims, penitents, monks, messengers, and merchants. Within Britain, too, transportation and communication—and thus any form of centralized control—were made problematic by purely logistical considerations.

It was also in accordance with the church's own inclinations to make some effort to preserve traditional culture and customs, reinvesting existing practices with a Christian meaning. Bede's Ecclesiastical History preserves a letter written by Pope Gregory to the Abbot Mellitus in 601, as the latter was going to join Augustine's mission in Britain; Gregory instructs him to tell Augustine that the temples of the idols in that nation ought not to be destroyed; but let the idols that are in them be destroyed; let holy water be made and sprinkled in the said temples, let altars be erected, and relics placed. For if those temples are well built, it is requisite that they be converted from the worship of devils to the service of the true God; that the nation, seeing that their temples are not destroyed, may remove error from their hearts, and knowing and adoring the true God, may they more familiarly resort to the places to which they have been accustomed. And because they have been used to slaughter many oxen in the sacrifices to devils, some solemnity must be exchanged for them on this account, as that on the day of the dedication, or the nativities of the holy martyrs, whose relics are there deposited, they may build themselves huts of the boughs of trees, about those churches which have been turned to that use from temples, and celebrate the solemnity with religious feasting, and no more offer beasts to the Devil, but kill cattle to the praise of God in their eating, and return thanks to the Giver of all things for their sustenance; to the end that, whilst some gratifications are outwardly permitted them, they may the more easily consent to the inward consolations of the grace of God.

Gregory may not be entirely clear on the precise nature of English paganism—he seems to imagine England to be like Rome, with temples and priesthoods—but his strategy permits many sorts of accommodations of Christian practice to English culture, and vice versa. Doubtless this hastened the process of conversion; Bede himself, writing barely a century after the beginning of the Roman mission to England, does not seem to regard lingering paganism among the English as a contemporary problem worth mentioning. The old pagan gods of the north were abandoned along with pagan temples and rituals—though remnants of their importance persisted, as they do today in our days of the week: Wednesday is “Woden’s day,” Thursday is “Thor’s Day,” and so on. But the Anglo-Saxons managed to adopt the civilization offered by Christianity and at the same time adapt it to their own Germanic heritage. From the perspective of literary history, this policy of “cleansing the temples” fostered an amazing interpenetration of Germanic and Christian ideas; each is re-thought and revised in terms of the other, and it is impossible as well as inappropriate to separate “Christian” from “pagan” elements in the literature of the Anglo-Saxons. A longing for the heavenly home could be expressed in the tones of traditional elegy, Christ could be portrayed as a mighty warrior and his crucifixion as a heroic battle, and the pagan past could be depicted with regretful admiration and poignant sadness in a long poem like Beowulf.

Throughout this period monasteries were the most important outposts of Christian culture in England. The institutions of monasticism had their roots in the ascetic tradition of early Christianity, the belief that one could serve God best by living apart from the world in a state of constant prayer and self-denial. A monastery, as the concept developed in the third and fourth centuries CE, was a place where ascetically minded Christians could live together, supporting one another in prayer and penitential practice while mitigating some of the harsher aspects of the solitary life. As monastic communities grew various rules were devised, some no more than collections of observations and advice. In the sixth century the Rule of St. Benedict outlined a clear and codified plan for the communal life, a plan that is still followed today in monastic communities around the world. The Benedictine rule—which, however rigorous it might seem to a modern reader, was meant to curb some of the ascetic extremes seen in Benedict’s own time—was the foundation on which the great monastic establishments were built, where work, communal prayer, and study comprised the Opus Dei or “work of God,” and which spread what Jean Leclercq has called “the love of learning and the desire for God” throughout early medieval Europe.

Many different rules and monastic orders developed throughout the Middle Ages; their practices differed from one order to another and one house to the next, but the general principles were constant. Monks were not usually ordained as priests, and had no pastoral responsibilities to minister to a congregation (though monasteries often did, especially in the early Middle Ages, provide pastoral care in areas without an established system of parishes). Monks were obliged to give up worldly wealth, their position in society, and their connections with family and friends so as to live in a community of individuals devoted to the same goals; at the same time, however, abbots were often from the same families as the secular rulers, and became powerful rulers and possessors of great wealth. Monastic communities always observed, at least in theory, a strict separation of the sexes, but the monastic life was open to women as much as to men; the English practice in the century before Bede was to have double monastic houses of monks and nuns, in almost all cases headed by an abbess such as the famous and noble Hild of Whitby. The monasteries, as the most important locus for intellectual activity and for the preservation and creation of cultural artifacts, became essential to the continuance of Latin culture, the practices of literacy, and the texts both of the church fathers and of classical authors, which were copied and read even as they were sometimes regarded with suspicion. Monastic culture flourished so vigorously in the north of England that one scholar has described Northumbria in the generations around 700 as a “veritable monastic Riviera.”

INVASION AND UNIFICATION

This came to a dramatic end in the 790s with the first wave of invasions by the various Scandinavian peoples known to history as “Vikings,” and organized monastic life in England seems to have fallen into a state of more or less complete disrepair in the course of the ninth century. (It would be restored in the later tenth century by the reformers Oswald, Dunstan, and Æthelwold; by this time, however, the centers of monastic culture were in Canterbury, Winchester, and Glastonbury rather than the far north, which was thoroughly Danish and in some places re-paganized.) Among the first targets of Viking attack were the holy island of Lindisfarne, which fell in 793, and Bede’s monastery at Jarrow, which was destroyed in 794; the raids would continue on and off for two centuries. The Vikings were in many ways an extraordinary group of peoples. Whereas previous invaders such as the Angles, Saxons, and Jutes traveled relatively short distances, the Vikings constructed longships that proved capable of crossing the Atlantic; the remains of a Viking settlement at L’anse Aux Meadows in Newfoundland, dating from about 1000, are evidence that they traveled even to the New World. They established settlements in Iceland and Greenland, and settled in Ireland, Scotland, and Normandy as well as in England (the territory of Normandy takes its name from the “northmen”). The popular image of the Vikings is one of raiders who would arrive, plunder, and return to their homeland; in fact, Viking raids were followed in most areas by invasion and settlement, and gradually Viking groups were absorbed into local populations. For most of the tenth century Viking raids ceased; the former raiders had become farmers, and had begun to intermarry with Anglo-Saxons in a process of cultural and linguistic assimilation that continued through the eleventh century.

The ruins at Lindisfarne.

The Viking presence contributed significantly to the unification of the Anglo-Saxon kingdoms and the first stirrings of what might be called, for lack of a better term, national feeling, both in Scotland and in England. The centers of political power shifted southward, to Mercia in the eighth century and Wessex in the ninth; smaller kingdoms formed alliances and larger ones expanded their rule, until most of England was united under King Alfred the Great of Wessex, who reigned from 871 to 899. Alfred was able to raise a substantial army and stop the Vikings militarily; while the Vikings maintained control over the north and northeast of England, Alfred and his successors controlled most of the remainder of the country.

With peace secured, Alfred began promoting education and literary culture. What is of incalculable importance for the history of English literature is that he proposed to encourage the translation of Latin works into English and the cultivation of vernacular literacy. Alfred surrounded himself with a learned circle of advisors after the manner of the Frankish emperor Charlemagne (d. 814), and was himself literate in Latin—he translated several works from Latin, including Boethius’s Consolation of Philosophy, though probably with a great deal of assistance from his advisors. He sets out the reasoning behind his policy of English translation in the Preface to his translation of Gregory the Great's Pastoral Care—and it is significant that he announces his program of education and translation in a book on how to rule and govern:

I recalled how the law was first composed in the Hebrew language, and thereafter, when the Greeks learned it, they translated it all into their own language, and all other books as well. And so too the Romans, after they had mastered them, translated them all through myriad interpreters into their own language.... Therefore it seemed better to me ... that we too should turn certain books which are the most necessary for all men to know into a language that we can all understand.

Alfred's educational program was designed primarily to help him govern, but one of its legacies is the relatively large quantity of literary, historical, legal, spiritual, and political writing in English (about 30,000 lines of poetry and about ten times as much prose) that has survived, almost all of it in manuscripts from the tenth and eleventh centuries. Under Alfred the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle was probably begun; to this year-by-year historical record we owe a great deal of our knowledge of the period.

The authority of even the most capable and ambitious rulers in the early Middle Ages was seldom able to survive long after their deaths. More often than not family feuding would undo much of what had been accomplished, as happened when fighting among Charlemagne's three sons led to the tripartite division of the Carolingian empire. Alfred had rather better luck with his descendants, who were able to consolidate his accomplishments and even extend them somewhat; his descendant Edgar (r. 959–75) commanded the allegiance of all of the most important English lords, had ties to the most important families on the Continent, and had in his control all senior church appointments. Under the weaker leadership of the next generation, however, in particular Æthelred II (r. 978–1016), and in the face of a renewed series of Viking attacks (dramatically depicted in the poetic Battle of Maldon, written some time after the actual battle, which took place in 991), the allegiance of the great lords and landholders to the king loosened, and the shameful decline of the English nobility described in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle culminated in the Danish King Cnut (r. 1016–35) taking the English throne.

The end of the tenth century was by no means entirely a period of decline, however; it was also a time of such literary figures as the homilist and grammarian Ælfric, the archbishop Wulfstan, and the scholar Byrhtferth of Ramsey; during these years a number of de luxe decorated manuscripts were produced, and important works such as the Rule of St. Benedict and the Gospels were translated into English. It is a tribute to the strength of Alfred's reforms that much of the administrative, military, and church structures he had put into place survived the conquest of England by a Danish king—as, indeed, they would in part survive the conquest fifty years later by the Normans. That these conquests did not cause more destruction than they did must also be attributed in part to the fact that these invading cultures were far from alien to English culture. In the centuries between the early Viking invasions and the reign of Cnut, Christianity had reached Scandinavia; whereas the early Vikings had raided and destroyed monasteries, Cnut was a Christian who continued to support the monasteries much as Alfred and his descendants had done. Similarly, while the Vikings had conquered Normandy in the early tenth century, by the time the Normans invaded Britain in 1066, the Viking culture there had largely been assimilated to that of Christian France.

AFTER THE NORMAN CONQUEST

THE NORMANS AND FEUDALISM

The Norman Conquest of England in 1066 was the next in the long series of invasions and migrations—Celts, Romans, Angles, Saxons, Jutes, and Vikings—that have shaped English culture. That it has held a special place as a focal point in English history is no doubt partly due to its timing, almost exactly at the point where many scholars see larger forces creating a dividing line between the early and the later Middle

From the Bayeux Tapestry (late eleventh century). This object is actually an embroidered banner, around 20 inches high and 230 feet long, rather than a woven tapestry. It was probably created by English embroiderers, who were particularly skilled in this kind of work. This section of the tapestry shows the Norman ships landing at Pevensey, Sussex, 28 September; several ships have already landed on the beach, and horses are being unloaded from another ship that has just arrived. The text of the tapestry at this point (translated from the Latin) reads as follows: Here the horses are getting out of the ships. And here the soldiers [hurry to Hastings to seize supplies].

Ages. French language and culture never threatened to extinguish the existing Anglo-Saxon culture and English language, although they did exert enormous and lasting influence on them. The contrast with the Anglo-Saxon migrations is striking: these effectively and permanently imposed an English culture on Britain, while conquest by the Normans never permanently imposed French culture on England. But the Norman invasion helped to change Britain in fundamental ways—most obviously in language, but also in social and economic structure. For all its far-reaching consequences, the invasion itself was a relatively modest affair. When Harold was crowned as king following the death of King Edward, the succession was disputed by William, Duke of Normandy, who settled the matter militarily; with a force probably numbering no more than 8,000, he crossed the channel, and had soon defeated and killed Harold in a day-long battle just outside Hastings. His victory brought England under the rule of a French-speaking king with substantial territorial claims in France, a situation that would persist for roughly the next three hundred years. Despite this obvious shift, and despite the triumphant narrative of the Bayeux tapestry (probably made within a generation of the battle for a Norman patron), the effects of the Conquest, particularly as it was viewed at close range rather than years later, apparently did not always loom so large. In this connection it is interesting to compare the five different accounts in different manuscripts of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle that have come down to us. At one extreme is the remarkably brief account of a scribe writing at Winchester in the manuscript known as the Parker MS: “In this year King Edward died and Earl Harold succeeded to the kingdom, and held it forty weeks and one day; and in this year William came and conquered England. And in this year Christ Church was built and a comet appeared on 18 April.” By contrast, a scribe writing a generation or more later in Peterborough presents a much fuller account of how Harold was forced to fight a Norse invader in the north of the country before meeting William at Hastings, and conveys more of the immediate effects of William’s conquest. Yet even here one has the sense that the death of a local abbot is regarded as being of almost as much importance as the Norman invasion:

And King Harold was informed [of the victory of a Norse King near the town of York], and he came with a very great force of English men and met him at Stamford Bridge, and killed him and Earl Tostig and valiantly overcame all the invaders. Meanwhile Count William landed at Hastings on Michaelmas Day, and Harold came from the north and fought with him before all of the army had come and there he fell and his two brothers Gyrth and Leofwine; and William conquered this country, and came to Westminster, and Archbishop Aldred consecrated him king, and people paid taxes to him, and gave him hostages and afterwards bought their land. And Leofric, Abbot of Peterborough, was at that campaign and fell ill there, and came home and died soon after, on the Eve of All Saints. God have mercy on his soul. In his day there was every happiness and every good at Peterborough, and he was beloved by everyone, so that the King gave to Saint Peter and him the Abbacy of Burton and that of Coventry which Earl Leofric, who was his uncle, had built, and that of Crowland and that of Thorne. And he did much for the benefit of the monastery of Peterborough with gold and silver and vestments and land, more indeed than any before or after him.

Significant here is the mention of people paying taxes to William and “buying” their lands. William exacted tribute from the conquered both in the immediate aftermath of his invasion and on an ongoing basis, keeping as much as a fifth of English lands for himself and dividing much of the rest among members of his family and the barons who had supported him, who in turn maintained their own followers. While neither the lords nor the peasants of Anglo-Saxon England had held legal title to their land in quite the way that we conceive of it today, they had in practice exercised rights over that land similar to those that we would describe as the rights of ownership. Under the Normans, by contrast, nobles held the land that they occupied not on any permanent basis but as part of a system of exchange. The king granted land to a nobleman as a fief; in return for the right to its use the nobleman was obliged to perform services for the king, including making payments at various times and providing armed knights whenever the king might demand them. The nobleman, in his turn, would grant land—again, as a fief—to a knight, who in return would owe to the nobleman military service and other dues. The knight would typically retain a substantial portion of this land, and then divide the rest among the peasantry. There were obligations in the other direction, as well: knights were obliged to provide protection for the peasantry, nobles for the knights, and the king for the nobles. The relationship at each level was, in theory at least, entirely voluntary and often publicly proclaimed, with the “vassal” (or holder of the fief) kneeling and promising homage and fealty to his lord, and a kiss between the two then sealing their mutual obligation.

The institution of this new system was marked in a unique way by William through the compilation of the Domesday Book, so-called in reference to the “Day of Judgment” at the end of the world, an extraordinary survey on a county-by-county basis of all the lands held by the king and by his vassals, recording all the obligations of the landholders. Without the sort of commitment to record keeping and enforcement that the Domesday Book represented (a commitment made possible, it must be said, by the underlying social order inherited from the Anglo-Saxons), the Normans might not have succeeded to such a great degree in imposing a new network of obligation on the conquered people. It must be noted, however, that the Domesday Book was seldom used to settle disputes or clarify ownership—the two functions for which, one might suppose, such a comprehensive census would be undertaken—in the first century of its existence. The eleventh-century ability to make records outpaced the development of a system in which to exploit them, and it would take some time before the mechanisms of government could make efficient use of such burdensome archives of documents. It has been argued that the Domesday Book, for all the impressive bureaucracy that brought it about, reflects a mistaken idea of the nature of written obligations: William may have imagined that the island of Britain could be granted to him by a written charter, like any other piece of land, and that recording the disposition of property and population would somehow fix them permanently in that state. But even if Domesday was more symbolic than useful, the imposition of feudal obligations was fairly thorough in England; the Anglo-Saxon nobles were quickly assimilated, dispossessed, or killed, leaving William in effective control of England. The Norman conquests of Wales and Scotland, however, were much slower and more piecemeal, and the Anglo-Norman kings never exercised very much control over Ireland.

The late eleventh century in England saw the arrival of the Jews as well as the French invaders. Christian disdain for moneylending—although there were certainly Christian usurers—and the exclusion of Jews from some other professions meant that they tended to become strongly associated with, and very important in, the financial workings of the kingdom. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, until their expulsion in 1290, they served at times as a financial last resort for the king; their relatively unprotected status as non-Christians made them vulnerable to much more severe forms of taxation and the abrogation of debts incurred by Christians but never repaid. Another important development of the later eleventh century, which would become much more central to civic life in the late Middle Ages, was the rise of guilds—initially merchant guilds that exercised a monopoly over the trade in a particular area, but later craft guilds that established regulations allowing them to control who could practice a given craft and that offered social and financial support to their members, as well as regulating the quality of production. While guilds and confraternities of some description, often purely religious in orientation, had existed since perhaps the seventh century, they became increasingly important in the course of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, particularly in England, and their rise coincided with the growth of urban centers and of new forms of religious devotion.

HENRY II AND AN INTERNATIONAL CULTURE

If William was the key figure in establishing Norman and feudal rule in England, his great-grandson Henry II (r. 1154–89) was the key figure in its preservation and extension through the later Middle Ages. Henry's coming to the throne in 1154 brought to an end almost twenty years of civil war under the disputed kingship of Stephen, in the course of which barons and church leaders had taken advantage of the collapse of royal authority to expand local powers. Many of them began to encroach on land claimed by the crown, and to build private castles to protect their domains. Henry put a stop to these practices, taking back the lands, tearing down the castles, and reorganizing royal authority in a fashion that was increasingly supported by standardized records and documents. Central authority over legal matters, which had previously been largely restricted to capital cases, was now extended to legal matters of all sorts; the first legal textbook was composed in Henry's reign. The expansion of the crown's legal control came in part at the expense of the church, and provoked one of the most famous incidents of Henry's reign, his clash with Thomas Becket (1118–70), Archbishop of Canterbury, who wanted the clergy to retain their right to be tried in church courts independent of the secular legal system. The Archbishop was subsequently murdered, allegedly on the orders of Henry, an event that exercised a tremendous hold on the contemporary imagination. As John of Salisbury tells the story (in the earliest surviving account of the murder, written in 1171), Becket was standing before the altar when the knights who had come in pursuit of him arrived and told him that it was his time to die. John writes:

Steadfast in speech as in spirit, he replied: "I am prepared to die for my God, to preserve justice and my church's liberty. But if you seek my head, I forbid you on behalf of God almighty and on pain of anathema to do any hurt to any other man, monk, clerk or layman, of high or low degree. ... I embrace death readily, so long as peace and liberty for the Church follow from the shedding of my blood." ... He spoke, and saw that the assassins had drawn their swords; and bowed his head like one in prayer. His last words were "To God and St. Mary and the saints who protect and defend this church, and to the blessed Denis, I commend myself and the church's cause." ... A son's affection forbids me to describe each blow the savage assassins struck, spurning all fear of God, forgetful of all fealty and any human feeling. They defiled the cathedral and the holy season with a bishop's blood and with slaughter.

It remains unclear whether or not Henry ordered Becket's murder. What is clear is that the outcry was so great that Henry was forced to perform public penance—and to accept that the church would, to some extent, remain outside the realm of royal authority. Becket's martyrdom created the Canterbury shrine that was the destination of Chaucer's pilgrims, among many others.

Plan for Canterbury Cathedral, c. 1160. Canterbury Cathedral, the seat of the Archbishop of Canterbury, head of the English Church, is a kind of time capsule of Christianity in Britain since Anglo-Saxon times. The earliest church known to have stood on this site was that of St. Augustine of Canterbury, who arrived as a missionary in 597 CE; traces of this building are believed to lie beneath the current structure. An Anglo-Saxon church was built over that of Augustine in the ninth or tenth century; it was destroyed by fire in 1067 and rebuilt by the Normans shortly afterward, and this construction still forms the basic fabric of the existing church, although it was modified and decorated further in the succeeding centuries. The plan shows the extensive monastic buildings as well as the cathedral itself. The lines shown connecting the buildings represent the plumbing system. At the top left the vineyard and orchard are indicated. The murder of St. Thomas Becket, then Archbishop, on the Cathedral's altar, made Canterbury a major pilgrimage shrine.

Durham Cathedral, begun in 1093, is regarded as one of the finest examples of Norman architecture in Europe; this style, a form of the Romanesque, is characterized by round arches (as here, along the sides of the nave) and vast but relatively spare interiors. Durham also displays some features (such as the pointed vaulting) that came to characterize the Gothic style of many later cathedrals.

Lincoln Cathedral, Galilee Porch. Begun in 1072 and substantially rebuilt in the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries, Lincoln Cathedral shows some of the classic features of both Romanesque and Gothic architecture. The Gothic Galilee Porch dates from c. 1230.

Salisbury Cathedral (thirteenth century). With a spire of 404 feet, this was until the 1960s the tallest building in England. It is a classic example of the high Gothic style, with its pointed arches, flying buttresses to support a higher vault, and greater intricacy of design, including decorative features such as exterior sculpture and stained glass windows.

If Henry's extension of the power of the English throne throughout the realm were unprecedented—though not, as the example of Becket suggests, entirely unopposed—so too was his extension of that power beyond the British Isles. Like previous Anglo-Norman monarchs, Henry controlled much of what is now northern France as well as England. With his marriage to Eleanor of Aquitaine in 1152 he had acquired control of much of southern France. But, despite the efforts of Henry and the kings who followed him, the English presence in France was far from enduring. Most of the English holdings in France were lost during the reign of King John (1166–1216), and by 1453, at the close of the Hundred Years' War between France and England, the port town of Calais was the only remnant of English control over France.

Henry II and Eleanor of Aquitaine sailing across the English Channel. Detail of illustration from Matthew Paris, Historia Major (c. 1240). The king and queen made the crossing many times as they traveled between their French and English kingdoms.

The period around the Norman Conquest also coincided with important developments in learned culture. England had produced outstanding scholars at various points in the early Middle Ages—among them Bede, the Latin poet Aldhelm, Ælfric, Byrhtferth, and most famously Alcuin of York, a monk of York who became master of Charlemagne's palace school—and in the eleventh century was home to the illustrious Anselm of Bec (1033–1109), one of the founders of scholastic thought, whose career demonstrates the international culture of the church and the schools, both of which used Latin, an international language. Born in Italy, Anselm became abbot of a monastery in Normandy, and was eventually appointed Archbishop of Canterbury—the leading church position in England. His development of the ontological argument for the existence of God in his Why God Became Man is a good example of scholastic ways of thinking, proceeding on the basis of deductive logic to new theological conclusions. While there were outstanding individual thinkers at this time, however, the universities were still in their infancy; in most of Europe, schools had existed for the most part only in association with cathedrals or monasteries and their chief purpose was to provide training for clerics. In the wake of monastic and ecclesiastical reform in the tenth and eleventh centuries, these schools began to expand their curricula to provide a more highly educated clergy at all levels. Already by the end of the eleventh century there was some form of instruction taking place at Oxford, and by the end of the twelfth century it was a substantial enough center of learning to have attracted its first foreign student, and to benefit when Henry II forbade English scholars to study at the university of Paris. The university of Bologna was also already in existence at this time, and these three were soon followed by others across Europe.

The British Isles in the twelfth century also saw the rise of new modes of historical writing, including works such as William of Malmesbury's Gesta Regum Anglorum or "Deeds of the English Kings," Henry of Huntingdon's Chronicle, and Geoffrey of Monmouth's Historia Regum Britanniae or "History of the Kings of Britain." These writers' approach to history emphasized, as their titles suggest, the deeds of kings and the rise and fall of nations; in this they departed from predecessors more interested in depicting the Christian framework of history. The period also illustrates the political uses of literature. While Henry II—unlike, for example, King Alfred—is not particularly remembered for his own literary activities, numerous works in Anglo-Norman are associated with him as a patron or dedicatee, and his desire to solidify and extend his claims on both French and English lands was one of the things that made him an important figure for literary history. Henry and his descendants are known as the Angevin (or Plantagenet) kings, a reference to Henry's father, Geoffrey "Plantagenet" of Anjou, and this designation accurately represents their ongoing political and cultural interest in France. Henry's reign saw the production and wide dissemination of numerous literary and historical works that proved foundational for British literature, especially the development of the Arthurian legend.

Geoffrey of Monmouth's History, completed around 1139, offers an account of the history of the realm going back to its mythical Trojan founder, Brutus (from whom the name Britain supposedly derived), and provided the foundation for the Arthurian stories of the later Middle Ages. Henry II, the descendant of Normans who, like the mythical British under Arthur, had battled the Saxons for control of Britain, was only the first in a long line of kings to find this legend, with its potential to offer an authoritative and legitimizing history, an appealing subject; Arthur's imperial ambitions, as told in this version of the tale, also offered a supposed historical precedent for English claims to rule on the continent.¹ Geoffrey's History was popular throughout Europe, and in the British Isles alone was translated into Middle Welsh, Anglo-Norman, and Middle English. The Anglo-Norman version Brut, by the poet Wace, was dedicated to Henry's queen, Eleanor of Aquitaine, a further suggestion of the story's royal allure. Later in the century, French authors—most notably Chrétien de Troyes (c. 1150–90)—inserted into the legendary history of Arthur episodes that focused on the individual achievements of knights and on romantic (sometimes adulterous) love, creating a considerably greater role for female characters. Their works took their name from the language in which they were written, roman (French, from which we derive the modern literary term romance as well as the name for the romance languages), as opposed to Latin—a choice that reflected the growing audience for vernacular poetry in the European courts.

A form closely related to the romance, and also written in the vernacular, was the Breton lay, a short narrative with, usually, a significant element of the marvelous and a central emphasis on a romantic relationship rather than large-scale political or military events. The lays' emphasis on the supernatural, which is often attributed to their origin in the Celtic culture of Brittany, is reminiscent at times of the early-twelfth-century prose tales of the Mabinogi from medieval Wales—which also, however, show notable chivalric and courtly features. By far the most famous medieval lays are those by an Anglo-Norman author who calls herself simply "Marie" and who apparently wrote in England in Henry's time; her twelve short tales—two of which are set in the world of Arthurian legend—offer a particularly careful attention to women's role in the conflicts of loyalty that often characterize romance narratives, and are one of the relatively few medieval works by a named female author. The Marie who wrote the lays is usually identified with the "Marie de France" who composed a collection of fables and an account of a knight's visionary journey to purgatory. Romance and the lays took some time to make their way into English; Layamon translated Wace's Brut into English around the turn of the thirteenth century, but most Middle English romances date from the late-thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, probably reflecting the linguistic tendencies of their primary audience, the French-speaking nobility, before the fourteenth century.

As had happened centuries earlier in the wake of Alfred's rule, royal authority was scaled back under Henry's successors, who included two of his sons: first Richard I (the Lionheart), who ruled from 1189 to 1199, and then John, who ruled until 1216. In order to raise money in his struggle against Phillip II of France for territory on the continent, John imposed extraordinary taxes on English barons and other nobles; the barons rebelled and forced the king to sign a document setting out the rights and obligations both of the nobles and of the king himself, and making explicit that the king was not to contravene these customary arrangements without consulting the barons. The document also reaffirmed the freedom of the English church, particularly the freedom from royal interference in the election of bishops or other officeholders. Under this “great charter” or Magna Carta, the power of the king was for the first time limited by the terms of a written document.

¹ Arthur's imperial... continent Although the Normans may have liked to associate themselves with the British side in the Arthurian legends, Welsh poets of the time, whose culture was the more direct descendant of the early British, cast the Normans in the role of the despised English.

WALES, SCOTLAND, IRELAND: NORMAN INVASIONS AND THEIR AFTERMATH

Standard histories of Britain during the centuries following the Norman conquest of England often pay a great deal of attention to the connections between England and France and to England’s military conflicts there, but relatively little to Anglo-Norman or English involvement in Scotland, Wales, and Ireland—even though the English presence in the latter three had far more enduring consequences than did the English involvement in France.

The Normans managed to conquer most of Wales soon after conquering England, and Norman lords introduced a feudal system, as well as dramatic changes in agricultural, religious, and commercial life; though Norman control of the area was never complete, arguably Wales became as connected to the Latinized world of Europe as it had been to the Celtic world of the Irish Sea. This cultural hybridity is reflected in Wales’s most famous medieval vernacular manuscripts, which contain masses of literature translated from French and Latin—in diverse forms encompassing religious meditations, chivalric chronicles, and romances—as well as poetry and prose from Welsh tradition. In works of Welsh legend such as the Four Branches of the Mabinogi, we can discern both ancient mythology and contemporary awareness of the Norman presence. The violent removal of the Welsh princes—the last of them, Llewelyn ap Gruffudd, in 1282—removed the support for the Gogynfeirdd or “Poets of the Princes” and the professional reciters who kept their work alive in memory; hence what looks like a literary flowering in terms of the written record was at least in part a salvage operation. However, a new generation of poets, Beirdd yr Uchelwyr or the “Poets of the Nobility,” developed under the patronage of the Welsh gentry, and flourished from the fourteenth through the sixteenth century, when Wales was formally annexed by England.

The best of these “Poets of the Nobility,” Chaucer’s contemporary Dafydd ap Gwilym, was as alert to European poetic trends as he was to the literary tradition of his homeland.

Norman and Anglo-Norman kings had less success in their efforts to conquer Scotland. Norman kings managed to exert control over parts of Scotland in the twelfth century, though that control remained fiercely contested. Edward I invaded Wales and Scotland again in the thirteenth century and established a greater degree of control, and Edward II and other British monarchs fought the Scots in the early fourteenth century in what are now generally referred to as the First and Second Scottish Wars of Independence (the most important engagement of which was the Battle of Bannockburn in 1314—a conflict that became etched in Scottish memory). But despite the best efforts of the Normans and the English, Scotland retained its independence—a kingdom with an identity defined in part at least through its history of determined resistance against English incursions. It was, however, in many respects a divided kingdom. The language and culture north of the River Forth (and in much of the far west of the kingdom) was Scottish Gaelic, while the language and culture between the English border and the Forth was English Scots, not Gaelic. (Early Scots was a close cousin of Old English, and Middle Scots, while rather more distant from Middle English, remained in the same family.) Under the rule of King David (1124–1153) Scotland’s economy (and also its Gaelic and Scots cultures) became far more closely connected to those of England and of the rest of Europe; this Davidian revolution, as it has come to be called, had far-reaching consequences. Feudalism was introduced, and government became far more highly organized; the growth of monasteries was encouraged, as was the growth of towns (or burghs). So too was learning of many sorts, and Scottish literary works from this period are largely written in Latin or French. Little has survived of literature in Gaelic or Scots from the eleventh through fifteenth centuries; it was not until the late medieval period—the era of Robert Henryson, William Dunbar, and Gavin Douglas—that Scots literature achieved an extraordinary flourishing.

English involvement in Ireland took a significant turn in the 1160s when Diarmait, king of Leinster, invited Henry II of England to assist him in an Irish civil conflict. The parallels to the coming of the Anglo-Saxons to England are noteworthy; the “assistance” became, in effect, an invasion by Henry’s barons, and as much of Ireland as the English could conquer was made a lordship subject to English rule. At the same time, Continental monastic orders such as the Benedictines, Cistercians, and Cluniacs had started moving in. Over the course of the next two centuries these influences brought growth to the towns and to trade, a measure of feudalism to parts of the countryside, changes to church organization, and a new legal system in areas under English control. Yet the English never did exert full control over Ireland during the medieval period, and in the years after the Black Death their real authority was limited to an area surrounding Dublin, which came to be known as the Pale (in Irish An Pháil, the staked or bordered area). Much of the rest of the country remained in the hands of the descendants of the Norman invaders, but more often than not these “Hiberno-Normans” (later known to Irish history as the “Old English”) had become culturally closer to their subjects than they were to the English. Like the Welsh, the medieval Irish translated and adapted a great deal of foreign literature into their own language, from Greco-Roman narratives to Arthurian romance. Until around 1200, the end of the Middle Irish period, the copying of early Irish texts was accomplished almost exclusively in native Irish monasteries. Perhaps the most famous manuscript of this period is the twelfth-century Lebor na hUidre or Book of the Dun Cow, which includes the oldest of several surviving retellings of portions of the much older great prose epic Táin Bó Cúailnge (The Cattle-Raid of Cooley). After 1200, the native monasteries declined, while bardic schools were set up under the patronage of both Gaelic and Hiberno-Norman lords; from then on, Irish texts were kept and copied by bardic, medical, and legal families as well as by monasteries. Nearly all of the vast literature we have in Old Irish (700–900) and Middle Irish (900–1200), though it can be securely dated using linguistic evidence, survives only in later manuscripts—sometimes as late as the sixteenth or seventeenth century.

THE THIRTEENTH CENTURY

1215 was a momentous year in medieval Europe. In addition to the signing of Magna Carta—whose ultimately far-reaching effects were at the time felt only in England—this year witnessed the Fourth Lateran Council, a major gathering of church leaders under the guidance of the energetic Pope Innocent III. Lateran IV represented an extraordinarily far-reaching attempt to unify Christian practice and raise standards of Christian observance. The Canons of the Council covered almost all aspects of Christian life, and their effects on both religious practice and religious instruction resounded through the rest of the Middle Ages. Christians from now on were required to confess their sins formally and receive Communion at least once a year, and the sacrament of the altar was officially declared to involve transubstantiation, meaning that the body and blood of Christ were actually present in, rather than merely represented by, the bread and wine consecrated at the Mass (a doctrine that became a matter of serious dispute, however, in later medieval England). A new network of regulation was put into place to govern marriages, with secret marriages prohibited and marriage itself declared a sacrament.

Associated with the increased emphasis on the importance of priests administering sacraments to the faithful were increased efforts to ensure that members of the clergy were educated and competent; one of the canons involved the maintenance of cathedral schools free to clerics. Bishops were required to preach in their dioceses or ensure that there were others who could do so in their stead, and clergy were forcefully reminded of the requirement of clerical celibacy. Individual Christians, for their part, were expected to be able to recite a small number of prayers, but there was no thought of encouraging widespread education of a sort that would enable the populace to read the word of God on their own. On the contrary, it was considered important to keep the Bible at a remove from the common people so that it could be safely interpreted to them through church intermediaries. The controversy that later developed over this issue would extend over several centuries and become a crucial concern for the Lollard or Wycliffite sect in fourteenth- and fifteenth-century

England, as well as a central distinguishing point between the Roman Catholic Church and the various Protestant faiths in the Reformation.

As this suggests, the reforms of the Fourth Lateran Council aimed to strengthen the Christian community, but with a new emphasis on differentiating, excluding, and penalizing unorthodox believers and non-Christians. The canons include extensive commentary on the need to control and excommunicate heretics; they require Jews and “Saracens” (Muslims) to wear distinctive clothing lest they be mistaken for Christians; they prohibit Jews from holding public office, and make provisions to encourage crusading against Muslim control of the Holy Land. The English joined wholeheartedly in the Crusades and the restrictions placed on Jews. There had been massacres of Jews, particularly at York, already in the late twelfth century; expulsions from various cities by the local lords became widespread as early as the 1230s; and in 1290 Edward I expelled all Jews from England. It is not surprising, in view of this, that anti-Jewish miracle stories became popular across Europe during this period; Chaucer’s Prioress’s Tale is a later example of this genre. Heresy remained a concern throughout Europe, although in this period the persecutions were more severe in France and other parts of the continent than in England.

The Fourth Lateran Council was in part a response to increased lay devotion and interest in religion, which offered a challenge to the sometimes inadequate pastoral care provided by the clergy. In the early thirteenth century, for example, the records of the Bishop of Winchester show numerous priests being forced to declare that they will learn the Creed, the Ten Commandments, the Seven Deadly Sins, and various other basic Christian doctrines within the space of a year, or pay a fine of forty shillings, a far from unusual instance which suggests that their preparation was not all that could have been wished. We may note, however, that some of the greatest works of Middle English religious literature survive in a closely related group of texts from around this same time: the Ancrene Riwe (Rule for Anchoresses) and the saints’ lives and other spiritual-guidance texts that accompany it in the manuscripts testify to the presence of learned and committed religious men and women in early thirteenth-century England.

The new religious movements that arose in the course of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries—movements often instigated by the laity—were in some cases accepted by the church, though others were declared heretical; the growth in such movements was so great that the Council decreed that no new religious orders could be instituted after 1215, a decree that was largely observed. Among the new groups, the most significant, particularly for literary history, were the fraternal orders or friars (terms that derive from the Latin and French words for “brother”): the Augustinian hermits, Carmelites, and, especially, Dominicans and Franciscans. Like the monks of the early church, the members of these new movements embraced poverty and learning. Unlike previous monks of any era, however, they devoted themselves to carrying religion directly to the people, rather than living an enclosed life; their aim was to pursue the “vita apostolica,” the way of life of the Apostles. Founded in the first part of the thirteenth century, they spread with great rapidity, and had a substantial presence in the British Isles by around 1250.

The friars’ considerable success and speedy growth derived in no small part from their practice of preaching and establishing foundations in urban centers. The tremendous growth in the European economy from the eleventh century onward had fostered the development of ever-larger towns and cities. Urban growth in turn made possible an increasing specialization of labor that is reflected in the rise of craft guilds and, in another sense, in the friars themselves. The religious and civic cultures that each represented were deeply entwined. Guilds, which by this time were at the center of civic life, had patron saints and made religious fellowship a central part of their collective identities; their later sponsorship of the great cycle plays of the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries was a natural outgrowth of this melding. And although St. Francis, the founder of the Franciscans, had entirely rejected his merchant background upon his conversion, the preachers of his order and the others found the towns, with their concentrated populations and alleged moral turpitude, an ideal place for their work.

Builders at work. Detail of illustration to Matthew Paris, Historia Major (c. 1240). Matthew Paris, a monk at the famous Benedictine Abbey of St. Alban's, near London, took over the chronicle kept by his abbey in 1235 and continued it until his death in 1259. He is one of the liveliest sources for all kinds of information on the mid-thirteenth century, and was among those who commented (with some disapproval) on the spread of the friars and, among other things, their extensive building projects as their orders grew ever larger.

In the British Isles as elsewhere, the friars proved popular and controversial in almost equal measure; a fierce critique of them by the Irish bishop Richard FitzRalph (c. 1299–1360) survives in over seventy manuscripts from every part of Europe, and their influence at the University of Paris in the mid-thirteenth century so infuriated the other clerics there that the pope had to intervene. Their preaching was widely admired, however, perhaps especially by lay audiences, and while they quickly became part of the church and university hierarchies, they also claimed a particular affinity for pastoral work. Their mission thus promoted the translation and dissemination of religious teaching among the laity, and their energy in this activity made their writings an important influence on the development of literature in the vernacular languages of Europe, including English. Their emergence and quick expansion both coincided with and furthered the rise of lay involvement in religious life, whether this took the form of pilgrimage, of spiritual reading or writing, of attendance at sermons and church services, or of devotion to saints' cults, particularly that of the Virgin Mary. Nor were the friars the only force for increased religious education; English churchmen were particularly active in their response to the canons of the Fourth Lateran Council, and many works of spiritual instruction for the clergy or the laity, in Latin, Anglo-Norman, or English, attempted to disseminate the basic tenets of the faith. The Speculum Confessionis usually attributed to the learned Robert Grosseteste (c. 1170–1253), bishop of Lincoln, is one example of the new works that responded to the requirement of yearly confession; another is the Anglo-Norman Manuel des Pechiez (c. 1270), the source for Robert Mannyng's Handlyng Synne (1303), which aimed to give laypeople the knowledge they needed to live in accordance with Christian teaching. Just as the influence of the French aristocracy after the Norman Conquest brought French language and literature into the realm of English literary history, so the broader emphasis on basic Christian instruction in the thirteenth century and beyond made Latin works and church teachings increasingly available to vernacular audiences.

The growing lay participation in religion is reflected in the growth of certain characteristic literary genres. The exemplum, or illustrative short story, most famously characteristic of medieval sermons, often provided a narrative argument for avoiding particular sins or emulating certain virtues; the closely related form of the miraculum, or miracle story, aimed to impress the reader or hearer with a sense of wonder. In the later Middle Ages exempla and other short narratives were often especially associated with the preaching of the friars; such stories were thought to be appealing to laypeople, who might need help with the fine points of doctrine and would find narrative more accessible. These tales were sometimes criticized for being more entertaining than instructive, and indeed are not always very different from the genres of fable or fabliau—the latter being a “funny short story in verse,” often dealing with sexual or economic deception and valuing cleverness over morality. Popular in French, fabliaux are essentially non-existent in (written) English until Chaucer, whose Miller’s, Reeve’s, and Shipman’s Tales, among others, are based on this genre.

Saints’ lives, another widely popular literary form, are also one of the oldest genres in English literature; the Old English Martyrology of the ninth century is a particularly comprehensive example, but some of the earliest texts in Middle English are the lives of three virgin martyrs (Juliana, Katherine, and Margaret), all dating from the early thirteenth century. Intriguingly, lives of women martyrs of the early church were extremely popular in late-medieval England; Chaucer’s Second Nun’s Tale, which recounts the life of St. Cecilia, is another well-known (later) example. As with the Bible, even texts that do not center on the life or deeds of a saint may invoke the saints or briefly recount their miracles; they were part of the common knowledge of the time, and widely represented in art. Saints were regarded as protectors and intercessors, and the retelling of their lives was part of the effort to promote their cults and gain their assistance; their stories could provide points of contact with the sacred, particularly since they came from many walks of life.

The growing attention to pastoral care further stimulated the need for clerical education, and the worldly duties of the clergy—from the care of souls (including the writing of sermons) to administration of lands or finances—made studies in logic, rhetoric, and other subjects beyond theology or canon law an important part of their training. At the same time, contact with Arab scholars made both Arabic learning and the writings of classical philosophers—Aristotle most influential among them—newly available in western Europe. The need to assimilate these traditions and bring them into accord with Christian teaching fostered the development of the scholastic method, or scholasticism, which gathered the evidence of various authorities and worked to synthesize it, usually by means of a debate form, into a single coherent authority. The structure of university study was quite different from its modern descendant, though not unrecognizably so. A student would first study the seven liberal arts, around which higher education was organized throughout the later Middle Ages: grammar, rhetoric, and logic (or dialectic), collectively known as the trivium, and arithmetic, music, astronomy, and geometry, called the quadrivium. Students who wished to continue could pursue further studies in theology, medicine, or law—roughly the equivalent of modern graduate schools.

Despite the intellectual flowering of the eleventh to thirteenth centuries, education remained in essence a luxury for most of the population. Not only laborers, but many of the nobility and even some of the clergy never learned to read, although the widespread practice of reading or reciting aloud—both secular and religious works—and of course the experience of hearing sermons meant that those who could not read were not cut off from literate culture. Our own inevitable focus on the written sources that survive should not blind us to the ways in which those who could not themselves read or write still had considerable access to the great narratives and images of their culture.

THE ENGLISH MONARCHY

The religious and cultural energy of the thirteenth century in England was not particularly reflected in its monarchs; the period’s important political developments tended to arise, as we have seen in the case of John and Magna Carta, from limitations on the king’s power rather than, as with William the Conqueror or Henry II, his exercise of that power. The reign of John’s son Henry III (1216–72) was long but not particularly successful; he came to the throne as a child and by the end of his reign his son held effective power. Under his rule the monarchy lost ground to both external and internal forces. The French dauphin Louis controlled the southern part of England upon Henry’s accession, but was expelled in 1217; later in the century, however, Henry had to sell most of his French possessions to pay war debts, and the English barons continually challenged the king’s authority, culminating in his effective deposition in 1264–65 by the forces led by the baron

Simon de Montfort, who as regent convened a kind of proto-Parliament. Simon's death in 1265 at the hands of Henry's troops made him a martyr to many of the English, and both praise-poems and laments in his honor survive from the period. The most significant legacy of the barons' increased power was the consolidation of the principle of the king's limited rulership and the idea that the people of the realm (primarily the nobility) should take some part in its governance. The losses of French territory had contributed to a growing tendency for the ruling inhabitants of England to regard themselves as English (rather than Norman, Angevin, French, and so on); the broader participation in government in the course of the century may have solidified this tendency. By the early fourteenth century language could be seen as a unifying force in the nation: "both the learned and unlearned man who were born in England can understand English," asserts one commentator of the period.

Henry's son Edward I, a much more successful ruler than his father, managed to mend the relationship between monarchy and people, in part by strengthening administrative structures related to law (Chancery), finances (the Exchequer), and governance (the Council); in this he built on the legacy of Henry II and the achievements of the baronial challenge, and the meetings of his Council were the first to bear the name of Parliaments. He also conquered Wales, which never fully regained its independence, although resistance to English rule continued. Like other English monarchs, however, he was unable to gain much control over Ireland, and despite diplomatic and military attempts, he never managed to conquer Scotland, which remained officially independent of England until the eighteenth century. A significant outcome of the ongoing English-Scots conflict was the growth of a sense of national identity among the Scots at least as marked as that among the English; we see this in the declaration of Arbroath (1320), sent to the pope by the nobles of Scotland as a group, in which they declared that they were speaking for "the community of the realm" and that "for so long as one hundred men remain alive, we shall never under any conditions submit to the domination of the English." Edward's attempts to subdue Scotland demonstrated once more the political usefulness of legendary history: in putting forward the English claim on Scottish territory, he made reference to the historical assertions of Layamon's Brut, the Middle English translation of the legends gathered in Geoffrey of Monmouth's History of the Kings of Britain.

The strong, if sometimes brutal, kingship of Edward I contrasts sharply with the troubled rule of his son Edward II (1307–27), who was frequently at odds with his nobles and eventually was deposed by his French queen, Isabella, and her lover, Roger Mortimer, an English baron. Edward was succeeded by his son Edward III (1327–77), whose long reign provided a certain stability but involved considerable losses for England. Edward III forcefully reasserted his claims to French territory through his French mother, and began the long-lasting conflict that came to be known as the Hundred Years' War (1337–1453). This conflict displayed the ongoing contradictoriness of medieval English attitudes toward France: Edward's embrace of a French-derived chivalric culture and claim to the French throne tended to link the nobility of both countries, who exchanged hostages and diplomatic missions, while at the same time the battles provided a focus for anti-French sentiment (which went back to the Norman Conquest) and for renewed claims for English as a valued national language. This was not, of course, a sudden development; already in the thirteenth century a writer could assert that "common men know no French, among a hundred scarcely one," and similar claims become increasingly common in the fourteenth century. Despite considerable early success in the war, meanwhile, England's French holdings dwindled almost to nothing by the time of Edward III's death, and his continuing demand for funds to pursue his military projects put considerable strain on the economy, already weakened by the northern European famine of 1315–18.

Even more significant than the famine was the great plague of 1348–49, the "Black Death," which had a lasting impact on the demography, the economy, and ultimately the culture of Britain and of Europe more generally. It is believed that roughly one-third of western Europe's population died in the plague, though not evenly across all areas; the population of London is estimated to have fallen by almost half, from perhaps 70,000 to about 40,000. In the wake of the plague, there was—not surprisingly—a severe labor shortage; this facilitated a certain amount of social mobility as people were able to take higher-paying work, and the countryside suffered further depopulation as laborers left for the towns. Some employers competed for scarce labor by improving wages or conditions of labor, but the Statute of Laborers of 1351 officially restricted both wages and labor mobility; it became a cause of long-standing friction between the working population of England and its large landholders. Some of that tension found violent expression early in the reign of Edward's successor, his grandson Richard II (r. 1377–99) who inherited the throne at the age of only ten. (His father, the Black Prince, had died in 1376.) Severe taxation and limits on wages imposed in the wake of the Black Death caused considerable distress among the general populace, and helped to spark the Rising of 1381 (at which time the kingdom was still under the regency of John of Gaunt, Richard's uncle), in which groups from all over the country challenged the legislative and fiscal policies of the nobility, although they declared their allegiance to King Richard. While this uprising was easily quelled, it was a tremendous shock to the political and cultural establishment and foreshadowed the struggles for legitimacy that continued throughout the early fifteenth century; it also left behind an unusually rich record of non-nobles' views on the political economy of their day. The general unrest, exacerbated by Richard's autocratic style and struggles with his nobles for control of the country, made the last quarter of the fourteenth century a politically fragile time in England. The king's preference for his own favorites over other, more powerful lords led these "Lords Appellant," as they called themselves, to challenge his authority. Eventually, they succeeded in severely circumscribing his power—and, in 1388, in executing several of his closest advisors. A major source of the conflict between these lords and the king was Richard's desire to make peace with France; the king did eventually succeed in instituting a truce in 1396 through his marriage to the French princess Isabella (his beloved first wife, Anne of Bohemia, had died in 1394). In his later years he regained much of his control, in part through the help of his uncle John of Gaunt, but became increasingly despotic and took harsh revenge on the lords who had threatened his power. The contest culminated in the usurpation of the throne in 1399 by the Lancastrian Henry Bolingbroke (Henry IV), who had earlier been banished from the kingdom; Henry took advantage of Richard's absence in Ireland, where he was continuing his fruitless efforts to bring it under English control. Richard was later murdered in prison, echoing the fate of his deposed great-grandfather, Edward II.

CULTURAL EXPRESSION IN THE FOURTEENTH CENTURY

Richard's rulership may not have been a great success, but he is known, like Henry II, for his deep interest in artistic and cultural production and for the extraordinary literary output that took place during his reign—output that was, unlike that of Henry's reign, as likely to be in English as in French. The writers of the period, some of the best-known figures of medieval English literature, include John Gower, Geoffrey Chaucer, the Gawain-poet, and William Langland; because they all thrived under Richard II they are sometimes referred to as the "Ricardian poets." Despite their contemporaneity, however, their writings by no means reflect a unified literary culture. There are certainly overlaps and, in the case of Chaucer and Gower, even mutual references between some of their works, but the main thing they have in common apart from historical era is that they all wrote in English. As this introduction has tried to suggest, this in itself is a striking fact; only at the end of the fourteenth century do we begin to see the major works of later-medieval English literature participating, often deliberately, in the project of making English a literary language considered worthy of taking its place alongside Latin and the illustrious continental vernaculars, particularly French and Italian, and of being accorded to a position of renewed prominence and respect in its native country after a perceived period of neglect. At the same time, these authors were anything but removed from non-English influences. Gower composed works in Latin and French as well as English; Chaucer translated French and Italian works, and borrowings from continental and Latin traditions shape all his poetry;

Langland's Piers Plowman contains numerous lines in Latin and is strongly influenced by monastic Latin literary forms, while in its use of personification allegory it echoes a popular pan-European mode (also seen in the hugely influential French Romance of the Rose); in Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, the legendary history of Arthur is blended with borrowings from Celtic sources and Christian chivalric culture.

This brings us to an important point about medieval writers—one that applies to all the works in this volume, but that is usefully demonstrated by the Ricardian poets: they did not regard originality in the modern sense as an essential component of a literary work's value. While a medieval poet or preacher or chronicler certainly aimed to tell their story or convey their message in the best possible way, he or she would willingly draw on, combine, borrow from, translate, and rewrite the work of previous authors or storytellers. (The same could, of course, be said of Shakespeare.) Indeed, a link to authoritative sources—which could be written or oral—is often a crucial component of a medieval composition's own claims to authority. The increasing availability of Latin works, through preaching or written translation into the vernacular, or French ones, through performance or translation into English, along with Welsh, Breton, and Irish story material and works in other continental vernaculars, thus provided a rich trove from which Middle English authors constructed their writings.

The tendency of the “big four” Ricardian poets to attract so much attention can overshadow their debts to, and continuity with, the century that preceded them. Sir Gawain is part of a substantial tradition of Middle English romance—Arthurian and other—that includes Sir Orfeo, Sir Launfal, and the Alliterative and Stanzaic Morte Arthure, among many others. These vary in form but show the tendency of romance, too, to draw on a wide range of traditions for its subject matter. The lay Sir Orfeo, for example, reworks the story of Orpheus and Eurydice into a form with both Celtic and chivalric aspects: the classical underworld of Hades becomes a fairy land ruled by a powerful lord. The Alliterative and the Stanzaic Morte Arthure, meanwhile, each recount the fall of Arthur's kingdom, but with very different emphases—the Alliterative Morte sees imperial ambition and family treachery as essential elements, while the Stanzaic focuses on the adulterous love of Lancelot and Guinevere and the clash of blood brotherhood with the fraternal ties of the Round Table. Chaucer mocks traditional romance forms in his parodic Tale of Sir Thopas from The Canterbury Tales, and was all too aware of the challenges posed to idealized chivalry by the military realities of the fourteenth century. But as a member of the royal court, he could appreciate the virtues of what has rightly been called “the principal secular literature of entertainment” of the later Middle Ages and the appeal to an idealized past or a magic-laden landscape, the conflicts of loyalties or contests for love that characterize many romances and help to structure works as otherwise diverse as the Franklin's, Wife of Bath's, Knight's, and Merchant's Tales.

Religious belief and practice are another crucial context for much late-fourteenth-century writing. Early in the century, the poet and canon Robert Mannyng (fl. 1288–1338) translated a handbook on basic Christian teachings from Anglo-Norman to English, titling it Handlyng Synne (1303) and illustrating it lavishly with exempla. There was a growing audience for such spiritual “self-help” works in the English vernacular, and it has been suggested that Handlyng Synne also influenced many later works, including Gower's Confessio Amantis, Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, and Langland's Piers Plowman. Whether or not Mannyng's work formed part of their background, the authors were all able to draw on extensive knowledge of biblical material and Christian history, as well as on the wealth of exemplary narratives that characterized many works designed for religious instruction in the vernacular.

The late fourteenth century also sees the first records of the biblical drama of late-medieval England. Though little is certain regarding the origins of such drama, we do know that in the late fourteenth century substantial groups of plays presenting biblical subject matter began to be performed in several English towns, often in conjunction with festival days of late spring or summer such as Whitsun (“White Sunday”), or Pentecost (the seventh Sunday after Easter), and the Feast of Corpus Christi (a celebration of the Eucharist, held eleven days later); such plays continued to be performed until their suppression in the late sixteenth century. We know too that the presentation of the plays (which have variously been termed “miracle plays,” “mystery plays,” and “cycle plays”—designations that are all problematic in one way or another as blanket terms) varied. The texts that survive from the northern towns of York and Chester consist of more-or-less unified sequences of short plays—often called “pageants,” like the wagons in which they were performed—that present the full sweep of biblical history. The sequence of plays from Coventry is in some respects similar, but includes only New Testament material. Two much more disparate manuscript collections of plays also exist; these are known as “the N-Town plays” and “the Towneley plays.” No firm evidence suggests that either group of plays was ever performed as a sequence—or, indeed, that there was ever any intention to perform the collected plays as a sequence. The N-Town collection contains what was once a separate play on the childhood of Mary as well as a two-part Passion Play. The Towneley collection is of particular interest for a small group of remarkable plays traditionally ascribed to the “Wakefield Master.” (Three of these plays contain textual allusions to the area of Wakefield.)

Individual biblical plays, particularly in the northern sequences, were generally produced by particular craft guilds, representing a large outlay of time and money; in addition to providing religious instruction and entertainment, the plays reflected and emphasized the guilds’ central importance to civic life at this time, as well as the growth of lay power in the governance of many towns. But production of biblical drama was not restricted to annual guild-sponsored performances in towns; some plays were produced by local parishes and some plays performed in the halls of great houses, often by troupes of traveling players.

The scope of late-medieval English drama is similarly diverse. The body of surviving religious drama deriving from some other areas, such as East Anglia, includes not only biblical plays but also a large number of plays depicting the lives of saints or the performance of miracles. Passion plays and Christmas plays were also frequently performed in the late medieval period, as were interludes (typically, short comic sketches, intended for performance at court); mummings (dumb shows with masked performers); folk plays (featuring music and dance as well as dialogue, typically depicting the death and revival of a legendary hero); and Robin Hood plays.

A fifteenth- and sixteenth-century form that has attracted particular interest is the genre conventionally referred to as the “morality play.” Plays in this genre (such as Mankind and The Castle of Perseverance) depict in allegorical form the struggles of a universal human figure; vices and virtues are personified as characters and participate fully in the action of the play. Morality plays were clearly intended to encourage devout individuals to consider their own moral position and to maintain a keen awareness of the state of their souls. But morality plays could also offer a broad range of entertainment—as the humor and energy of Mankind amply demonstrate.

The continuing growth of lay participation in spiritual matters that we see reflected in a work such as Handlyng Synne or in the biblical dramas became, in other contexts, one of the most contentious issues in fourteenth- and fifteenth-century England. The critiques of the clergy, and particularly of monks and friars, that had accompanied ecclesiastical reform movements from the tenth century onward were strongly endorsed in the works of the Oxford theologian John Wyclif (c. 1324–84). In the course of a long and influential writing career, he attacked the church for its enormous wealth and criticized clerics for their moral failings, questioned the doctrine of transubstantiation, and moved toward a view that all laypeople should have direct access to the Bible and could communicate directly with God, needing no priestly intermediation (although he was in many cases sympathetic to parish priests). His views, some of which were declared heretical by the Archbishop of Canterbury’s council in 1382, were nonetheless widely shared, including by some of the nobility at Richard II’s court. Wyclif provided much of the intellectual foundation for the English sect known as Wycliffites or Lollards, and had an enormous influence on the religious, literary, and political culture of late-medieval England. Many of the issues that aroused his wrath are addressed also in Langland’s Piers Plowman, a text highly critical of clerical and ecclesiastical shortcomings (though unlike the writings of Wyclif and his followers it was not generally regarded as heretical).

Yet another aspect of fourteenth-century spirituality is evident in the Showings of the anchoress Julian of Norwich, one of the most important visionary texts of the Middle Ages. Julian's theologically complex and deeply learned account of her experience forms part of both a long tradition of women's visionary literature in medieval Europe (going back at least to the twelfth-century German abbess Hildegard of Bingen) and of a flowering of vernacular religious writing in late-fourteenth-century England that also includes authors such as Richard Rolle and Walter Hilton. And to set Julian's image of the created world as a hazelnut in the palm of God's hand alongside Sir Gawain and the Green Knight's richly detailed hunting scenes or the mysterious John Mandeville's accounts of satyrs, the phoenix, and the exotic kingdoms of the east is to be reminded of the enormous diversity of the literature of late-medieval England. As we noted at the beginning of this introduction, moreover, medieval manuscripts would in many cases have kept this diversity immediately present to readers, recording texts of very different genres alongside one another: saints' lives with confessional manuals, fabliaux with satirical poetry, romances with recipes. Such compilations are reflected in miniature, as it were, by "compilation poems" like the Canterbury Tales, which place stories from varied genres and traditions within a unifying frame, or Piers Plowman, which blends social critique, personification allegory, and anti-clerical satire into a visionary autobiography.

FIFTEENTH-CENTURY TRANSITIONS

Writers in fifteenth-century England were deeply aware of the rich and authoritative literary tradition that immediately preceded them, drawing on and praising the works of their predecessors even as they devised a distinctive tradition of their own. In political and religious terms as well, the fifteenth century was not immune to the turmoil of the late fourteenth, beginning with a crisis of royal authority as the "usurper" Henry IV tried to solidify his claims to the throne and to contain a major nationalist rebellion in Wales led by Owain Glyndwr (Owen Glendower). Religious legitimacy was also at issue, as ongoing Wycliffite (or Lollard) challenges to current church practices caused aggressive responses on the part of the ecclesiastical and secular hierarchies—most notably the royal decree De heretico comburendo of 1401, ordering that recalcitrants be burnt at the stake as heretics (the first institution of such punishment in England), and the famous Constitutions (1407–09) of Thomas Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, which declared that the making or owning of Bibles in English was forbidden and set strict limits on acceptable religious composition in the vernacular. William Thorpe's testimony during his trial for heresy before Archbishop Arundel, an excerpt from which appears on the website to this volume, demonstrates the depth of commitment and the high level of religious understanding that the Lollards brought to this struggle, which both sides regarded as a matter of eternal life and death as well as immediate political importance. The religious and political threats came together in the short-lived rebellion led by Sir John Oldcastle in 1413, in which he and other Londoners tried to depose the new King Henry V; the fact that Oldcastle had at this time already been convicted of heresy (as a Lollard) solidified the link many secular and church lords made between religious and worldly sedition. While Henry V's military success in France—most famously at the battle of Agincourt in 1415—and his strength as a ruler eased some of the strain, anxiety about the monarchy's legitimacy and about composition in the vernacular are evident in much of the literary production of the century.

One of the modes in which these anxieties were expressed was an outpouring of carefully orthodox religious literature in English, often in forms such as saints' lives, visionary narratives, or meditations on the life of the Virgin or on Christ's Passion. The great religious foundations of Henry V, Sheen Charterhouse and Syon Abbey, were important centers for both the dissemination of fourteenth-century writings and the creation of new works (many of which were translations from Latin or French); when Henry VI came to the throne after his father's early death, his own devout tendencies reinforced the link between the Lancastrian court and monastic spirituality. Religious devotion was far from limited to the elite, however; probably the most famous English text of the first half of the fifteenth century is the Book of Margery Kempe, composed by a laywoman living in the world as an account of her spiritual experiences, visions, pilgrimages, and trials for heresy. Margery's frequent conversations with divine and saintly personages show her to be simultaneously extraordinary in and typical of her time; fifteenth-century devotion, particularly in the vernacular, often emphasized emotional connection to and a sense of familiarity with the figures of salvation history.

The intense spirituality of figures such as Margery Kempe contrasts sharply in tone with many of the historical events of the later part of the century. The civil war between the Lancastrian and Yorkist factions—known to us as the Wars of the Roses from the two groups' emblems—pitted descendants of Edward III against one another as claimants to the throne. Begun under the weak kingship of Henry VI, who was deposed by the Yorkist faction in 1460, returned briefly to the throne in 1470, and was executed in 1471, the struggle went on until 1485 when Henry Tudor, a Lancastrian descendant (on his mother's side) of Edward III, defeated Richard III of the house of York and united the warring houses by marrying Elizabeth, daughter of the Yorkist king Edward IV (1461–70, 1471–83). Henry's direct descent, on his father's side, from the twelfth-century Welsh prince Rhys made his rulership the apparent fulfillment of longstanding Welsh prophecies that a Briton would rule England once more.

The chaos and disillusionment that attended the period of civil war echo through the Morte Darthur of Thomas Malory, who drew on Middle English and French works to create his massive cycle of Arthurian romances. This text, a kind of summation of the Arthurian obsessions of late-medieval England, became one of the first printed books in England when William Caxton published it in 1485. In his preface, Caxton—who gave Malory's work the title by which we know it—described the Morte Darthur as recounting “noble chivalry, courtesy, humanity, friendliness, hardiness, love, friendship, cowardice, murder, hate, virtue and sin,” a catalogue whose ending echoes the often dark tone of Malory's work. The Morte Darthur seems to reflect and perhaps comment upon the decline of the chivalric world that Malory, a knight who apparently fought on both sides in the Wars of the Roses, would have known well, and its account of the competing loyalties that eventually destroy Arthur and his kingdom would surely have resonated with contemporary events.

The printing of Malory's work by Caxton was only one small piece of the latter's enormous output. Between about 1475 and his death in 1491, he published almost a hundred different works, many of them his own translations; the most famous of the latter is his Golden Legend, an English version of a monumentally influential thirteenth-century Latin compendium of saints' lives. He is probably best known, however, for his awareness of and influence on the canon of British literature; works by Chaucer, Lydgate, and Gower were among his most important productions, with Malory joining them not long after. His attention to the ever-growing market for vernacular literature and his admiration for the great authors of the past made his professional life one of the great shaping forces on the development of the British tradition, as well as, of course, the instrument of England's entry into the world of printed books.

Of the chesse boorde in genere how it is made capitulo	i
The draught of the kyng and how he neweth hym in the chesse boorde capitulo	ii
Of the moeyng of the queene and how she yssueth out of her place capitulo	iii
Of the yssue of the Alouhens capitulo	iiii
Of the moeyng of the knyghtes capitulo	v
Of the yssue of the wolues & of her progresse capitulo	vi
Of the yssue of the comyn peple whom the paynes represente capitulo	vii
Of the epilogacon and recapitulacon of the booke capitulo	viii

Table of contents from The Game and Play of Chesse, printed by William Caxton (2nd edition, 1481).

Woodcut illustration from The Game and Play of Chesse, printed by William Caxton (2nd edition, 1481).

Caxton's (numerous) early readers included members of the Paston family, a wealthy Norfolk clan. Their extensive surviving letters, which range in date from 1422 to 1529, deal not with legendary heroism or magical encounters, but with the minutiae of everyday life: bills, quarrels with neighbors, marriages, deaths, political gossip.

If it plesse our man spirituel or temporel to bye any pys of two and thre comemoracions of salubriti vse enpryntid after the forme of this prelet lettre whiche ken wel and truly correct late hym come to welkmonestre in to the almoneshe at the red pale and he shal haue them good chepe

Supplicatio flet cordula

Advertisement issued by William Caxton (c. 1477).

LANGUAGE AND PROSODY

Old English poetry differs in important ways from later English poetry. Whereas a modern poem can be written in any of a number of forms—sonnets, blank verse, ballad meter, free verse, and so on—all surviving Old English poetry is written in essentially the same meter and form. Lines in modern English metrical poetry are built out of a fixed number of feet, each of which has (in principle) the same sequence of stressed and unstressed syllables; in Old English poetry, apart from a small number of extended or hypermetric lines appearing irregularly throughout the corpus of surviving verse and a handful of isolated “half-lines” that may or may not be errors, every line consists of two half-lines containing (usually) two stressed syllables each and a varying number of unstressed syllables. The two half-lines are linked by alliteration between one or both stressed syllables in the first half-line and the first stressed syllable of the second half-line. The patterns of alliteration in the two half-lines may be represented as aa:ax, xa:ax, etc. With one notable exception (an 87-line work known simply as “The Rhyming Poem” that appears in the tenth-century Exeter Book), lines of Old English poetry are not linked to one other by rhyme. (By contrast, rhyme is frequently an organizing principle of literature in the Celtic tradition; it features prominently, for example, both in Y Gododdin and in the early Irish lyrics included in this volume; a discussion of rhyme, alliteration, and other formal qualities in the early Irish verse is included in the headnote to “Early Irish Lyrics.”) Alliteration and stress, then, held the lines of an Old English poem together, as meter and rhyme hold together the lines of a Shakespearean sonnet; they were not decorative, as they are in modern poetry, but necessary structural elements.

The opening lines of the poem Beowulf illustrate this poetic structure:

Hwæt: We gardena in geardagum þeodcyninga þrym gefrunon,
hu ða æþelingas ellen fremedon!
Oft Scyld Scefing sceaþena þreatum monegum mægþum meodoseta ofeah, egsode eorl, syððan ærest wearð feasceft funden. He þæs frofre gebad, weox under wolcnum, weorðmyndum þah,
oð þæt him æghwylc þara ymb sittendra
ofer hronrade hyran scolde,
gomban gylðan. Þæt wæs god cyning.
Ðam eafera wæs æfter cenned

geong in gearдум, þone God sende
 folce to frofre. Fyrenðearfe ongeat 15 bæt hie ær drugon alдорlease lange hwile. Him þæs Liffrea, wuldres wealdend, woroldare forgeaf.
 Beowulf wæs breme, blæd wide sprang,
 Scyldes eafera Scedelandum in.
 20 Swa sceal geong guma gode gewyrcean, fromum feohgiftum on fæder bearme,
 þæt hine on ylde eft gewunigen
 wilgesipas, þonne wig cume, leode gelæsten. Lofðædum sceal 25 in mægþa gehwære man geþeon.

Most of this passage (to fæder, line 21) is on fol. 129r of the Beowulf manuscript, which is reproduced on p. 68. Old English script is relatively easy to read, though some letter forms are different from those of modern printed English (especially the round d, the open g, the long f, r, and s, the short t, the p-shaped w called wynn, and the ae ligature called aesc or “ash”) and some letters have not survived (the crossed d called eth and the long p-shaped letter called thorn, both of which represent the sound spelled th in Modern English). As with other surviving Old English poems, the scribe does not put each line of verse on its own line but writes straight across the page. Abbreviations in this text are rare, consisting mostly of a line over a final vowel to indicate that it is followed by the consonant m or n (e.g., monegū in line 5 for the adjective monegum “many”). Punctuation is much lighter than in modern English, and the divisions between what modern linguists recognize as words is not always clear, so that the scribe combines a preposition with the word that follows it, and divides the two parts of a compound word to write ingear dagum in line 1, or combines two short words to write hu ða in line 3.

Though many thousands of words have changed their shape, disappeared, or been added to the lexicon over the past millennium, Old English is still recognizably the ancestor of Modern English. The most common words have changed hardly at all: pronouns such as we, he, him, and that (though it is spelled þæt in Old English), prepositions such as in, under, and over (spelled ofer, but pronounced just like modern English over), and adverbs such as hu (how) and oft. Many other words are either the same as modern English words though spelled differently (god “good,” wæs “was”) or related to surviving words: geardagum is recognizable as “yore-days,” i.e., “days of yore”; wolcnum, an inflected plural form of the noun wolcn, survives as the archaic word “welkin” and still means “the heavens”; funden is the past participle of findan, which is the modern word “find”; hyran is the ancestor of modern “hear,” though it means “obey” as well as “hear” in Old English. Some other words, however, especially those in the aristocratic or poetic register, vanished from the language soon after the arrival of the Normans—examples here include æpelingas “noblemen,” ellen “brave (deeds),” þrym “glory,” and frofre “consolation.”

Other important differences between Old and Modern English are found in word order and inflection. A literal translation of these lines into Modern English clearly reveals this (words in parentheses are grammatical particles required in Modern English but expressed by inflectional endings in Old English):

What! We (of the) spear-Danes in yore-days of people's-kings glory heard how those noblemen brave-deeds did!
 Often Scyld Son-of-Sheaf (of) enemies (from) troops (from) many tribes mead-benches took away terrified (the) noblemen, after first (he) was penniless found. He (for) that comfort awaited, grew under (the) skies, (in) honors prospered,
 until (to) him each (of those) surrounding-sitters 10 over (the) whale's-riding-place to obey had to, tribute pay. That was (a) good king.
 (To) that (one) (a) son was afterwards born young in (the) yards, whom God sent
 (the) people to comfort. Severe-need (he) perceived that they before endured lord-less
 (a) long while. (To) him (for) that (the) Life-lord,
 (of) glory (the) wielder, world-honor gave.
 Beowulf was famous, fame widely sprang,
 (of) Scyld (the) son Scandinavian-lands in.
 So shall (a) young man good make-happen (with) pious gifts from (his) father's coffers, so that him in old-age afterwards might support willing-companions, when war (should) come,
 the people (might) support. (With) praise-deeds shall 15 in tribes each one (a) man prosper.

If we compare this literal rendering to the translation included in this volume, we can see that Old English tended to place verbs after direct objects and at the ends of clauses, while modern English requires a fairly strict subject-verb-object order:

Listen!

*We have heard of the glory in bygone days
of the folk-kings of the spear-Danes,
how those noble lords did lofty deeds.*

*Often Scyld Scefing seized the mead-benches
from many tribes, troops of enemies, struck fear into earls. Though he first was found a waif, he awaited solace for that—
he grew under heaven and prospered in honor
until every one of the encircling nations
over the whale's-riding had to obey him,
grant him tribute. That was a good king!
A boy was later born to him,
young in the courts, whom God sent
as a solace to the people—He saw their need,
the dire distress they had endured, lordless,
for such a long time. The Lord of Life,
Wielder of Glory, gave him worldly honor;
Beowulf, the son of Scyld, was renowned,
his fame spread far and wide in Scandinavian lands.
Thus should a young man bring about good
with pious gifts from his father's possessions,
so that later in life loyal comrades
will stand beside him when war comes,
the people will support him—with praiseworthy deeds
a man will prosper among any people.*

Old English, then, expresses most grammatical relationships by inflection, while Modern English requires grammatical particles such as prepositions and definite articles. Sentence elements could be multiplied without explicit connections such as “and” or “or”: gardena and ƿeodcyninga in line 2 are both plural possessives modifying ƿrym, and the whole phrase means something like “the glory of the spear-Danes (who were) the kings of the people”; sceapena ƿreatum and monegum mægum in lines 4–5 are both plural datives modifying the verb ofteah, so the phrase means “took away from troops of enemies (who were) from many tribes.” The sentence beginning he ƿas frofre on line 7 has three verbs, gebad, weox, and ƿah; it can be translated “He awaited consolation for that (as he) grew under the heavens (and) prospered in honors”—even though the three verbs are in one sense a temporal series (first he waited, then he grew, and finally he prospered), they are (more importantly) three variations of one idea (the consolation, the growing, and the prospering are all the same thing). As this example suggests, Old English poetry can be considerably more compressed than a modern translation, and its unlinked chains of multiple statements often require the reader's time and consideration to unfold their full meaning. Here is one other example: Cædmon's Hymn in Old English:

Nu sculon herian	heofonrices weard,
Metodes meahta	ond his modgeƿanc,
weorc wuldorfæder,	swa he wundra gehwæs,
ece Drihten,	or astealde.
He ærest scop	ielda bearnum
heofon to hrofe,	halig Scieppend;
ƿa middangeard	manncynnes weard,
ece Drihten,	æfter teode,
firum foldan	Frea ælmihtig.

The pattern of alliteration is clearly seen in the second line Metodes meahta ond his modgeƿanc; the fourth line ece Drihten or astealde indicates both that any vowel can alliterate with any other vowel and that both stressed syllables in the first half of the line do not need to alliterate.

Cædmon's Hymn also contains good examples of some of the important stylistic features of Old English poetry. Most notable—and noticeable—among these is repetition with variation, a kind of turning and returning around a name or quality to denominate it several times over. This style has been called appositive, after the grammatical practice of setting two nouns or phrases that refer to the same thing next to another, as in Shakespeare's “This royal throne of kings, this scepter'd isle, / This earth of majesty, this seat of Mars, / ... This blessed plot, this earth, this realm, this England” (Richard II 2.1). Cædmon's Hymn is a virtuoso exercise in apposition and in naming and renaming; the poem is largely a list of the names and attributes of God, who in nine lines is called heafonrices weard “guardian of the heavenly kingdom,” metod “Maker,” wuldorfæder “Father of glory,” ece Drihten

“eternal Lord,” halig Scieppend “holy Creator,” mancynnes weard “guardian of mankind,” and Frea “Lord.” Another notable stylistic feature is the use of formulae. God is called heofonrices weard in line 1 and mancynnes weard in line 7; in other poems appear the expressions rodera weard (“guardian of the skies,” Genesis 1), sigora weard (“guardian of victories,” Andreas 987), sumera weard (“guardian of summer,” Seafarer 53), and beahhorda weard (“guardian of a ring-treasure,” Beowulf 921), among many others. The metrical formula in this half-line might be expressed as “/xx weard” (with / indicating a stressed syllable and x an unstressed one); the first word varies depending on the sense of the poem and the needs of alliteration. Not all formulae need variation; God is called ece Drihten “eternal Lord” twice in the poem’s nine lines. The presence of repetitive lines and phrases and of formulaic expressions drawn from a common poetic repertoire does not indicate some lapse in creative energy or some failure of editing; such repetitions and variations are part of the traditional art of the Old English poet. The same principles of repetition-with-variation, adaptation of old expressions to new contexts, linking of lines and ideas by sound and suggestion, can be found on the largest scale across the whole body of Old English poetry.

The story of the development of Middle English out of Old English (or Anglo-Saxon) is in large part a story of the interplay between French and English; the Norman invaders brought their language with them when they crossed the English Channel in 1066. Among the latest surviving works deemed by scholars to have been written in Old English are a section of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle added in Peterborough around 1154, and some late twelfth-century copies of eleventh-century homilies and gospel translations. The linguistic changes that characterize the transition from Old to Middle English are as much a reflection of the changing cultural situation of English as they are of changing grammar or phonology. By 1100 the leaders of the church, the government, and the aristocracy (that is, practically anyone who could read or write) either spoke French as a native language or had learned French. The English language survived, however; Norman knights who settled in England married English women, had their children raised by English nurses, and worked with the English-speaking peasants and overseers on their farms. The total number of French speakers in England at any time was relatively small and bilingualism was probably common on all but the highest and lowest levels of society. For almost two centuries, however, this small number of French speakers included all officials, nobles, and high-ranking churchmen in the country. English was by no means the prestige language it had been among the Anglo-Saxons. There was little support for English literature among the literate classes, and no formal system of education or book-production to encourage writing in English; for more than a century after the Conquest, English had no place in the political, intellectual, or economic life of the country.

We may think of this situation as parallel, at least in linguistic terms, to the colonial settlements of India, Africa, and the Caribbean, in which a dominant language-culture influences the subject language-culture and vice versa; in such environments, to speak one language or another can be a highly charged and socially conscious act. In the early Middle English period one finds English poetry like The Owl and the Nightingale written in the French style (with rhymed meter rather than alliterative stressed lines), expressing French literary values, and borrowing French words and forms. French remained the language of the nobility (and thus of Parliament and the royal courts of law) until the late fourteenth century, and the English language borrowed widely from French as it expanded to deal with a more diverse and complex society, and with the growing literary ambitions of English authors. Both languages, meanwhile, continued to interact in complex ways with the language of unquestioned intellectual prestige, Latin.

The borrowings of French words into the English vocabulary are many, and generally seem to have been culturally motivated; thus, English borrows words for government (peace, justice, court, judge, sentence—though gallows is an English word) and culture (noble, dame, gentle, honor, courtesy, polite, manners). One effect of all this borrowing is that English has a great flexibility in its synonyms; we can express things in several different ways using words from different origins: we can ask or question someone, and get an answer or a response, which may make us glad or pleased, or it may make us mad or angry, and lead to a fight or dispute (or even an altercation). Often the English and French words for the same thing have come to differ in meaning: it has long been observed, for example, that animals used for meat are called by their English names when they are in the field—cow, calf, pig, sheep, deer—and by their French names on the table—beef, veal, pork, mutton, venison. This linguistic development reflects the social situation of post-Conquest England, in which the lower-class English raised the animals and the upper-class French ate them; it may also have something to do with the superiority of French over English cooking, which was recognized even a thousand years ago.

Alongside this generous borrowing of vocabulary and literary forms, one of the most important changes in Middle English was the wearing-away of the complex inflectional system of Old English, which had already begun to disappear by the end of the tenth century in some dialects, and the concomitant fixing of word-order into something more like its modern form. Another was the representation of many different regional dialects in written Middle English; Old English had regional varieties, but by far the majority of surviving manuscripts are written in some approximation of the standard West Saxon of the late tenth century. In the absence of a strong educational system teaching a standard for English spelling, regional dialects were much more fully represented in written Middle English. The differences between Old and Middle English can be seen in the following two passages, each translating the opening verses of Psalm 23; the former is from the Old English “Paris Psalter” of the ninth century, the latter from the Wycliffite translation of the Bible in the later fourteenth century (the same verses from the modern Douay-Rheims Bible, also translated from the Latin Vulgate, appear after the two passages):

Drihten me ræt, ne byð me nanes godes wan, and he me geset on swyðe good feohland. And fedde me be wætera staðum, and min mod gehwyrfe of unrotnesse on gefean. He me gelædde ofer þa wegas rihtwisnesse, for his naman.

The Lord governeth me, and no thing schal faile to me; in the place of pasture there he hath set me. He nurschide me on the watir of refreischyng; he conuertide my soule. He ledde me forth on the pathis of rigthfulnesse; for his name.

The LORD ruleth me; and I shall want nothing. He hath set me in a place of pasture: he hath brought me up, on the water of refreshment. He hath converted my soul. He hath led me on the paths of justice, for his own name's sake.

Even in these few lines the differences are notable: considerable developments in vocabulary (Drihten > Lord, ræt > governeth, feohland > the place of pasture, mod > soule, gehwyrfe > conuertide, wegas > pathis), changes in word order (Drihten me ræt > The Lord governeth me, he me geset > he hath set me, min mod gehwyrfe > he conuertide my soule) and the erosion of inflectional endings (be wætera staðum > on the watir of refreischyng, for his naman > for his name) all indicate the movement of English toward its present state. The Middle English passage is nearly identical to the early Modern English of the Douay-Rheims version. To understand something of the dialect diversity in written Middle English, however, one should compare the Wycliffite version to the same passage in two other Middle English texts, the West Midlands Psalter and the Yorkshire version of Richard Rolle, both written around the middle of the fourteenth century:

(West Midlands Psalter) Our Lord gouerneþ me, and noþyng shal defailen to me; in þe stede of pasture he sett me þer. He norissed me vp water of fylling; he turned my soule fram þe fende. He lad me vp þe bistiges of rigthfulnes for his name.

(Richard Rolle Psalter) Lord gouerns me and naþyng sall me want; in sted of pasture þare he me sett. On þe watre of rehytyng forþ he me broght; my saule he turnyd. He led me on þe stretis of rightwisnes; for his name.

By the end of the thirteenth century English began to appear once again as a language of official documents and public occasions. In 1337 a lawyer addressed the Parliament in English for the first time, as a chronicle says, “so that he might be better understood by all”; in 1362 Parliament ordered all lawsuits to be conducted in English. There is some indication that at the beginning of the fourteenth century the nobility had to be taught French—the language still held prestige, but it was by no means the native tongue of those born on English soil. Not surprisingly, it is in the same period, the fourteenth century, that English literary output becomes significant again. But the language that emerged had been strongly altered by two centuries of “underground” existence and the shaping pressure from the dominant French language and literary culture.

Among the most striking changes is the emergence of rhyme as a central organizing principle of English verse. Though rhyme was a fixture in the British Isles through the early medieval period both in Celtic literature and in Latin hymns, it never took root in Old English poetry; it seems to have been the influence of French literature in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries that brought rhyme into the mainstream of English literature. Many of the earliest rhyming works in Middle English are heroic romances written in rhymed couplets (typically with lines of eight syllables, similar to those of the twelfth-century French poet Chrétien de Troyes). In the thirteenth- and early fourteenth-century romances tail rhyme became common; stanzas written in this form include several groups of three lines in which each line has four stresses and each group is made up of a rhyming couplet and a “tail” line that rhymes with the other tail lines in the stanza. Though such poetry displays a degree of complexity in its rhyme scheme, in other ways the poetry was often unsophisticated; it is this genre that Chaucer satirizes in his Tale of Sir Thopas—a tale interrupted by complaints of its “rym doggerel”:

“By God,” quod he, “for pleynly, at a word,
Thy drasty rhyming is not worth a toord!”

Much as he satirizes tail rhymed romances in the Tale of Sir Thopas, elsewhere in The Canterbury Tales Chaucer takes rhyming poetry to a level of sophistication new to English, using lines of ten rather than eight syllables, adopting a regular iambic rhythm alternating unstressed and stressed syllables, and making frequent use of enjambement.

Whereas Chaucer and Gower wrote rhymed, metrical, non-alliterative poetry in the fourteenth century, other important poets of the period adopted a very different style, structured through patterns of alliteration in much the same way as Old English poetry had been. It is thought that the use of alliterative verse in the Old English style may have persisted through the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, though evidence of this is scarce and ambiguous. In the fourteenth century alliterative verse reappears in written form throughout much of England, and is used for subjects as varied as Arthurian legendary history (the Alliterative Morte Arthure), Christian dream vision (Pearl), and satiric commentary (Langland’s Piers Plowman), among others.

The literary flowering of the second half of the fourteenth century was by no means restricted to one region. Chaucer wrote in the dialect of London and the east Midlands which, more than any other, is the ancestor of modern English; the author of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, on the other hand, wrote in a dialect of the northwest midlands. As Chaucer himself put it, there was great “diversitee in English and in writing of our tonge.” With the coming of the printing press in the fifteenth century, the printed language began to take on more and more common characteristics, though it would be not until the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries that grammar, spelling, and punctuation were standardized.

In reading Old and Middle English (in whatever dialect) it is important to be aware of the major ways in which the language differs from our own. For any historical period of English the reconstruction of pronunciation is only approximate, but a careful study of sound changes, spelling, cognate languages, and word histories allows scholars to make highly educated guesses about the way Old and Middle English sounded. Old English used some letters not found in the Latin alphabet, including thorn (þ), eth (ð), and yogh (ȝ); the first two survived into Middle English, where thorn gradually came to be written much like the letter y (giving rise to the common misreading of “ye” for “the” in faux-antique signs like “ye olde shoppe”).

Some Old English consonant clusters were pronounced in unusual ways; sc was pronounced like sh and cg like dg, so that OE scip and ecg sounded much like their modern descendants ship and edge. The consonants c and g were pronounced differently depending on their position in a word; the Old English words gold and camb were pronounced much as in Modern English gold and comb, but geat was pronounced with a y as if it were roughly yat, and ciric was pronounced with ch sounds as in its modern descendant church.

One way in which Old and Middle English are dramatically different from Modern English is in sounding all consonants, including those in combinations such as kn, gn, lk, and wr that have become largely or entirely silent in modern English. The word “knight,” for example, is pronounced something like “k-nicht” (with the i short). Final unstressed e in words is always sounded in Old English, and sounded far more frequently in Middle English than is the case in modern English—though during the late-medieval period the sounding of the final e was beginning to die out, and scholars continue to dispute how frequently the final e should be sounded in Chaucerian English. Vowels are pronounced roughly as in French or Spanish—the modern English values are the result of a “Great Vowel Shift” that began in the fifteenth century. The long a in words such as “made,” for example, was pronounced like the a in “father”; the long e in words such as “sweete” was sounded like the a in “mate”; the long i (or y) in words such as “lif” and “myn” was pronounced in the same way we sound the i in “machine”; the long o in words such as “do” and “spoon” was sounded as we pronounce the o in “note”; and the long u (or ou or ow) in words such as “flowr” was sounded as we would pronounce the oo in “boot.”

While Middle English is far less inflected than Old English, meaning that fewer grammatical differences are signaled in the form of words, matters are, as noted above, complicated by dialect. Third person singular formations of verbs, for example, tend to end in -s or -ys in northern dialects, and in -th or -ith (later -eth) in southern dialects. “She has” is thus a form deriving from northern Middle English dialects, and “she hath” from southern English forms (cf. Richard Rolle’s “Lord gouerns me” where the Wycliffite version has “The Lord gouerneth me”). When the sheep thief Mak in The Second Shepherds’ Play pretends to be from southern England he says “ich be” instead of “I am” as northerners then (and all English speakers nowadays) would say. Word order in Middle English is often substantially different from modern practice, with the verb often coming later in the sentence than is our custom in statements, but coming at the beginning of the sentence in questions, as is the practice in many Romance languages. Many Middle English words are of course unfamiliar to the modern reader, but there are also many “false friends”—words that look identical or very similar to modern English words but carry significantly different denotations. Lewd, which in Old English means “secular, not relating to the clergy,” comes in Middle English to mean “unlearned,” but without any suggestion of a sexual character. Sely, though the ancestor of the modern “silly,” can mean “poor,” “miserable,” or “innocent” as well as “strange” or “foolish.” Even at the level of a single word, one might say, we can see the peculiar and provocative mixture of strangeness and familiarity, the haunting family resemblances and the disconcerting dissonances, that make the study of medieval literary culture so compelling and rewarding. We hope that in this collection of works you will come to know its powerful appeal.

HISTORY OF THE LANGUAGE AND OF PRINT AND MANUSCRIPT CULTURE

In an effort to provide for readers a direct sense of the development of the language and of print culture, examples of texts in their original form have been provided in each volume. A list of materials relevant to medieval language and print culture within the present volume appears below.

An overview of developments in the history of language during this period appears on pages 33–39.

The Game and Play of Chesse, printed by William Caxton, Table of Contents and illustration: pp. 32, 33.

Bede's Ecclesiastical History of the English People, beginning of the first book: p. 56.

"[Messe ocus Pangur Bán]," poem in original language: p. 60; page from the Reichenau Primer: p. 61.

The Dream of the Rood, lines 1–21: p. 75.

Beowulf, lines 1–21: p. 84.

Lindisfarne Gospels, pages from the Gospel of St. Luke: pp. 3, 4; CHI-RHO: color insert.

Book of Kells, opening page from the Gospel of St. Matthew: front cover; page from the Gospel of St. Mark: p. 9.

"Sumer is icumen in," Harley Manuscript 978: p. 204.

Jean Froissart, Chronicles: illustrations from a fifteenth-century manuscript: pp. 214, 224.

Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, illustrations from the original manuscript: p. 291.

"The Thorn and the Yogh," first lines of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight with Middle English letters: p. 292.

Chaucer, The Canterbury Tales, pages from the Ellesmere manuscript: pp. 294, 299, 317, 330, 351–52, 364–65, 371–72 (and color insert).

Julian of Norwich, passage in original spelling and punctuation: p. 392–94.

Decorative pages, various gospels: pp. 423–25.

Lambeth Bible, illuminated page showing the Virgin Mary: p. 428.

Flores Historiarum, illustration of three Jews attacked by a soldier: p. 444.

York Pinners' Crucifixion play, from the "Register," or official copy, of the York cycle: p. 446.

The Wakefield Master, The Second Shepherds' Play, opening page: p. 471.

Everyman, title page, early edition: p. 486.

Thomas Malory, Morte Darthur: illustrations from William Caxton's 1498 edition: p. 541.

BEDE

c. 673 – 735

Bede “the Venerable,” the most learned writer of the Anglo-Saxon period, was born in Northumbria around 673. At the age of seven he entered the twin monastery of Wearmouth-Jarrow and remained there, except for a few short excursions, until his death. Under the Abbot Ceolfrith, Bede received a thorough education in grammar, rhetoric, mathematics, music, natural science and the study of Scripture; he was ordained a deacon at 19 and a priest at 30. In a brief autobiographical note appended to his Ecclesiastical History he describes himself in this manner: “Amid the observance of the discipline of the Rule [of St. Benedict] and the daily task of singing in the church, it has always been my delight to learn or to teach or to write.” Over the course of his life Bede produced a body of writing that remains impressive for its clarity, intelligence, range, and devotion. His works, which survive in hundreds of manuscripts, were deeply influential and widely copied throughout the Middle Ages. Apart from a brief and enigmatic Old English poem and a lost translation of the Gospel of John he is said to have composed on his deathbed, all Bede’s works were written in Latin, then the European language of scholarship and of the Church.

The founder of Jarrow monastery, Benedict Biscop, had traveled extensively and assembled an impressive library; during Bede’s lifetime this remote outpost on the northeastern coast of England—founded about the year Bede was born, and scarcely 50 years after the rulers of Northumbria had converted to Christianity—was perhaps the most learned monastic center in all of Europe. Bede’s writings include numerous works of Scriptural commentary, many homilies, works on meter and orthography, lives of several saints, books of poetry and hymns, and several treatises on cosmology and timekeeping. He was deeply interested in time and its measurement, a matter of some urgency in his lifetime because the Irish and Roman churches had different methods for calculating the date of Easter. In some years the two churches celebrated the feast on different days, which to Bede was a shocking sign of disunity. In his works promoting the Roman method of reckoning Easter he also helped establish the foundations of medieval astronomy and chronology; Bede is primarily responsible for popularizing the western “BC” and “AD” system of reckoning dates using the anno domini or “year of (the birth of) our Lord” as the dividing principle.

It is Bede’s historical works, however, that are best known today. His Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum (Ecclesiastical History of the English People), completed in 731, is an extensive history of England which takes as its theme the conversion of the Anglo-Saxon invaders who had displaced the native Britons. The Ecclesiastical History imagines an “English” people united not so much by culture or language or geography as by faith, the Roman Christianity brought to the island by Augustine of Canterbury and other missionaries sent by Pope Gregory the Great in 597. This work still provides the foundation for much of our knowledge of England in the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries. Bede’s talent as a historian was his ability to take multiple sources—documents, other histories, local oral traditions and legends—and weave them together into a coherent narrative. Though Bede was not fully a historian in the modern sense, his approach is far less foreign to the modern historical sensibility than that of most medieval chroniclers; unlike many writers of the time, for example, he makes frequent reference to the sources for the material he is recounting. In Bede's narrative, written very much from the Northumbrian point of view, the English are gradually and inevitably brought into the happy embrace of the Roman church, triumphing against the bitterness and treachery of the native Britons, the well-meaning but deluded zeal of the Irish missionaries, and the temporizing and backsliding of one pagan king after another. It is a tribute to Bede's great literary talent that in many ways the story he constructs from whatever meager evidence was available to him is still regarded as a fundamentally accurate account.

The following selections give some of the flavor of Bede's work: a geographical prologue describing the island of Britain; a lively narrative of the coming of the Angles and Saxons derived largely from the early sixth-century Briton Gildas's De excidio Britonum ("On The Ruin of Britain"), a passionate work of moral exhortation written from a stridently anti-English perspective; a detailed psychological portrait of the Northumbrian king Edwin's slow movement towards conversion; and an account of two remarkable figures from the monastery of Whitby, the abbess Hild and the lay brother Cædmon. Cædmon's story is far more widely read today. According to Bede, Cædmon receives a miraculous talent for poetic composition and becomes a great composer of religious verse; Cædmon's Hymn (which Bede records in Latin, not English) is sometimes treated as the first English Christian poetic work. Bede's account of the life and miracles of the abbess Hild, however, plays a role of equal importance in his larger history; it is included here to suggest that the paired lives of a learned aristocratic woman and an illiterate peasant can tell us a great deal about the boundaries of Bede's narrative and the kinds of material it excludes, about the relationship between history and hagiography, and about the ways in which the cultural roles prescribed by one's gender and class affect the shape of one's spiritual journey.

from *Ecclesiastical History of the English People*¹

I. A DESCRIPTION OF THE ISLAND OF BRITAIN AND ITS INHABITANTS (I.1)

Britain, an island in the ocean, formerly called Albion, is situated in the northwest, opposite the coasts of Germany, France, and Spain, which form the greatest part of Europe, though at a considerable distance from them. It extends 800 miles to the north and is 200 miles broad, except where several promontories extend further in breadth, which makes the circuit of its coastline 3600 miles. To the south lies Belgic Gaul, from which the closest port for travelers is the city of Rutubi Portus, corrupted by the English into "Reptaces-tir."² The distance from there across the sea to Gessoriacum,³ the closest point in the land of the Morini, is fifty miles, or as some writers say, 450 stadia. Behind the island, where it opens upon the boundless ocean, are the Orkney Islands.

Britain is rich in grain and trees, and is well adapted for feeding cattle and beasts of burden. It also produces vines in some places, and has plenty of land and water-fowls of various kinds; it is remarkable also for its rivers, abounding in fish, particularly salmon and eels, and plentiful springs. Seals and dolphins are frequently taken, and even whales; besides many sorts of shellfish

¹ Ecclesiastical History of the English People The standard edition of the Historia Ecclesiastica, with a modern English translation, is Bertram Colgrave and R.A.B. Mynors, eds., Bede's Ecclesiastical History of the English People (Oxford, 1969). This translation, by R.M. Liuzza, relies heavily on that work, as well as the earlier work of L. Stevens (London: J.M. Dent; New York: E.P. Dutton, 1910) and J.M. Wallace-Hadrill's Bede's Ecclesiastical History of the English People: A Historical Commentary (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1991).

² Reptacestir Richborough.

³ Gessoriacum Boulogne.

such as mussels, in which are often found excellent pearls of all colors, red, purple, violet, and green, but mostly white. There is also a great abundance of cockles, from which a scarlet dye is made, a most beautiful color which never fades from the heat of the sun nor exposure to the rain; but the older it is, the more beautiful it becomes. Britain has salt springs and hot springs, and from them flow rivers which furnish hot baths, suitable for all ages and sexes, arranged for each separately. For water, as St. Basil says,¹ receives the quality of heat when it passes through certain metals, so that it becomes not only hot but scalding. Britain has also many veins of metals, copper, iron, lead, and silver; it produces much excellent jet, which is black and sparkling, burns in fire, and when heated drives away serpents; when it is warmed by rubbing it attracts whatever is applied to it, like amber. The island was once famous for its twenty-eight noble cities, besides innumerable castles which were all strongly secured with walls, towers, gates, and locks.

Because Britain lies almost under the North Pole, the nights are light in summer, so that at midnight it is difficult for those who are watching to tell whether the evening twilight still lingers, or the dawn of morning is coming, since the sun at night returns to the east through the northern regions without passing far below the horizon. For this reason the summer days are extremely long; on the other hand the winter nights are also of great length, namely eighteen hours, for the sun then withdraws into the regions of Africa. In summer too the nights are extraordinarily short, as are the days in winter, each containing only six equinoctial hours,² while in Armenia, Macedonia, Italy, and other countries in the same latitude, the longest day or night extends to fifteen hours, and the shortest to nine.

At the present time, there are five languages in Britain, the English, British,³ Irish, Pictish, and Latin, just as the divine law is written in five books, each in its own way devoted to seeking out and setting forth one and the same knowledge of sublime truth and true sublimity. The Latin tongue, through the study of the Scriptures, has become common to all the rest. At first this island had no other inhabitants than the Britons, from whom it derived its name, and who, coming over into Britain, so it is said, from Armorica,⁴ took possession of the southern parts of it. When they had made themselves masters of the greatest part of the island, beginning from the south, it is said that the Pictish race from Scythia,⁵ putting to sea in a few long ships, were driven by the winds beyond the shores of Britain and arrived on the northern coast of Ireland. There they found the Irish race and asked to be allowed to settle among them, but their request was refused. Ireland is the largest island next to Britain, and lies to the west of it; but though it is shorter than Britain to the north, yet it runs out far beyond it to the south, opposite to the northern parts of Spain, though a wide sea lies between them. The Picts came to this island, as has been said, by sea and asked that a place be granted them where they might settle. The Irish answered that the island could not hold them both; but they said, "We can give you some good advice as to what to do. We know of another island not far from ours, to the east, which we often see in the distance on a clear day. If you will go there, you can make settlements; but if anyone should oppose you, you shall have our help." And so the Picts, sailing over into Britain, began to occupy the northern parts of the island, because the Britons had seized the southern parts. Now the Picts had no wives, so they asked the Irish for some; they consented to give them women only on condition that, when any difficulty should arise, they should choose a king from the female line rather than the male; this custom, as is well known, has been observed among the Picts to this day. In the course of time Britain received a third nation in addition to the Britons and the Picts, namely the Irish, who came from Ireland under their leader Reuda, and won lands from

¹ St. Basil says In his Hexaemeron, a treatise on the six days of creation.

² equinoctial hours As Bede explains in his De temporum ratione (The Reckoning of Time), these hours are those which divide the day evenly into twenty-four parts (i.e., like a modern day); "common" hours divide day and night into twelve hours each of uneven length, so that summer hours are long during the day and short at night, and winter hours are just the reverse.

³ British I.e., Welsh.

⁴ Armorica Area along the northwest coast of France somewhat larger than modern Brittany.

⁵ Scythia Irish tradition reports that the Picts come from Thrace; Bede may be following this here, or using "Scythia" to mean the farthest northern regions of the world, Ultima Thule.

the Picts either by fair means or by force of arms. They still possess these lands. They are to this day called Dalreudini after their commander—in their language, Dal signifies a part.

Ireland far surpasses Britain in breadth and in wholesomeness and serenity of climate, for the snow rarely lies there above three days. No man makes hay in the summer for winter use, or builds stables for his beasts of burden. No reptiles are found there, and no snake can live there; for although serpents have often been carried to Ireland from Britain, as soon as the ship comes near the shore and the scent of the air reaches them, they die. In fact almost everything in the island is good against poison. We have seen how, for example, when people have been bitten by serpents, the leaves of manuscripts from Ireland were scraped, and the scrapings put in water and given to them to drink. These scrapings immediately expelled the spreading poison, and eased the swelling. The island abounds in milk and honey, nor is there any lack of vines, fish, or fowl; and it is noted for deer and goats. It is properly the native land of the Irish; they migrated from there, as has been said, and formed the third nation in Britain in addition to the Britons and the Picts. There is a very wide arm of the sea, which originally divided the nation of the Picts from the Britons; it runs from the west very far into the land, where, to this day, stands the strong city of the Britons, called Alcluith.¹ The Irish settled on the north side of this bay and made their home there.

2. THE COMING OF THE ENGLISH TO BRITAIN

[After the Goths attack Rome in 410, the Roman legions in Britain withdraw, leaving the British defenseless, “utterly ignorant of the arts of war.” They are immediately attacked by the Irish from the west and the Picts from the north. Bede’s source for this section is the British historian Gildas, whose De excidio Britonum (“On the Ruin of Britain”) is a stern and prophetic work upbraiding the British for their sins and lamenting the punishments they suffered at the hands of the Saxon invaders. Bede’s allegiances are different, of course, but the harsh tone of Gildas’s polemic, and his assertion that the coming of the English was ordained by God, is put to good use in Bede’s excoriation of the British (Bede’s deep dislike of the British arose, ostensibly at least, from their refusal to convert their conquerors to Christianity).]

In the year of our Lord 423, Theodosius the younger became emperor after Honorius, the forty-fifth from Augustus, and governed the Roman empire twenty-six years. In the eighth year of his reign Palladius was sent by Celestinus, the Roman pontiff, to the Irish who believed in Christ, to be their first bishop.² In the twenty-third year of his reign Aetius, a man of high rank and a patrician, held his third consulship with Symmachus. The wretched remnants of the Britons sent him a letter which began: “To Aetius, thrice Consul, the groans of the Britons.” In the course of the letter they expressed their sorrows: “The barbarians drive us to the sea; the sea drives us back to the barbarians: between them we face two sorts of death—we are either slaughtered or drowned.” Yet all this could not procure any assistance from him, because he was engaged in a deadly war with Blædla and Attila, kings of the Huns. And even though Blædla had been murdered the year before this by the treachery of his brother Attila, nevertheless Attila himself remained so dangerous an enemy to the state that he devastated almost all of Europe, attacking and destroying cities and castles. At the same time there was a famine in Constantinople, which was followed shortly afterwards by the plague, and a great part of the walls of that city fell to the ground, along with fifty-seven towers. Many cities also fell into ruins, and the famine and pestilential stench which filled the air destroyed thousands of men and cattle.

Meanwhile this famine afflicted the Britons more and more, leaving a lasting memory of its malice to posterity. It forced many of them to submit themselves to their predatory enemies; others still held out, trusting in divine assistance when none was to be had from men. These continually made raids from the mountains, caves, and forests, and at last they began to inflict severe losses on the enemy who had been plundering their land for so many years. The shameless Irish robbers then returned home, intending to come back before long; the Picts, from that time on, remained quiet in the farthest part of the island, though they did not cease to plunder and harass the Britons from time to time.

² Palladius was sent . . . bishop Nothing much is known of Palladius beyond what Bede reports; Bede never mentions St. Patrick, who is generally remembered as the “Apostle to the Irish.”

¹ Alcluith Dumbarton.

When the ravages of the enemy finally ceased, there was such an abundance of grain in the island as had never been known before. With abundance came an increase in luxury, which was immediately followed by every sort of crime; in particular, cruelty and hatred of truth and love of falsehood increased so much that if anyone among them happened to be milder than the rest and somewhat inclined to truth, all the rest heaped hatred and missiles upon him, as if he had been the enemy of Britain. Not only were laymen guilty of these things, but even our Lord's own flock and their pastors too; they cast off the light yoke of Christ¹ and thrust their necks under the burden of drunkenness, hatred, argument, strife, envy, and other crimes of this sort. In the meantime a severe plague suddenly fell upon that corrupt generation, and soon destroyed so many of them that there were scarcely enough people left alive to bury the dead: yet those who survived could not be awakened from the spiritual death which their sins had brought upon them, either by the death of their friends or by the fear of their own death. For this reason, a still more severe retribution soon afterwards fell upon this sinful nation for their horrible wickedness. They consulted as to what should be done, and where they should seek help to prevent or repel the very frequent attacks of the northern nations, and they all agreed with their King Vortigern² that they should call the Saxons to their aid from across the sea. As events clearly showed, this was ordained by the will of our Lord Himself so that evil might fall upon them for their wicked deeds.

In the year of our Lord 449 Marcian became emperor with Valentinian, the forty-sixth emperor from Augustus, and ruled for seven years. At this time the nation of the Angles or Saxons, being invited by Vortigern, came to Britain in three long ships; they were granted a place to settle in the eastern part of the island so that they might appear to be fighting for their country, but their real intention was to enslave it. Accordingly they first fought against the enemy who attacked from the north, and won the victory. When this became known at home in their own country, and also the fertility of the country and the cowardice of the Britons, a much larger fleet was quickly sent over with a greater number of men; this, added to the troop already there, made an invincible army. The newcomers received a grant of land from the Britons, on condition that they wage war against their enemies for the peace and safety of the country, and the Britons agreed to pay them.

Those who came over were from three powerful tribes in Germany—the Saxons, Angles, and Jutes. From the Jutes are descended the people of Kent and of the Isle of Wight, and that part of the kingdom of the West Saxons just opposite the Isle of Wight, which is still today called the nation of the Jutes. From the country of the Saxons, that is, the region which is now known as Old Saxony, came the East Saxons, the South Saxons, and the West Saxons. From the country of the Angles—that is, the region between the provinces of the Jutes and the Saxons which is called Angulus, and which is said to remain deserted from that day to this—came the East Angles, the Middle Angles, the Mercians, and all the Northumbrian race (that is, those people that dwell north of the river Humber), and the other Anglian tribes.³ Their first commanders are said to have been two brothers, Hengest and Horsa. Horsa was afterwards killed in battle by the Britons, and was buried in the eastern part of Kent, where there is still a monument bearing his name. They were the sons of Wihtgils, son of Witta, son of Woden, from whose stock the royal families of many kingdoms claim their descent.⁴

¹ Not only ... of Christ See Matthew 11.29.

² King Vortigern Bede expands on his source Gildas here to supply the name of the king Vortigern (which means "chief lord"—Gildas calls him only superbus tyrannus, which basically means the same thing) and the names of the Saxons Hengest and Horsa (both names mean "horse"). Vortigern later has a prominent (though ignominious) role in the Arthurian legends as shaped by Geoffrey of Monmouth's History of the Kings of Britain.

³ Anglian tribes Or "English people." In the title of his work, and in its text as well, Bede refers to all the invading tribes as the gens Anglorum or "English people."

They were the ... their descent Bede is apparently not troubled by the fact that Woden is a Germanic god, suggesting that by his day active worship of Woden was not widespread. In medieval historical writing, the various classical and Germanic gods (when they are not written off as demons masquerading to lead men astray) are usually explained as ancient heroes whose exploits and stature were inflated over time until they were worshipped as gods.

In a short time hordes of these peoples flooded into the island, and their numbers increased so much that they became a terror to the natives who had invited them. Then suddenly they joined forces with the Picts, whom they had by this time driven far away by the force of their arms, and began to turn their weapons against their allies. First they made them supply a greater quantity of food; then, seeking an occasion to quarrel, they insisted that unless more plentiful supplies were brought to them, they would break the alliance and ravage the whole island. Nor were they slow in carrying out their threats—to make a long story short, the fire kindled by the hands of these pagans executed God's just revenge on the nation for its crimes, not unlike the fire once kindled by the Chaldeans which consumed the walls and city of Jerusalem.¹ Likewise here in Britain the just Judge ordained that the fire of these brutal conquerors should ravage all the neighboring cities and countryside from the east to the western sea, without opposition, until it covered almost every part of the doomed island. Public and private buildings fell into ruins; priests were everywhere slain before the altars; the prelates and people alike were destroyed with fire and sword regardless of their rank; and there was no one left to bury those who had died in such a cruel slaughter. Some of the miserable remnant were captured in the mountains and butchered in heaps; others, exhausted by hunger, came forward and submitted themselves to the enemy, ready to accept perpetual slavery for the sake of food, if only they were not killed on the spot. Some fled sorrowfully beyond the sea, while others remained in their own land and led a miserable life among the forests, crags, and mountains, always expecting every moment to be their last.

When the victorious army had destroyed and dispersed the native peoples, and returned home to their own settlements,² the Britons slowly began to gather strength and courage. They emerged from their hiding places and unanimously prayed for divine assistance that they might not be utterly destroyed. Their leader at that time was Ambrosius Aurelius,³ a modest man who was, by chance, the sole member of the Roman nation to survive the storm in which his parents, who were of a royal and famous family, had perished. Under his leadership the Britons regained their strength, challenged their victors to battle and, by the help of God, won the victory. From that time on, sometimes the natives, and sometimes their enemies, prevailed, until the year of the siege of Mount Badon, when the Britons made no small slaughter of their enemies, about forty-four years after their arrival in England. But more of this hereafter.

3. THE LIFE AND CONVERSION OF EDWIN, KING OF NORTHUMBRIA; THE FAITH OF THE EAST ANGLES

[The conversion of Edwin is in many ways the central event in Bede's long history—it sets England firmly on the road to Christianity and represents the crowning achievement of the mission of Augustine of Canterbury, sent by Pope Gregory the Great to convert the island. Bede probably relied on local knowledge and memories for his story; he therefore has to explain why Edwin's conversion is significantly delayed and accomplished with much foot-dragging.

According to Bede's account, Edwin secured his kingship in Northumbria with the help of Rædwald, the king of East Anglia, in 616; later he married Æthelburh, daughter of the Christian king Æthelberht of Kent, in 625. One of the conditions of the marriage was that he put no obstacles in the way of Christian worship in his kingdom, and promise to consider becoming a Christian himself. Æthelburh arrives in Northumbria accompanied by the bishop Paulinus; though Paulinus works diligently to convert Edwin, he is unsuccessful for a long time. When Edwin survives an assassination attempt by the West Saxons on the same day he celebrates the birth of his daughter (whom he allows to be baptized), he promises to convert if God will grant him victory over his enemies. After his campaign against the West Saxons is successful, however, he delays settlements I.e., in Britain, not Germany.

¹ not unlike ... Jerusalem See 2 Kings 25.8–10.

³ Ambrosius Aurelius Bede's information comes from Gildas; no earlier or more reliable source is known for Ambrosius Aurelius, later transformed into King Arthur. The battle of Mount Badon, if it occurred at all, probably took place around 500 CE.

Ornamental belt buckle (early 7th century CE) from the Sutton Hoo burial site. Twentieth century excavations at Sutton Hoo in southeast England uncovered a remarkable collection of artifacts from an Anglo-Saxon ship-burial. In addition to this buckle, 40 other gold objects were discovered in the burial mound, together with human remains, the bones of horses, weaponry, silverware, and the remains of large open ships.

Nave, Durham Cathedral (1093–1133). One of the largest and most imposing of English cathedrals, Durham was built by Norman bishops over a remarkably short period. A shrine for Saint Cuthbert, it also houses the bones of the Venerable Bede.

"The Parable of the Sower" (detail), stained glass, Canterbury Cathedral (early 13th century). The extensive use of stained glass in church architecture began in the twelfth century; when Abbot Suger of Saint-Denis in France rebuilt sections of his church c. 1135. He commissioned stained glass windows, the light from which he believed would assist worshipers to raise themselves to "the purity of heaven."

Map of Britain (c. 1250), drawn by Matthew Paris for his history of England, Historia Major. As well as counties and major towns, Matthew identifies features such as Hadrian's Wall, noting that it "once divided the English and the Picts."

Illustration from a manuscript of the Chronicles of Matthew Paris (c. 1259). The illustration shows an incident that occurred in 1244: Gruffydd of Wales is attempting to escape from the Tower of London by lowering himself with knotted sheets. Though his half-brother, Dafydd, had been named sole heir to their father, Llewellyn of Wales, Gruffydd was nonetheless thought to have a claim to the throne that his father had held. Henry III of England, hoping to strengthen his power over the kingdom of North Wales, had Gruffydd imprisoned. Gruffydd's attempted escape failed; he fell to his death.

Sir Geoffrey Luttrell taking leave of his wife and daughter as he departs for war or jousting. From the Luttrell Psalter (c. 1320–40), folio 202. This knight is being passed his helmet and lance by his wife; his daughter stands in attendance, holding his shield. The image is suggestive of the chivalric values expressed in works such as Sir Thomas Malory's Le Morte Darthur; women are subservient to knights, yet the knight is sworn to defend their honor, and their regard is vital to the maintenance of the knight's position in the chivalric order. (British Library)

"Annunciation to the Shepherds," stained glass (later 14th century), Victoria and Albert Museum.

"Virgin and Child," stained glass (14th century), Eaton Bishop Church, Herefordshire.

"Sir James Berners," stained glass (later 14th century), St. Mary's Church, West Horseley, Surrey. This knight, who was beheaded in 1388, is shown here wearing armor typical of the period.

Opening page of the Prologue to The Wife of Bath's Tale, Ellesmere manuscript. (Reprinted by permission of The Huntington Library, San Marino, California. EL 26 C9 f. 72r.)

Illuminated page from The Bedford Book of Hours (early fifteenth century), folio 257. The “Bedford Hours” was a lavishly illustrated volume commissioned by John of Lancaster, Duke of Bedford, and his wife, Anne of Burgundy. In the central image on this page Anne of Burgundy kneels before her patron saint, Saint Anne (mother of the Virgin Mary); a book lies open between them. The Virgin Mary stands at her mother’s side. The baby Jesus is beside her, his eyes turned towards Anne of Burgundy.

It was traditionally held that Mary had been taught to read by her mother, and that she was reading at the time of the Annunciation; images of Mary reading were important touchstones for women who were (or wished to be) literate. (British Library)

Detail from an illuminated page from a manuscript of the poems of Charles, Duke of Orléans (c. 1500). Charles was held as a prisoner in the Tower of London following the Battle of Agincourt (1415). This image (in which the Duke, recognizable by the ermine tippet around his shoulders, appears several times), is thought to portray London with some accuracy; London Bridge appears in the background.

fulfilling his promise for a long time, despite the instruction of Paulinus, the prayers of his wife, and the entreaties of the Pope (Boniface) himself.

Bede's account of Edwin's conversion is sometimes caught between its contradictory impulses towards hagiography (in which conversion is described as a personal journey to faith, punctuated by miracles) and political history (in which conversion is seen as an act of royal policy). But it is marked by a lively sense of scene and character, and vividly conveys the fragile and sometimes dangerous nature of early Anglo-Saxon kingship, the power of the "heroic" code as an ideal of behavior, and the complex implications of conversion; Bede's report (or invention) of the council at which Edwin hears the opinions of his advisors—the unnamed philosophical nobleman, the opportunistic high priest Coifi—is a classic scene, a Christian writer's lyrical, almost elegiac imagination of the pagan heart.]

Such was the letter that Pope Boniface wrote for the salvation of King Edwin and his nation. But a heavenly vision, which God in His mercy had once chosen to reveal to Edwin when he was in exile at the court of Rædwald, king of the Angles, was of greater use in urging him to understand and embrace the counsels of salvation. Paulinus saw how difficult it was for the king's proud mind to bow to the humility of the way of salvation and accept the mystery of the life-giving cross, but at the same time he continued to use both exhortation with men and prayer to God for his and his subjects' salvation. At length, as we may suppose, he was shown in spirit the nature of the vision that had once been revealed to the king. Nor did he lose any time in warning the king to fulfill the vow he had made when he saw the vision, which he had promised to undertake if he should be delivered from the trouble he was in at that time, and ascend to the throne.

His vision was this: when his predecessor Æthelfrith was persecuting him, he wandered secretly for many years through several places and kingdoms, and at last came to Rædwald, asking him for protection against the plots of his powerful persecutor. Rædwald gladly received him, and promised to do what he asked. But when Æthelfrith learned that he had been seen in that kingdom, and had been hospitably entertained by the king and his retainers, he sent messengers to offer Rædwald a great sum of money to kill Edwin. But this had no effect; he sent a second and a third time, offering more and more each time, and threatening to make war on him if he refused. Rædwald, either terrified by his threats or corrupted by his bribes, yielded to his request and promised either to kill Edwin or to give him up to the messengers. A trusty friend of Edwin's found this out, and went into his chamber when he was going to bed, for it was the first hour of the night. He called him outside, told him what the king had promised to do with him, adding, "If you are willing, I will take you from this kingdom right now, and lead you to a place where neither Rædwald nor Æthelfrith will ever find you." Edwin answered, "I thank you for your goodwill, but I cannot do what you suggest, lest I be the first to break the compact I have made with this great king; he has done me no wrong, nor shown me any enmity. If I must die, let it rather be by his hand than by that of some meaner person. For where should I now fly, when I have for so many years been a vagabond through all the kingdoms of Britain, trying to escape the snares of my enemies?" His friend went away, and Edwin remained alone outside; sitting with a heavy heart in front of the palace, he began to be overwhelmed with many thoughts, not knowing what to do or which way to turn.

He remained a long time in silent anguish, brooding over his misfortunes, when suddenly in the dead of night he saw a man approach him whose face and dress were equally strange. He was more than a little frightened at this unexpected sight. The stranger came close, saluted him, and asked why he sat there alone and melancholy on a stone at that time, when everyone else was resting, and fast asleep. Edwin asked in reply what concern it was to him whether he spent the night indoors or out. The stranger replied, "Do not think that I am unaware of the cause of your grief, your sleeplessness, and your sitting alone outside. For I know who you are, and why you grieve, and the evils which you fear will fall upon you. But tell me, what reward would you give the man who would free you from this anguish, and persuade Rædwald neither to harm you himself, nor to give you up to be murdered by your enemies?" Edwin replied that he would give that person all that he was able in return for such a favor. The other continued, "What if he also assured you that you will overcome your enemies, and be a king who surpasses in power not only all your ancestors, but also all who have reigned before you over the English?" Edwin, encouraged by these questions, did not hesitate to promise that he would make a suitable return to anyone who should offer him such great benefits. Then the man said, "If the one who truly foretold so many good things could also give you better and more useful advice for your life and salvation than any of your ancestors or kindred ever heard of, would you consent to obey him, and to follow his saving counsel?" Edwin did not hesitate to promise that he would follow in every detail the directions of the one who could rescue him from so many troubles and raise him to the throne. At this answer the man who was speaking to him laid his hand on his head saying, "When this sign shall come to you, remember this conversation that has passed between us, and do not hesitate to fulfill what you have now promised." Having uttered these words, it is said that he immediately disappeared, so that the king might realize that it was not a man but a spirit that had appeared to him.

The young prince sat there alone for a time, rejoicing in the consolation he had received but deeply troubled and anxiously wondering who it was that had talked to him in that way, or where he had come from. Meanwhile the friend mentioned earlier returned, greeted him pleasantly and said, "Rise, go inside, and let yourself sleep without fear! The king has changed his mind and intends to do you no harm but rather to keep the promise he made you; when he secretly revealed to the queen the plan I told you before, she talked him out of it, warning that was unworthy of so great a king to sell his good friend for gold when he was in such distress, and to sacrifice his own honor, more precious than any ornament, for the love of money." In short, the king did as he had said, and not only refused to betray the banished man to his enemy's messengers, but helped Edwin to recover his kingdom. As soon as the messengers had returned home, he raised a mighty army to overthrow Æthelrith. Rædwald did not give him time to gather all his forces; he attacked him with a much larger army and killed him on the borders of the kingdom of Mercia, on the east bank of the river Idle. In this battle Rædwald's son Regenhere was killed. And thus Edwin, in accordance with the vision he had received, not only escaped the snares of the king his enemy, but after his death succeeded him on the throne.

King Edwin hesitated to accept the word of God preached by Paulinus, and for some time, as we have said, used to sit alone for several hours at a time, earnestly debating within himself what he ought to do and what religion he should follow. One day the man of God¹ came to him, laid his right hand on the king's head, and asked him if he recognized this sign. The king, trembling, was about to fall down at his feet but Paulinus raised him up and said in a voice that seemed familiar, "Behold, with God's help you have escaped the hands of the enemies you feared; behold, you have obtained by His gift the kingdom you desired; take heed not to delay what you promised to do—receive the faith and keep the commandments of Him who rescued you from earthly adversity and has raised you to the honor of an earthly kingdom. If, from this time forward, you are willing to follow his will, which is made known to you through me, He will not only deliver you from the everlasting torments of the wicked, but also make you a partaker with Him of His eternal kingdom in heaven."

When the king heard these words, he answered that he was both willing and bound to accept the faith which Paulinus taught, but that he would confer about it with his chief men and counselors so that, if they agreed with him, they might all together be cleansed in Christ, the Fountain of Life. Paulinus agreed, and the king did as he said: holding a meeting with his council of wise men, he asked each one in turn what he thought of this new doctrine, and the new worship of God that had been proclaimed.

Coifi, chief of his own priests, immediately answered, "Consider, O king, this new doctrine that is being preached to us. For I say to you truly that as far as I can tell, the religion we have practiced until now has no virtue in it. None of your people has devoted himself more diligently to the worship of our gods than I, and yet there are many who receive greater favors and greater honor from you than I do, and are more prosperous in all their undertakings. If the gods had any power they would have helped me more readily, since I have been more careful to serve them. It follows, therefore, that if on examination those new doctrines which are now preached to us are found to be better and more effective, we should accept them immediately and without delay."

¹ man of God I.e., Paulinus.

Another of the king's chief men agreed with his words and his advice, and then added: "This is how the present life of man, O king, seems to me in comparison with that time which is unknown to us: as if you are sitting in your feasting-hall with your ealdormen and thanes¹ in wintertime, with a good fire burning in the middle of the hall and all inside is warm, while outside the winter storms of rain and snow are raging; and a sparrow flies swiftly through the hall, entering in at one door and quickly flying out at another. While he is within the winter storms cannot touch him; but after the briefest moment of calm he immediately vanishes out of your sight, out of the winter and back into it again. So this life of man appears just for a moment—of what went before, or what is to follow, we know nothing at all. If this new doctrine contains anything more certain, it seems right that we should follow it." The other elders and counselors spoke in the same way, by divine inspiration.

Coifi added that he wanted to listen more attentively to what Paulinus had to say about the God he preached. The king ordered Paulinus to speak and Coifi, hearing his words, cried out, "I have long realized that our religion is worthless—the more diligently I sought the truth in our worship, the less I found it. But now I freely confess that such truth shines forth clearly in this preaching, which can bestow on us the gift of life, salvation, and eternal happiness. Therefore I advise, O king, that we instantly abandon and set fire to those temples and altars which we have consecrated without reaping any benefit from them." What more is there to say? The king publicly accepted the gospel which Paulinus preached, renouncing idolatry, and confessed his faith in Christ; and when he asked the high priest who should be the first to profane the altars and temples of their idols, together with the enclosures around them, Coifi answered, "I will; for who can more properly than myself destroy those things which I once worshipped in ignorance, through the wisdom which has been given me by the true God, and set an example for others?"

And immediately, casting aside his former superstitions, he asked the king to furnish him with arms and a stallion, and mounting it he set out to destroy the idols. Now the high priest was not allowed to carry arms or to ride on any horse but a mare; but with a sword girded about him and a spear in his hand, he mounted the king's stallion and set off for the idols.² The common people, seeing this, thought he was mad; but wasting no time, as soon as he drew near the temple he profaned it by casting into it the spear which he held, and rejoicing in the knowledge of the worship of the true God, he ordered his companions to destroy and set fire to the temple and all its enclosures. This place where the idols once stood is still shown, a short distance east of York beyond the river Derwent. Today it is called Goodmanham, the place where the high priest, by the inspiration of the true God, profaned and destroyed the altars which he had himself consecrated.

So King Edwin and all the nobles of his nation, and a large number of the common people, received the faith and regeneration by holy baptism in the eleventh year of his reign, that is in the year of our Lord 627, and about 180 years after the coming of the English into Britain. He was baptized at York on Easter day, the 12th of April, in the church of St. Peter the Apostle which he himself had built of timber, while he was a catechumen³ and receiving instruction in order to receive baptism. In the same city he established an episcopal see for his instructor and bishop Paulinus. As soon as he was baptized he began, under the direction of Paulinus, to build a larger and more noble church of stone in the same place, in the midst of which the chapel which he had built first would be enclosed. The foundations were laid and he began to build the church square, surrounding the former chapel, but before the walls were raised to their proper height, the king was cruelly slain⁴ and the work was left to his successor Oswald. Paulinus continued to preach the word of the Lord in the king-

² Now the high priest ... idols Bede is our only authority for this custom, or for the existence of "high priests" in Anglo-Saxon pagan religion.

³ catechumen Person preparing to be baptized into the Catholic faith.

⁴ the king was cruelly slain In battle against Cædwalla, king of the Britons, and Penda, King of the Mercians.

¹ ealdormen and thanes Noblemen.

dom for six years, that is, until the end of the king's reign, with his consent and favor, and all who were predestined for eternal life believed and were baptized. Among these were Osfrid and Eadfrid, King Edwin's sons, who were born to him while he was in exile; their mother was Cwenburh, daughter of Ceorl, king of the Mercians.

Other children of his by Queen Æthelburh were baptized later, namely Æthelhun and a daughter Æthelthryth and a second son Uscfrea; the first two were snatched from this life while still in their white garments,¹ and buried in the church at York. Yffi, son of Osfrith, was also baptized, and many more nobles and members of the royal family. It is said that the fervor of the faith and the longing for the washing of salvation was so great among the Northumbrians that once when Paulinus came to the king and queen in their royal palace called Ad gefrin,² he spent thirty-six days there fully occupied in catechising and baptizing, and during these days, from morning till night, he did nothing but instruct the people who came from every village and region in Christ's saving word. When they were instructed, he washed them with the water of absolution in the river Glen, which is nearby. This palace was abandoned by the kings who followed Edwin and another built instead, at the place called Mælmin.³

All this happened in the kingdom of Bernicia; but in the kingdom of Deira also, where Paulinus used to stay frequently with the king, he baptized in the river Swale, which runs by the village of Catterick, for in the earliest days of the church there they could not build chapels or baptistries. But in Campodonum,⁴ where there was also a royal dwelling, he built a church which afterwards was burned down, together with all the buildings, by the pagans who killed King Edwin. In its place later kings built a dwelling for themselves in the region called Loidis.⁵ The altar, which was made of stone, escaped the fire and is still preserved in the monastery of the most reverend abbot and priest Thrythwulf, which is in the forest of Elmet.

Edwin was so devoted to the true worship that he also persuaded Eorpwald, son of Rædwald and king of the East Saxons, to abandon his idolatrous superstitions and, with his whole kingdom, to accept the Christian faith and sacraments. Indeed his father Rædwald had long before been initiated into the mysteries of the Christian faith in Kent, but in vain; for on his return home, he was seduced by his wife and by certain perverse teachers, and turned back from the sincerity of the faith, so that his last state was worse than his first.⁶ Like the ancient Samaritans, he seemed at the same time to serve Christ and the gods whom he had previously served, and in the same temple he had one altar for Christian sacrifice and another small one to offer victims to devils. Ealdwulf, ruler of that kingdom up to our own time, testified that the temple had stood until his time, and that he had seen it when he was a boy. King Rædwald, noble by birth but ignoble in his actions, was the son of Tytil, whose father was Wuffa, from whom the kings of the East Angles are called Wuffings.⁷

Eorpwald, not long after he had embraced the Christian faith, was killed by a heathen called Ricberht; and afterwards the kingdom remained in error for three years, until Eorpwald's brother Sigiberht came to the throne. Sigiberht was a devout Christian and a learned man; he was in exile during his brother's life and went to live in Gaul, where he was admitted to the sacraments of the Christian faith. As soon as he came to the throne he made it his business to see that the whole kingdom shared his faith. His efforts were strongly supported by

⁵ Loidis Leeds.

⁶ so that his ... his first See Luke 11.26.

⁷ King Rædwald ... Wuffings Bede's account of Rædwald's incomplete conversion and excessive ecumenism contrasts sharply with that of Edwin's deep, thoughtful, and fervent faith; moreover, since he is a Northumbrian, Bede's center of gravity is in the north, not least because his sources of information were probably richer. But the treacherous and backsliding East Saxons should not be underrated: Rædwald is widely thought to be the king honored by the elaborate and richly decorated ship-burial at Sutton Hoo, and the Wuffings may or may not be the same as the Swedish Wylfings mentioned in Beowulf.

¹ white garments I.e., still wearing the white robe given to those who are newly baptized and worn every day for the first week after the sacrament.

² Ad gefrin Present-day Yeavering, Northumberland. Archaeologists have excavated the site of Edwin's hall, an impressive complex of large buildings and outdoor spaces on the site of a Neolithic hill fort.

³ Mælmin Near present-day Millfield, Northumberland.

⁴ Campodonum Roman site near Dewsbury, Yorkshire.

Bishop Felix. The bishop had been born and ordained in Burgundy; when he came to Archbishop Honorius and expressed his desires, the archbishop sent him to preach the word of life to this nation of the Angles. Nor were his wishes in vain, for the devoted sower reaped an abundant harvest of believers in this spiritual field—indeed, as his name signified,¹ he delivered all of that kingdom from longstanding evil and unhappiness, brought it to the faith and to the works of righteousness, and gave it the gift of everlasting felicity. He received the see of his bishopric in the city of Dommoc,² and when he had ruled as bishop over the kingdom for seventeen years, he ended his days there in peace.

Paulinus also preached the word to the kingdom of Lindsey, the first land on the south bank of the river Humber, bordering on the sea. He first converted the prefect of the city of Lincoln, whose name was Blæcca, and his whole family. In this city he also built a stone church of beautiful workmanship; its roof has now either fallen through age or been thrown down by enemies, but the walls are still standing, and every year some miraculous cures are wrought in that place for the benefit of those who seek them in faith. When Justus departed to Christ, in his place Paulinus consecrated Honorius as bishop in that church, as we will later tell in its proper place.

An abbot and priest of the monastery of Partney, a most truthful man whose name was Deda, told me this about the faith of this kingdom: an old man had told him that he himself had been baptized at noon by Bishop Paulinus, in the presence of King Edwin, with a great number of people, in the river Trent, near the city which in English is called Tiowulfingacæstir.³ He also used to describe the appearance of Paulinus: he was tall, a little stooping, with black hair, a thin face, a slender and aquiline nose, and an aspect both venerable and majestic. In his ministry he also had with him a deacon named James, a man of zeal and great reputation in Christ's Church, who survived right up to our days.

It is reported that there was such perfect peace in Britain, wherever the dominion of King Edwin extended, that, as the proverb still says, a woman with a new-born child could walk throughout the island from sea to sea without receiving any harm. The king cared so much for the good of his nation that in various places where he had noticed clear springs near the highways, he had stakes set up with bronze drinking-cups hanging from them, for the convenience of travelers. No one dared to touch them for any other purpose than the one they were designed for, because they feared the king and loved him dearly. His dignity was so great throughout his realm that not only were banners carried before him in battle, but even in time of peace, when he rode about his cities, estates, or regions with his thegns, a standard-bearer always used to go before him, and when he walked along the roads, there used to be carried before him the type of standard which the Romans call a tufa and the English a thuf.

4. ABBESS HILD OF WHITBY; THE MIRACULOUS POET CÆDMON

In the year of our Lord 680 Hild, the most devout servant of Christ, abbess of the monastery that is called Whitby,⁴ departed on the 17th of November after having performed many heavenly works on earth, to receive the rewards of the heavenly life, at the age of sixty-six. She spent her first thirty-three years living most nobly in the secular habit, and more nobly dedicated the remaining half to our Lord in the monastic life. She was of noble birth, being the daughter of Hereric, nephew to King Edwin; in Edwin's company she received the faith and mysteries of Christ at the preaching of Paulinus of blessed memory, the first bishop of the Northumbrians, and she preserved her faith undefiled until she was rewarded with the sight of Him in heaven.

Resolving to give up the secular habit and serve Him alone, she withdrew to the kingdom of the East Angles, for she was related to the king there; she intended to pass over from there into Gaul, leaving her native land and all that she had to live as a stranger for our Lord's sake in the monastery of Chelles, so that she might more easily reach her eternal home in heaven. Her sister

¹ as his name signified Felix means "fortunate" or "happy" in Latin.

² Dommoc Dunwich.

³ Tiowulfingacæstir Littleborough.

⁴ Whitby Bede uses the Old English name "Streaneshalch."

Hereswith, mother of Ealdwulf, king of the East Angles, was at that time living in the same monastery under the discipline of the monastic Rule, waiting for her heavenly crown. Inspired by her example, Hild continued a whole year in the kingdom of the East Angles with the intention of going abroad; Bishop Aidan called her home, however, and gave her enough land to support herself on the north side of the river Wear, where she lived in the monastic life for a year, with a small group of companions.

After this she was made abbess in the monastery called Heruteu,¹ which had been founded not long before by Heiu, a devoted handmaid of Christ, who is said to have been the first woman in the kingdom of Northumbria to take the habit and vows of a nun, having been ordained by Bishop Aidan. But soon after she had founded that monastery, Heiu went away to the town of Calcaria, which the English call Kelcacestir,² and there made her dwelling. Hild, the handmaid of Christ, was appointed to rule over that monastery, and immediately began to establish a rule of life there in all things, as she had been taught by many learned men; for Bishop Aidan and other devout men who knew her visited her frequently, instructed her diligently, and loved her dearly for her innate wisdom and devotion to the service of God.

When she had ruled over this monastery for some years, wholly intent upon establishing a rule of life there, it happened that she also undertook either to found or to reform a monastery in the place called Streaneshalch,³ which she carried out with great industry. She established the same rule in this monastery as in the other, and she taught there the strict observance of justice, piety, chastity, and other virtues, above all peace and charity. After the example of the primitive church, no one there was rich, and no one was poor, for all things were common to all, and none had any private property. Her wisdom was so great that not only ordinary people, but even kings and princes sometimes asked for and received her advice; she obliged those who were under her direction to devote so much time to the study of the Holy Scriptures, and to exercise themselves so much in works of justice, that there might be no difficulty in finding many there who were fit for ecclesiastical duties, that is for the service of the altar.

In fact we have seen five men from that monastery become bishops, all of them men of singular merit and sanctity: Bosa, Ætla, Oftfor, John, and Wilfrid. The first of them, as we related elsewhere, was consecrated bishop of York; of the second, it may be observed that he was appointed bishop of Dorchester. Of the two last we shall later relate that John was consecrated bishop of Hexham and Wilfrid, bishop of York; of Oftfor we will here note that after he applied himself to the reading and observance of the Scriptures in both of Hild's monasteries, being anxious to attain to greater perfection, he went to Kent to join Archbishop Theodore, of blessed memory. After he had spent more time in sacred studies there, he resolved to go to Rome, which in those days was considered to be an act of great merit. After his return to Britain, he went to the province of the Hwicce, where King Osric then ruled, and remained there a long time, preaching the word of faith and setting an example of holy life to all who saw and heard him. At that time Bosel, the bishop of that kingdom, suffered such weakness of body that he could not carry out his episcopal duties; so Oftfor was appointed bishop in his place by universal consent, and was consecrated at King Æthelred's command by Bishop Wilfrid, of blessed memory, who was at that time bishop of the Middle Angles because Archbishop Theodore was dead, and no other bishop had been ordained in his place. Before Bosel, a most learned and industrious man of excellent ability named Tatfrid had been chosen bishop there, also from Hild's monastery, but he had been snatched away by an untimely death before his consecration.

All who knew Abbess Hild, the handmaid of Christ, called her Mother because of her outstanding piety and grace. She was not only an example of holy life to those who lived in her monastery, but provided an opportunity for repentance and salvation to many who lived far away who heard the happy news of her diligence and virtue. This was bound to happen so that the dream which her mother Breguswith had during Hild's infancy should be fulfilled. When her husband Hereric lived in exile under the British king Cerdic, where he was later

¹ Heruteu Hartlepool.

² Kelcacestir Uncertain; possibly Tadcaster.

³ Streaneshalch Site in northeastern Yorkshire (now Whitby) where the Abbess Hild founded a double monastery.

poisoned, Breguswith dreamed that she was looking for him most carefully, and could find no sign of him anywhere; but suddenly, after having tried with all her might to find him, she found a most precious necklace under her garment, and as she was gazing at it very attentively, it cast such a blaze of light that it spread throughout all Britain. This dream came true in her daughter Hild, whose life was a bright example, not only to herself, but to many who desired to live well.

After she had governed this monastery many years, it pleased Him who has made such merciful provision for our salvation to subject her holy soul to the trial of a long sickness so that, like the apostle, her strength might be made perfect in weakness.

She was struck by a fever and fell into a violent heat, and for six years was afflicted continually; during all which time she never failed to give thanks to her Maker or to instruct the flock entrusted to her care both in public and in private. From her own experience she admonished everyone to serve the Lord dutifully in health and always to return thanks to Him in adversity or bodily illness. In the seventh year of her illness, she began to suffer internally and approached her last day. Around cock-crow, having received the viaticum of Holy Communion,¹ she called together the handmaids of Christ who were in the monastery, and admonished them to preserve the Gospel peace among themselves and towards all others; and as she was exhorting them she joyfully saw death approaching or, to use the words of our Lord, she passed from death into life.

That same night it pleased Almighty God by a vision to reveal her death in another monastery at some distance from hers called Hackness, which she had built that same year. In that monastery was a nun called Begu, who for thirty years or more had dedicated her virginity to God and served Him in the monastic life. While she was in the dormitory of the sisters, she suddenly heard in the air the familiar sound of the bell which used to awaken the sisters and call them to prayers when any one of them had been taken out of this world. Opening her eyes, she seemed to see the top of the house open, and a strong light pour in from above; looking intently at that light, she saw the soul of the handmaid of the Lord borne into heaven in the midst of that light, attended by angels. Then awaking and seeing the other sisters lying around her, she realized that what she had seen was either a dream or a vision; greatly frightened, she rose immediately and ran to a maiden named Frigyth, who was then presiding over the monastery in place of the abbess. With many tears and sighs, Begu told her that the Abbess Hild, mother of them all, had departed this life, and that she had seen her ascend with a great light, and with angels conducting her, into eternal bliss and the company of the inhabitants of heaven. When Frigyth heard this, she awoke all the sisters, and called them to the church; she ordered them to pray and sing psalms for Hild's soul, which they did for the rest of the night. At break of day, the brothers came from the place she had died with news of her death. They answered that they already knew it, and when they told how and when they had heard it, it was found that her death had been revealed to them in a vision in the very same hour that the brothers said she had died. Thus it was happily ordained by Heaven that when some watched her departure out of this world, others watched her entrance into the eternal life of the spirit. These monasteries are about thirteen miles distant from each other.

It is also reported that her death was made known in a vision the same night to one of the holy maidens who loved her most passionately, in the same monastery where this servant of God died. She saw Hild's soul ascend to heaven in the company of angels; and she declared this, the very same hour it happened, to those servants of Christ who were with her, and awakened them to pray for her soul, even before the rest of the congregation had heard of her death, for it was only made known to the whole monastery the next morning. This same nun was at that time with some other servants of Christ in the remotest part of the monastery, where the women who had recently entered the monastery used to spend their time of probation until they were instructed in the Rule and admitted to the society of the community.

In Hild's monastery was a certain brother specially marked by the grace of God, who used to make pious and religious verses, so that whatever he learned from the holy Scriptures through interpreters, he soon afterwards turned into poetry of great sweetness and humility, in English, which was his native language. By his verses the minds of many were often inspired to despise the world and to long for the heavenly life. After him other Englishmen tried to compose religious poems, but none could ever compare with him, for he did not learn the art of poetry from men or through a man,¹ but received the gift of song freely by divine grace. For this reason he never could compose any trivial or foolish poem, but only those which were concerned with devotion and were fitting for his pious tongue to utter.

¹ viaticum ... Communion Communion received by someone who is possibly near death.

He had lived in the secular life until he was well advanced in years, and had never learned any verses; therefore sometimes at feasts, when it was agreed for the sake of entertainment that all present should take a turn singing, when he saw the harp coming towards him, he would rise up from the table in the middle of the feast, go out, and return home. On one occasion when he did this, he left the house of feasting and went to the stable, where it was his turn to take care of the animals that night. In due time he stretched out to rest; a person appeared to him in his sleep, saluted him by name, and said, "Cædmon, sing me something." Cædmon answered, "I cannot sing; that is why I left the feast and came here, because I could not sing." The man who was talking to him replied, "Nevertheless, you must sing to me."

"What shall I sing?" he asked. "Sing about the beginning of created things," he replied. At that, Cædmon immediately began to sing verses which he had never heard before in praise of God, whose general sense is this: "We ought now to praise the Maker of the heavenly kingdom, the power of the Creator and his counsel, the deeds of the Father of glory and how He, since He is the eternal God, was the author of all marvels and first, as almighty Guardian of the human race, created heaven as a roof for the sons of men, and then the earth."² This is the sense but not the actual order of the words he sang in his sleep, for poetry, no matter how well composed, cannot be literally translated from one language into another without losing much of its beauty and dignity. Awakening from his sleep, Cædmon remembered all that he had sung in his dream, and soon added more verses in the same manner, praising God in a worthy style.

In the morning he went to the steward, his master, and told him of the gift he had received; the steward led him to the abbess, who ordered him, in the presence of many learned men, to recount his dream and repeat his poem, so that they might all decide what it was and where it had come from. It was clear to all of them he had received a gift of heavenly grace from our Lord. Then they explained to him a passage of sacred history or doctrine, and ordered him, if he could, to turn it into verse. He undertook this task and went away; when he returned the next morning he repeated it to them, composed in excellent verse. At this the abbess, recognizing the grace of God in this man, instructed him to renounce the secular habit and take up the monastic life; when this was done she joined him to the rest of the brethren in her monastery and ordered that he should be taught the whole course of sacred history. He learned all that he could by listening, and turned it over in his mind like a clean beast chewing the cud,³ turned it into the most harmonious verse, and recited it so sweetly that his teachers became in turn his audience. He sang of the creation of the world, the origin of the human race, and all the history of Genesis; and made many verses on the departure of the children of Israel from Egypt, and their entry into the Promised Land, and many other stories from the holy Scriptures; of the Incarnation, Passion, and Resurrection of our Lord, and of His Ascension into heaven, of the coming of the Holy Spirit and the teaching of the apostles, also of the terror of future judgment, the horror of the pains of hell, and the joys of the kingdom of heaven, and many more songs about the divine mercies and judgments by which he tried to turn all men away from the love of vice and to inspire in them the love and practice of good works. He was a very devout man, humbly submissive to the discipline of the

¹ from men or through a man See Galatians 1.1.

We ought now ... the earth See below for Cædmon's Hymn in Old English. Bede gives only this paraphrase; in two manuscripts of Bede's Latin Historia a poem in the Northumbrian dialect of Old English is added in the margins. When Bede's work was translated into Old English at the end of the ninth century, the translators substituted a version of this poem for Bede's paraphrase, and omitted the disclaimer that follows it.

He learned ... the cud See Leviticus 11.3; Deuteronomy 14.6.

monastic rule, but full of zeal against those who behaved otherwise; for this reason his life had a lovely ending.

When the hour of his departure drew near, for fourteen days he was afflicted with a bodily weakness which seemed to prepare the way, yet mild enough that he could talk and walk the whole time. Nearby was the house to which the sick and dying were carried. As evening fell on the night he was going to depart this life, he asked his attendant¹ to prepare a place for him there so he could take his rest. The attendant wondered why he should desire that, because there seemed to be no sign of his dying soon, but did what he had asked. They went there and were talking pleasantly and joyfully with the people who were already in the house; when it was past midnight he asked them whether they had the Eucharist there. They answered, "What need do you have of the Eucharist? You are not likely to die, since you talk so merrily with us, just as though you were in perfect health." "Nevertheless," he said, "bring me the Eucharist." When he had taken it into his hand he asked whether they were all in charity with him, without any complaint or quarrel. They answered that they were all in perfect charity, and free from anger; and likewise asked him whether he felt the same towards them. He answered at once, "My sons, I am in charity with all the servants of God." Then strengthening himself with the heavenly viaticum, he prepared for his entrance into the next life; he asked how near it was to the time when the brothers had to awaken to sing their nightly praise of our Lord. They answered, "It is not far off." He said, "Good; let us wait until then," and signing himself with the sign of the holy cross, he laid his head on the pillow and fell into a slumber, and so ended his life quietly. Thus it came to pass that, just as he had served God with a simple and pure mind and quiet devotion, so now he departed into His presence and left the world by a quiet death, and his tongue, which had composed so many holy words in praise of the Creator, uttered its last words while he was in the act of signing himself with the cross, and commending his spirit into God's hands; and from what has been said, it seems he had foreknowledge of his death.

5. CÆDMON'S HYMN IN OLD AND MODERN ENGLISH

Nu sculon herian heofonrices weard,
Metodes meahta ond his modgeþanc,
weorc wuldorfæder, swa he wundra gehwæs,
ece Drihten, or astealde.
He ærest scop ielda bearnum
heofon to hrofe, halig Scieppend;
þa middangeard manncynnes weard,
ece Drihten, æfter teode,
firum foldan Frea ælmihtig.

Now (we) ought to praise Heaven-kingdom's guardian,
the Maker's might and his mind's thoughts,
the work of the glory-father, as he of each of wonders, eternal Lord, established a beginning.²
He first shaped for men's sons
Heaven as a roof, the holy Creator;
then middle-earth mankind's guardian, eternal Lord, afterwards prepared the earth for men, the Lord almighty.

—C. 731

¹ his attendant Older monks were attended by young novices who took care of them.

² Lord ... beginning I.e., He established the beginning of every wonder.

Beginning of the first book of Bede's Ecclesiastical History of the English People (British Library Cotton MS Tiberius C.ii, fol. 5v).

EARLY IRISH LYRICS

The coming of Christianity to Ireland in the fifth and sixth centuries brought with it the Latin alphabet; a rich oral tradition soon became the basis for an equally rich written one. The poems below (most of which cannot be dated with precision) are a mere sampling of the remarkable body of early Irish literature.

Notwithstanding the complexities of the verbal system, Old Irish bears a much closer resemblance to modern Irish than does Old English to modern English. Old Irish belongs to the Goedellic or Gaelic group of Celtic languages, so it is common to hear Irish speakers described as speaking Gaelic (for which the Irish name is “Gaeilge”). The modern Gaelic languages—Irish, Scottish Gaelic, and Manx—are all descended from Old Irish.

Though Old Irish poems often deal with subjects that are found in Old English poetry as well, in many formal respects the two are very different. Whereas Old English poetry typically divides into half lines, each including two stressed syllables but a variable number of total syllables, early Irish poetry might be either accentual or syllabic; in the classical Old Irish period, syllabic meters (with a set number of total syllables per line) predominated. And whereas the body of Old English poetry that has come down to us is (with one exception) unrhymed, Old Irish poetry typically has end-rhyme, line-internal rhyme, and aicill-rhyme, in which the end of one line rhymes with the beginning or middle of another. There are two broad categories of syllabic meter, rannaigeacht and deibide, both of which have four-line stanzas: in rannaigeacht there is end-rhyme between (at least) the second and fourth lines, while in deibide the rhyme-scheme is aabb. The metrical notation for the famous poem “Messe ocus Pangur Bán,” in deibide, is $7^1 7^2 7^1 7^2$; the large numbers are the syllables per line, and the superscript numbers are the syllables in the last word of each line. Since the stress-accent in Irish falls on the first syllable of a word, this means that stressed syllables (one-syllable words) are rhymed with unstressed syllables (the second syllable of two-syllable words). On top of this there is a fairly complex system of alliteration—a system based, surprisingly, not on the way the consonants are actually pronounced, which varies as part of Old Irish grammar, but on the consonants’ underlying form. Finally, it was expected that the first and last words of a poem would be either the same word or homophones, a feature known as dúnad (“closing”). The translations below focus on conveying the meaning of the lines; to give some sense of the formal properties of the poetry, “[Messe ocus Pangur Bán]” is reproduced below in the original as well as in translation.

Though many of the Old Irish poems that are of most interest to twenty-first-century readers deal in one way or another with the (pagan) Otherworld or with the (Christian) afterlife, the greater part of Old Irish poetry concerned the here-and-now. Poets focused very largely on verse that aimed either to praise or to blame—with kings and nobles being the recipients of both. (Strangely enough, much more satire than praise survives from the early period.) The value of praise poetry, and of the poets in general, was affirmed by Giolla Brighde Mac Con Mide in a thirteenth-century poem, “A theachtair tig ón Róimh” (“O messenger come from Rome”), in which he responded to a papal envoy apparently seeking to suppress the poets. The poem argues that skill in poetry is a gift from God, and therefore any well-made praise by a poet effectively praises God as well, and is fully compatible with Christian living. It also asserts that payments to poets are never wasted, since wealth means nothing without nobility, and all awareness of nobility depends on the poets’ ability to memorialize one’s ancestors. The heroes of the past live on in poetry forever—but without poetry, people would have no sense of their own status and lineage, and there would be no distinction in rank between the children of lords and the children of kennel-keepers:

If the men of Ireland resolve to expel the poets,
every Gael will be of sketchy birth;
every nobleman will be a peasant.

This is an eloquent statement of the poets' importance, and explains why the bardic orders survived in Ireland as long as there was any kind of aristocracy to support them.

What the poets granted with praise, they could also take away. "The First Satire," below, is taken from one of the most important prose sagas, and gives a prototypical example of satire in the early Irish sense—a formalized assault on the reputation of the poem's subject.

"[A Bé Find, in rega lim]" ("Fair lady, will you go with me") gives us a description of the Otherworld, the home of the Túatha Dé Danann ("Peoples of the Goddess Danu," or in modern terms "the fairies") who lived in Ireland before the coming of the Gaels. The Otherworld was normally accessible through hollow hills; the agreement with the Gaels was that they would live in the upper half of Ireland (the part above ground) while the Túatha Dé Danann got the lower half. Human-Otherworld interactions, with one group typically encroaching on the other's turf, are a major theme of early Irish literature, through which crucial issues relating to kingship and the productive tension between what Kim McCone calls "pagan past and Christian present" are explored in various ways.

On first reading, "The Lament of the Old Woman of Beare" seems to be a dramatic monologue by a courtesan or royal consort who has become a nun in her old age. (The Irish for "old woman," caillech, literally means "veiled one," and is also used to refer to nuns.) Using images like the rise and fall of the tide, the poem sets up various oppositions: the pleasures and abundance of the past versus the austerity and deprivation of the present; the disappointment of this world versus the promise of a Christian afterlife. But the poem may also hold levels of meaning that are more difficult for modern readers to recapture. One reading for which there is great scholarly support, for example, takes the Old Woman as a personification of sovereignty associated with a particular line of kings in Munster (the southern province of Ireland)—thereby explaining her references to embracing multiple kings.

"[Is acher in gáith innocht]" ("The wind is wild tonight"), with its delicious irony of the comforting storm, reads as the work of a monk from the Viking Age, when Scandinavians explored, raided, and traded throughout much of Europe. Viking raiders began to target Irish monasteries in the ninth century. Most of modern Ireland's urban centers originated as either major monasteries (for example, Cork) or Viking settlements (for example, Dublin); and for raiding parties in the early Middle Ages, monasteries were the best source of easy plunder.

"[Techt do Róim]" ("Going to Rome") is a pithy comment on the fraught relationship between the Irish church and Rome. The unconventionality of the early Irish church is usually overstated in modern writings about "Celtic Christianity," but while missionary exile—like that of St. Columba, founder of the abbey of Iona on an island near Scotland, and St. Columbanus, founder of three abbeys on the Continent—was celebrated, pilgrimages to Rome were less encouraged. In one story, St. Brigit of Kildare tells a bishop not to bother traveling to Rome; when he sets off anyway, he is eaten by wolves before he even leaves Ireland.

Finally, "[Messe ocus Pangur Bán]" ("Me and white Pangur") compares the activities of an ecclesiastical scholar to those of his cat. The cat is catching mice, and the scholar is apparently "glossing": unpacking the meaning in the work of an older authority in order to add commentary to a manuscript. This poem has become a well-known classic, translated many times by major writers, among them Robin Flower, W.H. Auden, Frank O'Connor, Seamus Heaney, Paul Muldoon, and Eavan Boland.

*The First Satire*¹

One time a poet came to visit King Bres. They put him in a cramped, lightless hut where there was no fire and no furniture, not even a bed. When he got up the next day, he was far from grateful, and as he walked across the yard, he said:

Sans food to fill a plate,
sans milk to grow a calf,
sans roof when darkness falls,
sans fee for storytellers:
so be Bres.

"Now Bres is bust," he said, and that came true the moment he said it: Bres's fortunes tanked.

This was the first satire ever composed in Ireland.

—9TH CENTURY

*[A Bé Find, in rega lim]*²

Fair lady, will you go with me to a land of wonder lit by stars?
Our hair is like primroses,
bodies like snow.

There's no "yours" or "mine" there.
Teeth are white there, eyebrows black.

Our people thrill the eye.
Every cheek is the color of foxglove.

The top of every plain is purple.
10 A blackbird's eggs delight the eye.
The fields of Ireland are lovely to look at,
but they might as well be desert when you know the Great Land.

Do you like to get drunk on Irish beer?
The beer of the Great Land will do it faster.
15 The land I speak of is a wonder.
The young won't ever die before the old.

Streams of sweet water flow gently through it.
There is mead and wine for every taste.
The people there are majestic, flawless.
20 We make babies without sin or guilt.³

We see everyone everywhere
and no one sees us.
The darkness caused by Adam's sin
hides us so we can't be catalogued.

25 Woman, if you join my proud people you'll wear gold in your hair.
And I will serve you bacon, beer, and milk,
or whatever drink you like, fair lady.

—9TH CENTURY

¹ The First Satire Translated from the Old Irish for this anthology by Matthieu Boyd. What appears here is an excerpt from the saga Cath Maige Tuired, "The (Second) Battle of Mag Tuired."

² [A Bé Find, in rega lim] Translated from the Old Irish for this anthology by Matthieu Boyd. What appears here is an excerpt from the saga Tochmarc Étaíne, "The Wooing of Étaín" (pronounced "Aideen"). The character Étaín is a woman of the Otherworld (called the sídh, pronounced like the verb "sheathe," as in "to sheathe a sword"), but after various adventures she ends up married to the human king of Tara. Her Otherworld husband Midir comes to take her back and uses this poem to try and win her over.

³ We make ... guilt Michael Cronin translates the end of this verse as "it's not a sin to copulate," and Margaret Elphinstone, in her novel Hy Brasil, has a character translate it "sex there is not a sin, and no one need feel any guilt about it." The basic meaning of the word compert is "conception, impregnation" or "offspring"; to the extent it means "sex," it refers to sex for reproduction, not for fun. Cronin thinks the poet "situates his utopia in the sexual license of pagan Ireland but is aware of the finger-wagging of the Christian present," which may be true, but the major point is that the Otherworld people are free of original sin ("Adam's sin" in the poem), probably because they are not fully human.

[Messe ocus Pangur Bán]¹

Messe ocus Pangur bán, cechtar nathar fria aindán:
bíth a menmasam fri seilgg,
mu menma céin im aincheird.

5 Caraimse fos, ferr cach clú,
oc mo lebrán, lēir ingnu;
nī foirmtech frimm Pangur bán,
caraid cesin a maccdán.

10 Ō ru biam, scél cen scís, innar tegdais, ar n-ōendís,
tāthiunn, dīchīrchide clius,
nī fris tarddam ar n-áthius.

Gnáth, hūaraib, ar gressaib gal
glenaíd luch inna línasam;
15 os mé, du-fuit im lín chéin
dliged ndoraid cu ndronchéill.

Fūachaidsem fri frega fál
a rosc, a nglése comlán;
fūachimm chéin fri fēgi fis 20 mu rosc rēil, cesu imdis.

Fāelidsem cu ndēne dul
hī nglen luch inna gērchrub;
hī tucu cheist ndoraid ndil
os mē chene am fāelid.

25 Cia beimmi amin nach ré
nī derban cách a chēle:
maith la cechtár nár a dán;
subaigthius a óenurán.

He fesin as choimsid dáu 30 in muid du-ngní cach oenláu;
du thabairt doraid du glé
for mu mud céin am messe.

—9TH CENTURY

Me and white Pangur:²
each has his own gift.
Normally his mind is set on hunting,
while I'm focused on my special craft.

I love resting (better than all fame)
with my booklet, at diligent study.
White Pangur's not envious of me;
he loves his youthful gift.

Since here we are (it's never boring!)³
as housemates, together,
we each have (it's endless fun!)
something to apply our skill to.

It often happens that by fearless pouncing
a mouse sticks in his net;
as for me, in my net falls
some obscure principle, hard to interpret.

He points his eye at the wall
with perfect clarity;
I point my own eye
at the text's keen insights, though it's very feeble.

He capers with frenetic joy
when a mouse sticks in his clutches;
when I unravel a tough, complex question,
I celebrate too.

Though we might be like this anytime,
neither one disturbs the other.
Each one likes his gift,
enjoys it by his little self.

Pangur is the master of the method he practices each day.
My own method is designed to make what's convoluted clear.

¹ [Messe ocus Pangur Bán] Translated from the Old Irish for this anthology by Matthieu Boyd. This poem about a scholar and his cat comes from a ninth-century book called the "Reichenau Primer."

² Pangur This is an unusual name, since the sound /p/ is not native to Irish. The name probably comes from the Welsh word for "fuller," because of the white chalk ("fuller's earth") that was used to work cloth.

³ (it's never boring!) These intrusive remarks, which interrupt the syntax, fill out the verse line.

“[Messe ocus Pangur Bán]” (commonly referred to as “Pangur Bán”) is included in a ninth-century manuscript that appears to have been the notebook of an Irish scribe working at the island monastery of Reichenau on Lake Constance. (The manuscript is now held in a different monastery, in the village of Saint Paul-in-the-Lavanttal, Carinthia, Austria.) Though the poem is often described as having been written “in the margin” of this manuscript, in fact it appears in the bottom half of a verso (left-side) page—as the above photograph shows. The manuscript (which is variously known as “the Reichenau Primer” and “the St. Paul Irish Codex”) includes an eclectic variety of materials—among them excerpts from Greek works, notes on mathematics and logic, and an astrological table. The poem was not brought to the attention of the wider world until Celtic scholars Whitley Stokes and John Strachan included both a transcription of the manuscript text and a translation in the second volume of their Thesaurus Palaeohibernicus: a Collection of Old-Irish Glosses, Scholia, Prose And Verse (1903).

[Is acher in gáith innocht]¹

The wind is wild tonight,
 it whips the waves' white hair.
 And I breathe easy.
 For once the Irish Sea stops crawling with violent bands from Viking-land.

—9TH CENTURY

[Techt do Róim]²

Going to Rome?
 Big effort. Small profit.
 That Lord you're after?
 You won't find him there unless you take him with you.

—9TH CENTURY

*The Lament of the Old Woman of Beare*³

The Old Woman of Beare said this when she was old and decrepit:

I am ebbing like the sea.
 Age has made me yellow;
 while I grieve,
 it comes gleefully to feed.⁴

¹ [Is acher in gáith innocht] Translated from the Old Irish for this anthology by Matthieu Boyd.

² [Techt do Róim] Translated from the Old Irish for this anthology by Matthieu Boyd.

³ The Lament of the Old Woman of Beare Translated from the Old Irish for this anthology by Matthieu Boyd. The translation of this poem, which has some textual difficulties, is based on the critical edition by Gerard Murphy in Early Irish Lyrics, and the translation sometimes coincides with his; Beare Peninsula on the coast of Munster. Most if not all places named in the poem are in Munster.

⁴ like the sea ... to feed The poem interleaves different metaphors, maritime and arboreal. Youth is associated with the fertile plains, and age with the barren shore; but youth is also associated with the flood tide, and age with the ebb; age is associated with the yellowing of leaves and the rotting of vegetation, but is also described as wintry and, in this verse, as an animal hurrying to its meal.

I am Buí, the Old Woman of Beare.
 Once I wore a dress that was ever-new.
 Today, I'm cast down so low that I'm not even wearing someone else's cast-off.

These days all of you love wealth,
 not people.
 In my day,
 it was people we loved.

We cherished the people whose lands we gallop⁵ through.
 They provided lavishly for us,
 and afterwards kept a lid on their boasting.

These days you're good at making demands and not so eager to be granting them.
 You don't give much,
 and then you brag about it.

Fast chariots
 and prize-winning racehorses:
 there was a flood of them for a time,
 bless the King⁶ who granted them!

My body is bitterly longing
 to go and live where it is known.
 When the Son of God decides it's time,
 let Him come and take back His deposit.

Bony and thin
 is how my arms look uncovered.
 The craft they used to practice was pleasure:
 they used to be wrapped around glorious kings.

When my arms are uncovered
 they're bony and thin.
 I tell you they're not fit to reach out for handsome young men.

⁵ gallop The past tense "galloped" might seem to make more sense here, but the original is clearly present-tense.

⁶ the King There is no capitalization in the manuscript. In the context of the poem the king may be understood to be God, but strictly speaking this is not required.

Maidens celebrate when Beltaine¹ comes round.
Better I should grieve:
I'm not just depressed, I'm an old bag.

I speak no honeyed words.
No sheep are killed for my wedding.
My hair is thin and gray.
It's no tragedy to wear a mean veil² over it.

I wear a white veil on my head,
but I don't mind.
I had every color of head-dress
when we used to drink good liquor.

I envy no one old except the plain of Feimen.
I'm covered up like an old person,
while Feimen is as blonde as ever.

The Stone of the Kings³ in Feimen, Rónán's Seat⁴ in Bregun:
it's been a long time since the heavy weather came to stroke their cheeks,
but they're not old or wrinkled.

The great sea's surf is raucous,
and winter makes the waves claw higher.
I expect no nobleman or slave's son to visit me today.

I know what they're doing:
they're rowing, rowing far away.
The reeds of Áth° Alma:
the place they sleep is cold.

ford

Alas the day!
I'm not rowing over any seas of youth.
The long years have taken their toll on my figure as my lustful urges gutter out.

70 Alas the day!
Now, in any weather,
I hug my clothes around me, even in the bright sun.
I'm old. I admit it.

I spent the summer of my youth,
75 my autumn too.
The winter of old age that overwhelms us all nips me with its first frost.

I lived it up in my bloom of youth and I have no regrets.
80 If I'd been more restrained, what difference would it make?
Old cloak, never worn, doesn't mean brand-new.⁵

The green cloak my King spreads on Drumain⁶ is lovely.
The Man⁷ who fulls⁸ it is noble:
85 he has given it wool to replace rough cloth.

Ugh! I'm so cold.
Every acorn's born to rot.
After feasting with bright candles,
what a change—the darkness of a chapel.

90 I've had my time with kings,
drinking mead and wine;
now I drink watery whey
with wizened old women.

¹ Beltaine The counterpart of Samain (1 November), which inspired Hallowe'en, Beltaine was a pagan festival that marked the transition from winter to summer. Supernatural encounters at this time were believed to be common (see the First Branch of the Mabinogi for an example from a Welsh story). The celebration of May Day as a spring festival may be the closest modern equivalent.

² mean veil Simple head covering.

³ Stone of the Kings I.e., stone used in coronation ceremonies.

⁴ Rónán's Seat Court, probably of the eighth-century king Rónán Mór of Múscraige Bregoin, a small kingdom in Munster.

⁵ If I'd ... brand-new The last two lines of this verse, in Gerard Murphy's literal translation, read: "Though my leap beyond the wall had been small, the cloak would not have been still new." Murphy says the cloak statement is "doubtless a proverbial phrase."

⁶ Drumain Ridge near the plain of Feimen.

⁷ Man There is no capitalization in the manuscript, but scholars agree that the "man" referred to here is the divine man, Jesus.

⁸ fulls Fulling is the process of shrinking and felting woollen fabric to make it water-resistant.

95 May a little whey-cup be my beer.
 May all of my frustrations be God's will.
 Praying to you, O Living God,
 may I give ...¹ against anger.

I see my cloak covered with the stains of age.
 My mind has started to deceive me.
 100 There's gray hair growing through my skin,
 lichen on an old tree's bark.²

My right eye was taken from me, sold for a land that will be mine forever.³
 And my left eye was taken 105 to strengthen my claim.

There are three floods
 that roll to the fort of Ard Ruide:
 a flood of warriors, a flood of horses,
 a flood of hunting hounds of Lugaid's sons.

110 The wave of the sea in flood and the wave of swift ebb:
 what the flood-wave brings you
 the ebb-wave tears from your hand.

The wave of the sea in flood 115 and that other wave, the ebb:
 I've known both
 and I can recognize them now.

May the silence of my pantry never spread to the wave of the sea in flood.
 120 Although I once had many guests,
 a hand was laid⁴ on them all.

If the Son of Mary only knew he'd be underneath the rafters of my pantry!⁵
 It might have been the only way I was generous, but 125 I never said no to anyone.

It breaks my heart
 (people are such base creatures) that no one cares to watch me ebb
 the way they watched me flood.

130 My flood kept my deposit⁶ safe.
 Jesus, Son of Mary, saved it till the ebb
 so that I am not sad.⁷

It must be nice to be an island in the great sea:
 135 when the tide has ebbed it floods again.
 But I—I expect no flood
 after this ebb.

These days there's hardly a homestead
 I'd recognize.
 140 All that was in flood is ebbing now.

—8TH OR EARLY 9TH CENTURY

¹ ... A word missing in the original.

² There's gray ... bark The word crotball can mean "tree-bark" or "sluggishness, decrepitude." A translation using the other sense would be "The hair that's growing through my skin is gray. This is how it feels to be an old tree, rotting."

³ a land ... forever Heaven. The speaker means that her sight has worsened, not that her eyes have literally been removed.

⁴ a hand was laid The literal words are clear but the sense is uncertain—the hand of death?

⁵ If ... pantry The point made here could be that the speaker was practicing Christian charity even before she realized it.

⁶ my deposit The earlier verse about the Son of God coming to take back his deposit supports Murphy's reading of "my deposit" here as "that which was deposited with me."

⁷ till the ebb ... not sad Left unpunctuated (and there was no punctuation in the manuscript), the fourth line of this verse seems to mean "so that I am not sad until the ebb." The present translation adopts Murphy's reading.

EXETER BOOK ELEGIES

Most of the Old English poetry that has survived is contained in only four manuscripts. The richest and most diverse of these is Exeter Cathedral Library, Dean and Chapter MS 3501, a large anthology of secular and religious poems. The book was given to the Cathedral library at Exeter by the bishop Leofric some time before his death in 1072 CE (and has remained there ever since), but it was written probably a century earlier, somewhere in the south of England. Because some pages have been lost from the manuscript, we cannot say how many poems it originally contained, and we do not know the reasons behind its compilation. But the Exeter Book is a fascinating collection whose contents range from serious religious poetry on the Advent and Ascension of Christ, to verse lives of St Guthlac and Juliana, to a reworking of a Latin poem on the Phoenix, to a collection of almost 100 verse riddles which are sometimes comical or obscene. The poems are probably by many different authors; a poet named Cynewulf encoded his own name (in runes) in two poems, Juliana and Christ II, but all others are anonymous and untitled.

The Exeter Book includes a number of short philosophical poems, differing from one another in style and outlook but similar in tone, which have come to be known as “elegies”: these are The Wanderer, The Seafarer, Deor, Wulf and Eadwacer, The Wife’s Lament, The Ruin, The Husband’s Message, and two fragmentary poems called Resignation A and B. All these titles, it must be remembered, are modern inventions, and not always the most reliable guides to the content or meaning of the poem. Likewise the modern label “elegy” is potentially misleading: in Greek and Latin literature the term refers to a particular metrical form, and since the sixteenth century the word has been used in English literature to describe a poem of mourning (the most famous examples of classic English elegies include Milton’s Lycidas, Shelley’s Adonais, and Tennyson’s In Memoriam). But the term “elegy” is sometimes used more loosely to describe any serious meditative lyric poem, and it is in this broad sense that these Old English poems should be considered “elegies.”

The Old English elegies are not grouped together in the Exeter Book and are all, as far as we know, by different authors, but they share certain themes and concerns—the passage of time and the transience of earthly things, the pain of exile and separation, the ache of absence and longing—as well as certain images and scenes such as ruined or abandoned buildings, desolate landscapes, storms at sea, darkness, and the chill of winter. These themes, and the traditional language in which they are presented, are found in other Old English poems—certain passages of Beowulf are “elegiac,” if not outright “elegy”—and the contemplation of earthly mutability sometimes seems almost obsessive in Old English literature. The tone and language of elegy may have roots deep in the traditions of Germanic poetry, but it is also influenced by late classical works such as Boethius’s Consolation of Philosophy; the recognition that the world under the heavens is a place of tragic impermanence would probably have been regarded as equally good Christian doctrine and worldly wisdom.

Most of the Old English elegies are monologues spoken by an unidentified character whose situation is unclear but who seems to be cut off from human society and the comforts of home and companionship. But even though they share the poetic language of exile and longing, each poem has its own shape and purpose, and each makes its own statement about the problems and possibilities of earthly life. The Wanderer laments the passing of a whole way of life, the heroic world of the warrior’s hall; The Wife’s Lament is a poem of intense personal longing for an absent husband or lover, even if its expressions of erotic desire is largely framed in the heroic language of lordship and loyalty. Deor stays close to the secular world of heroic legend; The Seafarer is explicitly and even aggressively homiletic and Christian. The Ruin is more detached and dispassionate about the scene it describes (it is the only poem without a first-person narrator) and its moral judgments, if any, are implicit and indirect.

Each of the poems presented here has some structural and interpretive difficulties. The Wanderer is a dramatic monologue with a prologue and epilogue, but the beginnings and endings of speeches are not indicated in the manuscript and can only be guessed at. The Seafarer switches tone so radically that many readers (including Ezra Pound, who translated the poem) have simply rejected the second, more homiletic half. These poems develop philosophical arguments and present evidence and conclusions, but Old English poetic language is not necessarily congenial to the demands of precise reasoning; sentence boundaries and relationships between clauses are often uncertain. The Wife's Lament is also obscure by virtue of its language—a number of the poem's key terms have more than one meaning, and there is no indication which of several ways each of them ought to be translated. And the pages of the Exeter Book containing The Ruin have been damaged, leaving the poem to crumble into incoherence.

All these poems (with the exception of The Ruin) are first-person accounts of individual emotion and experience; they seem to speak across the ages in voices whose pain often strikes a reader as vividly authentic and intimate. But their expression of individual subjectivity takes shape from deep within literary conventions, forms, and images that anchor their personal voices in a shared cultural tradition. This tension between the individual and the tradition may be an important part of the work of the Old English elegies; they dramatize the moment when an individual recognizes the universality of his or her experience, when one turns from loneliness and isolation to accept, even embrace, the shared suffering of the human condition. And despite their interpretive problems—which are found to some degree in all early literature—the Exeter Book elegies are among the most moving and powerful poems in Old English; their vision of life as both infinitely precious and inevitably transitory still strikes a responsive chord in the minds of many readers.

*The Wanderer*¹

Always the one alone longs for mercy,²
 the Maker's mildness, though, troubled in mind, across the ocean-ways he has long been forced to stir with his hands the frost-cold sea,
 and walk in exile's paths. *Wyrd*³ is fully fixed.

¹ The Wanderer The following poems are edited by Bernard J. Muir, The Exeter Anthology of Old English Poetry, revised 2nd edition (Exeter, 2000) and have been translated for The Broadview Anthology of British Literature by R.M. Liuzza.

longs for mercy The Old English word gebidan, translated "longs for," can also mean "awaits" or "experiences." The word ar "mercy" can also mean "prosperity" in an earthly sense.

³ Wyrd The Old English word for Fate; a powerful but not quite personified force. It is related to the verb weorthan, meaning roughly "to occur." Its meanings range from a neutral "event" to a prescribed "destiny" to a personified "Fate"; it is useful to think of wyrd as "what happens," usually in a negative sense. In a poem so preoccu-

Thus spoke the Wanderer, mindful of troubles, of cruel slaughters and dear kinsmen's downfall:⁴
 "Often alone, in the first light of dawn,
 I have sung my lament. There is none living to whom I would dare to reveal clearly my heart's thoughts. I know it is true that it is a nobleman's lordly nature to closely bind his spirit's coffer, hold fast his treasure-hoard, whatever he may think.
 The weary mind cannot withstand wyrd,
 the troubled heart can offer no help,

pied with puzzling over the nature and meaning of wyrd, it seemed appropriate to leave the word untranslated.

⁴ Thus spoke... kinsmen's downfall Old English manuscripts do not use quotation marks, and there are no clear indications of where one speech begins and ends in this poem; we are not sure whether lines 1–5 are spoken by the same character that speaks the following lines, or whether they are the narrator's opinion on the general situation of the Wanderer.

and so those eager for fame often bind fast
 in their breast-coffers a sorrowing soul, just as I have had to take my own heart—
 often wretched, cut off from my own homeland, far from dear kinsmen—and bind it in fetters,
 ever since long ago I hid my gold-giving friend in the darkness of earth, and went wretched, winter-sad, over the ice-locked waves, sought, hall-sick, a treasure-giver, wherever I might find, far or near,
 someone in a meadhall who might know my people,
 or who would want to comfort me, friendless, accustom me to joy. He who has come to know how cruel a companion is sorrow
 for one with few dear friends, will understand:
 the path of exile claims him, not patterned gold,
 a winter-bound spirit, not the wealth of earth.
 He remembers hall-holders and treasure-taking,
 how in his youth his gold-giving lord accustomed him to the feast—that joy has all faded.

And so he who has long been forced to forego
 his lord's beloved words of counsel will understand:
 when sorrow and sleep both together often bind up the wretched exile, it seems in his mind that he clasps and kisses his lord of men, and on his knee lays hands and head, as he sometimes long ago in earlier days enjoyed the gift-throne.¹
 But when the friendless man awakens again and sees before him the fallow waves, seabirds bathing, spreading their feathers,
 frost falling and snow, mingled with hail,
 then the heart's wounds are that much heavier, longing for his loved one. Sorrow is renewed when the memory of kinsmen flies through the mind;²
 he greets them with great joy, greedily surveys hall-companions—they always swim away;
 the floating spirits bring too few

¹ lays hands ... enjoyed the gift-throne The description seems to be some sort of ceremony of loyalty, charged with intense regret and longing.

² the memory ... through the mind Old English þonne maga gemynd mod geondhweorfeð could also mean "when the mind surveys the memory of kinsmen."

55 familiar voices. Cares are renewed for one who must send, over and over,
 a weary heart across the binding waves.³

And so I cannot imagine for all this world
 why my spirit should not grow dark when I think through all this life of men,
 how suddenly they gave up the hall-floor, mighty young retainers. Thus this middle-earth droops and decays every single day;
 and so a man cannot become wise, before he has weathered 65 his share of winters in this world. A wise man must be patient,
 neither too hot-hearted nor too hasty with words,
 nor too weak in war nor too unwise in thoughts,
 neither fretting nor fawning nor greedy for wealth,
 never eager for boasting before he truly understands;
 70 a man must wait, when he makes a boast,
 until the brave spirit understands truly
 where the thoughts of his heart will turn.

The wise man must realize how ghastly it will be when all the wealth of this world stands waste, 75 as now here and there throughout this middle-earth walls stand blasted by wind, beaten by frost, the buildings crumbling.
 The wine halls topple, their rulers lie deprived of all joys; the proud old troops all fell by the wall. War carried off some, sent them on the way, one a bird carried off over the high seas, one the gray wolf shared with death—and one a sad-faced man covered in an earthen grave. The Creator 85 of men thus destroyed this walled city, until the old works of giants⁴ stood empty,
 without the sounds of their former citizens.

He who deeply considers, with wise thoughts,
 this foundation and this dark life,

³ greets them ... the binding waves The grammar and reference of this intense, almost hallucinatory scene is not entirely clear; the translation reflects one commonly-proposed reading.

⁴ old works of giants Ruined buildings are called "the work of giants" (enta geweorc) in several places in Old English literature.

90 old in spirit, often remembers so many ancient slaughters, and says these words:
 'Where has the horse gone? where is the rider? where is the giver of gold?
 Where are the seats of the feast? where are the joys of the hall?
 O the bright cup! O the brave warrior!
 95 O the glory of princes! How the time passed away, slipped into nightfall as if it had never been!
 There still stands in the path of the dear warriors
 a wall wondrously high, with serpentine stains.
 A storm of spears took away the warriors,
 100 bloodthirsty weapons, wyrd the mighty,
 and storms batter these stone walls,
 frost falling binds up the earth,
 the howl of winter, when blackness comes,
 night's shadow looms, sends down from the north 105 harsh hailstones in hatred of men.
 All is toilsome in the earthly kingdom,
 the working of wyrd changes the world under heaven.
 Here wealth is fleeting, here friends are fleeting,
 here man is fleeting, here woman is fleeting, 110 all the framework of this earth will stand empty."

So said the wise one in his mind,¹ sitting apart in meditation.
 He is good who keeps his word,² and the man who never too quickly
 shows the anger in his breast, unless he already knows the remedy
 a noble man can bravely bring about. It will be well for one who seeks mercy, 115 consolation from the Father in heaven, where for us all stability stands.

The Seafarer

I can sing a true song of myself, tell of my journeys, how in days of toil

the wise one in his mind Old English snottor on mode could also mean "the one who was wise in mind."

² keeps his word Keeps faith. These last lines offer an answer to the Wanderer's unresolved melancholy—the wisdom of self-control and the hope of Christian salvation.

I've often suffered troubled times, endured hard heartache, come to know 5 many of care's dwellings on the keel of a ship, terrible tossing of the waves, where the anxious night-watch often held me at the ship's stem when it crashes against the cliffs. Pinched with cold were my feet, bound by frost 10 in cold fetters, while cares seethed hot around my heart, and hunger gnawed my sea-weary mind. That man does not know, he whose lot is fairest on land,
 how I dwelt all winter, wretched with care, 15 on the ice-cold sea in the paths of exile, deprived of dear kinsmen,³
 hung with icicles of frost while hail flew in showers.
 I heard nothing there but the noise of the sea,
 the ice-cold waves; the wild swan's song 20 sometimes served for music, the gannet's call and the curlew's cry for the laughter of men,
 the seagull's singing for mead-drink.
 Storms beat the stone cliffs; the tern answered,
 icy-feathered, the eagle screamed, 25 dewy-feathered—no sheltering family could bring consolation to my desolate soul.

And so⁴ he who has tasted life's joy in towns, suffered few sad journeys, scarcely believes,
 proud and puffed up with wine, what I, weary, 30 have often had to endure in my seafaring.
 The night-shadow darkened; snow came from the north,
 frost bound the ground, hail fell on earth,
 coldest of grains. And so⁵ they compel me now,

³ deprived of dear kinsmen A half-line may be missing here. There is no break in the manuscript or in the sense of the poem, but the line has only two stresses instead of the expected four.

⁴ And so The repeated connecting word forþon is notoriously difficult in this poem—it points forwards and/or backwards, meaning either "therefore" or "thus" or "because." In a poem whose logical progression is by no means clear or easy to follow this is a significant source of ambiguity. I have chosen to render it with the vague "and so," hoping to preserve some of the loose connection and interpretive difficulty found in the original.

⁵ And so The disjunction between what has come before and what comes after this line is so great that it has been proposed that a second speaker is introduced here (there are no quotation marks in my heart-thoughts, to try for myself

 the high seas, the tossing salt streams;¹
 my heart's desire urges my spirit time and again to travel, so that I might seek a foreign land somewhere far from here.

And so no man on earth is so proud in spirit,
 nor so gifted in grace nor so keen in youth,
 nor so bold in deeds, nor so beloved of his lord,
 that he never has sorrow over his seafaring,
 when he sees what the Lord might have in store for him.
 He has no thought of the harp or the taking of rings,
 nor the pleasures of woman nor joy in the world,
 nor anything else but the tumbling waves—
 he who hastens to sea always has longing.
 The groves take blossom, the cities grow fair,
 the fields brighten, the world rushes on;
 all these urge the eager-hearted spirit to travel, when one intends to journey far over the flood-ways.
 Even the cuckoo urges with its sad voice, summer's guardian announces sorrow bitter in the breast-hoard. He does not know, the man blessed with ease, what those endure
 who walk most widely in the paths of exile.

And so now my thought flies out from my breast,
 my spirit moves with the sea-flood,
 roams widely over the whale's home,
 to the corners of the earth, and comes back to me greedy and hungry; the lone flier cries out, incites my heart irresistibly to the whale's path
 over the open sea—because hotter to me
 are the joys of the Lord than this dead life,

the manuscript that might clarify this ambiguity). Though this "two-speaker" theory is no longer widely accepted, it reflects the difficulty many critics have reconciling the conflicting attitudes presented in the poem—sea voyage as terrible suffering, sea voyage as longed-for escape (as in the opening of Melville's Moby-Dick), sea-voyage as metaphor for spiritual pilgrimage, or even for life itself.

¹ they compel me . . . salt streams Or "and yet my heart-thoughts are pressing me, now that I myself might explore the high seas and tossing salt waves."

loaned, on land.² I will never believe that earthly goods will endure forever.
 Always, for everyone, one of three things hangs in the balance before its due time:
 illness or age or attack by the sword
 wrests life away from one doomed to die.
 And so for every man the praise of posterity,
 those coming after, is the best eulogy—
 that before he must be on his way, he act bravely on earth against the enemies' malice,
 do bold deeds to beat the devil,
 so the sons of men will salute him afterwards,
 and his praise thereafter live with the angels forever and ever, in the joy of eternal life, delight among heaven's host.

The days are lost,
 and all the pomp of this earthly kingdom;
 there are now neither kings nor emperors nor gold-givers as there once were,
 when they did the greatest glorious deeds
 and lived in most lordly fame.
 All this noble host is fallen, their happiness lost,
 the weaker ones remain and rule the world, laboring and toiling. Joy is laid low,
 the earth's nobility grows old and withers,
 like every man throughout middle-earth.
 Old age overtakes him, his face grows pale,
 the graybeard grieves; he knows his old friends,
 offspring of princes, have been given up to the earth.
 When his life fails him, his fleshly cloak will neither taste the sweet nor touch the sore,
 nor move a hand nor think with his mind.
 Though a brother may wish to strew his brother's grave with gold, bury him among the dead with heaps of treasure to take with him, that gold will be useless before the terror of God
 for any soul that is full of sin,
 the gold he had hidden while here on earth.

² this dead life, / loaned, on land At this point the sea-voyage is revealed to be a journey of spiritual discovery, as in the Hiberno-Latin Voyage of St Brendan. The hermit-monks of Ireland had a particular penchant for taking to small boats and trusting in God for their safety. Some reached Iceland; some are rumored to have reached the Americas; many others, no doubt, found rest at the bottom of the sea.

Great is the terror of God, before which the earth
trembles;
He established the sturdy foundations,
105 the earth's solid surface and the high heavens.
Foolish is he who dreads not the Lord; death will find him unprepared.
Blessed is he who lives humbly; mercy from heaven
comes to him,
the Maker strengthens his spirit, for he believes in His might.
A man must steer a strong mind and keep it stable, 110 steadfast in its promises, pure in its ways;
every man must hold in moderation his love for a friend and his hatred for a foe, though he may wish him full of fire ...¹
... or his friend consumed
on a funeral pyre. Fate is greater, 115 the Maker mightier than any man's thoughts.

Let us consider where we should have our home,² and then think how we might come there, and let us also strive to reach that place
of eternal peace, unending blessedness, 120 where life is found in the love of the Lord, hope in heaven. Thanks be to the holy one that he has so honored us, ruler of glory,
eternal Lord, throughout all time. Amen.

The Wife's Lament

I make this song of myself, deeply sorrowing, my own life's journey. I am able to tell all the hardships I've suffered since I grew up,
but new or old, never worse than now—
5 ever I suffer the torment of my exile.

First my lord left his people over the tumbling waves; I worried at dawn where on earth my leader of men might be.
When I set out myself in my sorrow,
10 a friendless exile, to find his retainers, that man's kinsmen began to think in secret that they would separate us,
so we would live far apart in the world,
most miserably, and longing seized me.

15 My lord commanded me to live here;³
I had few loved ones or loyal friends
in this country, which causes me grief.
Then I found that my most fitting man was unfortunate, filled with grief, 20 concealing his mind, plotting murder with a smiling face. So often we swore that only death could ever divide us, nothing else—all that is changed now;
it is now as if it had never been, 25 our friendship. Far and near, I must endure the hatred of my dearest one.

They forced me to live in a forest grove,
under an oak tree in an earthen cave.⁴
This earth-hall is old, and I ache with longing;
30 the dales are dark, the hills too high,
harsh hedges overhung with briars,
a home without joy. Here my lord's leaving often fiercely seized me. There are friends on earth, lovers living who lie in their beds,
35 while I walk alone in the first light of dawn
under the oak tree and through this earth-cave, where I must sit the summer-long day;
there I can weep for all my exiles,
my many troubles; and so I can never 40 escape from the cares of my sorrowful mind,
nor all the longings that seize me in this life.

¹ full of fire ... Something is missing here, though there is no gap in the manuscript; the translation is conjectural and makes as little sense as the original.

² Let us consider ... our home The tone of these last lines, different in many respects from the rest of the poem, seems to place the poem finally in a homiletic setting—the exhortation of a preacher rather than the confession of a weathered Ancient Mariner.

³ to live here Or, “to take up a dwelling in a grove” or “to live in a (pagan) shrine.” The precise meaning of the line, like the general meaning of the poem, is a matter of dispute and conjecture.

⁴ in an earthen cave Or even “in an earthen grave or barrow.”

May the young man always be sad-minded¹ with hard heart-thoughts, yet let him have a smiling face along with his heartache, a crowd of constant sorrows. Let to himself all his worldly joys belong! Let him be outlawed in a far distant land, so that my friend sits under stone cliffs chilled by storms, weary-minded, surrounded by water in a sad dreary hall! My beloved will suffer the cares of a sorrowful mind; he will remember too often a happier home. Woe to the one who must wait with longing for a loved one.

The Ruin

Wondrous is this wall's foundation—*wyrd*² has broken
 and shattered this city; the work of giants crumbles.
 The roofs are ruined, the towers toppled,
 frost in the mortar has broken the gate,
 torn and worn and shorn by the storm, eaten through with age. The earth's grasp holds the builders, rotten, forgotten, the hard grip of the ground, until a hundred generations of men are gone.

This wall, rust-stained and covered with moss, has seen one kingdom after another,
 stood in the storm, steep and tall, then tumbled.
 The foundation remains, felled by the weather, it fell. ...³
 grimly ground up. ...

¹ May the young man ... sad-minded These difficult lines have been read as a particular reflection, imagining the mental state of her distant beloved, or as a general reflection on the double-faced nature of the world; here, following the reading of some critics, they are taken as a kind of curse, wishing upon the beloved all the suffering and sorrow felt by the speaker.

² wyrd On this Old English word, see the note to line 5 of The Wanderer.

it fell... Several lines are lost here; the translation tries to make sense of a few surviving words.

... ..cleverly created. ...
 a crust of mud surrounded ... put together a swift and subtle system of rings; one of great wisdom wondrously bound the braces together with wires.

Bright were the buildings, with many bath-houses,
 high noble gables and a great noise of armies,
 many a meadhall filled with men's joys,
 until mighty wyrd made an end to all that.
 The slain fell on all sides, plague-days came,
 and death destroyed all the brave swordsmen;
 the seats of their idols became empty wasteland,
 the city crumbled, its re-builders collapsed
 beside their shrines. So now these courts are empty, and the rich vaults of the vermilion roofs shed their tiles. The ruins toppled to the ground, broken into rubble, where once many a man
 glad-minded, gold-bright, bedecked in splendor, proud, full of wine, shone in his war-gear,
 gazed on treasure, on silver, on sparkling gems,
 on wealth, on possessions, on the precious stone,
 on this bright capital of a broad kingdom.

Stone buildings stood, the wide-flowing stream threw off its heat; a wall held it all in its bright bosom where the baths were,⁴ hot in its core, a great convenience.
 They let them gush forth
 the hot streams over the great stones, under...
 until the circular pool hot...
where the baths were.
 Then....
 that is a noble thing,
 how the city ...⁵
 —? IOTH CENTURY

⁴ where the baths were This description has led many readers to assume the poem is describing the actual ruins of the Roman temple complex at Aqua Sulis in the modern city of Bath.

⁵ the city... The poem, appropriately, trails off into incoherent decay.

THE DREAM OF THE ROOD

Although the manuscript in which this poem appears—known as the Vercelli Book¹—was copied in the tenth century, The Dream of the Rood may be considerably older. Several lines from the poem are carved in runic characters on a large stone monument known as the Ruthwell Cross, found in a small church in Dumfriesshire on the western border of England and Scotland. The Cross, which has been dated to the early eighth century, is elaborately carved with scenes from the Gospels and lives of the saints, antiphons in Latin, and decorative scroll-work; if the runic inscriptions were part of the original monument (and not a later addition), then The Dream of the Rood—or at least those portions carved on the Ruthwell Cross—would be among the earliest written Old English poems.

The Ruthwell Cross.

The Dream of the Rood tells the story of the Crucifixion of Christ from the point of view of the Cross, which appears to the narrator in a dream and recounts its experiences. Christ is presented as a heroic warrior, eagerly leaping on the Cross to do battle with Death; the Cross is a loyal retainer who is painfully and paradoxically forced to participate in his lord's execution. The narrator who witnesses this then shares his vision, describes the virtues of devotion to the Cross, and looks forward to the time when righteous Christians, protected by the Cross, are taken up into the banquet-halls of heaven. The blending of Christian themes and heroic conventions is a striking example of how the Anglo-Saxons vigorously re-imagined Christianity even as they embraced it. The Dream of the Rood interweaves biblical, liturgical, and devotional material with the language of heroic poetry and elegy, and something of the ambiguity and wordplay of the Riddles; its complex structure of echoes, allusions, repetitions, and verbal parallels makes it one of the most carefully constructed poems in Old English.

*The Dream of the Rood*²

Listen! I will speak of the sweetest dream, what came to me in the middle of the night,
when speech-bearers slept in their rest.
It seemed that I saw a most wondrous tree raised on high, wound round with light, the brightest of beams. All that beacon was covered in gold; gems stood fair at the earth's corners, and there were five up on the cross-beam. All the angels of the Lord looked on,

10 fair through all eternity;³ that was no felon's gallows,
but holy spirits beheld him there,
men over the earth and all this glorious creation.

¹ The Vercelli Book (Vercelli Biblioteca Capitolare CXVII) is a collection of English religious prose and poetry written in southern England in the later tenth century, and taken to Vercelli, Italy, some time afterwards, where it still remains.

² The Dream of the Rood Translated by R.M. Liuzza for The Broadview Anthology of British Literature.

All the angels ... through all eternity These lines are difficult and much debated; another possible translation is "All creation, eternally fair / beheld the Lord's angel there," the Lord's angel presumably being the Cross itself, God's messenger to earth (the Greek word angelos meaning "messenger").

Wondrous was the victory-tree, and I was stained by sins,
 wounded with guilt; I saw the tree of glory honored in garments, shining with joys, bedecked with gold; gems had covered worthily the Creator's tree.
 And yet beneath that gold I began to see an ancient wretched struggle, when it first began to bleed on the right side. I was all beset with sorrows, fearful for that fair vision; I saw that eager beacon change garments and colors—now it was drenched, stained with blood, now bedecked with treasure.
 And yet, lying there a long while,
 I beheld in sorrow the Savior's tree,
 until I heard it utter a sound;
 that best of woods began to speak words:

"It was so long ago—I remember it still—that I was felled from the forest's edge, ripped up from my roots. Strong enemies seized me
 there,
 made me their spectacle, made me bear their criminals;
 they bore me on their shoulders and set me on a hill, enemies enough fixed me fast. Then I saw the Lord of mankind
 hasten eagerly when he wanted to ascend upon me.
 I did not dare to break or bow down against the Lord's word, when I saw the ends of the earth tremble. Easily I might have felled all those enemies, yet fast I stood.
 Then the young hero made ready—that was God almighty—
 strong and resolute; he ascended on the high gallows, brave in the sight of many, when he wanted to ransom mankind.
 I trembled when he embraced me, but I dared not bow to the ground,
 or fall to the earth's corners—I had to stand fast.
 I was reared as a cross: I raised up the mighty King,
 the Lord of heaven; I dared not lie down.
 They drove dark nails through me; the scars are still visible,
 open wounds of hate; I dared not harm any of them.
 They mocked us both together; I was all drenched with blood

flowing from that man's side after he had sent forth
 his spirit.

50 "Much have I endured on that hill of hostile fates: I saw the God of hosts cruelly stretched out. Darkness had covered with its clouds the Ruler's corpse, that shining radiance. Shadows spread 55 grey under the clouds; all creation wept, mourned the King's fall: Christ was on the cross.
 And yet from afar men came hastening to that noble one; I watched it all.
 I was all beset with sorrow, yet I sank into their hands, 60 humbly, eagerly. There they took almighty God, lifted him from his heavy torment; the warriors then left me standing drenched in blood, all shot through with arrows.
 They laid him down, bone-weary, and stood by his body's head;
 they watched the Lord of heaven there, who rested a while,
 65 weary from his mighty battle. They began to build a tomb for him
 in the sight of his slayer; they carved it from bright stone,
 and set within the Lord of victories. They began to sing a dirge for him,
 wretched at evening, when they wished to travel hence, weary, from the glorious Lord—he rested there with little company.¹
 70 And as we stood there, weeping, a long while fixed in our station, the song ascended from those warriors. The corpse grew cold, the fair life-house. Then they began to fell us all to the earth—a terrible fate!
 75 They dug for us a deep pit, yet the Lord's thanes, friends found me there ...
 adorned me with gold and silver.²

¹ with little company I.e., utterly alone.

² adorned me with gold and silver There is no gap in the manuscript here, but something is obviously missing—the story of the Finding of the True Cross, told (among other places) in the Old English poem Elene later in the Vercelli Book. The Cross is buried, hidden, forgotten, then recovered by Helen, mother of the emperor Constantine; its authenticity is established and it becomes an object of veneration and sign of victory.

80 "Now you can hear, my dear hero,
 that I have endured the work of evil-doers, harsh sorrows. Now the time has come that far and wide they honor me,
 men over the earth and all this glorious creation, and pray to this sign. On me the Son of God suffered for a time; and so, glorious now 85 I rise up under the heavens, and am able to heal
 each of those who is in awe of me.
 Once I was made into the worst of torments, most hateful to all people, before I opened the true way of life for speech-bearers.
 90 Lo! the King of glory, Guardian of heaven's kingdom honored me over all the trees of the forest, just as he has also, almighty God, honored
 his mother, Mary herself,
 above all womankind for the sake of all men.

95 "Now I bid you, my beloved hero, that you reveal this vision to men,
 tell them in words that it is the tree of glory on which almighty God suffered for mankind's many sins
 100 and Adam's ancient deeds.
 Death He tasted there, yet the Lord rose again with his great might to help mankind.
 He ascended into heaven. He will come again to this middle-earth to seek mankind 105 on doomsday, almighty God,
 the Lord himself and his angels with him,
 and He will judge—He has the power of judgment—
 each one of them as they have earned beforehand here in this loaned life.
 110 No one there may be unafraid
 at the words which the Ruler will speak:
 He will ask before the multitude where the man might be who for the Lord's name would taste bitter death, as He did earlier on that tree.
 115 But they will tremble then, and little think what they might even begin to say to Christ.
 But no one there need be very afraid who has borne in his breast the best of beacons;
 but through the cross shall seek the kingdom

120 every soul from this earthly way, whoever thinks to rest with the Ruler."

Then I prayed to the tree with a happy heart, eagerly, there where I was alone with little company. My spirit longed to start 125 on the journey forth; it has felt so much of longing. It is now my life's hope that I may seek the tree of victory alone, more often than all men, and honor it well. I wish for that 130 with all my heart, and my hope of protection is fixed on the cross. I have few wealthy friends on earth; they all have gone forth, fled from worldly joys and sought the King of glory;
 they live now in heaven with the High Father, 135 and dwell in glory, and each day I look forward to the time when the cross of the Lord,
 on which I have looked while here on this earth,
 will fetch me from this loaned life,
 and bring me where there is great bliss, 140 joy in heaven, where the Lord's host is seated at the feast, with ceaseless bliss;
 and then set me where I may afterwards dwell in glory, have a share of joy fully with the saints. May the Lord be my friend, 145 He who here on earth once suffered on the hanging-tree for human sin;
 He ransomed us and gave us life,
 a heavenly home. Hope was renewed with cheer and bliss for those who were burning there.¹ 150 The Son was successful in that journey, mighty and victorious, when he came with a multitude,
 a great host of souls, into God's kingdom,
 the one Ruler almighty, the angels rejoicing and all the saints already in heaven 155 dwelling in glory, when almighty God, their Ruler, returned to his rightful home.

—IOTH CENTURY

¹ Hope was renewed ... burning there A well-known Christian tradition known as the "Harrowing of Hell" tells how Jesus, after his death on the Cross, descended into Hell and broke open its gates, releasing the souls of those unjustly imprisoned by Satan since the Creation of human beings. He conveyed them to Heaven, then returned to earth in time for his resurrection.

rime. rade sƿ nethid' fnoctton ƿaƿu cƿaƿez ƿaƿe ƿaƿeƿ aton to ƿam beaƿan neƿe cunnon hƿezan ƿhyƿan ƿet ƿe hƿƿonƿ lœht uppe mid eƿelam aƿan moton aƿeum to gƿoce ƿonne ƿod ƿile ƿoƿdan lƿeƿ aƿe ƿe ƿƿican:

Hæt ic ƿƿaƿna cƿe ƿezan ƿille hæt mæge mæce
 to midƿe mæce eƿƿan ƿeƿd biƿid ƿeƿe ƿumdon.
 ƿuhte' mæ ƿet ic ƿe ƿaƿe ƿyllicƿe ƿaƿe on ƿe lœdan lœhte be ƿundri bœma beaƿhtƿeƿe aƿl ƿet beaƿti ƿaƿ be ƿoƿti mid ƿolde ƿimmar ƿeodon ƿaƿe æt ƿoldan ƿeatum. ƿƿleƿ ƿaƿ ƿƿe ƿeƿon uppe on ƿam eƿle ƿe ƿƿanne be hœlƿon ƿaƿ ægel dƿƿht nƿ aƿle ƿaƿe ƿuƿi ƿoƿd ƿe ƿeƿe neƿeƿ dƿi hƿu ƿuƿodeƿ ƿaƿe. æhine ƿaƿ be hœlƿon halƿe ƿaƿe mæ offi mœdan ƿaƿl ƿeƿ mæge ƿe ƿeƿe:
 Syllie ƿaƿ ƿe ƿeƿe bœm ƿe ƿynnũ ƿaƿ ƿoƿ ƿundod mid ƿomnũ ƿe ƿeƿe ic ƿuƿdƿeƿ ƿaƿe. ƿeƿum ƿeƿe ƿode ƿynnũ ƿeƿan ƿe ƿeƿe mid ƿolde ƿimmar hœƿon be ƿuƿht ƿeƿdlice ƿeƿdes ƿaƿe. ƿeƿeƿe ic ƿuƿi ƿeƿe ƿold on ƿeƿan mæht ƿeƿeƿe æƿeƿm ƿet hƿe æƿeƿe on ƿan ƿeƿeƿe on ƿa ƿeƿeƿe hœlƿe aƿle ƿaƿ mid ƿuƿum ƿeƿeƿe. ƿeƿeƿe ic ƿeƿe ƿoƿ ƿaƿe ƿeƿeƿe ƿe ƿeƿe ƿe ƿeƿe ic ƿeƿeƿe beaƿti.

EXETER BOOK RIDDLES

The Exeter Book ends with two groups of verse riddles. The manuscript is damaged and it is impossible to know how many riddles were in the original collection, but there may have been 100, following the model of the popular Latin Enigmata of Aldhelm and Symphosius. But apart from this speculation, there are few similarities between the Latin and English versions of this popular poetic genre. The Enigmata of Aldhelm were apparently used as classroom examples of the principles of Latin versification; it is unlikely (though not impossible) that the English Riddles would have served such a purpose for apprentice English poets. Moreover, very few of the English Riddles depend on the sort of deliberate obscurity common in the Enigmata—no. 86 is a rare example, but it is closely modeled on one of the Latin Riddles of Symphosius.

Apart from one Riddle which is found in an earlier version, there is little evidence for the origins and audience of the Riddles, either individually or collectively. Many of the Exeter Book Riddles echo one another's language, especially in the repeated closing line saga hwæt ic hatte "say what I am called," but it is unlikely that the whole collection was written by one person. A number of the Riddles seem to come from a bookish milieu, probably monastic (see nos. 26 and 47), and others are somewhat philosophical in tone (no. 43), but the presence of about a dozen riddles whose obscene double meanings seem out of place in a monastic setting (see nos. 44 and 45 below) still raises a few eyebrows. Unlike the Latin riddles, which give away their solution in their title, some of the Old English riddles are apparently meant to be genuinely puzzling and difficult to solve—in fact a few (such as no. 95 below) continue to baffle readers to this day.

In many cases, however, the pleasure of the Riddles seems to lie not in obscurity but in observation—they are in essence short lyric poems which show the world at a slightly odd angle, and bring the material and the natural world to new life through metaphor, analogy, wordplay, and misdirection. In the Riddles creatures speak, things express their point of view, everyday objects perform heroic deeds, and innocent household items become obscene projections of human desire. The playful language of the Riddles is a kind of lens through which the wonder, poignancy, and wild energy of the world are brought into focus. Whether they were written for education, inspiration, or amusement, the delight of the Riddles lies in their gift for seeing familiar things with fresh eyes, and compressing these insights in a few short lines which draw the listener into the process of that perception; they help remind us that the poetic landscape of Old English literature was not as gloomy, as pious, or as bloody as is sometimes thought.

Riddle 1¹

What man is so bold in mind and so clever that he can say who drives me on my way?

¹ Riddle 1 The following riddles have been translated by R.M. Liuzza for The Broadview Anthology of British Literature. Riddles 1–3 are printed as three separate Riddles in Krapp and Dobbie and in Muir, but in the manuscript they are treated as one text in three parts—or perhaps two texts (Riddle 1 and Riddles 2/3) in three parts—and are generally regarded as one long riddle by modern editors.

When I rise up strong and savage,
with a roar of thunder I wreak havoc,
5 I go about the earth fiercely, burning halls, ravaging buildings; the reek of smoke rises grey over the rooftops, clamor and terror fall among men. When I shake the forest,
I fell the trees bright with ripe fruit;
10 roofed with water, I am hurled on my way,
driven far and wide by mighty forces.

What once protected people on land
 I bear on my back, bodies and souls tossed in the sea. Say what shrouds me, or what I am called, who carries such cargo?

(Riddle 2)

At times I travel under the thronging waves, where no one sees me, seek the depths of the ocean floor. The sea is angry, flecked with foam,¹
 the whale's home roars and howls.
 Streams beat the shore, hurling waves of stone and sand and sea and seaweed onto the steep shingle, when I struggle beneath the waves, stirring the bottom of the broad sea-bed. I cannot break free from the sea's protection until He permits it, my guide in all my journeys. O wise man, say who draws me from the sea's embrace,
 when the streams again grow still and the waves calm that once covered me.

(Riddle 3)

Sometimes my lord constrains me closely, pushes me down under the deep bosom
 of the broad plain, and brings me to bay, presses my mighty power into a dark hole, cramped and small, where the earth sits hard on my back.² I have no escape from that terror, even though I could shake the very pillars of the earth—make palaces tremble, buildings totter, walls tumble down crashing on their heads. The air seems calm across the earth, the sea quiet and still,
 until I come heaving up out of the ground,

¹ flecked with foam There is no gap in the manuscript here, but a half-line seems to be missing.

² where the earth sits hard on my back This passage reflects the widespread early belief that earthquakes were caused by subterranean winds.

just as He guides me, who in the beginning first put me in bondage, fastened 45 fetters and chains; I can never break free from the power that points out my path.

Sometimes I swoop down and stir up the sea from above, drive to the shore
 the flint-grey flood; the foaming waves 50 batter the wall, black dunes rise from the deep; dark in its tracks comes another surge, driven by the sea, until together they rush against the high ridges along the shoreline, with the groans of ships 55 and the cries of sailors. The steep stone crags silently await the battering storms,
 the crash of arms, when the crushing sea crowds the cliffs. A boat can expect bitter struggle, if the sea catches it 60 in that grim season with all souls on board, until it comes, driven out of control,
 ransacked of life, to ride the foam on the waves' back. I bring terror to the race of men, when I rampage³ 65 on my savage way. Who will stop me?

Sometimes I rush, the dark rain-clouds riding on my back; I scatter them wide, sea-soaked, then let them slip back together again. Great is the roar, 70 a mighty scream bellowing from the cities,
 when the clouds crash sharp together,
 scraping edge upon edge. Shadowy spirits hurrying spew sparks of flames
 over the earth, clashing clamor 75 spreads dark over men with a dire din, goes forth fighting, and lets fall
 the dim, pounding, drumming deluge from its belly. The battle rages on, a great and terrible troop of horsemen, 80 a mighty fear rises in the hearts of men,
 panic in the cities, when that sliding demon

³ to the race of men, when I rampage This line lacks alliteration in the original and is probably corrupt, or else something is missing here.

shoots his sharp gleaming arrows.

Only a fool does not fear those deadly spears—
and yet he too dies, if the true Creator 85 lets fly his fiery darts from the whirlwind, straight from above, sends his arrows through the slashing rain. Few survive who are touched by the tempest's deadly weapon.

I start that strife and stand at its head, 90 when I set my course in the crowded clouds, move my mighty strength through the throng over the breast of the sea. Crowding in battle, the high storm bursts when I bend down again
close to the ground under the covering of the sky, 95 and load on my back the burden I must bear commanded by the Creator's almighty power.

And so, a mighty servant, I struggle—at times under the earth, at times I dive deep below the waves, at times above the sea 100 I stir up the streams, at times I ascend and trouble the clouds, I travel widely, violent and swift. Say what I am called,
or who raises me when I cannot rest,
or who steadies me when I become still.

Riddle 7

My garment is silent when I tread the ground,
or dwell in towns, or stir the seas,
Sometimes my raiment raises me up and the high air, over the homes of men, 5 and when the strength of the wind sends me far above mankind, my adornments
resound in song, ring out loudly, sing out clear when I am untouched
by land or sea, a traveling spirit.

Riddle 14

Once was a warrior's weapon, but now
I a young man has wound me in twisted wires of gold and silver. Sometimes men kiss me;
sometimes I summon willing companions
5 to battle; sometimes a steed bears me across the borders; sometimes a sea-horse brings me, bright treasure, over the ocean.
Sometimes a woman adorned with rings fills my bosom; sometimes on the boards
10 I lie—hard, headless, and plundered.
Sometimes I hang shining on a wall, decorated and adorned, where men drink—noble war-gear. Sometimes the warriors take me on horseback, and then treasure-clad, 15 I breathe in the breath of a soldier's breast.
Sometimes my song summons proud warriors to share wine; sometimes in anger
my voice saves what is stolen, puts foes to flight. Say what I am called.

Riddle 26

Some strong enemy snatched my life,
S deprived me of strength and soaked me,
drenched me in water, dragged me away,
set me in the sun, where I soon lost 5 all the hair I had. The hard edge, clean-ground blade of a knife cut me,
then fingers folded, then the bird's delight with swift drops darting again and again over the dark brim swallowed wood-dye, 10 streamed across me and stopped again, left a dark path. Protecting boards were wrapped around me, stretched with skin, gleaming gold; there glittered upon me¹
the splendid work of smiths, fine-woven wire.
15 Now the adornments and the red dye and the precious settings widely proclaim

¹ glittered upon me The Old English word gliwedon literally means “played” like a musical instrument. Some editors see a metaphor here—the sparkle of sunlight on gold like the sound of music—while others want to emend to glisnedon, “glittered.”

the Protector of men—the fool cannot fault it.¹
 If the sons of men will make use of me
 they will be safer and more certain of victory, bolder in heart, happier in mind,
 wiser in spirit; they will find more friends,
 nearer and dearer, truer, more devoted,
 kinder and more loyal, who will increase honor and wealth, give them generously all benefits, and in a loving embrace clasp them close. Say what I am called, needful to men; my name is glorious,
 a help to heroes, and holy in myself.

Riddle 43

I know a noble guest within the gates, whom great men love. Grim hunger cannot harm him, nor hot thirst, nor illness or age. If the servant treats him well, who must go with him on his journey, then food and joy they will find ready for them at home—but countless children of sorrow, if the servant
 obeys his lord and master badly on the journey. A brother ought not fear his brother—that harms them both,
 when they both spring from the same bosom
 of one kinswoman, keen and bright, mother and sister. Let the man who wishes reveal with noble words how the guest and servant I speak of here are called.

Riddle 44

A marvelous thing hangs by a man's thigh, under his tunic. There's a hole at the tip;
 it's stiff and strong and set in a good place.
 When a young lord lifts his cloak

¹ the fool cannot fault it The Old English says nalas dolwite, which might mean “not at all the pain of a wound” (i.e., the object is decorated like a hero, not wounded and scarred like a shield, another leather-covered wooden object). The translation assumes the reading is nalas dol wite, “by no means should a fool find fault.”

over his knees, there's a well-known hole
 he hopes to greet with the head of his dangler, one he has often filled with its full length.

Riddle 45

Something's swelling over in the corner,
 rising and standing, raising its cover.
 A haughty bride grabbed that boneless thing with her hands, and the prince's daughter slipped that swelling thing under a cloth.

Riddle 47

A moth ate words. A marvelous fate it seemed to me, when I heard of that wonder, that a worm could swallow some man's song,
 a thief in the dark, tales of glory and their firm foundation. That thieving guest was none the wiser for swallowing those words.

Riddle 85

My hall is not silent, but I am not loud around ... the Lord shaped us² for the same journey. I am swifter, sometimes stronger; he is more lasting.
 Sometimes I rest while he runs on;
 as long as I live I dwell in him,
 if we are separated, my death is certain.

Riddle 86

A creature came to a council of men
 where many sat, wise in mind.
 He had one eye and two ears,
 two feet, twelve hundred heads,
 a back and belly and two hands,

² around ... the Lord shaped us There is no gap in the manuscript, but something is missing here.

arms and shoulders, one neck,
and two sides—say what I'm called.

Riddle 95

I am a noble thing, known to men,
often I rest with rich and wretched, world-renowned. I roam widely,
and on me—once foreign, now friendly—5 rests the ravager's joy. If I am to have joy in the cities or shining success, men of wisdom most dearly love
my society; I will show wisdom to many, with no words 10 spoken at all. Though the sons of men who dwell on earth eagerly seek my trail, I hide my tracks from time to time from every man.
—?IOTH CENTURY

(Solutions to riddles: 1 Wind/Storm; 7 Swan; 14
Horn; 26 Bible; 43 Soul and Body; 44 Penis or Key;
45 Penis or Dough; 47 Book-Moth; 85 Fish and River;
86 A One-Eyed Seller of Garlic; 95 Book? Moon?
Riddle?)

BEOWULF

Only one copy of the Old English poem that modern editors call Beowulf has survived, and it is likely that it has survived only by accident. A manuscript containing Beowulf and a small collection of other texts—a poetic treatment of the deuterocanonical Old Testament story of Judith, a prose life of St Christopher, and two treatises of fantastical geography now known as The Wonders of the East and Alexander's Letter to Aristotle—was copied by two scribes, probably in the decade after 1000, in a monastic center somewhere in the south of England. It is an eclectic anthology containing prose and verse, hagiography and secular heroism, oriental and biblical and Germanic lore; its contents baffle our modern expectations of genre. The texts are from different sources, and the prose pieces are all translations of Latin works. What unites them, apparently, is an interest in monsters and marvels, faraway places and long-distant ages, and fantastic beings of extraordinary size; in his 1995 book, Orchard described its contents as “Pride and Prodigies.” Whatever its original purpose or audience, the book fell into obscurity in the centuries after the Norman Conquest in 1066, and its later history is unknown until 1563, when the English antiquary Laurence Nowell (c. 1515–71) signed his name on the first page of St. Christopher. The Nowell Codex, as it is sometimes called, later came into the library of the collector Sir Robert Cotton (1571–1631); the present-day shelfmark of the manuscript (British Library MS Cotton Vitellius A. xv) recalls the arrangement of Cotton’s library, in which books were stored in shelves surmounted by busts of Roman emperors. Cotton bound the manuscript with an unrelated twelfth-century copy of Augustine’s Soliloquies and other works. In 1731, while Cotton’s collection was stored at Ashburnham House in Westminster awaiting donation to the future British Museum, a disastrous fire damaged or destroyed hundreds of volumes and nearly consumed the Beowulf manuscript as well.

Apart from a notice in an early manuscript catalog by Humphrey Wanley in 1705, it was not until the end of the eighteenth century that scholars began to appreciate the contents of this scorched and charred manuscript. The romantic nationalism of the time expected—indeed, more or less required—that at the beginning of every great nation’s literature would stand a national epic analogous to the Greek Iliad. The French had the Chanson de Roland, the Germans the Nibelungenlied; Beowulf, the earliest full-length heroic poem in any Germanic language, was claimed by the English (because of its language), the Danes (because of its subject), and the Germans (because of its setting in the pre-Christian north). The first printed notice of the poem, along with some badly translated passages, was in Sharon Turner’s second edition of his History of the Anglo-Saxons (1805), where it is called “a composition most curious and important. . . . [I]t may be called an Anglo-Saxon epic poem.” In 1787 a copyist who was probably commissioned by the scholar Grímur Thorkelin (1752–1829), an Icelander in the service of Denmark, made a transcription of the poem; later Thorkelin himself went to the British Museum to make another. Like Turner, Thorkelin’s inability to read Old English did not prevent him from admiring Beowulf. He was convinced that the poem was originally composed in Danish, even though it survived in an English translation, and that its author had been an eyewitness to the funeral of the hero Beowulf, which he placed in the year 340. These theories are nonsense, but Thorkelin’s transcripts are still invaluable evidence for many readings now lost from the crumbling edges of the manuscript’s pages.

Although, like other Old English poems, Beowulf is copied on its manuscript pages from margin to margin like prose, the poem consists of 3,182 extant lines of alliterative verse, divided into 43 numbered sections of varying length with an unnumbered prologue. Its language is allusive and embellished and its plot complex and digressive, but its story is relatively straightforward. The Danish king Hrothgar, descendant of the legendary Scyld, has built a magnificent hall Heorot, but the hall is invaded night after night by a marauding beast named Grendel (sec. 1–2). A young warrior of the tribe of the Geats named Beowulf hears of Hrothgar's troubles and comes to his rescue; after a series of challenges and boasts he faces Grendel unarmed, and tears off the monster's arm in a wild wrestling match (3–12). Celebration is lively but short-lived; the next night the monster's mother attacks the hall in revenge for the death of her son, killing one of Hrothgar's most trusted retainers (13–19). Undaunted, Beowulf follows her tracks to an underwater lair and, after a difficult fight, kills her with an extraordinary sword that he finds in her cave (20–23). He returns to the Danish hall to much praise, celebration, and gift-giving; soon he returns to his native land and recounts his adventures to his own king and uncle Hygelac (24–31).

The story of Beowulf follows the narrative patterns of a folktale: a hero who quests and fights in isolation from friends and family, fabulous battles against monstrous foes, the theme of a young man who was thought to be lazy (lines 2183–89) but later becomes a mighty hero, even the concatenation of three challenges in ascending order of difficulty. The fabulous outlines of the story equally recall the broad brushstrokes of myth: the mighty Beowulf may be a distant echo of Thor; his descent into the mere may dimly depict a shamanistic initiation; his death may contain a hint of Ragnarok, the northern apocalypse. Beowulf, then, appears to be a reflex of an ancient and universal plot.

Whatever its underlying structural patterns, Beowulf is neither myth nor folktale; its stories of dragon-slaying and nocturnal struggles are set against a complex background of legendary history. The action of the poem unfolds on a roughly recognizable map of Scandinavia: Hrothgar's hall Heorot has been plausibly placed in the village of Lejre on the Danish island of Zealand, and we may tentatively identify Beowulf's tribe of Geats with the historical Gautar of southern Sweden. The mythical figure of Scyld soon yields to the historical figure of Hrothgar, and a number of the poem's characters—among them Heremod, Hrothgar, Ingeld, and Hygelac—are mentioned in other sources and were certainly regarded as figures of history rather than fable. The Frankish historian Gregory of Tours (d. 594) mentions the disastrous raid of Hygelac (whom he calls Chlochilaicus and describes as a Danish king) and dates it around the year 520. And, like its characters and setting, the concerns of the poem are historical. Behind the drama of isolated hand-to-hand encounters against monstrous adversaries, Beowulf is an intensely political poem; the poet is as intrigued by Danish diplomacy and the bitter feud between the Geats and Swedes as he is by the hero's battles. Kingdoms and successions, alliances and truces, loyalties and the tragically transient stability of heroic society are the poem's somber subtext, a theme traced less in the clashes of the battlefield than in the patterns of marriage and kin, in stories remembered and retold, in allusion and digression and pointed foreshadowing.

Whatever historical interests may be found in Beowulf, however, it is difficult to read the poem with anything like a modern expectation of historical accuracy. Like many medieval works, Beowulf is frustratingly ambivalent—it is not quite mythical enough to be read apart from the history it purports to contain, nor historical enough to furnish clear evidence for the past it poetically recreates. The action of the poem is set in a somewhat vague heroic geardagum (“bygone days,” line 1), an age not meant to be counted on a calendar, nor its kingdoms and tribes marked on a map; nor, undoubtedly, were the monstrous races of Grendels and dragons so clearly distinct in the poet's mind from the real dangers of the real world just beyond the margins of the known. While medieval authors certainly made distinctions between historia and fabula, the boundaries between these terms are not nearly as impermeable as those of our modern categories “history” and “fable.”

Both the ultimate and the proximate origins of Beowulf are unknown. Most scholars assume that the surviving manuscript is a copy of an earlier written text and is probably the last in a long chain of copies. Moreover, the poem begins with the assumption that we are hearing a familiar story, or at least a story from a familiar milieu: “We have heard of the glory ... of the folk-kings of the spear-Danes” (We Gar-Dena ... þeodcyninga þrym gefrunon), the poet asserts, and his cryptic allusions throughout the poem suggest that his audience was already familiar with a larger repertoire of songs and stories of kings and heroes.

There is a great deal at stake in the arguments over the poem's origins. Beowulf will be read differently if it is imagined to have been produced in the time of Bede (c. 725) or Alfred (c. 880) or Ælfric (c. 1000). The earlier we think the poem to be, the more potentially authentic its historical material; a later Beowulf, more openly fictional, is a more complex and "literary" work. Moreover, the more closely we try to assign a date and place of origin to the poem, the more closely we must read it as a text, the intention of a single author or a reflection of a particular ideology, rather than a product of an oral poetic art whose composition may have been collective and whose traditional roots are beyond discovery.

Most critics agree that the heroic action of the poem is thoroughly accommodated to a Christian paradigm; they disagree, however, on the meaning and purpose of that accommodation. Beowulf is a secular Christian poem about pagans that avoids the easy alternatives of automatic condemnation or enthusiastic anachronism. While early scholars tried to find a single source for the poem's complex and peculiar texture—whether in pure Germanic paganism or orthodox Augustinian Christianity—more recent work recognizes that Beowulf, like the culture of the Anglo-Saxons themselves, reflects a variety of interdependent and competing influences and attitudes, even a certain tension inherent in the combination of biblical, patristic, secular Latin, and popular Germanic material. The search for a single "audience" of Beowulf, and with it a sense of a single meaning, has given way to a recognition of a plurality of readers and interests in Anglo-Saxon England.

The author of the poem (for the sake of argument, let us say the person who was responsible for its commitment to parchment) was certainly a Christian: the technology of writing in the Anglo-Saxon period was almost entirely confined to monastic scriptoria. The manuscript in which Beowulf is preserved contains a saint's legend and a versified Bible story. Moreover the poet indicates a clear familiarity with the Bible and expects the same from his audience. Though the paganism of Beowulf's world is downplayed, however, it is not denied; his world is connected to that of the audience but separated by the gulf of conversion as much as by the seas of migration.

Beowulf seeks to explore both the bridges and the chasms between the pagan past and the Christian present; it teaches secular readers how to be pious, moral, and thoughtful about their own history, mindful of fame and courage while aware of its limitations and dangers. The poem is a Christian author's imaginative recreation of a pagan mentality, similar in some respects to Bede's eloquent simile of the sparrow, which he places in the mouth of one of King Edwin's retainers in the Ecclesiastical History I.30—the warm but fleeting pleasures of life are placed against the somber background of its ultimate meaninglessness, and without the hope of conversion or salvation all that is available to make sense of the world are courage, honor, and a stoical acceptance of one's fate, whether good or bad.

Beowulf, lines 1–21
(British Library, Ms Cotton Vitellius A.xv, fol. 129r).

*Beowulf*¹

PROLOGUE

Listen!

We have heard of the glory in bygone days of the folk-kings of the spear-Danes,²
how those noble lords did lofty deeds.

Often Scyld Scefing³ seized the mead-benches
from many tribes, troops of enemies,
struck fear into earls. Though he first was found a waif, he awaited solace for that—
he—grew under heaven and prospered in honor
until every one of the encircling nations
over the whale's-riding⁴ had to obey him,
grant him tribute. That was a good king!
A boy was later born to him,
young in the courts, whom God sent
as a solace to the people—he saw their need,
the dire distress they had endured, lordless,
for such a long time. The Lord of Life,
Wielder of Glory, gave him worldly honor;
Beowulf,⁵ the son of Scyld, was renowned,
his fame spread wide in Scandinavian lands.
Thus should a young man bring about good
with pious gifts from his father's possessions,
so that later in life loyal comrades
will stand beside him when war comes,
the people will support him—with praiseworthy deeds
a man will prosper among any people.

Scyld passed away at his appointed hour,
the mighty lord went into the Lord's keeping;

¹ Beowulf This translation is by R.M. Liuzza from the edition published by Broadview Press.

² spear-Danes The Danes are described by many different epithets in the poem; see the Glossary of Proper Names for further instances.

³ Scyld Scefing The name means "Shield, Son of Sheaf (i.e., of grain)." The mysterious origins of Scyld, who seems to arrive providentially from nowhere and is returned to the sea after his death, have occasioned much critical speculation.

⁴ whale's-riding A condensed descriptive image of the sea—the riding-place of whales. Elsewhere the sea is the "gannet's bath" and the "swan's riding."

⁵ Beowulf Not the monster-slaying hero of the title, but an early Danish king. Many scholars argue that the original name was Beow.

they bore him down to the brimming sea, his dear comrades, as he himself had commanded while the friend of the Scyldings⁶ wielded speech—that dear land-ruler had long held power.
In the harbor stood a ring-prowed ship,
icy, outbound, a nobleman's vessel;
there they laid down their dear lord,
dispenser of rings, in the bosom of the ship,
glorious, by the mast. There were many treasures loaded there, adornments from distant lands;
I have never heard of a more lovely ship bedecked with battle-weapons and war-gear, blades and byrnies.⁷ In its bosom lay many treasures, which were to travel far with him into the keeping of the flood.
With no fewer gifts did they furnish him there,
the wealth of nations, than those did who at his beginning first sent him forth alone over the waves while still a small child.⁸
Then they set a golden ensign high over his head, and let the waves have him, gave him to the sea with grieving spirits, mournful in mind. Men do not know how to say truly—not trusted counselors,
nor heroes under the heavens—who received that cargo.

I

Then Beowulf Scylding, beloved king, was famous in the strongholds of his folk for a long while—his father having passed away, a lord from earth—until after him arose
the great Healfdene, who held the glorious Scyldings all his life, ancient and fierce in battle.
Four children, all counted up,
were born to that bold leader of hosts:
Heorogar, Hrothgar, and Halga the Good,

⁶ Scyldings The Danes, "sons of Scyld."

⁷ byrnies Coat of ring-mail.

⁸ With no fewer ... small child Scyld was found destitute—this statement is an example of litotes, or ironic understatement, not uncommon in Anglo-Saxon poetry.

I heard that ...¹ was Onela's queen,
dear bedfellow of the Battle-Scylfing.

Then success in war was given to Hrothgar, 65 honor in battle, so that his beloved kinsmen eagerly served him, until the young soldiers grew into a mighty troop of men. It came to his mind that he should order a hall-building, have men make a great mead-house
70 which the sons of men should remember forever,² and there within he would share everything with young and old that God had given him, except for the common land and the lives of men.
Then the work, as I've heard, was widely proclaimed 75 to many nations throughout this middle-earth, to come adorn the folk-stead. It came to pass swiftly among men, and it was soon ready, the greatest of halls; he gave it the name "Heorot,"³
he whose words were heeded far and wide.
80 He remembered his boast; he gave out rings, treasure at table. The hall towered high and horn-gabled—it awaited hostile fires, the surges of war; the time was not yet at hand
when the sword-hate of sworn in-laws
85 should arise after ruthless violence.⁴

A bold demon who waited in darkness wretchedly suffered all the while,
for every day he heard the joyful din
loud in the hall, with the harp's sound, 90 the clear song of the scop.⁵ He who knew how to tell the ancient tale of the origin of men

¹ ... A name is missing from the manuscript here; it has been conjectured from parallel sources that it should be Yrse, or Ursula. The Swedish ("Scylfing") king Onela appears later in the story, causing much distress to Beowulf's nation.

² a great ... forever Or "a greater mead-hall / than the sons of men had ever heard of." The reading adopted here is that of Mitchell and Robinson.

³ Heorot "Hart." An object recovered from the burial-mound at Sutton Hoo, perhaps a royal insignia, is surmounted by the image of a hart.

⁴ it awaited ... violence The hall Heorot is apparently fated to be destroyed in a battle between Hrothgar and his son-in-law Ingeld the Heathobard, a conflict predicted by Beowulf in 2024–69. The battle itself happens outside the action of the poem.

⁵ scop Poet-singer. This is the first of several self-reflexive scenes of poetic entertainment in the poem.

said that the Almighty created the earth,
a bright and shining plain, by seas embraced,
and set, triumphantly, the sun and moon 95 to light their beams for those who dwell on land, adorned the distant corners of the world with leaves and branches, and made life also,
all manner of creatures that live and move.
—Thus this lordly people lived in joy, 100 blessedly, until one began to work his foul crimes—a fiend from hell.
This grim spirit was called Grendel, mighty stalker of the marches, who held the moors and fens; this miserable man 105 lived for a time in the land of giants, after the Creator had condemned him
among Cain's race—when he killed Abel
the eternal Lord avenged that death.⁶
No joy in that feud—the Maker forced him 110 far from mankind for his foul crime.
From thence arose all misbegotten things,
trolls and elves and the living dead,
and also the giants who strove against God for a long while⁷—He gave them their reward for that.

2

115 When night descended he went to seek out the high house, to see how the Ring-Danes had bedded down after their beer-drinking.
He found therein a troop of nobles asleep after the feast; they knew no sorrow or human misery. The unholy creature, 120 grim and ravenous, was ready at once, ruthless and cruel, and took from their rest thirty thanes;⁸ thence he went rejoicing in his booty, back to his home, 125 to seek out his abode with his fill of slaughter.

⁶ Cain's race ... that death The story of Cain and Abel is told in Genesis 4.1–16.

⁷ misbegotten things ... long while The poet lists a collection of Germanic, classical, and biblical horrors; all are ultimately traced to their biblical roots, though the characters in the poem are not aware of this.

⁸ thanes A "thane" is a retainer, one of the troop of companions surrounding a heroic king in Germanic literature.

When in the dim twilight just before dawn
 Grendel's warfare was made known to men,
 then lamentation was lifted up after the feasting, a great morning-sound. Unhappy sat
 the mighty lord, long-good nobleman;
 he suffered greatly, grieved for his thanes,
 once they beheld that hostile one's tracks,
 the accursed spirit; that strife was too strong,
 loathsome and long.

It was no long wait,
 but the very next night he committed a greater murder, mourned not at all for his feuds and sins—he was too fixed in them.
 Then it was easy to find a thane
 who sought his rest elsewhere, farther away, a bed in the outbuildings,¹ when they pointed out—truly announced with clear tokens—that hall-thane's hate; he who escaped the fiend held himself afterwards farther away and safer.
 So he ruled, and strove against right,
 one against all, until empty stood the best of houses. And so it was for a great while—for twelve long winters the lord of the Scyldings suffered his grief, every sort of woe, great sorrow, when to the sons of men
 it became known, and carried abroad in sad tales, that Grendel strove long with Hrothgar, bore his hatred, sins and feuds, for many seasons,
 perpetual conflict; he wanted no peace with any man of the Danish army,
 nor ceased his deadly hatred, nor settled with money,
 nor did any of the counselors need to expect bright compensation from the killer's hands,² for the great ravager relentlessly stalked, a dark death-shadow, lurked and struck old and young alike, in perpetual night held the misty moors. Men do not know whither such whispering demons wander about.

Thus the foe of mankind, fearsome and solitary,
 often committed his many crimes,
 cruel humiliations; he occupied Heorot,
 the jewel-adorned hall, in the dark nights—
 he saw no need to salute the throne,
 he scorned the treasures; he did not know their love.³
 That was deep misery to the lord of the Danes, crushing his spirit. Many a strong man sat in secret counsel, considered advice, what would be best for the brave at heart
 to save themselves from the sudden attacks.
 At times they offered honor to idols at pagan temples, prayed aloud that the soul-slayer⁴ might offer assistance in the country's distress. Such was their custom, the hope of heathens—they remembered hell
 in their minds, they did not know the Maker,
 the Judge of deeds, they did not know the Lord God,
 or even how to praise the heavenly Protector, Wielder of glory. Woe unto him who must thrust his soul through wicked force in the fire's embrace, expect no comfort, no way to change at all! It shall be well for him who can seek the Lord after his deathday and find security in the Father's embrace.

3

With the sorrows of that time the son of Healfdene seethed constantly; nor could the wise hero turn aside his woe—too great was the strife, long and loathsome, which befell that nation,
 violent, grim, cruel, greatest of night-evils.

Then from his home the thane of Hygelac,⁵

¹ outbuildings Hrothgar's hall is apparently surrounded by smaller buildings, including the women's quarters (see lines 662–65, 920–24). Under normal circumstances the men sleep together in the hall, ready for battle (1239–50).

² bright compensation from the killer's hands Germanic and Anglo-Saxon law allowed that a murderer could make peace with the family of his victim by paying compensation, or wergild. The amount of compensation varied with the rank of the victim.

³ Thus the foe . . . love This is a much-disputed passage; my reading follows a suggestion made by Fred C. Robinson in "Why Is Grendel's Not Greeting the giftstol a wrac micel?" and repeated in Mitchell and Robinson's Beowulf.

⁴ soul-slayer I.e., the Devil. In the Middle Ages the gods of the pagans were often regarded as demons in disguise.

⁵ Hygelac The hero is not named until more than a hundred lines later. Hygelac is his uncle and king. (Referred to as Chlochilaicus and described as a Danish king by Gregory Tours [d. 594], it is likely that Hygelac was a familiar historical figure.)

195 a good man among the Geats, heard of Grendel's deeds—he was of mankind the strongest of might
 in those days of this life,
 noble and mighty. He commanded to be made a good wave-crosser, said that he would seek out 200 that war-king over the swan's-riding,
 the renowned prince who was in need of men.
 Wise men did not dissuade him at all from that journey, though he was dear to them;
 they encouraged his bold spirit, inspected the omens.
 205 From the Geatish nation that good man had chosen the boldest champions, the best he could find; as one of fifteen he sought the sea-wood. A wise sailor showed the way to the edge of the shore.
 210 The time came—the craft was on the waves, moored under the cliffs. Eager men climbed on the prow—the currents eddied, sea against sand—the soldiers bore
 into the bosom of the ship their bright gear, 215 fine polished armor; the men pushed off
 on their wished-for journey in that wooden vessel.
 Over the billowing waves, urged by the wind,
 the foamy-necked floater flew like a bird,
 until in due time on the second day 220 the curved-prowed vessel had come so far that the seafarers sighted land, shining shore-cliffs, steep mountains,
 wide headlands—then the waves were crossed,
 the journey at an end. Thence up quickly 225 the people of the Weders¹ climbed onto the plain, moored their ship, shook out their mail-shirts, their battle-garments; they thanked God
 that the sea-paths had been smooth for them.

230 When from the wall the Scyldings' watchman, whose duty it was to watch the sea-cliffs,
 saw them bear down the gangplank bright shields,
 ready battle-gear, he was bursting with curiosity
 in his mind to know who these men were.
 Thisthane of Hrothgar rode his horse 235 down to the shore, and shook mightily his strong spear, and spoke a challenge:

“What are you, warriors in armor, wearing coats of mail, who have come thus sailing over the sea-road in a tall ship, 240 hither over the waves? Long have I been the coast-warden, and kept sea-watch so that no enemies with fleets and armies should ever attack the land of the Danes.
 Never more openly have there ever come 245 shield-bearers here, nor have you heard any word of leave from our warriors or consent of kinsmen. I have never seen a greater earl on earth than that one among you,
 a man in war-gear; that is no mere courtier, 250 honored only in weapons—unless his looks belie him, his noble appearance! Now I must know your lineage, lest you go hence as false spies, travel further into Danish territory. Now, you sea-travelers 255 from a far-off land, listen to my simple thought—the sooner the better, you must make clear from whence you have come.”

4

The eldest one answered him,
 leader of the troop, unlocked his word-hoard:
 260 “We are men of the Geatish nation and Hygelac's hearth-companions.
 My father was well-known among men,
 a noble commander named Ecgtheow;
 he saw many winters before he passed away, 265 ancient, from the court; nearly everyone throughout the world remembers him well.
 With a friendly heart have we come seeking your lord, the son of Healfdene, guardian of his people; be of good counsel to us!
 270 We have a great mission to that famous man, ruler of the Danes; nor should any of it be hidden, I think. You know, if things are as we have truly heard tell,
 that among the Scyldings some sort of enemy, 275 a hidden evildoer, in the dark nights makes known his terrible mysterious violence, shame and slaughter. With a generous spirit

¹Weders I.e., the Geats.

I can counsel Hrothgar, advise him how,
 wise old king, he may overcome this fiend—
 if a change should ever come for him,
 a remedy for the evil of his afflictions,
 and his seething cares turn cooler;
 or else forever afterwards a time of anguish
 he shall suffer, his sad necessity, while there stands in its high place the best of houses.”

The watchman spoke, as he sat on his horse,
 a fearless officer: “A sharp shield-warrior must be a judge of both things,
 words and deeds, if he would think well.
 I understand that to the Scylding lord
 you are a friendly force. Go forth, and bear weapons and armor—I shall guide your way;
 and I will command my young companions to guard honorably against all enemies your ship, newly-tarred, upon the sand, to watch it until the curved-necked wood bears hence across the ocean-streams
 a beloved man to the borders of the Weders—and such of these good men as will be granted that they survive the storm of battle.”
 They set off—their vessel stood still,
 the roomy ship rested in its riggings, fast at anchor. Boar-figures shone over gold-plated cheek-guards,¹ gleaming, fire-hardened; they guarded the lives of the grim battle-minded. The men hastened, marched together, until they could make out the timbered hall, splendid and gold-adorned—the most famous building among men under the heavens—where the high king waited;
 its light shone over many lands.
 Their brave guide showed them the bright court of the mighty ones, so that they might go straight to it; that fine soldier wheeled his horse and spoke these words:
 “Time for me to go. The almighty Father guard you in his grace, safe in your journeys! I must to the sea, and hold my watch against hostile hordes.”

5

320 The road was stone-paved, the path led the men together. Their mail-coats shone hard, hand-linked, bright rings of iron rang out on their gear, when right to the hall
 they went trooping in their terrible armor.
 325 Sea-weary, they set their broad shields, wondrously-hard boards, against the building’s wall;
 they sat on a bench—their byrnies rang out,
 their soldiers’ war-gear; their spears stood,
 the gear of the seamen all together, 330 a gray forest of ash. That iron troop was worthy of its weapons.

Then a proud warrior²
 asked those soldiers about their ancestry:
 “From whence do you carry those covered shields,
 gray coats of mail and grim helmets, 335 this troop of spears? I am herald and servant to Hrothgar; never have I seen so many foreign men so fearless and bold.
 For pride, I expect, and not for exile,
 and for greatness of heart you have sought out Hrothgar.” 340 The courageous one answered him, proud prince of the Weders, spoke words hardy in his helmet: “We are Hygelac’s board-companions—Beowulf is my name.
 I wish to explain my errand 345 to the son of Healfdene, famous prince,
 your lord, if he will allow us,
 in his goodness, to greet him.”
 Wulfgar spoke—a prince of the Wendels, his noble character was known to many, 350 his valor and wisdom: “I will convey to the friend of the Danes, lord of the Scyldings, giver of rings, what you have requested,
 tell the famous prince of your travels,
 and then quickly announce to you the answer
 355 which that good man sees fit to give me.”

¹ Boar-figures ... cheek-guards The boar was a sacred animal in Germanic mythology; in his Germania the Roman historian Tacitus mentions warriors wearing boar-images into battle (ch. 45). Images of boars were placed on helmets to protect the wearer from the “bite” of a sword, which was often quasi-personified as a serpent. Archaeologists have unearthed several Anglo-Saxon helmets with various kinds of boar-images on them.

² proud warrior Later identified as Wulfgar.

He hastily returned to where Hrothgar sat
 old and gray-haired, with his band of earls;
 he went boldly, stood by the shoulder
 of the Danish king—he knew the noble custom.
 360 Wulfgar spoke to his friend and lord:
 “There have arrived here over the sea’s expanse,
 come from afar, men of the Geats;
 the chief among them the warriors call Beowulf. They bring a request, 365 my lord, that they might be allowed to exchange words with you—do not refuse them your reply, gracious Hrothgar!
 In their war-trappings they seem worthy of noble esteem; notable indeed is that chief 370 who has shown these soldiers the way hither.”

6

Hrothgar spoke, protector of the Scyldings:
 “I knew him when he was nothing but a boy—
 his old father was called Ecgtheow, to whom Hrethel the Geat¹ gave in marriage 375 his only daughter; now his daring son has come here, sought a loyal friend.
 Seafarers, in truth, have said to me,
 those who brought to the Geats gifts and money
 as thanks, that he has thirty 380 men’s strength, strong in battle, in his handgrip. Holy God
 in His grace has guided him to us, to the West-Danes, as I would hope, against Grendel’s terror. To this good man 385 I shall offer treasures for his true daring.
 Be hasty now, bid them enter to see this troop of kinsmen all assembled;
 and tell them in your words that they are welcome to the Danish people.”

390 He announced from within:²
 “My conquering lord commands me to tell you,

ruler of the East-Danes, that he knows your ancestry,
 and you are to him, hardy spirits,
 welcome hither from across the rolling waves.
 395 Now you may go in your war-gear
 under your helmets to see Hrothgar, but let your battle-shields and deadly spears await here the result of your words.”

The mighty one arose, and many a man with him, 400 powerful thanes; a few waited there,
 guarded their battle-dress as the bold man bid them.
 They hastened together as the man led them,
 under Heorot’s roof; [the warrior went]³
 hardy in his helmet, until he stood on the hearth.
 405 Beowulf spoke—his byrnie gleamed on him,
 war-net sewn by the skill of a smith:
 “Be well, Hrothgar! I am Hygelac’s kinsman and young retainer; in my youth I have done many glorious deeds. This business with Grendel 410 was made known to me on my native soil;
 seafarers say that this building stands,
 most excellent of halls, idle and useless to every man, after evening’s light is hidden under heaven’s gleaming dome.
 415 Then my own people advised me,
 the best warriors and the wisest men,
 that I should, lord Hrothgar, seek you out,
 because they knew the might of my strength;
 they themselves had seen me, bloodstained from battle, 420 come from the fight, when I captured five,
 slew a tribe of giants, and on the salt waves fought sea-monsters by night, survived that tight spot, avenged the Weders’ affliction—they asked for trouble!—
 and crushed those grim foes; and now with Grendel, 425 that monstrous beast, I shall by myself have a word or two with that giant. From you now I wish, ruler of the Bright-Danes, to request a single favor, protector of the Scyldings, that you should not refuse, having come this far, 430 protector of warriors, noble friend to his people,— that I might alone, o my own band of earls
 and this hardy troop, cleanse Heorot.
 I have also heard that this evil beast
 in his wildness does not care for weapons,

¹ Hrethel the Geat Father of Hygelac and grandfather of Beowulf.

² people . . . within There is no gap in the manuscript, but the two halves of the line do not alliterate, and something is probably missing from the text at this point. Most editors add two half-lines with the sense “Then Wulfgar went to the door.”

³ [the warrior went] A half-line is missing; the translation follows the most innocuous conjecture.

so too will I scorn—so that Hygelac, my liege-lord, may be glad of me—
 to bear a sword or a broad shield,
 a yellow battle-board, but with my grip
 I shall grapple with the fiend and fight for life, foe against foe. Let him put his faith in the Lord's judgment, whom death takes!
 I expect that if he is allowed to win, he will eat unafraid the folk of the Geats in that war-hall, as he has often done, the host of the Hrethmen. You'll have no need to cover my head¹—he will have it, gory, bloodstained, if death bears me away;
 he will take his kill, think to taste me,
 will dine alone without remorse,
 stain his lair in the moor; no need to linger
 in sorrow over disposing of my body!
 Send on to Hygelac, if battle should take me,
 the best battledress, which my breast wears,
 finest of garments; it is Hrethel's heirloom, the work of Weland.² Wyrd³ always goes as it must!"

7

Hrothgar spoke, protector of the Scyldings:
 "For past favors, my friend Beowulf,
 and for old deeds, you have sought us out.
 Your father struck up the greatest of feuds,
 when he killed Heatholaf by his own hand
 among the Wylfings. When the Weder tribe would not harbor him for fear of war, thence he sought the South-Dane people over the billowing seas, the Honor-Scyldings;
 then I first ruled the Danish folk and held in my youth this grand kingdom,

¹ cover my head A burial custom. Beowulf grimly jokes that there will be no need to trouble with funeral expenses if Grendel wins this fight; he will have no head to bury.

² Weland Legendary blacksmith of the Norse gods. The antiquity of weapons and armor added to their value.

³ Wyrd The Old English word for "fate"; it is sometimes quasi-personified, though apparently not to the extent that the goddess Fortuna was in Roman poetic mythology. The word survives, via Shakespeare's Macbeth, as the Modern English word "weird."

city of treasure and heroes—then Heorogar was dead, my older brother unliving, Healfdene's firstborn—he was better than I!
 470 Later I settled that feud with fee-money;
 I sent to the Wylfings over the crest of the waves ancient treasures; he swore oaths to me.⁴
 It is a sorrow to my very soul to say to any man what Grendel has done to me—475 humiliated Heorot with his hateful thoughts, his sudden attacks. My hall-troop, my warriors, are decimated; wyrd has swept them away into Grendel's terror. God might easily put an end to the deeds of this mad enemy!
 480 Often men have boasted, drunk with beer,
 officers over their cups of ale,
 that they would abide in the beer-hall
 Grendel's attack with a rush of sword-terror.
 Then in the morning this mead-hall,
 485 lordly dwelling, was drenched with blood,
 when daylight gleamed, the benches gory,
 the hall spattered and befouled; I had fewer
 dear warriors when death took them away.
 Now sit down at my feast, drink mead in my hall,⁵ 490 the reward of victory, as your mood urges."

Then a bench was cleared in the beer-hall for the men of the Geats all together;
 the strong-minded men went to sit down,
 proud in their strength. A thane did his service, 495 bore in his hands the gold-bright ale-cup, poured the clear sweet drink. The scop sang brightly in Heorot—there was the joy of heroes, no small gathering of Danes and Geats.

⁴ I sent ... me Hrothgar pays the wergild for the man Ecgtheow killed, and Ecgtheow swears an oath of loyalty and support. It is this oath, passed on to the next generation, that Beowulf is fulfilling (at least this is Hrothgar's public sentiment; his thoughts in the privacy of his council are somewhat different).

⁵ Now sit ... hall The meaning of this line in Old English is disputed.

Unferth¹ spoke, son of Ecglaf, 500 who sat at the feet of the Scylding lord, unbound his battle-runes²—Beowulf's journey,
 that brave seafarer, sorely vexed him,
 for he did not wish that any other man
 on this middle-earth should care for glory 505 under the heavens, more than he himself:
 "Are you the Beowulf who strove with Breca
 in a swimming contest on the open sea, where in your pride you tried the waves
 and for a foolish boast risked your life 510 in the deep water? No man, whether friend or foe, could dissuade you two from that sad venture, when you swam in the sea;
 there you seized in your arms the ocean-streams,
 measured the sea-ways, flailed your hands 515 and glided over the waves—the water roiled, wintry surges. In the keeping of the water
 you toiled for seven nights, and he outswam you, and had more strength. Then in the morning the swells bore him to the Heathoream shore; 520 from thence he sought his own sweet land, beloved by his people, the land of the Brondings,
 the fair fortress, where he had his folk,
 his castle and treasure. He truly fulfilled,
 the son of Beanstan, his boast against you.
 525 So I expect a worse outcome from you—though you may have survived the storm of battle, some grim combats—if for Grendel you dare to lie in wait the whole night long."

Beowulf spoke, son of Ecgtheow:
 530 "What a great deal, Unferth my friend, drunk with beer, you have said about Breca, told his adventures! I will tell the truth—
 I had greater strength on the sea,
 more ordeals on the waves than any other man.
 535 When we were just boys we two agreed

Unferth Unferth's name, which may be significant, means either "un-peace" or "un-reason." In the manuscript it is always spelled "Hunferth," though it alliterates with a vowel. His position at Hrothgar's feet appears to be one of honor.

¹ unbound his battle-runes Or "unleashed his hostile secret thoughts." Run in Old English often means "secret."

and boasted—we were both still in our youth—that out on the great ocean
 we would risk our lives, and we did just that.
 We had bare swords, when we swam in the sea, 540 hard in our hands; we thought to protect ourselves from whales. Not for anything could he swim far from me on the sea-waves, more swiftly on the water, nor would I go from him.
 We two were together on the sea
 545 for five nights, until the flood drove us apart, surging waves, coldest of weathers,
 darkening night, and a northern wind,
 knife-sharp, pushed against us. The seas were choppy;
 the fishes of the sea were stirred up by it.
 550 There my coat of armor offered help, hard, hand-locked, against those hostile ones,
 my woven battle-dress lay on my breast adorned with gold. Down to the ocean floor a grisly foe dragged me, gripped me fast 555 in his grim grasp, yet it was given to me to stab that monster with the point of my sword, my war-blade; the storm of battle took away
 that mighty sea-beast, through my own hand.

"Time and again those terrible enemies 560 sorely threatened me. I served them well with my dear sword, as they deserved.
 They got no joy from their gluttony,
 those wicked man eaters, when they tasted me,
 sat down to their feast on the ocean floor—565 but in the morning, wounded by my blade, they were washed ashore by the ocean waves,
 dazed by sword-blows, and since that day they never hindered the passage of any sea-voyager. Light shone from the east, 570 God's bright beacon; the waves grew calm,
 so that I could see the sea-cliffs,
 the windswept capes. Wyrd often spares
 an undoomed man, when his courage endures!
 And so it was that with my sword I slew 575 nine of these sea-monsters. I have never heard of a harder night-battle under heaven's vault,

nor a more wretched man on the water's stream;
 yet I escaped alive from the clutches of my enemies,
 weary from my journey. Then the sea washed me up, the currents of the flood, in the land of the Finns,
 the welling waters. I have never heard a word about any such contest concerning you, such sword-panic. In the play of battle Breca has never—nor you either—done a deed so bold and daring with his decorated blade—I would never boast of it!— though you became your brothers' killer, your next of kin; for that you needs must suffer punishment in hell, no matter how clever you are.¹
 I will say it truly, son of Ecglāf, that never would Grendel have worked such terror,
 that gruesome beast, against your lord,
 or shames in Heorot, if your courage and spirit were as fierce as you yourself fancy they are;
 but he has found that he need fear no feud,
 no storm of swords from the Victory-Scyldings,
 no resistance at all from your nation;
 he takes his toll, spares no one in the Danish nation, but indulges himself, hacks and butchers and expects no battle from the Spear-Danes. But I will show him soon enough the strength and courage of the Geats in war. Afterwards, let him who will go bravely to mead, when the morning light of a new day, the sun clothed in glory, shines from the south on the sons of men!"

Then the giver of treasure was greatly pleased, gray-haired and battle-bold; the Bright-Danes' chief had faith in his helper; that shepherd of his folk recognized Beowulf's firm resolution.
 There was the laughter of warriors, lovely sounds and winsome words. Wealhtheow went forth, Hrothgar's queen, mindful of customs;

¹ though you became ... you are Unferth's fratricide brings the general theme of kin-slaying, represented by Grendel's descent from Cain, inside Hrothgar's hall. In reality—at least in the reality of the heroic world depicted in poetry—it may not have been unthinkable for kinsmen to find themselves on opposite sides of a battle; loyalty to one's lord was supposed to outweigh the claims of blood-relation. The word "hell" is not in the manuscript, but it is attested by one of the early transcriptions. In their translation, Bruce Mitchell and Fred C. Robinson read healle, i.e., "hall."

adorned with gold, she greeted the men in the hall,
 then that courteous wife offered the full cup
 first to the guardian of the East-Danes' kingdom, bid him be merry at his beer-drinking, beloved by his people; with pleasure he received the feast and cup, victorious king.
 The lady of the Helmings then went about to young and old, gave each his portion of the precious cup, until the moment came when the ring-adorned queen, of excellent heart, bore the mead-cup to Beowulf;
 she greeted the Geatish prince, thanked God with wise words that her wish had come to pass, that she could rely on any earl for relief from those crimes. He took the cup, the fierce warrior, from Wealhtheow,
 and then eager for battle he made his announcement.
 Beowulf spoke, son of Ecgtheow:
 "I resolved when I set out over the waves,
 sat down in my ship with my troop of soldiers,
 that I would entirely fulfill the wishes of your people, or fall slain, fast in the grip of my foe. I shall perform a deed of manly courage, or in this mead-hall
 I will await the end of my days!"
 These words well pleased that woman, the boasting of the Geat; she went, the gold-adorned and courteous folk-queen, to sit beside her lord.

Then, as before, there in that hall were strong words spoken, the people happy, the sounds of a victorious nation, until shortly the son of Healfdene wished to seek his evening rest; he knew that the wretched beast had been planning to do battle in the high building from the time they could first see the sunrise until night fell darkening over all,
 and creatures of shadow came creeping about pale under the clouds. The company arose.
 One warrior greeted another there,
 Hrothgar to Beowulf, and wished him luck,
 gave him control of the wine-hall in these words:
 "I have never entrusted to any man,
 ever since I could hold and hoist a shield,
 the great hall of the Danes—except to you now.
 Have it and hold it, protect this best of houses,

be mindful of glory, show your mighty valor,
watch for your enemies! You will have all you desire,
if you emerge from this brave undertaking alive."

10

Then Hrothgar and his troop of heroes, protector of the Scyldings, departed the hall;
the war-chief wished to seek Wealhtheow, his queen's bedchamber. The glorious king¹ had set against Grendel a hall-guardian
—as men had heard said—who did special service for the king of the Danes, kept guard against a giant.
Surely the Geatish prince greatly trusted his mighty strength, the Maker's favor,
when he took off his iron byrnie,
undid his helmet, and gave his decorated sword,
most excellent iron, to his servant
and bid him hold his battle-gear.
The good man, Beowulf the Geat, spoke a few boasting words before he lay down:
"I consider myself no poorer in strength and battle-deeds than Grendel does himself;
and so I will not kill him with a sword,
put an end to his life, though I easily might;
he knows no arts of war, no way to strike back,
hack at my shield-boss, though he be brave in his wicked deeds; but tonight we two will forego our swords, if he dare to seek out a war without weapons—and then let the wise Lord, the holy God, grant the judgment of glory
to whichever hand seems proper to Him."

Battle-brave, he lay down; the bolster took the earl's cheek, and around him many a bold seafarer sank to his hall-rest.
None of them thought that he should thence ever again seek his own dear homeland,
his tribe or the town in which he was raised,
for they had heard it said that savage death had swept away far too many of the Danish folk in that wine-hall. But the Lord gave a web of victory to the people of the Weders, comfort and support, so that they completely overcame their enemy through one man's craft, by his own might. It is a well-known truth that mighty God has ruled mankind always and forever.

In the dark night he came creeping, the shadow-goer. The bowmen slept who were to hold that horned hall—all but one. It was well-known to men that the demon foe could not drag them under the dark shadows if the Maker did not wish it;
but he, wakeful, keeping watch for his enemy,
awaited, enraged, the outcome of battle.

11

Then from the moor, in a blanket of mist,
Grendel came stalking—he bore God's anger;
the evil marauder meant to ensnare
some of human-kind in that high hall.
Under the clouds he came until he clearly knew he was near the wine-hall, men's golden house, finely adorned. It was not the first time he had sought out the home of Hrothgar, but never in his life, early or late,
did he find harder luck or a hardier hall-thane.
To the hall came that warrior on his journey, bereft of joys. The door burst open,
fast in its forged bands, when his fingers touched it;
bloody-minded, swollen with rage, he swung open the hall's mouth, and immediately afterwards
the fiend strode across the paved floor, went angrily; in his eyes stood
a light not fair, glowing like fire.
He saw in the hall many a soldier,
a peaceful troop sleeping all together,
a large company of thanes—and he laughed inside;
he meant to divide, before day came,
this loathsome creature, the life of each man from his body, when there befell him the hope of a feast. But it was not his fate to taste any more of the race of mankind
after that night. The kinsman of Hygelac, mighty one, beheld how that maneater planned to proceed with his sudden assault.

¹ The glorious king Or "King of Glory," i.e., God?

Not that the monster¹ meant to delay—
 he seized at once at his first pass a sleeping man, slit him open suddenly,
 bit into his joints, drank the blood from his veins,
 gobbled his flesh in gobbets, and soon had completely devoured that dead man, feet and fingertips. He stepped further,
 and took in his hands the strong-hearted man in his bed; the monster reached out towards him with his hands—he quickly grabbed him with evil intent, and sat up against his arm.²
 As soon as that shepherd of sins discovered that he had never met on middle-earth, in any region of the world, another man with a greater handgrip, in his heart he was afraid for his life, but none the sooner could he flee.
 His mind was eager to escape to the darkness, seek out a host of devils—his habit there was nothing like he had ever met before.
 The good kinsman of Hygelac remembered then his evening speech, and stood upright and seized him fast. His fingers burst;
 the giant turned outward, the earl stepped inward.
 The notorious one meant—if he might—to turn away further and flee, away to his lair in the fen; he knew his fingers were held in a hostile grip. That was an unhappy journey
 that the harm-doer took to Heorot!
 The great hall resounded; to the Danes it seemed,
 the city's inhabitants and every brave earl,
 like a wild ale-sharing.³ Both were angry,

¹ monster The OE word aglaca, which literally means “awesome one” or “terror,” is elsewhere applied to the dragon-slaying Sigemund (line 893, where it is translated “fierce creature”) and to Beowulf himself. Its translation here is admittedly tendentious. The word appears elsewhere, variously translated, in lines 159, 433, 556, 732, etc.

² he quickly grabbed ... his arm It is not entirely clear who grabs whom—apparently Grendel reaches out to Beowulf, who is lying down; the hero then grabs Grendel's arm and sits up against it.

³ wild ale-sharing The general sense of the OE word ealuscerwen is “panic” or “terror,” but its precise meaning (probably “a dispensing of ale”) is unclear: did the Danes think a wild party was going on?; were they dismayed by the loss of their mead-hall?; or does OE ealu mean “luck”?

770 fierce house-wardens—the hall echoed.
 It was a great wonder that the wine-hall
 withstood their fighting and did not fall to the ground, that fair building—but it was fastened inside and out with iron bands, 775 forged with skill. From the floor there flew many a mead-bench, as men have told me,
 gold-adorned, where those grim foes fought.
 The Scylding elders had never expected that any man, by any ordinary means, 780 could break it apart, beautiful, bone-adorned,
 or destroy it with guile, unless the embrace of fire might swallow it in flames. The noise swelled new and stark—among the North-Danes was horrible terror, in each of them
 785 who heard through the wall the wailing cry—
 God's adversary shrieked a grisly song of horror, defeated, the captive of Hell bewailed his pain. He pinned him fast, he who was the strongest of might among men 790 in those days of this life.

12

Not for anything would that protector of earls
 let that murderous visitor escape alive—
 he did not consider his days on earth of any use at all. Many an earl 795 in Beowulf's troop drew his old blade, longed to protect the life of his liege-lord,
 the famous captain, however they could.
 But they did not know as they entered the fight,
 those stern-minded men of battle, 800 and thought to strike from all sides and seek his soul, that no sword, not the best iron anywhere in the world,
 could even touch that evil sinner,
 for he had worked a curse on weapons, 805 every sort of blade. His separation from the world
 in those days of this life
 would be a wretched work, and that alien spirit would travel far into the keeping of fiends.
 Then he discovered, who had done before 810 so much harm to the race of mankind,

so many crimes—he was marked by God—
 that his body could bear it no longer,
 but the courageous kinsman of Hygelac had him in hand—hateful to each 815 was the life of the other. The loathsome creature felt a great pain in his body; a gaping wound opened in his shoulder-joint, his sinews sprang apart, his joints burst asunder. Beowulf was given glory in battle—Grendel was forced 820 to flee, fatally wounded, into the fen, seek a sorry abode; he knew quite surely that the end of his life had arrived, the sum of his days. The wishes of the Danes were entirely fulfilled in that bloody onslaught!
 825 He who had come from afar had cleansed,
 wise and stout-hearted, the hall of Hrothgar, warded off attack. He rejoiced in his night-work, his great deed of courage. That man of the Geats had fulfilled his boast to the East-Danes, 830 and entirely remedied all their distress, the insidious sorrows they had suffered and had to endure from sad necessity, no small affliction. That was a clear sign when the battle-brave one laid down the hand, 835 arm and shoulder—there all together was Grendel's claw—under the curved roof.

13

Then in the morning was many a warrior,
 as I have heard, around that gift-hall, leaders of the folk came from far and near 840 throughout the wide land to see that wonder, the loathsome one's tracks. His parting from life hardly seemed sad to any man who examined the trail of that inglorious one,
 how he went on his weary way, 845 defeated by force, to a pool of sea-monsters,
 doomed, put to flight, and left a fatal trail.
 The water was welling with blood there—
 the terrible swirling waves, all mingled together with hot gore, heaved with the blood of battle, 850 concealed that doomed one when, deprived of joys,
 he lay down his life in his lair in the fen,

his heathen soul—and hell took him.

Then the old retainers returned from there,
 and many a youth on the joyful journey, 855 bravely rode their horses back from the mere,
 men on their steeds. There they celebrated Beowulf's glory: it was often said that south or north, between the two seas,¹ across the wide world, there was none 860 better under the broad billowing sky among shield-warriors, nor more worthy to rule—
 though they found no fault with their own friendly lord, gracious Hrothgar, but said he was a good king.
 At times the proud warriors let their horses prance, 865 their fallow mares fare in a contest,
 wherever the footpaths seemed fair to them,
 the way tried and true. At times the king's thane,
 full of grand stories, mindful of songs, who remembered much, a great many 870 of the old tales, found other words truly bound together; he began again to recite with skill the adventure of Beowulf, adeptly tell an apt tale,
 and weave his words. He told nearly all 875 that he had heard said of Sigemund's stirring deeds,² many strange things, the Volsung's strife, his distant voyages obscure, unknown to all the sons of men,
 his feuds and crimes—except for Fitela,
 880 when of such things he wished to speak to him,

¹ between the two seas A conventional expression like Modern English "coast to coast"; apparently it originally referred to the North and Baltic seas.

² He told... deeds Beowulf is praised indirectly, by being compared first to Sigemund, another famous monster-slayer (a different version of whose story is told in the Old Norse Volsungasaga and the Middle High German Nibelungenlied; there the dragon-slaying is attributed to Sigemund's son Siegfried), and then contrasted to Heremod, an earlier king of the Danes who descended into tyranny (it is sometimes assumed that the disastrous ending of Heremod's reign is the cause of the Danes' lordlessness and distress mentioned at the beginning of the poem). The implication is that Beowulf's deeds place him in the ranks of other exemplary figures. The method of narration is allusive and indirect, as though the audience were expected to know the details of the story and appreciate an elliptical reference to them.

uncle to nephew¹—for always they were,
 in every combat, companions at need;
 a great many of the race of giants
 they slaughtered with their swords. For Sigemund no small fame grew after his final day, after that hardened soldier, prince's son,
 had killed a dragon, keeper of a hoard;
 alone, he dared to go under gray stones,
 a bold deed—nor was Fitela by his side;
 yet so it befell him that his sword pierced the wondrous serpent, stood fixed in the wall,
 the manly iron; the dragon met his death.
 That fierce creature had gone forth in courage
 so that he could possess that store of rings and use them at his will; the son of Wæls loaded his sea-boat, bore the bright treasure to the ship's hold. The serpent melted in its own heat.

He was the most famous of exiles, far and wide,
 among all people, protector of warriors,
 for his noble deeds—he had prospered for them—
 since the struggles of Heremod had ceased, his might and valor. Among the Jutes²
 he was betrayed into his enemies' hands, quickly dispatched. The surging of cares had crippled him too long; he became a deadly burden to his own people, to all noblemen;
 for many a wise man had mourned in earlier times over his headstrong ways who had looked to him for relief from affliction, hoped that that prince's son would prosper,
 receive his father's rank, rule his people,
 hoard and fortress, a kingdom of heroes,
 the Scylding homeland. The kinsman of Hygelac became to all the race of mankind
 a more pleasant friend; sin possessed him.³

Sometimes, competing, the fallow paths they measured on horseback. When morning's light raced on and hastened away, many a retainer,

stout-hearted, went to see the high hall
 to see the strange wonder; the king himself, guard of the treasure-hoard, strode glorious from the woman's chambers with a great entourage, a chosen retinue, and his royal queen with him measured the mead-hall path with a troop of maidens.

14

925 Hrothgar spoke—he went to the hall, stood on the steps, beheld the steep roof plated with gold, and Grendel's hand:
 “For this sight let us swiftly offer thanks to the Almighty! Much have I endured 930 of dire grief from Grendel, but God may always work, Shepherd of glory, wonder upon wonder.
 It was not long ago that I did not expect ever in my life to experience relief from any of my woes, when, stained with blood, 935 this best of houses stood dripping, gory,
 a widespread woe to all wise men who did not expect that they might ever defend the people's fortress from its foes, devils and demons. Now a retainer has done 940 the very deed, through the might of God, which we all could not contrive to do with all our cleverness. Lo, that woman could say, whosoever has borne such a son
 into the race of men, if she still lives, 945 that the God of Old was good to her in childbearing. Now I will cherish you, Beowulf, best of men, like a son in my heart; hold well henceforth your new kinship. You shall have no lack 950 of any worldly goods which I can bestow.
 Often have I offered rewards for less,
 honored with gifts a humbler man, weaker in battle. Now by yourself you have done such deeds that your fame will endure always and forever—may the Almighty 955 reward you with good, as He has already done!”

Beowulf spoke, son of Ecgtheow:
 “Freely and gladly have we fought this fight, done this deed of courage, daringly faced

¹ uncle to nephew Fitela is actually Sigemund's son by his own sister—either the poet is being discreet, or his version of the story differs from that of the Norse.

² Jutes Perhaps “Eoten.” The word literally means “giants” and may be a tribal name, or an epithet, or may in fact refer to an actual race of giants.

³ sin possessed him I.e., Heremod.

960 this unknown power. I would much prefer that you could have seen the foe himself decked in his finery,¹ fallen and exhausted!
 With a hard grip I hoped to bind him quickly and keenly on the killing floor, 965 so that in my handgrasp he would have to lie squirming for life, unless he might slip away;
 I could not—the Creator did not wish it—hinder his going, no matter how hard I held that deadly enemy; too overwhelming was 970 that fiend's flight. Yet he forfeited his hand, his arm and shoulder, to save his life,
 to guard his tracks—though he got little comfort thereby, pathetic creature;
 the loathsome destroyer will live no longer, 975 rotten with sin, but pain has seized him,
 grabbed him tightly in its fierce grip,
 its baleful bonds—and there he shall abide,
 guilty of his crimes, the greater judgment,
 how the shining Maker wishes to sentence him.” 980 Then the son of Ecglaf² was more silent in boasting words about his battle-works
 after the noblemen, through the earl's skill, looked on the hand over the high roof,
 the enemy's fingers; at the end of each nail 985 was a sharp tip, most like steel, heathen talons, the terrible spikes of that awful warrior; each of them agreed that not even the hardest of ancient and honorable irons could touch him, or injure at all 990 the bloody battle-paw of that baleful creature.

15

Then it was quickly commanded that Heorot be adorned by hands. There were many men and women who prepared that wine-hall,
 the guest-house; gold-dyed tapestries 995 shone on the walls, many a wonderful sight to any man who might look on them.

¹ in his finery Literally “in his adornments,” a peculiar phrase since Grendel is notoriously not armed and unadorned. Perhaps Beowulf means “covered in a garment of blood”?

² son of Ecglaf I.e., Unferth.

That shining building was nearly shattered inside, entirely, fast in its iron bands, its hinges sprung; the roof alone survived 1000 unharmed, when that horrible creature, stained with foul deeds, turned in his flight, despairing of life. Death is not an easy thing to escape—try it who will—but compelled by necessity all must come 1005 to that place set aside for soul-bearers, children of men, dwellers on earth,
 where the body, fast on its bed of death,
 sleeps after the feast.

Then was the set time that the son of Healfdene went to the hall;
 1010 the king himself wished to share in the feast.
 I have never heard of a greater host who bore themselves better before their treasure-giver.
 Those men in their glory moved to their benches,
 rejoiced in the feast; fairly those kinsmen 1015 took many a full mead-cup, stouthearted in the high hall, Hrothgar and Hrothulf. Heorot within was filled with friends—no false treacheries did the people of the Scyldings plot at that time.³ 1020 He gave to Beowulf the blade of Healfdene,⁴
 a golden war-standard as a reward for victory,
 the bright banner, a helmet and byrnie,
 a great treasure-sword—many saw them borne before that man. Beowulf received 1025 the full cup in the hall, he felt no shame at that gift-giving before his bowmen;
 never have I heard tell of four treasures given more graciously, gold-adorned,
 from one man to another on the ale-benches.
 1030 On the crown of the helmet as a head-protector

³ Heorot within ... at that time Implicit in this statement is the idea that, at some later time, the people of the Scyldings did plot false treacheries; from other sources it is possible to infer that after the death of Hrothgar, his nephew Hrothulf ruled rather than Hrethric, Hrothgar's son. Many scholars assume that the story of some sort of treacherous usurpation was known to the audience; this gives a special urgency to much of what happens in these scenes of feasting, especially the speeches of Wealhtheow.

⁴ He gave ... Healfdene The translation follows the reading of Bruce Mitchell and Fred C. Robinson. The manuscript is usually emended to mean “the son of Healfdene gave to Beowulf.”

a ridge, wound with wire, stood without,
 so that the file-sharp swords might not terribly harm him, storm-hardened, when shield-fighters had to go against hostile forces.
 The protector of earls ordered eight horses with ornamented bridles led into the building, in under the eaves; on one sat
 a saddle, skillfully tooled, set with gemstones;
 that was the warseat of the high-king
 when the son of Healfdene sought to perform his swordplay—the widely-known warrior never failed at the front, when the slain fell about him.
 And the lord of the Ingwines¹ gave ownership of both of them to Beowulf,
 the horses and weapons, bid him use them well.
 So manfully did the mighty prince,
 hoard-guard of warriors, reward the storm of battle with steeds and treasures that none who will speak
 the truth rightfully could ever reproach them.

16

Then the lord of earls, to each of those on the mead-benches who had made with Beowulf a sea-journey, gave jeweled treasures, antique heirlooms, and then ordered that gold be paid for the man whom Grendel had wickedly slain—he would have done more, if wise God and one man's courage had not prevented that fate. The Maker ruled all of the race of mankind, as He still does.
 Therefore understanding is always best,
 spiritual foresight—he must face much,
 both love and hate, who long here
 endures this world in these days of strife.

Noise and music mingled together
 before the leader of Healfdene's forces,
 the harp was touched, tales often told,
 when Hrothgar's scop was set to recite
 among the mead-tables his hall-entertainment about the sons of Finn, surprised in ambush,
 when the hero of the Half-Danes, Hnæf the Scylding,

1070 had to fall in a Frisian slaughter.²

Hildeburh, indeed, had no need to praise the good faith of the Jutes. Guiltless, she was deprived of her dear ones in that shieldplay, her sons and brothers—sent forth to their fate, 1075 dispatched by spears; she was a sad lady!
 Not without cause did she mourn fate's decrees, the daughter of Hoc, after daybreak came and she could see the slaughter of her kin under the very skies where once she held 1080 the greatest worldly joys. War took away all of the thanes of Finn, except a few,
 so that he could not continue at all a fight with Hengest on the battlefield, nor could that woeful remnant drive away 1085 the prince's thane—so they offered them terms:³
 they would clear out another hall for them,
 a house and high-seat, of which they should have half the control with the sons of the Jutes, and Folcwalda's son, with feasting and gifts, 1090 should honor the Danes each and every day, gladden the troops of Hengest with gold rings and ancient treasures, ornamented gold, just as often as he would encourage the hosts of the Frisians in the beer-hall.
 1095 They swore their pledges then on either side,
 a firm compact of peace. With unfeigned zeal Finn swore his oaths to Hengest, pledged that he,
 with the consent of his counselors, would support with honor those sad survivors, 1100 and that none should break their pact in word or deed, nor through malice should ever make mention,
 though they should serve their ring-giver's slayer,

² the sons of Finn ... Frisian slaughter The story is obscure; the survival of a fragment of another poem telling the same story helps clarify the action somewhat. Hnæf, prince of the Danes, is visiting his sister Hildeburh at the home of her husband Finn, king of the Frisians. While there, the Danish party is treacherously attacked (perhaps by a Jutish contingent among Finn's troops, unless the "Jutes" and Frisians are one and the same people); after five days of fighting Hnæf lies dead, along with many casualties on either side. Hnæf's retainer Hengest is left to lead the remnant of Danish survivors.

³ them terms The referent of this pronoun is not entirely clear—who offers what to whom? The terms of the truce are unthinkable—no hero could honorably follow the killer of his lord. In the following line "they" refers to the Frisians, "them" to the Danes.

¹ Ingwines Friends of "Ing"; i.e., the Danes.

without a lord, as they were led by need—and if, provoking, any Frisian spoke reminding them of all their murderous hate,
then with the sword's edge they should settle it.

The oath¹ was made ready, and ancient gold was brought from the hoard; the Battle-Scyldings' best fighting-man was ready for the fire.

It was easy to see upon that pyre
the bloodstained battle-shirt, the gilded swine, iron-hard boar-images, the noblemen with fatal wounds—so many felled by war!
Then Hildeburh commanded at Hnæf's pyre that her own son be consigned to the flames to be burnt, flesh and bone, placed on the pyre at his uncle's shoulder; the lady sang a sad lament. The warrior ascended;
to the clouds coiled the mighty funeral fire,
and roared before their mound; their heads melted,
their gashes burst open and spurted blood,
the deadly body-bites. The flame devoured, most greedy spirit, those whom war destroyed
of both peoples—their glory departed.

17

The warriors left to seek their native lands, bereft of friends, to behold Frisia, their homes and high fortresses. Hengest still stayed there with Finn that slaughter-stained winter, unwilling, desolate. He dreamt of home, though on the frozen sea he could not² steer his ring-prowed ship—the ocean raged with storms, strove with the wind, and winter locked the waves in icy bonds, until there came another year to the courtyard—as it yet does,
always observing its seasons and times,
bright glorious weather. Gone was the winter, and fair the bosom of earth; the exile burned to take leave of that court, yet more he thought of stern vengeance than of sea-voyages,

¹ oath Some editors emend að "oath" to ad "pyre."

² not OE ne "not" is not in the manuscript; most editors and translators add it to make better sense of the passage and of Hengest's character.

how he might arrange a hostile meeting,
remind the Jutish sons of his iron sword.
So he did not refuse the world's custom when the son of Hunlaf³ placed a glinting sword,
the best of battle-flames, upon his lap;
its edge was not unknown among the Jutes.
And so, in turn, to the bold-minded Finn befell cruel sword-evil in his own home,
when Guthlaf and Oslaf spoke of their grief,
the fierce attack after their sea voyage,
and cursed their wretched lot—the restless heart could not restrain itself. The hall was stained with the lifeblood of foes, and Finn was slain,
the king among his host; the queen was seized.
The Scylding bowmen carried to their ships
all the house property of that earth-king, whatever they could find in Finn's homestead, brooches and bright gems. On their sea journey they bore that noble queen back to the Danes and led her to her people.

The lay was sung,
the entertainer's song. Glad sounds rose again, the bench-noise glittered, cupbearers gave wine from wondrous vessels. Wealhtheow came forth in her golden crown to where the good two sat, nephew and uncle; their peace was still whole then, each true to the other. Likewise Unferth, spokesman,⁴ sat at the foot of the Scylding lord; everyone trusted
his spirit,
that he had great courage, though to his kinsmen he had not been merciful in sword-play. Then the lady of the Scyldings spoke:

"Take this cup, my noble courteous lord, giver of treasure! Be truly joyful, gold-friend of men, and speak to the Geats
in mild words, as a man should do!

³ the son of Hunlaf It is not clear who this is: perhaps Guthlaf or Oslaf (mentioned a few lines later), perhaps not; apparently some retainers remained with Hengest in Finn's hall, nursing their resentment throughout the winter. Some scholars take the OE word hunlafing as the name of a sword.

⁴ spokesman The Old English word thyle has been variously interpreted, from "court jester" to "official speechmaker." The present translation grants Unferth a measure of dignity and position to which, perhaps, he is not entitled.

Be gracious to the Geats, mindful of the gifts which you now have from near and far.
 I have been told that you would take this warrior for your son. Heorot is cleansed, the bright ring-hall—use your many rewards
 while you can, and leave to your kinsmen
 the folk and kingdom, when you must go forth to face the Maker's decree. I know that my own dear gracious Hrothulf will hold in honors these youths, if you should give up the world
 before him, friend of the Scyldings;
 I expect that he would wish to repay both our sons kindly, if he recalls all the pleasures and honors that we have shown him,
 in our kindness, since he was a child.”
 She turned to the bench where her boys sat,
 Hrethric and Hrothmund, and the son of heroes,
 all the youths together; the good man,
 Beowulf the Geat, sat between the two brothers.

18

The flagon was brought forth, a friendly greeting conveyed with words, and wound gold offered with good will, two armlets, garments and rings, and the greatest neck-collar ever heard of anywhere on earth.
 Under heaven I have not heard tell of a better
 hoard-treasure of heroes, since Hama carried off to the bright city the Brosinga necklace, the gem and its treasures; he fled the treachery of Eormanric,¹ chose eternal counsel.

¹ Under heaven ... of Eormanric The Brosinga necklace had apparently been worn by the Norse goddess Freya. Nothing much is known of Hama, who apparently stole the necklace from Eormanric, famous king of the Goths. The “bright city” and “eternal counsel” may refer to his retreat into a monastery and conversion to Christianity (a story told in the Old Norse Thidrekssaga), though this is not entirely certain.

Hygelac the Geat on his last journey had that neck-ring,² nephew of Swerting, when under the banner he defended his booty,
 the spoils of slaughter. Fate struck him down when in his pride he went looking for woe,
 a feud with the Frisians. He wore that finery, those precious stones, over the cup of the sea,
 that powerful lord, and collapsed under his shield.
 Into Frankish hands came the life of that king,
 his breast-garments, and the great collar too;
 a lesser warrior looted the corpses mown down in battle; Geatish men held that killing field.

The hall swallowed the noise.
 Wealhtheow stood before the company and spoke:
 “Beowulf, beloved warrior, wear this neck-ring in good health, and enjoy this war-garment, treasure of a people, and prosper well, be bold and clever, and to these boys be mild in counsel—I will remember you for that.
 You have made it so that men will praise you far and near, forever and ever,
 as wide as the seas, home of the winds, surround the shores of earth. Be while you live blessed, o nobleman! I wish you well with these bright treasures. Be to my sons kind in your deeds, keeping them in joys!
 Here each earl is true to the other,
 mild in his heart, loyal to his liege-lord,
 the thanes united, the nation alert,
 the troop, having drunk at my table, will do as I bid.”
 She went to her seat. The best of feasts it was—the men drank wine, and did not know wyrd, the cruel fate which would come to pass for many an earl once evening came,
 and Hrothgar departed to his own dwelling,
 the mighty one to his rest. Countless men held that hall, as they often had before.
 They cleared away bench-planks, spread cushions and bedding on the floor. One of those beer-drinkers lay down to his rest fated, ripe for death.

² Hygelac the Geat ... neck-ring The first of several mentions of Hygelac's ill-fated raid against the Frisians. Later we are told that Beowulf gives the necklace to Hygd, Hygelac's wife; she apparently let him borrow it when he went on his piratical raid.

They set at their heads their round battle-shields,
 bright boards; there on the bench,
 easily seen over the noblemen, 1245 were the high battle-helmet, the ringed byrnie, the mighty wooden spear. It was their custom to be always ready, armed for battle,
 at home or in the field, every one of them,
 on whatever occasion their overlord
 1250 had need of them; that was a good troop.

19

They sank into sleep—one paid sorely for his evening rest, as had often happened when Grendel guarded that gold-hall, committed his wrongs until he came to his end, 1255 died for his sins. It was soon all too clear, obvious to all men, that an avenger still lived on after that enemy for a long time after that grim battle—Grendel's mother, monstrous woman, remembered her misery, 1260 she who dwelt in those dreadful waters,
 the cold streams, ever since Cain killed with his blade his only brother, his father's kin; he fled bloodstained,
 marked for murder, left the joys of men, 1265 dwelled in the wasteland. From him awoke many a fateful spirit—Grendel among them, hateful accursed foe, who found at Heorot
 a wakeful warrior waiting for battle.
 When the great beast began to seize him, 1270 he remembered his mighty strength,
 the ample gifts which God had given him,
 and trusted the Almighty for mercy,
 favor and support; thus he overcame the fiend,
 subdued the hellish spirit. He went away wretched, 1275 deprived of joy, to find his place of death, mankind's foe. But his mother—greedy, grim-minded—still wanted to go on her sad journey to avenge her son's death.

She reached Heorot, where the Ring-Danes 1280 slept throughout the building; a sudden upset came to men, when Grendel's mother broke into the hall. The horror was less by as much as a maiden's strength, a woman's warfare, is less than an armed man's 1285 when a bloodstained blade, its edges strong, hammer-forged sword, slices through the boar-image on a helmet opposite.¹

 Then in the hall was the hard edge drawn,
 swords over seats, many a broad shield 1290 raised in hands—none remembered his helmet or broad mail-shirt when that terror seized them.
 She came in haste and meant to hurry out,
 save her life, when she was surprised there,
 but she quickly seized, fast in her clutches,
 1295 one nobleman when she went to the fens.
 He was the dearest of heroes to Hrothgar
 among his comrades between the two seas,
 mighty shield-warrior, whom she snatched from his rest,
 a glorious thane. Beowulf was not there, 1300 but another place had been appointed for the famous Geat after the treasure-giving.
 Heorot was in an uproar—she took the famous hand,
 covered in gore; care was renewed,
 come again to the dwellings. That was no good exchange, 1305 that those on both sides should have to bargain with the lives of friends.

Then the wise old king,
 Grey-bearded warrior, was grieved at heart
 when he learned that he no longer lived—
 the dearest of men, his chief thane, was dead.
 1310 Quickly Beowulf was fetched to the chambers, victory-blessed man. Just before dawn that noble champion came with his companions, went with his men to where the old king waited wondering whether the Almighty would ever 1315 work a change after his tidings of woe.
 Across the floor walked the worthy warrior with his small troop—the hall-wood resounded—and with his words he addressed the wise one, lord of the Ingwines, asked him whether 1320 the night had been agreeable, after his urgent summons.

The horror ... opposite In fact Grendel's mother is a much more dangerous opponent for Beowulf; the point of these lines is not clear.

20

Hrothgar spoke, protector of the Scyldings:
 “Ask not of joys! Sorrow is renewed for the Danish people. Æschere is dead,
 elder brother of Yrmenlaf,
 my confidant, my counselor,
 my shoulder-companion in every conflict
 when we defended our heads when the footsoldiers clashed
 and struck boar-helmets. As a nobleman should be, always excellent, so Æschere was!
 In Heorot he was slain by the hand of a restless death-spirit; I do not know where that ghoul went, gloating with its carcass, rejoicing in its feast. She avenged that feud in which you killed Grendel yesterday evening in your violent way with a crushing vice-grip, for he had diminished and destroyed my people for far too long. He fell in battle, it cost him his life, and now another has come,
 a mighty evil marauder who means to avenge
 her kin, and too far has carried out her revenge, as it may seem to many a thane
 whose spirit groans for his treasure-giver,
 a hard heart’s distress—now that hand lies dead
 which was wont to give you all good things.

“I have heard countrymen and hall-counselors among my people report this:
 they have seen two such creatures,
 great march-stalkers holding the moors,
 alien spirits. The second of them, as far as they could discern most clearly,
 had the shape of a woman; the other, misshapen,
 marched the exile’s path in the form of a man,
 except that he was larger than any other;
 in bygone days he was called ‘Grendel’
 by the local folk. They knew no father, whether before him had been begotten any more mysterious spirits. That murky land they hold, wolf-haunted slopes, windy headlands, awful fenpaths, where the upland torrents plunge downward under the dark crags, the flood underground. It is not far hence —measured in miles—that the mere stands;

over it hangs a grove hoar-frosted,
 a firm-rooted wood looming over the water.
 1365 Every night one can see there an awesome wonder, fire on the water. There lives none so wise or bold that he can fathom its abyss.
 Though the heath-stepper beset by hounds,
 the strong-horned hart, might seek the forest, 1370 pursued from afar, he will sooner lose his life on the shore than save his head and go in the lake—it is no good place!
 The clashing waves climb up from there dark to the clouds, when the wind drives 1375 the violent storms, until the sky itself droops, the heavens groan. Now once again all help depends on you alone. You do not yet know this fearful place, where you might find the sinful creature—seek it if you dare!
 1380 I will reward you with ancient riches for that feud, as I did before,
 with twisted gold, if you return alive.”

21

Beowulf spoke, son of Ecgtheow:
 “Sorrow not, wise one! It is always better
 1385 to avenge one’s friend than to mourn overmuch.
 Each of us must await the end of this world’s life; let him who can bring about fame before death—that is best for the unliving man after he is gone.
 1390 Arise, kingdom’s guard, let us quickly go and inspect the path of Grendel’s kin.
 I promise you this: he¹ will find no protection—
 not in the belly of the earth nor the bottom of the sea, nor the mountain groves—let him go where he will!
 1395 For today, you must endure patiently all your woes, as I expect you will.”
 The old man leapt up, thanked the Lord,
 the mighty God, for that man’s speech.
 Then for Hrothgar a horse was bridled
 1400 with plaited mane. The wise prince

¹ he The hero does not note carefully enough the gender of Grendel’s mother, or else the pronoun he refers to OE magan “kinsman,” a masculine noun.

rode in full array; footsoldiers marched with shields at the ready. The tracks were seen far and wide on the forest paths,
 a trail through the woods, where she went forth 1405 over the murky moor, bore the young man's lifeless body, the best of all those who had held watch over Hrothgar's home.
 The son of nobles crossed over the steep stone cliffs, the constricted climb, 1410 a narrow solitary path, a course unknown,
 the towering headlands, home of sea-monsters.
 He went before with just a few wise men to see the way,
 until suddenly he saw mountain-trees, 1415 stunted and leaning over gray stone, a joyless wood; the water went under turbid and dreary. To all the Danes, the men of the Scyldings, many a thane,
 it was a sore pain at heart to suffer, 1420 a grief to every earl, when on the seadiff
 they came upon the head of Æschere.
 The flood boiled with blood—the folk gazed on—and hot gore. At times a horn sang its eager war-song. The footsoldiers sat down.
 1425 They saw in the water many kinds of serpents, strange sea-creatures testing the currents,
 and on the sloping shores lay such monsters
 as often attend in early morning
 a sorrowful journey on the sail-road, 1430 dragons and wild beasts. They rushed away bitter, enraged; they heard the bright noise, the sound of the battle-horn. A Geatish bowman cut short the life of one of those swimmers with a bow and arrow, so that in his body stood 1435 the hard war-shaft; he was a slower swimmer on the waves, when death took him away.
 At once in the water he was assailed with the barbed hooks of boar-pikes, violently attacked and dragged ashore, 1440 the strange wave-roamer; the men inspected this grisly visitor.

Beowulf geared up
 in his warrior's clothing, cared not for his life.
 The broad war-shirt, woven by hand, cunningly made, had to test the mere—

1445 it knew well how to protect his bone-house so that a battle-grip might not hurt his breast nor an angry malicious clutch touch his life.
 The shining helmet protected his head,
 set to stir up the sea's depths, 1450 seek that troubled water, decorated with treasure, encircled with a splendid band, as a weapon-smith
 in days of old had crafted it with wonders, set boar-images, so that afterwards
 no blade or battle-sword might ever bite it.
 1455 Not the smallest of powerful supports was that which Hrothgar's spokesman lent him at need;
 that hilted sword was named Hrunting, unique among ancient treasures—
 its edge was iron, etched with poison stripes, 1460 hardened with the blood of war; it had never failed any man who grasped it in his hands in battle, who dared to undertake a dreadful journey into the very home of the foe—it was not the first time that it had to perform a work of high courage.
 1465 Truly, the son of Ecglaf, crafty in strength, did not remember what he had said before,
 drunk with wine, when he lent that weapon to a better swordsman; he himself did not dare to risk his life under the rushing waves, 1470 perform a lordly act; for that he lost honor, his fame for courage. Not so with the other,
 when he had geared himself up for battle.

22

Beowulf spoke, son of Ecgtheow:
 "Consider now, famous kinsman of Healfdene, 1475 wise prince, now that I am eager to depart,
 gold-friend to men, what we spoke of before:
 if ever in your service I should lose my life, that you would always be like a father to me when I have gone forth.
 1480 Be a protector to my band of men,
 my boon-companions, if battle should take me,
 beloved Hrothgar, and send on to Hygelac
 the gifts of treasure which you have given me.
 The lord of the Geats will understand by that gold,
 1485 the son of Hrethel will see by that treasure, that I found a ring-giver who was good in ancient customs, and while I could, enjoyed it.

And let Unferth have that ancient heirloom,
that well-known man have my wave-patterned sword, hard-edged, splendid; with Hrunting I shall win honor and fame, or death will take me!"

After these words the Wether-Geat man hastened boldly, by no means wished to stay for an answer; the surging sea received the brave soldier. It was the space of a day¹ before he could perceive the bottom.
Right away she who held that expanse of water,
bloodthirsty and fierce, for a hundred half-years,
grim and greedy, perceived that some man was exploring from above that alien land.
She snatched at him, seized the warrior in her savage clutches, but none the sooner injured his sound body—the ring-mail encircled him, so that she could not pierce that war-dress,
the locked coat of mail, with her hostile claws.
Then that she-wolf of the sea swam to the bottom,
and bore the prince of rings into her abode,
so that he might not—no matter how strong—wield his weapons, but so many wonders set upon him in the water, many a sea-beast with battle-tusks tearing at his war-shirt, monsters pursuing him.²

Then the earl perceived that he was in some sort of battle-hall where no water could harm him in any way, and, for the hall's roof, he could not be reached by the flood's sudden rush—he saw a fire-light,
a glowing blaze shining brightly.
Then the worthy man saw that water-witch,
a great mere-wife; he gave a mighty blow with his battle-sword—he did not temper that stroke—
so that the ring-etched blade rang out on her head a greedy battle-song. The guest discovered then that the battle-flame would not bite, or wound her fatally—but the edge failed the man in his need; it had endured many hand-to-hand meetings, often sheared through helmets, fated war-garments. It was the first time that the fame of that precious treasure had failed.

Again he was stalwart, not slow of zeal, mindful of glory, that kinsman of Hygelac—
the angry challenger threw away that etched blade, wrapped and ornamented, so that it lay on the earth,
strong, steel-edged. He trusted his strength, the might of his handgrip—as a man should do if by his warfare he thinks to win long-lasting praise: he cares nothing for his life.
The man of the War-Geats grabbed by the shoulder
Grendel's mother—he had no regret for that feud;
battle-hardened, enraged, he swung her around,
his deadly foe, so she fell to the ground.
Quickly she gave him requital for that with a grim grasp, and grappled him to her—weary, he stumbled, strongest of warriors, of foot-soldiers, and took a fall.
She set upon her hall-guest³ and drew her knife,
broad, bright-edged; she would avenge her boy,
her only offspring. On his shoulders lay the linked corselet; it defended his life,
prevented the entrance of point and blade.
There the son of Ecgtheow would have ended his life
under the wide ground, the Geatish champion, had not his armored shirt offered him help,
the hard battle-net, and holy God brought about war-victory—the wise Lord, Ruler of the heavens, decided it rightly,
easily, once he stood up again.

23

He saw among the armor a victorious blade, ancient giant-sword strong in its edges,
worthy in battles; it was the best of weapons,
except that it was greater than any other man might even bear into the play of battle, good, adorned, the work of giants.⁴

¹ It was the space of a day Or "it was daylight."

² pursuing him Or "attacked their adversary." The Old English word æglecan may refer here to Beowulf or the sea-monsters.

³ She set upon her hall-guest Some translations read "sat down upon"; the meaning of OE ofsæt is disputed.

⁴ the work of giants Old, highly praised weapons are often called "the work of giants"—whether this is meant to connect the sword to the giants "who fought against God" is not clear.

The Scyldings' champion seized its linked hilt, fierce and ferocious, drew the ring-marked sword despairing of his life, struck in fury so that it caught her hard in the neck, broke her bone-rings; the blade cut through the doomed flesh—she fell to the floor,
the sword was bloody, the soldier rejoiced.

The flames gleamed, a light glowed within even as from heaven the firmament's candle shines clearly. He looked around the chamber, passed by the wall, hefted the weapon
hard by its hilt, that thane of Hygelac, angry and resolute—nor was the edge useless to that warrior, but he quickly wished to pay back Grendel for the many battle-storms which he had wrought on the West-Danes much more often than on one occasion, when Hrothgar's hall-companions
he slew in their beds, devoured sleeping fifteen men of the Danish folk,
and made off with as many more,
a loathsome booty. He paid him back for that,
the fierce champion, for on a couch he saw Grendel lying lifeless, battle-weary from the wound he received in the combat at Heorot. His corpse burst open when he was dealt a blow after death,
a hard sword-stroke, and his head chopped off.

Soon the wise troops saw it,
those who kept watch on the water with Hrothgar—
all turbid were the waves, and troubled, the sea stained with blood. The graybearded elders spoke together about the good one,
said they did not expect that nobleman would return, triumphant, to seek the mighty prince; to many it seemed that the sea-wolf had destroyed him.
The ninth hour came; the noble Scyldings abandoned the headland, and home went the gold-friend of men. The guests¹ sat sick at heart, and stared into the mere;
they wished, but did not hope, that they would see their lord himself.

Then the sword began,

that blade, to dissolve away in battle-icicles from the war-blood; it was a great wonder that it melted entirely, just like ice
when the Father loosens the frost's fetters, unwraps the water's bonds—He wields power over times and seasons; that is the true Maker.
The man of the Geats took no more precious treasures from that place—though he saw many there—than the head, and the hilt as well, bright with gems; the blade had melted,
the ornamented sword burned up; so hot was the blood of the poisonous alien spirit who died in there.
Soon he was swimming who had survived in battle
the downfall of his enemies, dove up through the water;
the sea-currents were entirely cleansed,
the spacious regions, when that alien spirit
gave up life-days and this loaned world.

The defender of seafarers came to land,
swam stout-hearted; he rejoiced in his sea-booty,
the great burden which he brought with him.
That splendid troop of thanes went towards him, thanked God, rejoiced in their prince,
that they might see him safe and sound.
Then from that bold man helmet and byrnie were quickly unstrapped. Under the clouds the mere stewed, stained with gore.
They went forth, followed the trail,
rejoicing in their hearts; they marched along the road,
the familiar path; proud as kings
they carried the head from the sea-cliff with great trouble, even for two pairs of stout-hearted men; four of them had to bear, with some strain, on a battle-pole Grendel's head to the gold-hall, until presently fourteen proud and battle-hardy Geats came to the hall, warriors marching; the lord of those men,
mighty in the throng, trod the meadhall-plain.
Then the ruler of thanes entered there,
daring in actions, honored in fame,
battle-brave hero, to greet Hrothgar.
Then, where men were drinking, they dragged by its hair Grendel's head across the hall-floor,
a grisly spectacle for the men and the queen.
Everyone stared at that amazing sight.

¹ The guests I.e., the Geats who had come to Heorot with Beowulf.

Beowulf spoke, son of Ecgtheow:
 “Look! son of Healfdene, prince of the Scyldings,
 we have brought you gladly these gifts from the sea
 which you gaze on here, a token of glory.
 Not easily did I escape with my life that undersea battle, did my brave deed with difficulty—indeed, the battle would have been over at once, if God had not guarded me.
 Nor could I achieve anything at that battle with Hrunting, though that weapon is good;
 but the Ruler of Men granted to me that I might see on the wall a gigantic old sword, hanging glittering—He has always guided the friendless one—so I drew that weapon.
 In that conflict, when I had the chance, I slew
 the shepherds of that house. Then that battle-sword burned up with its ornaments, as the blood shot out, hot sweat of battle. I have brought the hilt back from the enemy; I avenged the old deeds,
 the slaughter of Danes, as seemed only right.
 Now you have my word that you may in Heorot sleep without care with your company of men, and every thane, young and old,
 in your nation; you need fear nothing,
 prince of the Scyldings, from that side,
 no deadly manslaughters, as you did before.”

Then the golden hilt was placed in the hand of the gray-haired war-chief, wise old leader, that old work of giants; it came to the keeping of the Danish lord after the fall of demons, a work of wonder-smiths; and when that evil-hearted
 man,

God's adversary, gave up the world,
 guilty of murders—and his mother too—
 it passed to the possession of the best of world-kings between the two seas,
 of all those that dealt out treasures in Danish lands.

Hrothgar spoke—he studied the hilt of the old heirloom, where was written¹ the origin of ancient strife, when the flood slew, rushing seas, the race of giants—

they suffered awfully. That was a people alien to the eternal Lord; a last reward
 the Ruler gave them through the raging waters.
 Also, on the sword-guard of bright gold

1695 was rightly marked in rune-letters, set down and said for whom that sword,
 best of irons, had first been made,
 with scrollerly and serpentine patterns. Then spoke the wise son of Healfdene—all fell silent:

1700 “One may, indeed, say, if he acts in truth and right for the people, remembers all, old guardian of his homeland, that this earl was born a better man! Beowulf my friend, your glory is exalted throughout the world, 1705 over every people; you hold it all with patient care, and temper strength with wisdom. To you I shall fulfill our friendship, as we have said. You shall become a comfort
 everlasting to your own people,
 and a help to heroes.

“Not so was Heremod
 1710 to the sons of Ecgwala, the Honor-Scyldings;
 he grew not for their delight, but for their destruction
 and the murder of Danish men.
 Enraged, he cut down his table-companions,
 comrades-in-arms, until he turned away alone 1715 from the pleasures of men, that famous prince; though mighty God exalted him in the joys of strength and force, advanced him far over all men, yet in his heart he nursed a blood-ravenous breast-hoard. No rings did he give 1720 to the Danes for their honor; he endured, joyless, to suffer the pains of that strife,
 a long-lasting harm to his people. Learn from him, understand virtue! For your sake I am telling this,
 in the wisdom of my winters.

“It is a wonder to say 1725 how mighty God in His great spirit allots wisdom, land and lordship to mankind; He has control of everything.
 At times He permits the thoughts of a man
 in a mighty race to move in delights, 1730 gives him to hold in his homeland
 the sweet joys of earth, a stronghold of men, grants him such power over his portion of the world,

¹ written Or “carved.” It is not clear whether the scene is visual or textual, depicted or written in (presumably runic) characters.

a great kingdom, that he himself cannot imagine an end to it, in his folly.

1735 He dwells in plenty; in no way plague him illness or old age, nor do evil thoughts darken his spirit, nor any strife or sword—hate shows itself, but all the world turns to his will; he knows nothing worse.

25

1740 “At last his portion of pride within him grows and flourishes, while the guardian sleeps,
the soul’s shepherd—that sleep is too sound, bound with cares, the slayer too close who, sinful and wicked, shoots from his bow.¹ 1745 Then he is struck in his heart, under his helmet with a bitter dart—he knows no defense—
the strange, dark demands of evil spirits;
what he has long held seems too little,
angry and greedy, he gives no golden rings 1750 for vaunting boasts, and his final destiny
he neglects and forgets, since God, Ruler of glories, has given him a portion of honors.

In the end it finally comes about that the loaned life-dwelling starts to decay and falls, fated to die; another follows him 1755 who doles out his riches without regret,
the earl’s ancient treasure; he heeds no terror.
Defend yourself from wickedness, dear Beowulf,
best of men, and choose better, 1760 eternal counsel; care not for pride, great champion! The glory of your might is but a little while; too soon it will be that sickness or the sword will shatter your strength, or the grip of fire, or the surging flood, 1765 or the cut of a sword, or the flight of a spear, or terrible old age—or the light of your eyes will fail and flicker out; in one fell swoop death, o warrior, will overwhelm you.

1770 “Thus, a hundred half-years I held the Ring-Danes under the skies, and kept them safe from war from many tribes throughout this middle-earth,

¹ At last ... bow The slayer is sin or vice; the soul’s guardian is reason, conscience, or prudence.

from spears and swords, so that I considered none
under the expanse of heaven my enemy.

Look! Turnabout came in my own homeland, 1775 grief after gladness, when Grendel became my invader, ancient adversary;
for that persecution I bore perpetually
the greatest heart-cares. Thanks be to the Creator, eternal Lord, that I have lived long enough 1780 to see that head, stained with blood, with my own eyes, after all this strife!
Go to your seat, enjoy the feast, honored in battle; between us shall be shared a great many treasures, when morning comes.”

1785 Glad-hearted, the Geat went at once to take his seat, as the wise one told him.
Then again as before, a feast was prepared for the brave ones who occupied the hall on this new occasion. The dark helm of night 1790 overshadowed the troop. The soldiers arose;
the gray-haired ruler was ready for bed,
the aged Scylding. Immeasurably well did rest please the Geat, proud shield-warrior;
at once a chamberlain led him forth, 1795 weary from his adventure, come from afar,
he who attended to all the needs of that thane, for courtesy, as in those days
all heroes and warriors used to have.

The great-hearted one rested; the hall towered 1800 vaulted and gold-adorned; the guest slept within until the black² raven, blithe-hearted, announced the joy of heaven. Then light came hurrying bright over shadows; the soldiers hastened, the noblemen were eager to travel 1805 back to their people; the bold-spirited visitor wished to seek his far-off ship.

The hardy one ordered Hrunting to be borne to the son of Ecglaf,³ bid him take his sword, lordly iron; he thanked him for the loan, 1810 and said that he regarded it as a good war-friend,
skillful in battle, and the sword’s edges

² black Either OE blac “shining” or blec “black”; the translation prefers the irony of the image of the black raven, not otherwise known as a harbinger of joy, announcing the surprising good news of a dawn without slaughter.

³ son of Ecglaf I.e., Unferth.

he did not disparage; he was a noble man.
And when the warriors were eager for their journey, equipped in their war-gear, the nobleman went, honoring the Danes, to the high seat where the other was:
the hero, brave in battle, saluted Hrothgar.

26

Beowulf spoke, son of Ecgtheow:
“Now we seafarers, come from afar, wish to say that we desire to seek Hygelac. Here we were honorably entertained with delights; you have treated us well.
If ever on earth I can do any thing to earn more of your affection,
than the battle-deeds I have done already,
ruler of men, I will be ready at once.
If ever I hear over the sea’s expanse that your neighbors threaten you with terror
as your enemies used to do,
I will bring you a thousand thanes, heroes to help you. I have faith in Hygelac—
the lord of the Geats, though he be young, shepherd of his people, will support me with words and deeds, that I might honor you well and bring to your side a forest of spears,
the support of my might, whenever you need men.
If ever Hrethric, son of a prince, decides to come to the Geatish court, he will find many friends there; far-off lands are better sought by one who is himself good.”

Hrothgar spoke in answer to him:
“The wise Lord has sent those words into your heart; I have never heard a shrewder speech from such a young man.
You are strong in might, and sound in mind, prudent in speech! I expect it is likely that if it should ever happen that the spear or the horrors of war take Hrethel’s son,¹ or sickness or sword strike the shepherd of his people, your lord, and you still live,
that the sea-Geats could not select a better choice anywhere for king,

hoard-guard of heroes, if you will hold the realm of your kinsmen. Your character pleases me better and better, beloved Beowulf.
1855 You have brought it about that between our peoples,
the Geatish nation and the spear-Danes,
there shall be peace, and strife shall rest,
the malicious deeds they endured before,
as long as I shall rule this wide realm, 1860 and treasures together. Many shall greet another with gifts across the gannet’s bath;
the ring-necked ship shall bring over the sea tribute and tokens of love. I know these nations will be made fast against friend and foe, 1865 blameless in everything, in the old way.”

The protector of heroes, kinsman of Healfdene, gave him twelve great treasures in the hall;
bid him seek his own dear people in safety
with those gifts, and quickly come again.
1870 Then the good king, of noble kin, kissed that best of thanes and embraced his neck,
the Scylding prince; tears were shed
by that gray-haired man. He was of two minds—but in his old wisdom knew it was more likely 1875 that never again would they see one another, brave in their meeting-place. The man was so dear to him
that he could not hold back the flood in his breast, but in his heart, fast in the bonds of his thought,
a deep-felt longing for the dear man 1880 burned in his blood. Beowulf from thence, gold-proud warrior, trod the grassy lawn,
exulting in treasure; the sea-goer awaited its lord and owner, where it rode at anchor.
As they were going, the gift of Hrothgar 1885 was often praised; that king was peerless, blameless in everything, until old age took from him
—it has injured so many—the joy of his strength.

27

Those men of high courage then came to the sea,
that troop of young retainers, bore their ring-mail, 1890 locked shirts of armor. The coast-guard observed the return of those earls, as he had once before;

¹ Hrethel's son I.e., Hygelac.

he did not greet those guests with insults on the clifftop, but rode towards them, said that the warriors in their shining armor would be welcome in their ships to the people of the Weders.

The sea-curved prow, the ring-necked ship,
as it lay on the sand was laden with war-gear, with horses and treasures; the mast towered high over Hrothgar's hoard-gifts.

To the ship's guardian he¹ gave a sword, bound with gold, so that on the mead-benches
he was afterwards more honored by that heirloom, that old treasure. Onward they went, the ship sliced through deep water, gave up the Danish coast.

The sail by the mast was rigged fast with ropes,
a great sea-cloth; the timbers creaked,
the wind over the sea did not hinder at all the wave-floater on its way; the sea-goer sped on,
floated foamy-necked, forth upon the waves,
the bound prow over the briny streams,
until they could make out the cliffs of Geatland, familiar capes; the keel drove forward thrust by the wind, and came to rest on land.

Right away the harbor-guard was ready at the shore,
who for a long time had gazed far over the currents, eager for the beloved men;
he moored the broad-beamed ship on the beach fast with anchor-ropes, lest the force of the waves should drive away the handsome wooden vessel.
He bade that the nobleman's wealth be borne ashore,
armor and plated gold; they had not far to go to seek their dispenser of treasure, Hygelac son of Hrethel, where he dwelt at home with his companions, near the sea-wall.

The building was splendid, the king quite bold, high in his hall, Hygd² very young,
wise, well-mannered, though few winters had the daughter of Hæreth passed within the palace walls—yet not poor for that,
nor stingy of gifts to the Geatish people, of great treasures. She considered Thryth's pride,³ famous folk-queen, and her terrible crimes:

no man, however bold, among her own retainers dared to approach her, except as her prince,⁴ or dared to look into her eyes by day;

for he knew that deadly bonds, braided by hand,
were waiting for him—first the hand-grip,
and quickly after a blade appointed,
so that a patterned sword had to settle things, proclaim the execution. That is no queenly custom for a lady to perform—no matter how lovely—that a peace-weaver⁵ should deprive of life

a friendly man after a pretended affront.

The kinsman of Hemming⁶ put a halt to that:

then ale-drinkers told another tale,
said she caused less calamity to the people, less malicious evil, after she was given gold-adorned to the young champion, fair to that nobleman, when to Offa's floor

she sought a journey over the fallow sea at her father's wish, where she afterwards on the throne, famous for good things, used well her life while she had it,
held high love with that chief of heroes,

of all mankind, as men have told me,
the best between the two seas,
of all the races of men; therefore Offa,
in gifts and battle, spear-bold man,
was widely honored, and held in wisdom

his own homeland. From him arose Eomer

¹ Thryth's pride These lines are difficult. Some editions and translations read the name as "Modthryth"; the reading adopted here smoothes out a transition that is otherwise abrupt even by the standards of this poem. This "digression" on the character of a queen, with some elements of a folktale, is the counterpart to the story of Heremod in earlier sections.

² her prince I.e., as a husband; or else the line means "except the prince himself," i.e., her father.

³ peace-weaver This epithet reflects the common practice, whose sometimes tragic consequences are explored at length elsewhere in the poem, of settling intertribal feuds with a marriage between the daughter of one lord and the son of another.

⁴ kinsman of Hemming Offa I, fourth-century king of the continental Angles, not Offa II, the eighth-century king of Mercia. The elaborate praise offered to Offa I has been taken to suggest that the poem may have been written or circulated in the court of Offa II, but there is otherwise no evidence for this.

¹ he I.e., Beowulf.

² Hygd Hygelac's queen.

as a help to heroes, kinsman of Hemming,
grandson of Garmund, skilled in violence.

28

The hardy man¹ with his hand-picked troop went across the sand, trod the sea-plain,
the wide shore. The world's candle shone, hastening from the south. They had survived their journey,
went boldly to where they knew the protector of earls, slayer of Ongentheow,² good young battle-king, gave out rings in his fortress. To Hygelac
the arrival of Beowulf was quickly reported, that to the enclosures his battle-companion,
protector of warriors, came walking alive
back to his court, safe from his battle-play.
Quickly, as the powerful one commanded,
the hall was cleared out inside for the foot-guests.

He sat down with him, he who had survived the fight,
kinsmen together, after he greeted his friend and liege-lord with a formal speech, with courteous words and cups of mead.
The daughter of Hæreth passed through the hall, cared for the people, bore the cup to the hand of the hero.³ Hygelac began to question his companion courteously in the high hall—curiosity pressed him to know how the sea-Geats' adventures had gone:

"How did you fare, beloved Beowulf,
in your journey, when you suddenly resolved to seek a far-off strife over the salt sea, a battle in Heorot? Did you better at all the well-known woe of Hrothgar, the famous prince? For that I seethed with heart-care and distress, mistrusted the adventure of my beloved man; long I implored that you not seek that slaughter-spirit at all, let the south-Danes themselves make war against Grendel. I say thanks to God that I might see you again safe and sound."

Beowulf spoke, son of Ecgtheow:

"It is no mystery to many men,
my lord Hygelac—the great meeting,
what a time of great struggle Grendel and I had in that place where he made so many sorrows for the victory-Scyldings, life-long misery—I avenged them all,
so that none of Grendel's tribe needs to boast anywhere on earth of that uproar at dawn, whoever lives longest of that loathsome kind, enveloped in foul evil. First I came there to the ring-hall to greet Hrothgar;
quickly the famous kinsman of Healfdene,
once he knew of my intentions,
assigned me a seat with his own sons.
That troop was in delight; never in my life have I seen among hall-sitters, under heaven's vault, a more joyous feast. At times the famous queen, bond of peace to nations, passed through the hall, urged on her young sons; often she gave twisted rings before she took her seat.
At times before the hall-thanes the daughter of Hrothgar bore the ale-cup to the earls in the back—Freawaru, I heard the men in the hall
call her, when the studded treasure-cup was passed among them. She is promised, young, gold-adorned, to the gracious son of Froda;⁴
the ruler of the Scyldings has arranged this,
the kingdom's shepherd, and approves the counsel that he might settle his share of feud and slaughter with this young woman. But seldom anywhere after the death of a prince does the deadly spear rest for even a brief while, though the bride be good!

"It may, perhaps, displease the Heathobards' prince,
and every retainer among his tribe,

¹ The hardy man I.e., Beowulf.

² slayer of Ongentheow I.e., Hygelac. The death of the Swedish king Ongentheow (at the hands of Wulf and Eofor, retainers of Hygelac) is told below, section 40.

³ to the hand of the hero The manuscript reads "to the hands of heathens," which makes sense, but is usually emended. The "daughter of Hæreth" is Hygd.

⁴ the gracious son of Froda Ingeld, prince of the Heathobards. His attack on the Danes, alluded to earlier in the poem (80–85), was apparently unsuccessful; another Old English poem, Widsith reports that "Hrothulf and Hrothgar ... humbled Ingeld's battle-array."

when across the floor, following that woman, goes a noble son of the Danes, received with honors;
 on him glitters an ancestral heirloom, hard, ring-adorned, once a Heathobard treasure
 as long as they were able to wield their weapons—

29 until in that deadly shield-play they undid their beloved comrades and their own lives.

 Then an old spear-bearer¹ speaks over his beer, who sees that ring-hilt and remembers all the spear-deaths of men—his spirit is grim—begins, sad-minded, to test the mettle
 of a young thane with his innermost thoughts,
 to awaken war, and says these words:

“Can you, my friend, recognize that sword, which your father bore into battle
 in his final adventure beneath the helmet, that dear iron, when the Danes struck him,
 ruled the field of slaughter after the rout of heroes,
 when Withergyld² fell—those valiant Scyldings?
 Now here some son or other of his slayer walks across this floor, struts in his finery, brags of the murder and bears that treasure which ought, by right, to belong to you.”

“He urges and reminds him on every occasion with cruel words, until the time comes that Freawaru’s thane, for his father’s deeds, sleeps, bloodstained from the bite of a sword, forfeits his life; from there the other escapes alive, for he knows the land well.
 Then on both sides the sworn oaths of earls will be broken, once bitter violent hate wells up in Ingeld, and his wife-love grows cooler after his surging cares.
 Thus I expect that the Heathobards’ part in the Danish alliance is not without deceit, nor their friendship fast.

an old spear-bearer I.e., of the Heathobards, outraged by the presence of his former enemies, the Danes. In heroic poetry when a warrior falls, his killer is often awarded his armor; the sword is a vivid reminder of the fate of its former owner and the duty of revenge that is passed on to the next generation.

Withergyld Apparently a famous Heathobard warrior.

“I will speak further concerning Grendel, so that you might certainly know, giver of treasure, how it turned out,

 the heroic wrestling-match. When heaven’s gem slipped under the ground, the angry spirit came, horrible, evening-grim, sought us out where, unharmed, we guarded the hall.
 The attack came first against Hondscio³ there, deadly to that doomed man—he fell first,
 a girded champion; Grendel was that famous young retainer’s devourer, gobbled up the body of that beloved man.
 None the sooner did that slayer, blood in his teeth,
 mindful of misery, mean to leave that gold-hall empty-handed,
 but in his mighty strength he tested me, grabbed with a ready hand. A glove⁴ hung huge, grotesque, fast with cunning clasps;
 it was all embroidered with evil skill,
 with the devil’s craft and dragons’ skins.
 Inside there, though I was innocent,
 that proud evil-doer wanted to put me,
 one of many; but it was not to be,
 once I angrily stood upright.

30⁵

“It is too long to tell how I handed back payment to the people’s enemy for all his evils—
 there, my prince, I did honor to your people with my actions. He escaped away, enjoyed his life a little while longer;
 yet behind him, guarding his path, was his right hand in Heorot, and wretched, he went hence, sad at heart, and sank to the sea-floor.

³ Hondscio We finally learn the name of the retainer killed in section 11. The name, as in modern German, means “glove.”

⁴ glove It is not clear what this is, but apparently it is a pouch of some kind. It is characteristic of a troll in Norse legend. In any case it does not figure in the narrator’s own description of Grendel’s attack, and is but one of the discrepancies between the two tellings of the story. Is Beowulf embellishing his tale? Or do such inconsistencies matter in a story like this?

⁵ 30 The placement of this section is conjectural; the MS sectional divisions are confused at this point.

“For that bloody onslaught the friend of the Scyldings repaid me greatly with plated gold, many treasures, when morning came,
 and we had gathered together to the feast again.
 There was song and joy; the aged Scylding,¹ widely learned, told of far-off times;
 at times the brave warrior touched the song-wood, delight of the harp, at times made lays both true and sad, at times strange stories
 he recounted rightly. That great-hearted king, gray-bearded old warrior wrapped in his years,
 at times began to speak of his youth again,
 his battle-strength; his heart surged within him
 when, old in winters, he remembered so much.
 And so there inside we took our ease all day long, until night descended again upon men. There, quickly ready with revenge for her griefs, Grendel’s mother journeyed sorrowful; death took her son, the war-hate of the Weders. That monstrous woman avenged her son, killed a soldier boldly at once—there the life of Æschere, wise old counselor, came to its end.
 And when morning came the men of the Danes were not able to burn his death-weary body with flames, nor place him on a funeral pyre, beloved man; she bore away his corpse
 in her evil embrace under the upland streams.
 That, to Hrothgar, was the most wrenching distress of all those that had befallen that folk-leader.
 Then the prince—by your life—implored me,
 his mind wracked, that in the roaring waves
 I should do a noble deed, put my life in danger, perform glorious things—he promised me reward.
 In the waves I found, as is widely known,
 a grim, horrible guardian of the abyss.
 There for a while, we fought hand-to-hand;
 the sea foamed with blood, and I severed the head of Grendel’s mother with a mighty sword in that [battle-]hall;² I barely managed to get away with my life—I wasn’t doomed yet—and the protector of earls once again gave me

 many treasures, that kinsman of Healfdene.

31

“So that nation’s king followed good customs;
 in no wise have I lost those rewards,
 the prize for my strength, but the son of Healfdene offered me treasures at my own choice,
 which I wish to bring to you, o war-king,
 to show good will. Still all my joys are fixed on you alone; I have few close kinsmen, my Hygelac, except for you.”

He ordered to be borne in the boar standard,
 the helmet towering in battle, the gray byrnie,
 the decorated sword, and told this story:
 “Hrothgar gave me this battle-gear, wise prince, and commanded particularly that first I should tell you the story of his gift—
 he said that Heorogar³ the king first had it, lord of the Scyldings, for a long while;
 none the sooner would he give to his own son,
 the valiant Heorowearð—loyal though he was—that breast-armor. Use all well!”
 Then, as I’ve heard, four swift horses, fallow as apples, well-matched, followed that war-gear; he gave him as a gift
 the horses and harness—as kinsman should behave, never knitting a net of malice for another with secret plots, preparing death for his hand-picked comrades. Hygelac’s nephew was loyal to him, hardy in the fight, and each man to the other mindful of benefits.—
 I heard that he gave the necklace to Hygd, the wondrous ornamented treasure which Wealhtheow had given him, to that lord’s daughter, along with three horses graceful and saddle-bright; her breast was adorned the more graciously after that ring-giving.

So the son of Ecgtheow showed himself brave, renowned for battles and noble deeds,
 pursued honor, by no means slew, drunken,

¹ the friend of the Scyldings ... Scylding It is not clear whether this is Hrothgar or not, or how many storytellers and singers are at this banquet.

² [battle-]hall A word is missing; other editors and translators supply different words, such as grund or “earth.”

³ Heorogar I.e., the eldest brother of Hrothgar.

2180 his hearth-companions; he had no savage heart, but the great gift which God had given him,
the greatest might of all mankind, he held, brave in battle. He had been long despised,¹ as the sons of the Geats considered him no good, 2185 nor did the lord of the Weders wish to bestow
many good things upon him on the mead-benches, for they assumed that he was slothful, a cowardly nobleman. Reversal came to the glorious man for all his griefs.

2190 The protector of earls, battle-proud king, ordered the heirloom of Hrethel² brought in, adorned with gold; among the Geats there was no finer treasure in the form of a sword.
He laid the sword in Beowulf's lap, 2195 and gave him seven thousand hides of land,³ a hall and a princely throne. Both of them held inherited land in that nation, a home and native rights, but the wider rule was reserved to the one who was higher in rank.

2200 Then it came to pass⁴ amid the crash of battle
in later days, after Hygelac lay dead,
and for Heardred⁵ the swords of battle held deadly slaughter under the shield-wall,
when the Battle-Scyflings sought him out,
2205 those hardy soldiers, and savagely struck down
the nephew of Hereric in his victorious nation—
then came the broad kingdom
into Beowulf's hands; he held it well for fifty winters—he was then a wise king, 2210 old guardian of his homeland—until in the dark nights a dragon began his reign, who guarded his hoard in the high heaths
and the steep stone barrows; the path below

¹ So the son ... long despised The reasons for ascribing to the hero an unpromising youth, elsewhere not mentioned, are not clear.

² Hrethel I.e., the father of Hygelac.

³ seven thousand hides of land The "hide" is a unit of land, originally the amount of land that could support a peasant and his family; its actual size varied from one region to another. Seven thousand hides is by any measure a very generous gift.

⁴ Then it came to pass This section is easier to follow if the reader refers to the Genealogies. The stories are told in greater detail later in the poem.

⁵ Heardred I.e., son of Hygelac.

lay unknown to men. Some sort of man 2215 went inside there, found his way to the heathen hoard—his hand ...
inlaid with jewels.⁶ He⁷ got no profit there, though he had been trapped in his sleep
by a thief's trickery: the whole nation knew, 2220 and all the people around them, that he was enraged.

32

Not for his own sake did he who sorely harmed him break into that worm-hoard, or by his own will,
but in sad desperation some sort of slave⁸
of a warrior's son fled the savage lash, 2225 the servitude of a house, and slipped in there, a man beset by sins. Soon he gazed around and felt the terror of that evil spirit;
yet ...⁹

... made ...

2230 ... when the terror seized him
he snatched a jeweled cup.

There were many such antique riches in that earth-hall,
for in ancient days an unknown man had thought to hide them carefully there, 2235 the rich legacy of a noble race, precious treasures. In earlier times death had seized them all, and he who still survived alone from that nation's army lingered there,
a mournful sentry, expected the same,
2240 that he might enjoy those ancient treasures for just a little while. A waiting barrow stood in an open field near the ocean waves,
new on the cape, safe with crafty narrow entrances;
he bore within the noble wealth,

⁶ inlaid with jewels The manuscript is damaged here and some text is unreadable. Among many conjectural restorations one thing is clear—a cup is taken from the dragon's hoard.

⁷ He I.e., the thief; "he" in the following line refers to the dragon. These lines are nearly illegible, and other readings have been proposed.

⁸ slave The word is illegible in the manuscript; the translation follows most editions.

⁹ ... The manuscript is unreadable at this point.

the plated gold, that guardian of rings,
a share worthy of a hoard, and spoke few words:

"Hold now, o thou earth, for heroes cannot,
the wealth of men—Lo, from you long ago
those good ones first obtained it! Death in war, and awful deadly harm have swept away
all of my people who have passed from life, and left the joyful hall. Now have I none to bear the sword or burnish the bright cup,
the precious vessel—all that host has fled.
Now must the hardened helm of hammered gold be stripped of all its trim; the stewards sleep who should have tended to this battle-mask.
So too this warrior's coat, which waited once the bite of iron over the crack of boards, molders like its owner. The coat of mail cannot travel widely with the war-chief, beside the heroes. Harp-joy have I none, no happy song; nor does the well-schooled hawk soar high throughout the hall, nor the swift horse stamp in the courtyards. Savage butchery has sent forth many of the race of men!"

So, grieving, he mourned his sorrow, alone after all. Unhappy sped both days and nights, until the flood of death broke upon his heart. An old beast of the dawn found that shining hoard standing open—he who, burning, seeks the barrows,
a fierce and naked dragon, who flies by night in a pillar of fire; people on earth fear him greatly. It is his nature to find a hoard in the earth, where, ancient and proud, he guards heathen gold, though it does him no good.¹

Three hundred winters that threat to the people held in the ground his great treasury, wondrously powerful, until one man made him boil with fury; he² bore to his liege-lord the plated cup, begged for peace from his lord. Then the hoard was looted, the hoard of rings fewer, a favor was granted the forlorn man; for the first time his lord looked on that ancient work of men.

When the dragon stirred, strife was renewed;
he slithered along the stones, stark-hearted he found his enemy's footprint—he had stepped too far in his stealthy skill, too close to the serpent's head.
Thus can an undoomed man easily survive
wrack and ruin, if he holds to the Ruler's grace and protection!³ The hoard-guardian searched along the ground, greedy to find the man who had sorely harmed him while he slept;
hot, half-mad, he kept circling his cave
all around the outside, but no one was there in that wilderness to welcome his warfare and the business of battle. Soon he returned to his barrow,
sought his treasure; he soon discovered that some man had disturbed his gold, his great wealth. The hoard-guardian waited impatiently until evening came;
the barrow's shepherd was swollen with rage,
the loathsome foe would repay with fire his precious drinking-cup. Then day was departed to the delight of that worm; he did not linger on the barrow wall, but took off burning in a burst of flames. The beginning was terror to the people on land, and to their ring-giving lord
the ending soon would be sore indeed.

33

Then that strange visitor began to spew flames and burn the bright courts; his burning gleams struck horror in men. That hostile flier would leave nothing alive.
The worm's warfare was widely seen,
his ferocious hostility, near and far,
how the destroyer hated and harmed
the Geatish people, then hastened to his hoard, his dark and hidden hall, before the break of day.
He had surrounded the people of that region with fire,
flames and cinders; he took shelter in his barrow,
his walls and warfare—but that trust failed him.
To Beowulf the news was quickly brought

¹ It is his nature ... good The association of dragons and hoarded treasure is ancient and proverbial.

² he I.e., the thief.

³ Thus can ... protection This is the narrator's version of Beowulf's comment at lines 572–73.

2325 of that horror—that his own home, best of buildings, had burned in waves of fire, the gift-throne of the Geats. To the good man that was painful in spirit, greatest of sorrows;
the wise one believed he had bitterly offended 2330 the Ruler of all, the eternal Lord, against the old law; his breast within groaned with dark thoughts—that was not his custom.
The fire-dragon had razed that fortress,
the folk-stronghold, with searing flames 2335 within and without; for that the war-king, prince of the Weders, devised revenge.
Then the lord of men bade them make,
protector of warriors, a wondrous war-shield,
all covered with iron; he understood well 2340 that wood from the forest would not help him, linden against flames. The long-good nobleman had to endure the end of his loaned days, this world's life—and so did the worm,
though he had held for so long his hoarded wealth.
2345 Then that prince of rings scorned to seek out the far-flung flier with his full force of men,
a large army; he did not dread that attack,
nor did he worry much about the dragon's warfare,
his strength or valor, because he had survived 2350 many battles, barely escaping alive in the crash of war, after he had cleansed, triumphant hero, the hall of Hrothgar,
and crushed Grendel and his kin in combat,
that loathsome race.

It was not the least 2355 of hand-to-hand combats when Hygelac was slain;
in the chaos of battle, the king of the Geats,
the lord of his people, in the land of the Frisians,
the son of Hrethel, died sword-drunk, beaten by blades. Beowulf escaped from there 2360 through his own strength, took a long swim;
he had in his arms the battle-armor of thirty men, when he climbed to the cliffs.
By no means did the Hetware¹ need to exult
in that fight, when they marched on foot to him, 2365 bore their linden shields; few came back from that brave soldier to seek their homes.

¹ Hetware I.e., a Frankish tribe apparently on the side of the Frisians.

The son of Ecgtheow crossed the vast sea,
wretched, solitary, returned to his people,
where Hygd offered him the hoard and kingdom, 2370 rings and royal throne; she did not trust that her son could hold the ancestral seat against foreign hosts, now that Hygelac was dead.
But despite their misery, by no means could they prevail upon that prince at all 2375 that he should become lord over Heardred, or choose to rule the kingdom.
Yet he upheld him² in the folk with friendly counsel,
good will and honors, until he was older,
and ruled the Weder-Geats.

Wretched exiles,
2380 the sons of Ohthere,³ sought him out across the seas;
they had rebelled against the Scyldings' ruler,⁴
the best of all the sea-kings who dispensed treasure in the Swedish lands, a famous king. That cost him⁵ his life:
2385 for his hospitality he took a mortal hurt with the stroke of a sword, that son of Hygelac;
and the son of Ongentheow afterwards went to seek out his home, once Heardred lay dead,
and let Beowulf hold the high throne
2390 and rule the Geats—that was a good king.

34

In later days he⁶ did not forget that prince's fall, and befriended Eadgils
the wretched exile; across the open sea

² upheld him Beowulf upheld Heardred, as champion and in effect a kind of regent.

³ sons of Ohthere I.e., Eanmund and Eadgils.

⁴ Scyldings' ruler Onela, son of Ongentheow. Ohthere had succeeded his father Ongentheow, but after his death his brother Onela apparently seized the throne and drove the two young men Eanmund and Eadgils into exile. They take refuge at the Geatish court, for which Heardred is attacked and killed by Onela. Later Eanmund is killed by Weohstan (see section 36 below) but Eadgils, with the help of Beowulf, becomes king (section 34).

⁵ him I.e., Heardred.

⁶ he I.e., Beowulf, whose revenge for the death of his lord Heardred takes a curiously indirect form—he supports Eadgils' return to Sweden, where Onela is killed.

he gave support to the son of Ohthere with warriors and weapons. He¹ wreaked his revenge with cold sad journeys, and took the king's life.

And so the son of Ecgtheow had survived every struggle, every terrible onslaught, with brave deeds, until that one day
when he had to take his stand against the serpent.
Grim and enraged, the lord of the Geats took a dozen men² to seek out the dragon;
he had found out by then how the feud arose,
the baleful violence; the precious vessel had come to him through the thief's hands.
He was the thirteenth man among that troop,
who had brought about the beginning of that strife,
a sad-minded captive—wretched and despised he led the way to that plain. He went against his will to where he alone knew the earth-hall stood,
an underground cave near the crashing waves,
the surging sea; inside it was full of gems and metal bands. A monstrous guardian, eager for combat, kept his gold treasures ancient under the ground; getting them was no easy bargain for any man.

The battle-hardened king sat down on the cape,
then wished good health to his hearth-companions,
the gold-friend of the Geats. His heart was grieving, restless, ripe for death—the doom was immeasurably near

that was coming to meet that old man, seek his soul's treasure, split asunder his life and his body; not for long was the spirit of that noble king enclosed in its flesh.

Beowulf spoke, the son of Ecgtheow:
“In my youth I survived many storms of battle,
times of strife—I still remember them all.
I was seven years old when the prince of treasures,
friend to his people, took me from my father;³
Hrethel the king held me and kept me,
gave me gems and feasts, remembered our kinship.
I was no more hated to him while he lived

—a man in his stronghold—than any of his sons,
Herebeald and Hæthcyn and my own Hygelac.

2435 For the eldest,⁴ undeservedly,
a death-bed was made by the deeds of a kinsman,
after Hæthcyn with his horn bow struck down his own dear lord with an arrow—
he missed his mark and killed his kinsman, 2440 one brother to another with a bloody shaft.
That was a fight beyond settling, a sinful crime, shattering the heart; yet it had to be that a nobleman lost his life unavenged.

“It was as sad as if an old man 2445 should live to see his young son ride on the gallows⁵—let him recount a story, a sorry song, while his son hangs a comfort only to the ravens, and he cannot,
though old and wise, offer him any help.
2450 Each and every morning calls to mind his son's passing away; he will not care to wait for any other heir or offspring in his fortress, when the first one has tasted evil deeds and fell death.
2455 He looks sorrowfully on his son's dwelling,
the deserted wine-hall, the windswept home,
bereft of joy—the riders sleep,
heroes in their graves; there is no harp-music,
no laughter in the court, as there had been long before.

35

2460 “He takes to his couch and keens a lament
all alone for his lost one; all too vast to him seem the fields and townships.

“So the protector of the Weders⁶ bore surging in his breast heartfelt sorrows

⁴ eldest I.e., Herebeald.

⁵ It was as sad ... gallows It is usually suggested that this is a kind of epic simile, comparing Hrethel's grief over his son's death—a death beyond the scope of vengeance—to the grief of a criminal's father, who cannot claim compensation for the execution of his son. Mitchell and Robinson suggest that this is rather a reference to a pagan practice, part of the cult of Odin, in which the body of a man who did not die in battle was ritually hanged on a gallows. If this interpretation is correct, the “old man” is Hrethel himself.

⁶ the protector of the Weders I.e., Hrethel.

¹ He I.e., Eadgils.

² a dozen men Literally “one of twelve”—Beowulf, Wiglaf, and ten others. The thief who leads the way is the thirteenth man.

³ took me ... father Beowulf was brought up as a noble foster-child in the royal court.

for Herebeald. He could not in any way 2465 make amends for the feud with his murderer, but neither could he hate that warrior
 for his hostile deeds, though he was not dear to him.
 Then with the sorrow which oppressed him too sorely,
 he gave up man's joys, chose God's light;¹ 2470 he left to his children his land and strongholds
 —as a blessed man does—when he departed this life.

"Then there was strife between Swedes and Geats,² a quarrel in common across the wide water, hard hostility after Hrethel died, 2475 until the sons of Ongentheow³ were bold and warlike, wanted no peace over the sea, but around the Hill of Sorrows⁴
 they carried out a terrible and devious campaign.
 My friends and kinsmen got revenge for those 2480 feuds and evils⁵—as it is said—

although one of them paid for it with his own life, a hard bargain; that battle was fatal
 for Hæthcyn, king of the Geats.

Then, I've heard, the next morning, one kinsman 2485 avenged the other with the sword's edge,⁶ when Ongentheow attacked Eofor;
 his battle-helm slipped, the old Scylfing staggered, corpse-pale; Eofor's hand recalled his fill of feuds, and did not withhold the fatal blow.

"I have paid in battle for the precious treasures 2490 he⁷ gave me, as was granted to me, with a gleaming sword; he gave me land,
 a joyous home. He had no need to have to go seeking among the Gifthas 2495 or the Spear-Danes or the Swedes

God's light I.e., he died.

² strife between Swedes and Geats This refers to a time a generation before the conflicts of Heardred, Eanmund, and Eadgils; the Swedish-Geatish feud is longstanding.

³ sons of Ongentheow I.e., Ohthere and Onela.

⁴ Hill of Sorrows A hill in Geatland, in OE Hreosnabeorh.

⁵ My friends ... evils The scene of this revenge is apparently Sweden, in a place called "Ravenswood"; this battle is described again in sections 40 and 41.

⁶ one kinsman ... sword's edge Hygelac avenged the death of Hæthcyn on his slayer Ongentheow—not directly but through his man Eofor.

⁷ he I.e., Hygelac.

for a worse warrior, or buy one with his wealth;
 always on foot I would go before him,
 alone in the front line—and all my life

I will wage war, while this sword endures, 2500 which before and since has served me well, since I slew Dæghrefn, champion of the Hugas,⁸ with my bare hands in front of the whole army.
 He could not carry off to the Frisian king that battle-armor and that breast-adornment,⁹ 2505 but there in the field the standard-bearer fell,
 a nobleman in his strength; no blade was his slayer,
 but my warlike grip broke his beating heart,
 cracked his bone-house. Now the blade's edge, hand and hard sword, shall fight for the hoard."

Beowulf spoke, said boasting words for the very last time: "I have survived many battles in my youth; I will yet, an old folk-guardian, seek out a feud
 and do a glorious deed, if only that evildoer
 2515 will come out to me from his earth-hall."

Then for the last time he saluted
 each of the soldiers, his own dear comrades, brave in their helmets: "I would not bear a sword or weapon to this serpent, if I knew any other way

2520 I could grapple with this great beast¹⁰
 after my boast, as I once did with Grendel;
 but I expect the heat of battle-flames,
 steam and venom; therefore shield and byrnie will I have on me. From the hoard's warden

2525 I will not flee a single foot, but for us
 it shall be at the wall as wyrd decrees, the Ruler of every man. My mind is firm—
 I will forego boasting against this flying foe.
 Wait on the barrow, protected in your byrnies, 2530 men in war-gear, to see which of the two of us after the bloody onslaught can better bear his wounds. This is not your path, nor proper for any man except me alone

⁸ Hugas The Hugas, like the Hetware, are Frankish tribes allied to the Frisians; the battle in question may be the same as Hygelac's fatal raid.

⁹ breast-adornment Possibly the same as the necklace described in 1195–1214.

¹⁰ great beast The OE word æglæcan is here used to refer to the dragon.

that he should match his strength against this monster, do heroic deeds. With daring I shall get that gold—or grim death and fatal battle will bear away your lord!”

Then that brave challenger stood up by his shield, stern under his helmet, bore his battle-shirt
under the stone-cliffs, trusted the strength of a single man—such is not the coward’s way.
He saw then by the wall—he who had survived a great many conflicts, good in manly virtues, the crash of battles when footsoldiers clashed—
stone arches standing, and a stream shooting forth from the barrow; its surge was hot with deadly flames, and near the hoard he could not survive for very long unburnt, for the dragon’s flaming breath.
Enraged, the ruler of the Weder-Geats
let a word burst forth from his breast, shouted starkly; the sound echoed,
resounding battle-clear under the gray stone.
Hate was stirred up—the hoard-warden recognized the voice of a man; there was no more time to sue for peace. First there issued the steam of that great creature out of the stone,
hot battle-sweat; the earth bellowed.
The warrior in the barrow turned his shield-board against the grisly stranger, lord of the Geats, when the writhing beast’s heart was roused to seek combat. The good war-king had drawn his sword, its edges undulled, an ancient heirloom; each of the two hostile ones stood in horror of the other.
He stood stout-hearted behind his steep shield, beloved commander, when the worm coiled itself swiftly together—he waited in his war-gear.
Then coiled, burning, slithering he came, rushing to his fate. The shield defended well the life and limb of the famous lord for less time than he might have liked;
there on that day for the first time he faced the outcome,¹ and Fate did not grant victory in battle. The lord of the Geats raised his hand, struck that mottled horror

with his ancient sword, so that that edge failed, bright against the bony scales, bit less strongly than the king of that nation needed it to do, 2580 hard-pressed in battle. Then the barrow-warden was more savage after that stroke, and spit out gruesome fire; wide sprang the battle-flames. The gold-friend of the Geats did not boast of his glorious victories; his bare sword 2585 failed at need, as it should never have done, that ancient good iron. It was no easy journey when the great offspring of Ecgtheow had to give up ground in that place;
he was forced, against his will, to find 2590 a place of rest elsewhere—just as every one of us must give up these loaned days.

It was not long until those two great creatures² came together again.
The hoard-guard took heart, his breast swelled with breath
once again; he³ suffered anguish, 2595 trapped by flames, he who had once ruled his folk.
His comrades, hand-chosen, sons of noblemen,
did not take their stand in a troop around him with warlike valor—they fled to the woods and saved their lives. The spirit rose up in sorrow 2600 in the heart of one of them; nothing can overrule kinship at all, in one who thinks well.

36

He was called Wiglaf, Weohstan’s son,
a worthy shield-warrior, a prince of the Scylfings,⁴ kinsman of Ælfhere. He saw his liege-lord 2605 suffer heat under his war-helmet;
he recalled the honors he had received from him,
the wealthy homestead of the Waegmundings,
every folk-right that his father had possessed;

² creatures OE æglæcan again, here referring to Beowulf and the dragon together.

³ he I.e., Beowulf.

⁴ a prince of the Scylfings Wiglaf’s nationality is in question—he is both a Swede and a Wægmunding (like Beowulf; see lines 2813–14). His father fought on the Swedish side in their feuds with the Geats. Tribal allegiance is more fluid than modern nationality.

¹ for the first time ... outcome Or “if he could have controlled the outcome for the first time.”

he could not hold back—his hand seized 2610 the pale linden shield, and he drew his old sword.
 It was known among men as the heirloom of Eanmund, son of Ohthere; that friendless exile was slain in battle with the edge of that sword
 by Weohstan, who brought to his kinsman 2615 the burnished helmet, the ringed byrnie
 the old giant-work sword; Onela gave to him
 the war-equipment of his young kinsman,
 the shining armor—he never spoke of a feud,
 though he had slain his brother's son.¹ 2620 He² kept that war-gear for a great many years, the blade and byrnie, until his boy could perform brave deeds like his father before him;
 he gave him among the Geats that battle-gear,
 every piece of it, when, old, he departed this life 2625 and went forth. That was the first time that the young warrior had to weather
 the storm of battle beside his noble lord.
 His courage did not melt, nor did his kinsman's legacy weaken in war; the worm discovered that, 2630 when they began to meet together.

Wiglaf spoke, said to his companions
 many true words—he was mournful at heart—
 “I remember the time that we took mead together, when we made promises to our prince 2635 in the beer-hall—he gave us these rings—that we would pay him back for this battle-gear, these helmets and hard swords, if such a need as this ever befell him. For this he chose us from the army
 for this adventure by his own will, 2640 thought us worthy of glory, and gave me these treasures—
 for this he considered us good spear-warriors, proud helmet-wearers, even though our prince, shepherd of his people, intended to perform
 this act of courage all alone, 2645 because he has gained the most glory among men, reckless heroic deeds. Now the day has come that our noble lord has need of the support of good warriors; let us go to it, help our warlord, despite the heat, 2650 grim fire-terror. God knows for my part that I would much prefer that the flames should enfold

 my body alongside my gold-giving lord.
 It seems wrong to me that we should bear shields back to our land, unless we first might 2655 finish off this foe, defend the life of the prince of the Weders. I know full well that he does not deserve to suffer
 this torment all alone among the Geatish troop, or fall in the struggle; now sword and helmet, 2660 byrnie and battle-dress, shall be ours together!”
 He hurried through the deadly fumes, bore his helmet to the aid of his lord, spoke little:
 “Dear Beowulf, do all well, as in your youth you said you would,
 2665 that you would never let in your whole life your fame decline; now firm in deeds, single-minded nobleman, with all your strength
 you must protect your life—I will support you.”

After these words the worm came angrily, 2670 terrible vicious creature, a second time,
 scorched with surging flames, seeking out his enemies,
 the hated men. The hot flames rolled in waves, burned the shield to its rim; the byrnie was not of any use to the young soldier, 2675 but he showed his courage under his kinsman's shield, the young warrior, when his own was charred to cinders. Still the battle-king remembered his glory, and with his mighty strength swung his warblade with savage force, 2680 so that it stuck in the skull. Nægling shattered—
 the sword of Beowulf weakened at battle, ancient and gray. It was not granted to him that iron-edged weapons might ever help him in battle; his hand was too strong, 2685 he who, I am told, overtaxed every blade with his mighty blows, when he bore to battle a wound-hardened³ weapon—it was no help to him at all.

Then that threat to the people for a third time,
 fierce fire-dragon, remembering his feud,
 2690 rushed on the brave man, hot and bloodthirsty,

¹ he never ... brother's son Onela never spoke of a feud, though Weohstan had killed Onela's brother's son, for he wished him dead. As elsewhere in the poem, a sword is the reminder of both victory and vengeance.

² He I.e., Weohstan.

³ wound-hardened Or “wondrously hard”; the OE text is unclear.

when he saw the chance, seized him by the neck
in his bitter jaws; he was bloodied
by his mortal wounds—blood gushed in waves.

37

Then, I have heard, in his king's hour of need the earl¹ beside him showed his bravery,
the noble skill which was his nature.
He did not heed that head when he helped his kinsman;
that brave man's hand was burned, so that he struck that savage foe a little lower down, the soldier in armor, so that his sword plunged in bejeweled and bloody, so that the fire began to subside afterwards. The king himself still had his wits, drew the war-dagger, bitter and battle-sharp, that he wore in his byrnie;
the protector of the Weders carved through the worm's midsection.

They felled their foe—their force took his life—
and they both together had brought him down,
the two noble kinsmen; a thane at need, as a man should be! But that, for the prince, was his last work of victory, by his own will,
of worldly adventures.

When the wound
which the earth-dragon had worked on him began to burn and swell, he soon realized that in his breast was an evil force,
a poison welling; then the nobleman went,
still wise in thought, so that he sat on a seat by the wall. On that work of giants he gazed, saw how stone arches and sturdy pillars held up the inside of that ancient earth-hall.
Then with his hands the thane, immeasurably good,
bathed with water his beloved lord,
the great prince, spattered with gore,
sated with battle, and unstrapped his helmet.
Beowulf spoke—despite his wound,
that deadly cut—he knew clearly that his allotted life had run out, and his joys in the earth; all gone was his portion of days, death immeasurably near:

“Now I should wish to give my war-gear 2730 to my son, if there had been such, flesh of my flesh, if fate had granted me any heir. I held this people fifty winters; there was no folk-king,
not any of the neighboring tribes, 2735 who dared to face me with hostile forces or threaten attack. The decrees of fate
I awaited on earth, held well what was mine,
I sought no intrigues, nor swore many false or wrongful oaths. For all that I may 2740 have joy, though sick with mortal wounds, because the Ruler of men need not reproach me with the murder of kinsmen, when my life quits my body. Now go quickly to look at the hoard under the hoary stone, 2745 dear Wiglaf, now that the worm lies dead,
sleeps with his wounds, stripped of his treasure.
Hurry, so I might witness that ancient wealth, those golden goods, might eagerly gaze on the bright precious gems, and I might more gently, 2750 for that great wealth, give up my life and lordship, which I have held so long.”

38

Then swiftly, I have heard, the son of Weohstan
after these words obeyed his lord, sick with wounds, wore his ring-net,
2755 the woven battle-shirt, under the barrow's roof.
As he went by the seat he saw there, triumphant,
the brave young warrior; many bright jewels,
glittering gold scattered on the ground,
wonders on the walls, and the lair of that worm, 2760 the old dawn-flier—flagons standing, ancient serving-vessels without a steward,
their trappings all moldered; there was many a helmet old and rusty, a number of arm-bands with twisted ornaments.—Treasure may easily, 2765 gold in the ground, give the slip to any one of us: let him hide it who will!²—

¹ the earl I.e., Wiglaf.

² give the slip ... who will Or “can get the better of any man—heed [these words] who will!” The OE is uncertain; the translation follows Mitchell and Robinson.

Likewise he saw an ensign, all golden,
 hanging high over the hoard, greatest hand-work,
 linked together with skill; light gleamed from it so that he could see the cave's floor, survey those strange artifacts. There was no sign of the serpent there—a sword had finished him off.
 Then the hoard in that barrow, as I've heard, was looted,
 ancient work of giants, by one man alone;
 he piled in his arms cups and plates,
 whatever he wanted; he took the ensign too, brightest of beacons. His aged lord's blade —its edge was iron—had earlier harmed
 the one who was protector of those treasures for such a long time, who bore his fiery terror flaming before the hoard, seething fiercely in the darkest night, until he died a bloody death.

The messenger rushed out, eager to return, burdened with treasures; he was burning to know whether, stout-hearted, he would find still alive
 the prince of the Weders, weakened by wounds, in the place where he had left him on that plain.
 Then with the treasures he found the famous prince,
 his own lord, his life at an end,
 all bloody; he began once more to sprinkle water on him, until the point of a word escaped from his breast.¹

Old, full of grief, he looked on the gold:
 "For all these treasures, I offer thanks
 with these words to the eternal Lord,
 King of Glory, for what I gaze upon here,
 that I was able to acquire such wealth
 for my people before my death-day.
 Now that I have sold my old lifespan for this hoard of treasures, they will attend² to the needs of the people; I can stay no longer.
 The brave in battle will bid a tomb be built shining over my pyre on the cliffs by the sea;
 it will be as a monument to my people and tower high on Whale's Head,
 so that seafarers afterwards shall call it

'Beowulf's Barrow,' when their broad ships they drive from afar over the darkening flood."

The boldminded nobleman took from his neck
 a golden circlet, and gave it to the thane,
 the young spear-carrier, and the gold-covered helmet,
 ring and byrnie, bid him use them well:
 "You are the last survivor of our lineage,
 the Waegmundings; fate has swept away
 all of my kinsmen, earls in their courage, to their final destiny; I must follow them."
 That was the last word of the old warrior,
 his final thought before he chose the fire,
 the hot surging flames—from his breast flew his soul to seek the judgment of the righteous.³

39

Then it came to pass with piercing sorrow that the young warrior had to watch his most precious lord fare so pitifully, his life at an end. Likewise his slayer lay dead,
 the awesome earth-dragon deprived of his life,
 overcome by force. The coiled serpent could no longer rule his hoard of rings—edges of iron did away with him,
 the hard, battle-scarred shards of the smithy,
 so that the wide-flier, stilled by his wounds,
 toppled to the ground near his treasure-house.
 No more soaring about in the skies
 at midnight, preening in his precious treasures, showing his face—he fell to earth
 through that war-commander's handiwork.
 Indeed, few men on earth, no matter how strong,
 could succeed at that, as I have heard tell,
 though he were daring in every deed,
 could rush against the reek of that venomous foe,
 or rifle through that ring-hall with his hands,
 if he should find a waking warden

¹ Half a line (or more?) is missing from the manuscript at this point.

² they will attend Usually translated "you [Wiglaf] will attend . . ."; the OE verb may be indicative or imperative, but it is unambiguously plural, and the imperative plural is not used elsewhere in the poem to address a single person.

³ the judgment of the righteous Literally "the dom (fame) of the truth-fast," an ambiguous pronouncement. It is not clear whether this means that Beowulf's soul will receive the sort of judgment that a righteous soul ought to receive (and so go to Heaven), or that it will be judged by those "fast in truth" (and so go to Hell as an unbaptized pagan).

waiting in that barrow. Beowulf's share of that royal treasure was repaid by his death—each of them had journeyed to the end of this loaned life.

It was not long before the men late for battle left the woods, those ten weak traitors all together who had not dared to hoist their spears when their lord of men needed them most; now shamefaced, they carried their shields and battle-dress to where the old man lay dead, to stare at Wiglaf. He sat exhausted, a foot-soldier at his lord's shoulder, tried to rouse him with water—but it was no use. He could not, no matter how much he wanted, keep the life in the body of his captain, nor change any bit of the Ruler's decree; the judgment of God would guide the deeds of every man, as it still does today. Then that youth was ready with a grim rebuke for those who had thrown away their courage. Wiglaf spoke, son of Weohstan, looked, sick at heart, on those unloved:

“Lo! the man who would speak the truth must say that the lord who gave you those gifts of treasures, the soldier's trappings you stand in there, when often on the ale-benches he handed out helmets and byrnie to the hall-sitters, a lord to his followers, whatever he could find the finest anywhere, far or near—that all that battle-dress he absolutely and entirely threw away, when war beset him. Our nation's king had no need to boast of his comrades-in-arms! But the Ruler of victories allowed that he, alone with his blade, might avenge himself when he needed your valor. Only a little life-protection could I offer him in battle, but began nevertheless to support my kinsman beyond my own strength; ever the worse was the deadly enemy when I struck with my sword, a fire less severe surging from his head. Too few supporters thronged around our prince in his great peril. Now the getting of treasure, the giving of swords, and all the happy joys of your homeland, shall end for your race; empty-handed will you go, every man, among your tribe, stripped of land-rights, when noblemen learn far and wide of your flight, your inglorious deed. Death is better for any earl than a life of dishonor!”

40

He ordered the battle-work announced to the camp up by the cliff's edge, where that troop of earls, shield-bearers, sat sad-minded 2895 all the long morning, expecting either the final day of their dear lord or his homecoming. He who rode up to the cape was not at all silent with his new tidings, but he spoke truly in the hearing of all:
2900 “Now is the joy-giver of the Geatish people, the lord of the Weders, laid on his deathbed, holding a place of slaughter by the serpent's deeds; beside him lies his life-enemy, sick with knife-slashes; he could not with his sword make in the monstrous beast
2905 any kind of wound. Wiglaf sits, Weohstan's offspring, over Beowulf, one earl over the other, now dead; he holds with desperate heart the watch 2910 over friend and foe.

“Now this folk may expect a time of trouble, when this is told to the Franks and Frisians, and the fall of our king becomes widespread news. The strife was begun hard with the Hugas, after Hygelac came 2915 traveling with his ships to the shores of Frisia, where the Hetware attacked him in war, advanced with valor and a vaster force, so that the warrior in his byrnie had to bow down, and fell amid the infantry; not at all did that lord 2920 give treasure to his troops. Ever after that the Merovingians have never shown us mercy.
“Nor do I expect any peace or truce from the Swedish nation, but it has been well-known that Ongentheow ended the life

2925 of Haethcyn, son of Hrethel, in Ravenswood,¹ when in their arrogant pride the Geatish people first sought out the Battle-Scylfings.
 Immediately the ancient father of Ohthere,
 old and terrifying, returned the attack—2930 the old warrior cut down the sea-captain,² rescued his wife, bereft of her gold, Onela's mother and Ohthere's;
 and then hunted down his deadly enemies
 until they escaped, with some difficulty, 2935 bereft of their lord, into Ravenswood.
 With his standing army he besieged those sword-leavings,
 weary, wounded; he kept threatening woe to that wretched troop the whole night through—in the morning, he said, with the edge of his sword 2940 he would gut them, and leave some on the gallows-tree as sport for birds.³ But for those sad-hearted men solace came along with the sunrise, after they heard Hygelac's horn and trumpet sounding the charge, when the good man came 2945 following the trail of that people's troop.

41

"The bloody swath of the Swedes and Geats,
 the slaughter of men, was easily seen,
 how the folk had stirred up feud between them.
 That good man⁴ then departed, old, desperate, 2950 with a small band of kinsmen, sought his stronghold,
 the earl Ongentheow turned farther away;
 he had heard of proud Hygelac's prowess in battle,
 his war-skill, and did not trust the resistance
 he might muster against the seafarers' might

¹ Nor do I ... Ravenswood See Section 35 above. The allusive complexity of the narration of human feuds and battles is in striking contrast to the straightforward telling of the hero's battles against non-human opponents.

² old warrior ... sea-captain I.e., Ongentheow killed Hæthcyn. Hygelac is not present at this battle, but arrives later.

³ he would gut them ... for birds Ongentheow may be threatening to sacrifice the corpses of his defeated enemies to a pagan god of war.

⁴ good man I.e., Ongentheow, whose vicious hostility toward the Geats does not earn him the narrator's censure.

2955 to defend from the wave-borne warriors his treasure, his women and children; he ran away from there, old, into his fortress. Then the pursuit was offered to the Swedish people, the standard of Hygelac overran the place of refuge, 2960 after the Hrethlings thronged the enclosure.
 There with the edge of a sword, Ongentheow,
 old graybeard, was brought to bay,
 so that the king of that nation had to yield to Eofor's will. Angrily he struck; 2965 Wulf the son of Wonred lashed at him with his weapon, so that with his blow the blood sprang in streams from under his hair. Yet the ancient Scylfing was undaunted, and dealt back quickly
 a worse exchange for that savage stroke, 2970 once the ruler of that people turned around.
 The ready son of Wonred could not give a stroke in return to the old soldier, for he had cut through the helmet right on his head
 so that he collapsed, covered in blood, 2975 fell to the ground—he was not yet fated to die,
 but he recovered, though the cut hurt him.
 The hardythane of Hygelac⁵ then let his broad blade, as his brother lay there, his ancient giant-made sword, shatter that gigantic helmet 2980 over the shield-wall; then the king stumbled, shepherd of his people, mortally stricken.
 "There were many there who bandaged his⁶ kinsman, quickly raised him up, when a way was clear for them,
 so that they had control of that killing field.
 2985 Then one warrior plundered another,⁷ took from Ongentheow the iron byrnie, his hard hilted sword and his helmet too,
 and carried the old man's armor to Hygelac.
 He⁸ took that war-gear and promised him gifts 2990 among his people—and he kept that promise;
 the king of the Geats repaid that carnage,
 the offspring of Hrethel, when he made it home,

⁵ thane of Hygelac I.e., Eofor, Wulf's brother.

⁶ his I.e., Eofor's.

⁷ one warrior plundered another I.e., Eofor plundered Ongentheow.

⁸ He I.e., Hygelac.

gave to Eofor and Wulf extravagant treasures,
gave them each lands and locked rings, worth a hundred thousand.¹ Not a man in this world could reproach those rewards, since they had won them with their deeds;

and to Eofor he gave his only daughter,
the pride of his home, as a pledge of his friendship.

"That is the feud and the fierce enmity,
savage hatred of men, that I expect now,
when the Swedish people seek us out after they have learned that our lord has perished, who had once protected his hoard and kingdom against all hostility, after the fall of heroes, the valiant Scyldings,² worked for the people's good, and what is more, performed noble deeds. Now we must hurry and look upon our people's king, and go with him who gave us rings on the way to the pyre. No small part of the hoard shall burn with that brave man, but countless gold treasures, grimly purchased,
and rings, here at last with his own life paid for; then the flames shall devour, the fire enfold—let no warrior wear treasures for remembrance, nor no fair maiden have a ring-ornament around her neck, but sad in mind, stripped of gold, she must walk a foreign path, not once but often,
now that leader of our troop has laid aside laughter,
his mirth and joy. Thus many a cold morning shall the spear be grasped in frozen fingers, hefted by hands, nor shall the sound of the harp
rouse the warriors, but the dark raven, greedy for carrion, shall speak a great deal,
ask the eagle how he fared at his feast

when he plundered corpses with the wolf."³

Thus that brave speaker was speaking a most unlovely truth; he did not lie much 3030 in words or facts. The troop of warriors arose;
they went, unhappy, to the Cape of Eagles,
with welling tears to look at that wonder.
There on the sand they found the soulless body of the one who gave them rings in earlier times 3035 laid out to rest; the last day had come for the good man, when the war-king, prince of the Weders, died a wondrous death.
But first they saw an even stranger creature,
a loathsome serpent lying on the plain 3040 directly across from him; grim with his colors
the fire-dragon was, and scorched with his flames.
He was fifty feet long, lying there stretched out; once he had joy in the air in the dark night, and then down he would go 3045 to seek his den, but now he was fast in death;
he had come to the end of his cave-dwelling.
Cups and vessels stood beside him,
plates lay there and precious swords, eaten through with rust, as if in the bosom of the earth 3050 they had lain for a thousand winters;
all that inheritance was deeply enchanted,
the gold of the ancients was gripped in a spell
so that no man in the world would be able to touch that ring-hall, unless God himself, 3055 the true King of Victories, Protector of men, granted to whomever He wished to open the hoard, to whatever person seemed proper to Him.⁴

42

Then it was plain that the journey did not profit
the one⁵ who had wrongfully hidden under a wall 3060 that great treasure. The guardian had slain

¹ a hundred thousand A monetary unit, though it is not clear which one.

² Scyldings The manuscript reading ("Scyldings" is a further object of "protected") is often emended to Scylfingas, i.e., Swedes, or scildwigan "shield-warriors"; the present reading is that of Mitchell and Robinson. As it stands in the manuscript, the Geatish herald is referring to Beowulf's earlier adventures against Grendel and his mother.

³ the dark raven ... the wolf The eagle, wolf, and raven, the "beasts of battle," are a recurring motif in Old English poetry.

⁴ unless God himself ... proper to Him The power of the pagan spell can be overruled by the will of the true God.

⁵ the one I.e., the dragon.

that one and few others;¹ then that feud was swiftly avenged. It is a wonder to say where a valiant earl should meet the end of his span of life, when he may no longer dwell in the mead-hall, a man with his kinsmen.
 So it was with Beowulf, when he sought the barrow's guardian

and a hostile fight; even he did not know how his parting from life should come to pass, since until doomsday mighty princes had deeply pronounced, when they placed it there, that the man who plundered that place would be harried by hostile demons, fast in hellish bonds, grievously tortured, guilty of sins,
 unless the Owner's grace had earlier more readily favored the one eager for gold.²

Wiglaf spoke, son of Weohstan:
 "Often many earls must suffer misery
 through the will of one man, as we have now seen.
 We could not persuade our dear prince,
 shepherd of a kingdom, with any counsel,
 that he should not greet that gold-guardian,
 let him lie there where he long had been,
 inhabit the dwellings until the end of the world:
 he held to his high destiny. The hoard is opened, grimly gotten; that fate was too great which impelled the king of our people thither.
 I was in there, and looked over it all,
 the hall's ornaments, when a way was open to me;
 by no means gently was a journey allowed in under that earth-wall. In eager haste I seized in my hands a great mighty burden of hoard-treasure, and bore it out hither to my king. He was still conscious then, thoughtful and alert; he spoke of many things,
 an old man in his sorrow, and ordered that I greet you;
 he asked that you build a great high barrow
 for your prince's deeds, in the place of his pyre,

mighty and glorious, since he was of men
 the most worthy warrior throughout the wide world, while he could enjoy the wealth of a hall.

Let us now make haste for one more time to see and seek out that store of cunning gems, the wonder under the wall; I will direct you so that you can inspect them up close, abundant rings and broad gold. Let the bier be ready,
 quickly prepared, when we come out,
 then let us bear our beloved lord,
 that dear man, to where he must long rest in the keeping of the Ruler."

Then the son of Weohstan, brave battle-warrior, let it be made known to many heroes and householders, that they should bring from afar
 the wood for the pyre to that good one,³
 the leader of his folk: "Now the flames must devour,
 the black blaze rise over the ruler of warriors,
 who often awaited the showers of iron when the storm of arrows hurled from bow-strings shot over the wall, the shafts did their duty swift on feather-wings, sent on the arrow-heads."

Lo, then the wise son of Weohstan summoned from that host some of the best of the king's thanes, seven altogether;
 he went, one of eight, under that evil roof;
 one of the brave warriors bore in his hands
 a flaming torch, and went before them.
 It was not chosen by lots who should loot that hoard,⁴ once the men saw it sitting in the hall,
 every part of it unprotected,
 lying there wasting; there was little lament that they should have to hurry out with the precious treasures. They also pushed the dragon, the worm over the cliff-wall, let the waves take him,
 the flood embrace the guard of that finery;
 then the twisted gold, an uncountable treasure, was loaded in a wagon, and the noble one was carried,
 the gray-haired warrior, to the Cape of Whales.

¹ that one and few others Or "that one of a few," i.e., "a unique man" or "a man of rare greatness."

² favored the one eager for gold The OE text is corrupt and the precise meaning of this passage is not certain; the present translation tries to incorporate several suggested interpretations. The general sense seems to be clear enough—the gold was cursed, and only God's special grace would enable anyone to remove it. What this implies about Beowulf's failure, and his moral status, is less clear.

³ that good one I.e., the dead Beowulf.

⁴ It was not chosen ... hoard I.e., everybody had a share; there was enough for all.

The people of the Geats then prepared for him a splendid pyre upon the earth, hung with battle-shields and helmets and bright byrnie, as he had bidden; there in the middle they laid the mighty prince, the heroes lamenting their dear lord. Then the warriors kindled there on the cliff the greatest of funeral pyres; dark over the flames the woodsmoke rose, the roaring fire mingled with weeping—the wind lay still—until it had broken that bone-house hot at the heart. With heavy spirits they mourned their despair, the death of their lord; and a sorrowful song sang the Geatish woman,¹ with hair bound up, for Beowulf the king, with sad cares, earnestly said that she dreaded the hard days ahead, the times of slaughter, the host's terror, harm and captivity. Heaven swallowed the smoke.

Then the Weder people wrought for him a barrow on the headland; it was high and broad, visible from afar to sea-voyagers, and in ten days they built the beacon

3160 of that battle-brave one; the ashes of the flames they enclosed with a wall, as worthily as the most clever of men could devise it. In the barrow they placed rings and bright jewels, all the trappings that those reckless men 3165 had seized from the hoard before, let the earth hold the treasures of earls, gold in the ground, where it yet remains, just as useless to men as it was before. Then round the mound rode the battle-brave men, 3170 offspring of noblemen, twelve in all, they wished to voice their cares and mourn their king, utter sad songs and speak of that man; they praised his lordship and his proud deeds judged well his prowess. As it is proper 3175 that one should praise his lord with words, should love him in his heart when the fatal hour comes, when he must from his body be led forth, so the men of the Geats lamented the fall of their prince, those hearth-companions;
3180 they said that he was of all the kings of the world the mildest of men and the most gentle, the kindest to his folk and the most eager for fame.
—?8TH–10TH CENTURY (EARLY 11TH CENTURY MANUSCRIPT)

¹ Geatish woman The manuscript is damaged throughout this section, and the readings in this passage are conjectural; it is not clear who the “Geatish woman” is, though her advanced age is indicated by her bound-up hair. Typically, in Germanic poetry, it is women (and poets) who mourn.

 IN CONTEXT

Background Material

Glossary of Proper Names

Abel	slain by his brother Cain ; the story is told in Genesis 4.1–16
Ælfhere	kinsman of Wiglaf
Æschere	a prominent Dane, advisor to Hrothgar ; slain by Grendel's mother
Battle-Scylding	see Scyldings
Battle-Scylfing	see Scylfings
Beanstan	father of Breca
Beowulf	(prologue) Danish king, son of Scyld
Breca	engaged in a youthful swimming contest with Beowulf
Bright-Danes	see Danes
Brondings	the people of Breca
Brosings	(= Old Norse Brísings) makers of the magical necklace of Freya in Norse myth, to which a necklace in the story is compared
Cain	slayer of Abel in Genesis 4.1–16; father of the race of monsters
Dæghrefn	a warrior of the Hugas slain by Beowulf in hand-to-hand combat during Hygelac 's ill-fated raid on the Frisians
Danes	Hrothgar 's people; the Scyldings ; also called Bright-, Half-, Ring-, Spear-, East-, West-, North-, and South-Danes
Eadgils	son of Ohthere , brother of Eanmund
Eanmund	son of Ohthere , brother of Eadgils ; slain by Weohstan
East-Danes	see Danes
Ecglaf	father of Unferth
Ecgtheow	father of Beowulf
Ecgwala	a Danish king; the "sons of Ecgwala" are the Danes
Eofor	a warrior of the Geats ; brother of Wulf ; slayer of Ongentheow ; son-in-law of Hygelac
Eomer	son of Offa
Eormanric	king of the Ostrogoths
Eotens	unclear; perhaps the Jutes , perhaps the Frisians , perhaps "giants" (the literal meaning of the word) as a nickname for one group or the other
Finn	king of the Frisians , husband of Hildeburh ; killed by Hengest
Finns	the people of Finland; the Lapps
Fitela	legendary companion, nephew (and son) of Sigmund
Folcwalda	father of Finn
Franks	a Germanic tribe; see Hetware , Hugas , Merovingians
Freawaru	daughter of Hrothgar betrothed to Ingeld
Frisians	a Germanic tribe; Finn 's people
Froda	chief of the Heathobards , father of Ingeld
Garmund	father of Offa
Geats	Hygelac 's people and Beowulf's; a Germanic tribe; also called War-Geats, Hrethmen, Hrethlings, Weders

Gifthas	an East Germanic tribe
Grendel	descendent of Cain; monstrous marauder of the Danes
Guthlaf	a Danish warrior, companion of Hengest
Hæreth	father of Hygd
Hæthcyn	Geatish prince, second son of Hrethel
Half-Danes	see Danes
Halga	Danish prince, younger brother of Hrothgar
Hama	legendary Goth; stole Brosings' necklace
Healfdene	king of the Danes, father of Hrothgar
Heardred	king of the Geats, son of Hygelac
Heathobards	Ingeld's people; a Germanic tribe
Heatholaf	a Wylfing slain by Ecgtheow
Heathoream	a Scandinavian tribe: Norwegians, more or less
Helmings	the family of Wealhtheow
Hemming	kinsman of Offa and Eomer
Hengest	leader of the Danes; killed Finn in Frisia
Heorogar	Dane, eldest brother of Hrothgar
Heorot	the great hall of Hrothgar
Heorowearð	Dane; son of Heorogar
Herebeald	Geatish prince, eldest son of Hrethel; killed by his brother Hæthcyn
Heremod	king of the Danes in the poem's distant past, before the Scylding dynasty; he came to a bad end
Hereric	brother of Hygd, uncle of Heardred
Hetware	a Frankish tribe, allied with the Frisians; fought against Hygelac
Hildeburh	sister of the Danish Hnæf, wife of the Frisian Finn
Hnæf	chief of the Half-Danes, brother of Hildeburh; killed by Finn
Hoc	Dane, father of Hildeburh and Hnæf
Hondscio	Geatish warrior, comrade of Beowulf; slain by Grendel
Honor-Scyldings	see Scyldings
Hrethel	king of the Geats, father of Hygelac, grandfather of Beowulf
Hrethlings	sons of Hrethel, i.e., the Geats
Hrethmen	the Geats
Hrethric	Dane, son of Hrothgar
Hrothgar	aged king of the Danes beset by Grendel; helped by Beowulf
Hrothmund	Dane, son of Hrothgar
Hrothulf	Dane, son of Halga, nephew of Hrothgar; not to be trusted
Hrunting	the sword of Unferth
Hugas	the Franks, allies of the Frisians
Hunlaf	father of one of the warriors in Hengest's troop
Hygd	queen of the Geats, wife of Hygelac, daughter of Hæreth
Hygelac	king of the Geats, uncle of Beowulf
Ingeld	prince of the Heathobards, son of Froda, betrothed to Freawaru; after the events narrated in the poem he presumably burns down the great hall of Heorot
Ingwines	the "friends of Ing": the Danes
Jutes	allies of the Frisians; see Eotens
Merovingians	the Franks
Nægling	Beowulf's sword

North-Danes	see Danes
Offa	king of the Angles, husband of Thryth
Ohthere	Swede, son of Ongentheow
Onela	Swede, son of Ongentheow ; usurped throne
Ongentheow	Swedish king; killed by Wulf and Eofor
Oslaf	a Danish warrior, companion of Hengest
Ring-Danes	see Danes
Scyld Scefing	legendary founder of the Danish royal family
Scyldings	the Danes; also called Battle-, Honor-, Victory-Scyldings
Scylfings	the Swedes
Sigemund	legendary Germanic hero, son of Wæls
South-Danes	see Danes
Spear-Danes	see Danes
Swerting	uncle of Hygelac
Thryth	(often construed as Modthryth) wife of Offa
Unferth	Danish spokesman ("thyle") and courtier of Hrothgar
Victory-Scyldings	see Scyldings
Volsung	another name for Sigemund , son of Wæls
Waegmundings	the family of Weohstan , Wiglaf , and Beowulf
Wæls	father of Sigemund
War-Geats	see Geats
Wealhtheow	Danish queen, wife of Hrothgar
Weders	the Geats
Weland	legendary Germanic smith
Wendels	a Germanic tribe; perhaps the Vandals, perhaps not
Weohstan	father of Wiglaf ; killed Eanmund
West-Danes	see Danes
Wiglaf	son of Weohstan , young retainer of Beowulf
Withergyld	a dead Heathobard
Wonred	a Geat, father of Wulf and Eofor
Wulf	a warrior of the Geats , brother of Eofor ; assisted in killing Ongentheow
Wulfgar	a warrior of the Danes ; herald at the court of Hrothgar
Wylfings	a Germanic tribe of which Heatholaf was a member, until Ecgtheow killed him
Yrmenlaf	a Dane, younger brother of Æschere

Genealogies

1. The Danes (Scyldings)

2. The Geats

3. The Swedes (Scylfings)

The Geatish-Swedish Wars

When the story of Beowulf's fight with the dragon begins, the narrator leaps over fifty years in one brief passage. It is a tumultuous condensation of a complex chain of events (2200–08):

Then it came to pass amid the crash of battle
in later days, after Hygelac lay dead,
and for Heardred the swords of battle held
deadly slaughter under the shield-wall,
when the Battle-Scylfings sought him out,
those hardy soldiers, and savagely struck down
the nephew of Hereric in his victorious nation—
then came the broad kingdom
into Beowulf's hands;

These events are referred to throughout the last thousand lines of the poem, but they are not told in a straightforward way or in chronological order. The fortunes of the Geatish royal house may be reconstructed as follows:

1. Hæthcyn accidentally kills his brother Herebeald; their father Hrethel dies of grief (2432–71). Hæthcyn becomes king of the Geats.
2. After the death of Hrethel, Ohthere and Onela, the sons of the Swedish king Ongentheow, attack the Geats (2472–78).
3. In retaliation, Hæthcyn attacks Ongentheow in Sweden (2479–84); at first he is successful, but he is later killed at Ravenswood (2922–41). Hygelac's men Wulf and Eofor kill Ongentheow, and Hygelac (Hæthcyn's brother) is victorious (2484–89, 2942–99). Hygelac becomes king of the Geats; Ohthere becomes king of the Swedes.
4. Hygelac is killed in Frisia; his son Heardred becomes king of the Geats (2354–78).
5. Ohthere's brother Onela seizes the Swedish throne and drives out the sons of Ohthere, Eanmund and Eadgils (2379–84). Heardred takes in these exiles, and Onela attacks Heardred for this hospitality and kills him. Onela allows Beowulf to rule the Geats (2385–90).
6. Around this time Weohstan, father of Wiglaf, kills Eanmund on behalf of Onela (2611–19).
7. Eadgils escapes, later to kill Onela in Sweden, with help sent by Beowulf (2391–96); he presumably becomes king of the Swedes.
8. During Beowulf's fifty-year reign, the death of Eanmund is unavenged. After Beowulf's death, Eanmund's brother Eadgils will probably seek vengeance against Wiglaf, son of Weohstan (2999–3005).

GEOFFREY OF MONMOUTH

c. 1100 – c. 1154

Geoffrey of Monmouth was born at Monmouth and died at Llandaff. He may have been a Benedictine monk. After arriving in Llandaff in 1140, he became Archdeacon of St. Teilo's, and he was ordained a priest in 1151–52. He was elected Bishop of St. Asaph and consecrated at Lambeth by the Archbishop of Canterbury, but he died before he could enter his diocese. Geoffrey of Monmouth is best known for his chronicle, The History of the Kings of Britain (Historia regum britannie), which he composed in Latin for an educated audience. His Historia appeared before 1139, but the chronicler continued to revise, reissuing his completed work in 1147. He also wrote a version of the Prophecies of Merlin and perhaps a life of Merlin (Vita Merlini) as well.

In his Historia, Geoffrey aimed to recount the history of the kings of Britain from before the time of Christ to the time of Cadwallader (689 CE). His version of the myth of the origins of his island nation begins with Brutus, the great-grandson of Aeneas, who ostensibly arrives in Albion in the late twelfth century BCE. With his Trojan followers, Brutus defeats the giants inhabiting the land, and his compatriots rename the island “Britain” in his honor. After this, Geoffrey follows the line of British kings up to the time of Julius Caesar and the Roman invasions. By the fifth century, after Rome has departed from Britain (c. 410 CE), Geoffrey is ready to introduce Arthur, to whom he devotes approximately one-quarter of his Historia.

Geoffrey depicts Arthur as the son of Uther Pendragon and Igera, the wife of Gorlois, Duke of Cornwall. According to the Historia, Uther fell in love with Igera and wanted her for himself. In order to obtain her, Uther brought his army to attack the Duke, her husband. While Gorlois fought, Merlin cast a spell over Uther so that he would look exactly like Gorlois and thus be able to enter Tintagel, Gorlois's stronghold, and sleep with his wife. It was on this occasion that Arthur was conceived. Meanwhile, Gorlois died fighting against Uther's army, so Uther was soon able to resume his natural appearance and marry Igera.

With such a magical beginning, it is no surprise that Geoffrey's Arthur turns out to do extraordinary things. He becomes king as a young man and engages in a series of successful battles, defeating the Saxons, the Picts, and the Scots (with the help of his sword Caliburn), and conquering Ireland and Iceland as well. He marries Guinevere, a lady of Roman descent, and establishes an internationally famous order of knighthood which includes such men as Kay, Bedivere, and Gawain. After years of peace, he attacks and conquers Norway, Denmark, and much of Gaul. He holds court at Caerleon in Wales. But when Lucius, the western Emperor of Rome, demands tribute and the return of conquered lands, Arthur goes back to the continent to fight the Romans and defeats them in Burgundy. He might have continued his conquests except that news reaches him that his nephew Mordred has declared himself king, seduced the Queen, and made a pact with the Saxons. So Arthur returns to do battle with Mordred and routs him near the River Camel in Cornwall. Unluckily, Arthur is badly wounded in the fray. He is taken to the Isle of Avalon to recover from his wounds, but he transfers his crown to his cousin Constantine before his departure. Geoffrey does not record Arthur's death, leaving room for the belief in the future return of Arthur as King of Britain.

Geoffrey certainly used more than one source to create his fabulous Historia. He himself claimed that his chronicle was a translation of “a certain very ancient book written in the British language” that had been given to him by Walter, the Archdeacon of Oxford, but this book does not appear to have survived (and some doubt that it ever existed). Geoffrey's other sources include such historians as Gildas, Bede, and Nennius, and his account of Arthur also may have had a Welsh source.

Geoffrey's own imagination must be given credit, too, for his Historia reflects creative, if not always historically accurate, thinking.

Geoffrey's imagination and his status as a historian have been the subject of much debate. In his chronicle of 1151, Alfred of Beverly questioned why other historians do not acknowledge the deeds of the Britons celebrated by Geoffrey of Monmouth. In 1198, the historian William of Newburgh concluded that the Arthur and Merlin who appear in Geoffrey's Historia are fictitious characters, not historical ones, and he condemned Geoffrey as the "father of lies." William of Malmesbury, perhaps thinking of Geoffrey of Monmouth, complained that Arthur was the one about whom the Welsh tell "deceitful fables," and Ranulf Higden, the fourteenth-century compiler of the Latin Polychronicon, dismissed Geoffrey's portrayal of Arthur as improbable. Ranulf explained Geoffrey's glorification of Arthur by saying that each people likes to have its own hero and to praise him excessively; the Greeks have Alexander, for example, and the French have Charlemagne. Modern historians, beginning with the Renaissance historian Polydore Vergil, an Italian living in England who authored the Anglica historia (1534), have confirmed that Geoffrey of Monmouth departed from historical truth more often than he stuck to it. Nevertheless, Geoffrey's Historia exercised a tremendous influence not only on historical accounts of Britain, but also on romance narratives in medieval England and France.

Vernacular translations of Geoffrey's Historia abounded in the Middle Ages. Gaimar and Wace translated the work into Anglo-Norman, while Layamon and Robert of Gloucester translated it into English. Once translated into French, Geoffrey's Historia influenced French romance traditions dealing with the "Matter of Britain," including, perhaps most significantly, the works of Chrétien de Troyes. Geoffrey's Historia influenced both historical chronicles (the "Brut" tradition) and romance narratives such as the fourteenth-century alliterative poem Morte Arthure and the stanzaic Le Morte Arthur as well. In later centuries, it also helped to shape such works as Sir Thomas Malory's Morte d'Arthur, Tennyson's "Idylls of the King," and numerous modern novels that retell Arthurian legends.

from *A History of the Kings of Britain*¹

from Book 1

Britain is the best of isles, situated in the western Ocean between France and Ireland.² Stretching eight hundred miles north to south and two hundred miles east to west, it supplies ceaseless abundance for every human necessity. It is rich in every type of metal and likewise has wide fields and hills, which are well-suited for widespread agriculture. The soil in its richness brings forth many types of crops, each in its proper season. The island also has forests filled with all types of wild beasts and pastures filled with domestic animals and with all colors of flowers that offer their nectar to the flying bees. It also possesses the greenest fields stretching pleasantly beneath lofty mountains, in which sparkling waters flow by in sweetly murmuring streams, promising sweet slumbers on their banks. Moreover, Britain is watered with lakes and rivers full of fish, and on its southern edge by a channel over which one can sail to France.

Three noble rivers—the Thames, the Severn, and the Humber—extend like three arms, bringing in the commerce of the sea from all countries. Twenty-eight cities once adorned the land. Some of these cities, their walls leveled, now lie in ruin; in others, still standing, there tower high the most beautiful steeped churches of the saints, in which groups of religious men and women

¹ A History of the Kings of Britain The translation from the Latin of Geoffrey's Historia regum britannie excerpted here is that prepared by Michael Faletra for the Broadview edition of The History of the Kings of Britain; Faletra's annotations have also been drawn on extensively here.

² Britain . . . Ireland The description of Britain here follows those of Gildas and Bede, often almost verbatim.

give praise to God according to the Christian teaching. In latter days, five peoples have inhabited the island: the Normans, the Britons, the Saxons, the Picts,¹ and the Scots. Of these, the Britons first settled the island from sea to sea, until divine vengeance, on account of their overweening pride, sent the Picts and Saxons to drive them out. The story of their origins and arrival now remains to be explained.

After the Trojan War, Aeneas fled the fall of Troy with his son Ascanius² and then sailed on to Italy. There he was most honorably received by King Latinus.³ Turnus, the King of the Rutuli, grew jealous and fought against him. They met together in combat, wherein Aeneas prevailed and slew Turnus, thus winning the kingdom of Italy, as well as the hand of Lavinia, King Latinus's daughter. After Aeneas had breathed his last, Ascanius took on the royal authority. He built Alba Longa on an island in the Tiber⁴ and had a son whose name was Silvius. This son, indulging in secret pleasures, wed a certain granddaughter of Lavinia and fathered a child on her. When this was made known to Ascanius, he ordered his court wizards to ascertain the sex of the child. The wizards revealed, in no uncertain terms, that the girl would bear a son who would kill both his father and his mother, but that he would also wander in exile through many lands until he had finally achieved the highest honor. In this prophecy the wizards were not mistaken, for when the day of the child's birth arrived, the woman indeed bore a son and died in childbirth. The boy was taken by the midwife and named Brutus. When fifteen years had passed, this young man came upon his father while hunting and unintentionally killed him with an arrow: for it happened that, while his servants were leading a group of deer towards him, Brutus attempted to shoot at them, but his missile struck his father in the chest instead.⁵

Brutus's relatives were horrified by the crime he had committed, and he was expelled from Italy. ...

[Brutus wanders collecting followers and showing his prowess as a leader, eventually reaching "Albion."]

In those days, the island was named Albion,⁶ and was uninhabited except by a few giants. It was a beautiful place, filled with forests and with rivers that teemed with fish. It inspired Brutus and his companions with a great desire to settle there. As they explored the various regions of the island, the Trojans discovered giants who had fled to caves in the mountains. With the approval of their leader, the Trojans then partitioned the land among themselves. They began to cultivate the fields and construct buildings, so that, after a short space of time, you would think that they had lived there forever. Then Brutus called the island Britain, after his own name, and he called his comrades Britons. In devising these names, he hoped to be remembered forever. Thus in later days, the language of the people, which was originally called Trojan or crooked Greek, was known as British.⁷ But Corineus called the portion of the realm that fell by lot to him Corinea after himself, and his people followed his example and called themselves the Corineans. When all the provinces of Britain were to be divided up, Corineus had been allowed to choose his portion before everyone else, and he preferred that region which is now called Cornwall, either from the fact that it is the horn of Britain or from corruption of

¹ Britons Celtic inhabitants of Great Britain at the time of the Roman invasions; Saxons West Germanic groups that invaded Great Britain sporadically in the fifth and sixth centuries; Picts Ancient Celtic people, early inhabitants of what is now Scotland.

² Trojan War Ten-year war between the Trojans and Greeks, caused by Paris's abduction of Helen, and ending in the destruction of Troy; Aeneas Trojan hero who escaped the city's fall, wandering for seven years before founding Rome; Ascanius Aeneas's son.

³ King Latinus King of Latium, a pre-Roman city in Italy.

⁴ Alba Alba Longa, ancient pre-Roman city destroyed in the twelfth century BCE, shortly after Troy; Tiber Principal river of central Italy, flowing through Rome.

⁵ while hunting... instead This incident doubtless resonated with Geoffrey's contemporaries, since King William Rufus of England was also slain in a hunting accident (in the New Forest, in 1100).

⁶ Albion The name is an ancient one, known to the Greeks and Romans. It is unclear, however, whether the indigenous peoples of Britain ever used the term at such an early date.

⁷ British Geoffrey here uses the word Britannica, a term that in twelfth-century Latin was regularly used to describe the Celtic languages of Wales, Brittany, and Cornwall alike. The term "crooked Greek" here derives from a Welsh folk etymology in which the name of the Welsh language, Cymraeg in Welsh, is derived from cam groeg, "crooked Greek."

the word Corinea.¹

Corineus himself took great relish in fighting against the giants who seemed to thrive in his homeland more than in that of any of his comrades. There was among them a certain giant by the name of Gogmagog who stood some twelve cubits² tall. This Gogmagog was so strong that he once uprooted an oak tree as if it were a hazel-shoot. One day, when Brutus was celebrating a feast at the place where the Trojans had first landed, Gogmagog came with twenty other giants and caused great slaughter among the Britons. The Britons managed to band together and defeat the invaders, killing all of them except for Gogmagog. Brutus insisted that he be kept alive, for he greatly desired to see a wrestling match between him and Corineus, who enjoyed fighting giants above all other sport. Corineus arrived most jubilantly. He rolled up his sleeves, threw aside his weapons and provoked the giant to wrestle. At first Corineus, then the giant, prevailed as they struggled together, locked in each other's embrace. The very air vibrated with the groaning of their mighty breaths. Eventually Gogmagog exerted all his strength on Corineus and broke three of his ribs, two on the right side, and one on the left. This infuriated Corineus: he put forth all of his own strength, slung the giant over his shoulders, and made as fast as he could under the weight to the edge of the sea. There, at the pinnacle of a great cliff, he shook himself out of the giant's grip, heaved up the deadly creature that he carried on his shoulders, and cast him into the sea. Gogmagog, falling against the sharp rocks below, was dashed into a thousand pieces. The tide was red with his blood. That place derived its name from the giant's fall and is still called Gogmagog's Leap up to the present day.

¹ Cornwall ... Corinea Geoffrey's usual Latin term for Cornwall is Cornubia, and he usually refers to its inhabitants as Cornubienses; here he employs the appellation Corineiensem, in order to emphasize the derivation of their name from Corineus. Historically, the name of the land likely derives from the Cornovii, a Celtic British tribe mentioned by Roman authorities. The resemblance of the shape of the Cornish peninsula to a horn has led some to claim that the Celtic term corn ("horn") underlies the word.

² cubits Units of measurement, equal to the distance between the elbow and the fingertips.

After dividing up the realm, Brutus decided to build a city. To carry out this plan, he traveled all around the island looking for the perfect location. Coming eventually to the River Thames, he wandered its banks until he found a spot that was well suited to his purposes. He built a city there and called it Troia Nova, New Troy. From this name it was called in latter days, through the corruption of tongues, Trinovant. But in years to come, Lud—the brother of that Cassibelaunus who fought against Julius Caesar³—took control of the kingdom, and he surrounded that city with mighty walls and towers constructed with the most cunning artifice. He ordered the city to be called Caer Lud after himself. There afterwards arose great strife between him and his other brother Nennius, who bore it ill that Lud should want to erase the name of Troy from their land. The historian Gildas describes the dispute between them at length; I shall therefore choose to pass over these matters, lest I spoil with my humbler diction that which such a great writer discusses so elegantly.⁴

After Brutus built this city, he dedicated it to the citizens as their birthright, and he gave them a law code with which they could maintain the peace. In those days, the High Priest Eli ruled in Judaea, and the Ark of the Covenant⁵ was captured by the Philistines. In Troy, the sons of Hector reigned, having expelled the descendants of Antenor. Silvius Aeneas, the son of Aeneas, ruled in Italy.⁶ He was Brutus's uncle and the third king of the Latins.

³ Julius Caesar Roman general, emperor, and historian (100–44 BCE) who invaded Britain in the first century BCE, and who was assassinated by political enemies.

⁴ great strife ... elegantly Gildas's account of the relations between Rome and Britain in his Ruin of Britain makes no mention of this fraternal strife.

⁵ Judaea Ancient kingdom composed of modern-day southern Israel and southwestern Jordan; Ark of the Covenant Sacred chest in which the ancient Hebrews stored the tablets on which the Ten Commandments were inscribed. Insofar as these biblical events are historical, they are thought to have occurred in the eleventh century BCE.

⁶ Troy ... Italy Geoffrey here touches on incidents from the Trojan War, which holds a central place in Greek legend. The events of the war were taken by the ancient Greeks (and by medieval chroniclers) to be historical fact, with the events believed to have taken place in the thirteenth or twelfth centuries BCE.

from Book 2

[Geoffrey proceeds to discuss the genealogy and history of many of the kings of England, including the legendary King Leir—whose story appears here in a rather different form than Shakespeare gives it in King Lear.]

... With Bladud thus consigned to his doom, his son Leir was elevated to the kingship and ruled the land for sixty years. Leir built a city on the banks of the Soar which derives its name from him in the British tongue as Kaer Leir and in the Saxon tongue as Leicester. Denied any male offspring, he nonetheless had three daughters whose names were Goneril, Regan, and Cordelia.¹ Their father loved them all greatly, but he loved his youngest daughter, Cordelia, most of all. And so, when he began to grow old he thought about how to divide his kingdom among them and he sought to find such husbands as would share the rule of the land with them. In order to determine which of his three daughters was more worthy of the greater part of the kingdom, he went and asked them one by one who loved him the best. Posed this question by her father, Goneril the eldest daughter took the gods in heaven as witness that she bore for him a greater love than she bore for the soul that was in her own body. Her father then said to her, "Since in my old age you place me above all else, I shall marry you, my most beloved daughter, to whatever young man you should choose, and I shall give you a third of the kingdom of Britain." Then Regan, the second daughter, taking heed of her sister's example and hoping to insinuate her way into her father's good graces, answered him with many oaths, swearing that she could by no means express how much she loved him, except to say that she loved him above all other creatures. Thus gulled, her father granted her the same dignity as her sister and promised to find her a husband and give her another third of his kingdom.

But when Cordelia, the youngest daughter, perceived that her father was content with her sisters'

flattery, she thought she would test him and decided to answer him quite differently. "Is there, my father," she asked, "a daughter anywhere who can presume to love her father more than is fitting? I do not think that there is any daughter who would dare to confess this, unless she is seeking to conceal the truth with empty words. Indeed, I have always loved you as my father and even now my feelings do not waver. And if you insist on wrenching any more out of me, remember the constancy of the love I have held for you and cease your questioning. You truly have as much of my love as you are worth: that's how much I love you." Then her father grew exceedingly angry and indignant about this answer that she had given from the bottom of her heart. He did not delay in expressing himself thus: "Because you hold your aged father in such contempt and do not deign to love me as your sisters do, I refuse to let you share any part of this realm with your sisters. Since you are my daughter, however, I am not saying that I wouldn't marry you off to some foreigner if Fortune should permit it. But I assure you that I shall never seek to marry you with the same honor that I showed your sisters. Of course, while I had loved you until today more than your sisters, you have in fact loved me far less than they do."

Without delay, Leir followed the advice of his noble counsellors and married his two oldest daughters to the Duke of Cornwall and the Duke of Alban, along with half the island to rule between them as long as he lived. After his death, they would possess sovereignty over all of Britain.

Then it happened that Aganippus, the king of the Franks,² having heard great tidings of Cordelia's beauty, sent messengers to the king asking for his daughter's hand in marriage. Her father, steadfast in his anger, answered that he would give her to him freely, but without land or dowry, for he had already partitioned his kingdom, along with all his gold and silver, to his daughters Goneril and Regan. When this settlement was announced to Aganippus, he was even more greatly inflamed with love for the girl. He sent again to Leir, saying that he had gold and silver and lands enough, for

¹ three daughters ... Cordelia Geoffrey's account of Leir and his three daughters is the earliest known version of the story that formed the basis of Shakespeare's King Lear. The story passed from Geoffrey into the writings of various medieval chroniclers, before finding its way into Holinshed's Chronicles, Shakespeare's primary source.

² Franks Geoffrey's use of the term Franks rather than Gauls to refer to the inhabitants of France may reflect his having turned here from one source to another.

he possessed a third of Gaul. So he obtained the girl in this way in order to produce heirs with her. When the agreement was reached, Cordelia was sent to Gaul and married off to Aganippus.

After a long space of time, old age began to wear Leir down, and the dukes to whom he had partitioned the kingdom and married his daughters rose up against him. They seized from him the kingdom and the sovereign power that he had hitherto wielded bravely and gloriously. They avoided an all-out civil war, however, because one of his sons-in-law, Maglaurus the Duke of Alban, maintained Leir with one hundred forty knights so that the king would not appear dishonored. When two years had passed with Leir in residence there, his daughter Goneril became impatient with the great crowd of her father's retainers because they made trouble with her own servants, always insisting on more sumptuous rations. Her husband therefore decided that her father should be content with a retinue of thirty, and he dismissed the remainder.

Leir became so indignant at this treatment that he left Maglaurus and sought out Henwin, the Duke of Cornwall, whom he had married to his second daughter, Regan. Although the duke welcomed him honorably, not a year had passed before there was again friction between the household and Leir's attendants. Regan became angry because of this and ordered her father to dismiss all of his men, except for five who should remain to serve him. Her father was then greatly anguished, and he went back to his first daughter to see if he could move her to pity and allow him to keep all of his retainers. But Goneril was not moved at all and rekindled her former hostility. She swore by the gods in heaven that he could not lodge with her unless he dismissed all his men and would be content with a single retainer. She chided the old man, who now had nothing, for expecting to maintain such a following. Since she would in no way agree to anything he wanted, he yielded to her and dismissed the others and remained with one single servant.

But when Leir cast his memory back upon his former dignity, he began to detest the misery of his current state and thought about going to entreat his youngest daughter who lived across the ocean. He feared that she would not help him at all since he had married her off so ungraciously, yet he could tolerate his abjection no longer and set sail for Gaul. While crossing the sea, he noticed that he was accounted third among the princes there on the ship, and he lamented with crying and sobbing in these words: "O, you unbendable chain of Fate! you who keep to such an unswerving and narrow path! Why did you ever elevate me to an unstable happiness when it is a greater pain to revisit good times lost than to be oppressed by the sorrows to come? Indeed, the mere memory of that time when I was attended by a hundred thousand knights, when I was accustomed to cast down city walls and lay waste the lands of my enemies, grieves me more than the calamity of my present state. Fate has driven those who once lay beneath my feet to forsake me now in my weakness. O vengeful Fortune, will the day ever come when I will be able to repay those who have deserted me in my present state of poverty? O Cordelia, how true were those words you spoke when I asked what kind of love you bore me! You said 'I love you with as much of my love as you are worth.' While I was still able to give, I was worth much to them who were friends not to me but to my gifts. All the while they loved me but loved my riches more, for when the handouts went away so did they. But, dearest daughter, how will I dare to beg from you? Because of your words, I chose to marry you off more poorly than your sisters, who now, after receiving their inheritance, have reduced me to an exile and beggar."

Leir was saying these and similar things, and he came to Caritia where his daughter was dwelling. Waiting outside the city, he sent a messenger ahead to announce how he had fallen upon such hard times. And since Leir had neither food nor clothing, the messenger begged her to grant mercy upon the king. When her father was presented in this way, Cordelia was moved to bitter tears and she inquired as to how many men he had with him. He sent answer that he had only the one man who waited outside with him. At this, Cordelia seized all the gold and silver at hand and gave it to the messenger, instructing him to bring her father to a nearby city. There the messenger should treat the king as if he were ill, and he should provide Leir with baths, food, and shelter. Cordelia also arranged that her father retain forty well-dressed and fully-armed knights and that, after a time, he should send for King Aganippus and his own daughter.

When the messenger returned to King Leir, he brought him to another city and hid him there, carrying out all the things that Cordelia had commanded. As soon as Leir was arrayed in kingly attire and had established his new household, he sent messages to Aganippus and Cordelia, explaining that he had been cast out of Britain by his own sons-in-law and that he was coming now to seek their aid in recovering his realm. And so Aganippus and Cordelia came to him with their counselors and retinue, and they treated him with great honor and restored him to the power and high dignity he had once commanded in his own kingdom. In the meantime, Aganippus sent messengers all throughout Gaul to muster every armed soldier for assistance in restoring the kingdom of Britain to his father-in-law. Once Aganippus had done this, Leir led Cordelia and the assembled host and fought against his sons-in-law and defeated them. Three years after he had regained all of his former power, he died. Aganippus, king of the Franks, had also died by then. So Leir's daughter Cordelia assumed the governance of the kingdom, and she buried her father in an underground chamber which she had had built beneath the River Soar downstream from Leicester. This crypt was built in honor of the two-faced god Janus.¹ There, on the god's feast day, all the craftsmen of the city came to begin the first of the works that they would undertake for the entire year.

from Book 6

[This book is largely concerned with Britain at the end of the Roman period (when Rome held only a tenuous grasp of much of the island), and the period immediately following the withdrawal of Roman forces.]

When Gratianus the freedman learned of the death of Maximianus, he seized the crown of the realm and declared himself king. From that moment on, he oppressed the people with such great tyranny that the common folk organized themselves and attacked and killed him.² As word of this event reached other countries, the above-mentioned enemies, Wanius and Melga, returned from Ireland. Leading an army of Scots, Norsemen, and Danes, they ravaged the kingdom with fire and sword from sea to sea. Because of this terrible infestation and oppression, messengers were sent to Rome with letters, tearfully imploring the Romans to lend military aid so that they could avenge themselves; they also vowed their own eternal subjection to Rome, if only their enemies could be held at bay. In response, a legion that had not been involved with the recent ills in Britain was dispatched at once. It was shipped across the ocean to Britain and engaged the enemy in hand-to-hand combat. Overthrowing that great host, they drove the rest of the foreigners out of the land and thus delivered the oppressed people of Britain from destruction. The Romans then advised the Britons to construct a wall between Alban and Deira³ stretching from coast to coast. Though requiring a multitude of workers, such a wall would protect them from their enemies and would instill fear in any invaders, thus providing a defense for the Britons. Indeed, Alban in those days was completely overrun with barbarians, and any enemy force that landed there could always find a warm welcome. Therefore, drawing upon both private and public support, the local inhabitants pressed on in their labor and erected the wall.

The Romans then announced that they would by no means be troubled any longer with such costly expeditions and that it was beneath them to waste their military forces on land and sea dealing with unruly pirates. Instead, they said, the Britons should get into the habit of relying upon their own forces; they should act like men and defend their own lands, riches, women, children, and, above all, their freedom and way of life. Having issued this warning, they summoned all the men of the island who could bear arms back to London, for they themselves were preparing to return to Rome.

² Gratianus ... killed him Geoffrey's description of Gratianus is based on a similarly terse account in Bede (Ecclesiastical History 1.11).

³ wall ... Deira The ancient kingdoms of Deira and Bernicia were later merged into the kingdom of Northumbria. The wall referred to here, now known as Hadrian's Wall, was in fact constructed in the second century CE (at the instigation of the Roman Emperor Hadrian), not in the fifth century, as Geoffrey's account implies.

¹ Janus In Roman mythology, God of doorways and gates, traditionally represented with two faces looking in opposing directions.

When all the men were assembled, word was sent to Guithelin, the bishop of London, who addressed the Britons with these words: "Because of the command of the princes gathered around me, I feel obliged to address you. But I feel more like weeping than giving you some fancy speech; for I bewail the weakness and lack of guidance that has beset us since Maximianus bereaved this realm of all its armed forces and young men. You, a people unskilled in the waging of war, are all that is left, you who whose real business lies in the tilling of fields or the trading of wares. When invaders came from foreign lands, you went running like sheep without a shepherd, abandoning your folds until the power of the Romans restored your possessions. Will your hope always lie in outside protection? Will you not equip your own hands with shields and swords and spears against thieves who would by no means be stronger than you if you would only shake off your own sloth and sluggishness? The Romans have grown weary of running constantly about and taking the trouble to fight our enemies for us. They would rather forego whatever tribute they used to collect than continue to waste their efforts defending us by land and by sea. So now what? If you had only been a humble folk back when you were at the height of your former military power, do you think that all mankind would have fled from you? Can real men not be born of humble stock? Can a soldier not be born into a farmer's family, or a farmer from a military family? A soldier can indeed come from a shopkeeper's family and a shopkeeper from a soldier's. Since it is not unusual, then, that a man of one type can come from a different type of stock, I do not believe that you people can forget how to be real men. Since you are men, act like men! Call upon Christ to grant you the courage to defend your own homes!" When he had finished speaking, the people broke out in such a clamor that you might say that their courage was restored in that very moment.

After this, the Romans gave the timid Britons some good advice and left plans for the construction of defenses. They recommended that the Britons build a series of watchtowers at fixed intervals all along the southern coast of the ocean, for that is where the Britons kept their merchant fleet and therefore where they should most fear a barbarian attack. But it is easier to make a kite hunt like a sparrow-hawk than to instruct a farmer in the art of war. He who tries to explain complex matters to such a person might as well toss a pearl among swine. For as soon as the Romans bade their farewell, never to return, their old enemies emerged once again from the ships in which they had fled to Ireland. They brought with them hideous hosts of Scots and Picts and Norsemen and Danes and many others, and they captured all of Alban down to the Wall. Now that they had learned about the withdrawal of the Romans and their intention never to return, they were far more confident and threatened to ravage the entire island. The farm-folk defended the walls against them, but they were useless in battle, unable even to flee because of their faint-heartedness, and a poor defense they made perched up in their look-out posts all day and all night. All the while, the enemy continued to shoot the wretched Britons with barbed missiles, which flung them from the walls and dashed them to the ground. This untimely death was actually a blessing, for with such an end they avoided the awful torments that their brethren and loved ones would soon suffer. O how God punishes past evils! Alas, that Maximianus in his folly took away so many strong warriors! If they had been there when such a disaster hit, there would have been no enemy host that could not have been repelled. What was now clear about the Roman occupation is that they had been able to protect far-off lands with their military might and that they had ruled Britain peacefully. This is what happens when the defense of a kingdom falls upon its common-folk. What more can I say? Once their cities and the High Wall were abandoned, all the usual exiles swiftly followed, as did desperate dispersions, and persecution by the enemy, and the cruelest slaughter. The miserable Britons were plucked off by their foes like sheep by a wolf.

And so once again, the miserable remnant sent letters to Agitius, a powerful man among the Romans, imploring him thus: "O Agitius, thrice consul, hear the groans of the Britons!" And after saying a few more words, they added: "The sea drives us toward the barbarians and the barbarians drive us into the sea. Two different modes of death await us: we will either be drowned or get our throats slashed.”¹ But, not receiving any aid from the Romans, the messengers returned home sadly to relate the sorry news to their countrymen.

Taking counsel together, the Britons decided that Guithelin, the Archbishop of London, should go to Brittany, which was then called Armorica or Letavia, to seek help from their fellow Britons there. At that time, Aldroenus was king of Brittany, the fourth since that Conan to whom Maximianus had granted that land, as has been related above. Seeing a man of such high reverence as Guithelin approaching, Aldroenus welcomed him with great ceremony and asked the reason for his visit. Guithelin answered: “It is clear enough that pity can move you and your noble retainers to tears over what we, your fellow Britons, have suffered since Maximianus despoiled our island of all its soldiers and ordered them to inhabit the land which you rule. May you yet rule over it in peace for many long years. However, all the peoples who dwell near our island have risen up against us, the destitute remainder of your own British people. They have completely emptied our island realm of its store of riches. The British folk now have no food at all except what they can catch by hunting. There is no one who can stop them since no one remains among us who is skilled in the arts of war. You see, the Romans grew weary of defending us and went home, depriving us of all support. We are now bereft of all other hope, and we come to beg for your mercy. We beg you to take command and defend the kingdom that rightfully belongs to you from barbarian invasion. Who else but you whom we implore should wear the crown of Constantine and Maximianus, the crown your own grandfathers and great-grandfathers wore? Prepare your fleet and come: I place the kingdom of Britain in your hands.”

To these words Aldroenus responded: “There was once a time when I would not have refused the isle of Britain if it had been offered to me. Truly, I do not deem any country more prosperous than Britain when it enjoyed peace and tranquility. But now that misfortune has overtaken the land, it becomes less appealing to me and completely loathsome to my vassals. Above all, the evil power of the Romans has harmed Britain, so much so that no king can now maintain his power there unless he abrogates his freedom and accepts servitude to Rome. Who, then, would not prefer to reign quietly but freely over another land rather than possess the riches of Britain under the yoke of servitude? The kingdom that is now under my power is one I hold honorably, paying no homage to anyone higher than myself. I cherish it above all other lands, for I govern it in liberty. However, since my grandfathers and great-grandfathers did indeed once hold sway over the island of Britain, I will send with you my brother Constantine² and two thousand soldiers so that, by God’s mercy, he may liberate the country from the barbarian upstarts and attain the crown of the kingdom for himself. In fact, this very brother of mine, whose name I have already mentioned, is most skilled in the affairs of war and in many other matters. I do not hesitate to commit him to you, along with the abovementioned number of troops, if you are pleased to receive him. I can dispatch no more troops than that because the unruliness of the Gauls poses a constant threat.”

As soon as he finished speaking, the archbishop thanked him, and, summoning Constantine, smiled and said: “Christ triumphs, Christ is king, Christ reigns! Behold the king of desolate Britain, with the help of Christ! Behold our defense! Behold our hope and joy!” What more can I say? While the fleet was made ready, soldiers were mustered from the various parts of Brittany and handed over to Guithelin. When everything was in order, they crossed the sea and landed in the port of Totnes. They at once mustered together the remaining youth of the island and, meeting their enemies in battle, were led to victory by the merits of that blessed man. Then the Britons, who had been scattered all about, began to flock together. Convening at Silchester, they made Constantine their king and placed the crown of the realm upon his head. They also gave him a wife from a noble family, whom Guithelin had personally raised. And when he knew her, she produced three sons

¹ O Agitius ... slashed The letter is taken almost verbatim from Gildas’s The Ruin of Britain.

² Constantine Geoffrey derived the character of Constantine from Bede (Ecclesiastical History 1.11), though in this case he has altered his source significantly. Bede’s Constantine is “a common trooper of no merit” who moves from being a tyrant over Britain to the Roman Emperorship, where he is soon executed.

whose names were Constans, Aurelius Ambrosius, and Uther Pendragon. The eldest, Constans,¹ was dedicated to the Church of Amphybalus in Winchester and took monastic orders there. The other two, Aurelius and Uther Pendragon, were committed to Guithelin for their fostering. But later, after ten years had passed, a Pict in Constantine's service sought to have a private conversation with the king. Once the king was separated from all his other companions in a thicket of trees, the Pict stabbed him to death.

Upon the death of Constantine, there was unrest among the nobility over who was to be elevated to the throne. Some of them proclaimed Aurelius Ambrosius, some proclaimed Uther Pendragon, while others still supported various other relatives. While they were arguing for one over the other claimant, Vortigern,² the leader of the Gewissei and a man who exerted every effort to obtain the throne for himself, came forth. ...

[Here follows an extended recounting of the machinations of Vortigern to win the throne.]

Now that Vortigern saw no rival in the kingdom, he placed the royal crown upon his own head, declaring his authority over all the other nobles. When his treachery was made known, the peoples of the neighboring islands, whom the Picts had invited into Alban, rose up against him. The Picts were angry indeed that their compatriots had been executed on account of the death of Constans, and now they sought vengeance. Because of this, Vortigern worried every day about his army sustaining heavy losses in a battle against the Picts. He was also concerned about Aurelius Ambrosius and his brother Uther Pendragon, who, as was related above, had fled to Brittany because of him. Every day, moreover, rumors filled his ears that these two were now grown up and that they were building a fleet and preparing their return to their rightful kingdom.

¹ Constans As with Constantine, Geoffrey derives Constans from Bede, but elaborates greatly on Bede's brief description. Bede describes Constans merely as "a monk whom Constantine had created Caesar" and who was assassinated by a rival, presumably in Rome.

² Vortigern Vortigern, a figure known under the name of Gurtheyrn in the Welsh genealogies as one of the ancestors of the Welsh rulers of Powys, is the first figure in The History of the Kings of Britain to have been mentioned extensively in other historical sources, appearing in Bede and Nennius, as well as in the work of Geoffrey's contemporaries William of Malmesbury and Henry of Huntington.

In the meantime, three ceolas, which we call longships,³ came ashore in Kent. They were filled with armed men under the leadership of the two brothers Horsa and Hengist. At that moment, Vortigern happened to be in Durobernia, which is now called Canterbury, for habit often led him to visit that city. When messengers came to him announcing that an unknown people of mighty stature had landed in longships, he granted them safe transit and ordered them to be brought before him. As soon as they arrived in his presence, his eyes fell upon the two brothers, for they stood out among the rest on account of their noble bearing. After he had looked long and hard upon the rest of them, he asked what country they were from and why they had come into his kingdom. Hengist began to answer for them, for he was older and wiser than the rest: "Most noble king of foreign peoples, the land of Saxony reared us, which is one of the regions of Germany. The cause of our coming is to offer our service to you or to some other foreign prince. Indeed, we have been exiled from our homeland for no other reason except that the custom of that land demands such an action. For the custom of our homeland is that, whenever there is a surplus population of men, the princes of the entire realm gather together, bringing the youth of the realm with them. They then cast lots⁴ to decide who among the stronger and more experienced of us must seek his fortune in another country. In this way our country is relieved of its excess population. Our land has just recently become overpopulated again, and so our leaders have cast lots and chosen the band of young men whom you see before you, and they ordered us to honor that custom passed down from ancient times. We two brothers are the leaders of these men, for we are born of a noble house: I am Hengist and this is Horsa. Obeying our hallowed ancient traditions, we have sailed the sea and, by the will of Mercury,¹ we have come upon your kingdom.”

³ ceolas... longships Geoffrey borrows the Anglo-Saxon term ceolas.

⁴ cast lots Choosing by lot was a common method of making decisions. Typically, objects bearing the mark of competitors were placed in a receptacle and the first one to be drawn out (or to fall out) would be the first selected.

At the mention of Mercury, King Vortigern raised an eyebrow and inquired about their religion. Hengist replied: “We worship the gods of our country, including Saturn, Jove, and all the others who govern this world. But the greatest god of all is Mercury, whom we call Woden² in our tongue. To him our forefathers dedicated the fourth day of the week, which we even today know by the name of Wodnesdei. After him we venerate the most powerful of the goddesses. Her name is Frea and to her we have dedicated the sixth day of the week, which we call Fridei in honor of her.” Hearing this, Vortigern said: “Your belief—or, rather, unbelief—grieves me terribly. But I do rejoice in your arrival, for either God or some other power has sent you to me in the hour of my need. My enemies are pressing upon me from all sides, and, if you would care to share the labor of my battles, I will treat you honorably here in my kingdom and will give you gifts and land.” The barbarians agreed to these terms, a treaty was drawn up, and they took up residence in Vortigern’s court. The Picts soon after sent out a great force from Alban and began to ravage the northern regions of the island. When this news was related to Vortigern, he mustered his troops and crossed the Humber to engage them. They met in close, hand-to-hand combat; back and forth, the Britons and their enemies fought most bitterly. But the Britons themselves did not need to fight much, for the Saxons who had accompanied them fought so valiantly that they speedily repulsed the Picts, who had hitherto been so used to winning.

Securing this victory through the aid of the Saxons, Vortigern distributed generous gifts among his Saxon allies, and he granted their leader Hengist broad tracts of land in Lindsey where he could maintain his men. Then Hengist, who was a wise and clever man, recognizing the friendship that the king was offering him, addressed Vortigern in these words: “Lord, your enemies are everywhere burning with hatred for you and for your subjects who love you. Everyone is threatened, and now you are told that Aurelius Ambrosius will be leading a force of men from Brittany to oust you and set himself up as king. By your leave, allow us to send word to our homeland and invite soldiers from there, so that our numbers will be able to support you in a fight. There is one more request I would beg to ask you in your clemency, if I did not fear it would be refused.” To this, Vortigern answered: “Go ahead and send word to your allies in Germany and invite whom you will. Now tell me what else you desire and you will not be denied.” Hengist bowed his head and thanked the king. Then he said: “You have invested me with great lands and estates, but not, however, with the honor that befits a leader of noble blood. Perhaps along with these other things I should also be given cities and castles so that I will be respected by the other peers of your realm. The title of Earl or Prince should be granted to me, seeing as I spring from a people that has both of these ranks.” Vortigern answered: “I am forbidden to give you a gift of this sort, for you and your men are both foreign-born and pagans. And I do not yet understand your customs and character well enough to consider you the equal of my people. Even if I considered you to be true citizens, I could never treat you as such because of the disapproval of the British nobility.” “Then at least,” Hengist said, “grant to me, your servant, as much land as can be encircled by a single thong on land on which I can build a fortress and where, if the need arises, I can find safe refuge. I am loyal to you, and I have been and will continue to be loyal to you. What I now desire to do, I shall likewise do in complete loyalty to you.”

The king was moved by these words to acquiesce to this request. Hengist sent messengers into Germany to invite more warriors from that land to come quickly and lend their aid. As soon as the messengers had departed, Hengist took the hide of a bull and made it into a single leather thong. Then, in a rocky place which he had chosen with much thought, he walked around with this thong and began to build a castle within this measured-out space. Once built, it took its name from the thong with which it had been surveyed. For it was later called Kaercarrei in the British tongue, Thanchester in the ¹ Mercury Roman messenger god, and god of travelers.

² Saturn Roman god of agriculture; Jove Supreme Roman deity; Woden Supreme Anglo-Saxon deity, god of wisdom, war, and culture. Since at least as early as Tacitus’s Germania (first century CE), it had been customary to equate the Germanic gods with members of the Roman pantheon.

Saxon tongue, and Castrum Corrigiae in Latin.¹

In the meantime, the Saxon messengers had returned from their mission, bringing eighteen ships full of the choicest soldiers. They also brought with them Hengist's daughter Renwein, whose beauty was second to none. After their arrival, Hengist invited King Vortigern to his house to inspect the new fortress and fresh soldiers. Coming there in secret, the king praised how quickly the castle had been erected, and he retained the soldiers who had been invited. Once the royal feast had been served, the girl Renwein came out of her chamber carrying a goblet of wine. Approaching the king, she curtsied and said: "Lauerd king, Waesseil!" When Vortigern saw the girl's face, he marveled greatly at her beauty and grew inflamed with desire for her. Then he asked his interpreter what the girl had said and how he should answer. The interpreter explained: "She called you 'lord king' and honored you with a word of greeting. You should answer 'Drincheil.'" The king said "Drincheil," and commanded the girl to drink. He then took the goblet from her hand, kissed her, and drank. From that day until the present time it has been the custom of the table in Britain that whoever drinks should say "Waesseil" to his fellow. And whoever receives the drink next should say "Drincheil."²

Vortigern got rather drunk because of the different types of drinks he had imbibed. At that point Satan entered his heart, and he fell in love with the girl and asked her father for her hand. I say that Satan entered his heart because, though he was a Christian, he desired to sleep with a pagan woman. Hengist, who was no fool, had taken note of the king's mood. He consulted his brother Horsa and the other elders who were there, asking how they should respond to the king's request. They were all of one mind that the girl should be given to the king and that they should be given the province of Kent as a bride-price. She was thus given to the king at once and Hengist was invested with Kent, despite the fact that Earl Gorangon currently held those lands.³ The king wed the pagan girl that very night, for he found her pleasing beyond measure. Because of this, he earned the immediate enmity of both his vassals and his sons, for Vortigern had already sired three sons whose names were Vortimer, Katigern, and Paschent.

from Book 8

[Vortigern, unpopular because of his Saxon ties, is eventually challenged for the kingdom by his son Vortimer, who has the people's support, but after Vortimer is poisoned, Vortigern regains his throne. Ultimately, however, he is defeated by Aurelius Ambrosius, who in this account is the brother of Uther Pendragon and the uncle of Arthur. He and Uther jointly fight off the Saxon hordes and their allies.]

... While these events were occurring in Winchester, a star of great size and brightness appeared, shining forth in a single beam. At the end of the beam was a globe of fire shaped like a dragon, and from the dragon's mouth two more beams were emanating. The length of one of the beams could be seen stretching out beyond the shores of Gaul; the other stretched toward the Irish Sea in seven smaller beams. This star appeared three times, inspiring fear and wonder in all who beheld it. Even the king's brother Uther, who was engaging the enemy force in Wales at the time, was struck with considerable trepidation, and he sought out wise men to explain what the star portended. He especially desired that Merlin be summoned, for Merlin had come with the army in order that their war strategies could benefit from his counsel. When Merlin stood before him, Uther ordered him to explain the meaning of the star. Merlin began weeping, but then, summoning forth his spirit, exclaimed: "Woe for the irreversible damage! Woe for the orphaned folk of Britain! Woe for the passing of our most noble king! That renowned king of Britain, Aurelius Ambrosius, has died; we shall all perish with him unless God lends us His aid. Hasten now, Uther, our most noble leader! Do not shirk from the fight against your enemies now. The victory will be in your hand and you will be the king of all Britain. Indeed, this star signifies you, as does the fiery dragon beneath the star. That beam which is stretched out toward the shores of Gaul indicates your future son, a most powerful man, whose might shall hold sway over all the lands he will protect. The other ray signifies a daughter, whose sons and grandsons will later rule the kingdom of Britain."¹

¹ Thanchester ... Latin The location of Hengist's Thanchester is unknown and has been the subject of considerable dispute.

² until the present ... Drincheil "Wassail" remains in occasional use in Britain as a salutation used when presenting a cup of wine to a guest; "drink-hail," however, has fallen into disuse.

³ Kent ... those lands Bede documents the fact that Kent was the initial area of Anglo-Saxon settlement in Britain.

Then Uther, though he doubted whether Merlin really spoke the truth, advanced on the enemy host in hopes of capturing it. And he came into the vicinity of Menevia, where he intended to rest for half a day. When Uther's presence there was reported to Gillomanus, Paschent, and the Saxons who were there, they left the city to fight with him. As soon as the two hosts spied each other, they both drew up their battle-lines and fell upon each other in close combat. Clashing in that way, soldiers of both sides were slain left and right, as would be usual in such a battle. Uther finally prevailed and seized the victory, but only after most of the day had passed and he had slain both Paschent and Gillomanus. The barbarians fell back to their ships as quickly as they could, but the Britons cut them down as they fled. With Christ's favor, a complete victory was granted to Uther, who then made his way as speedily as he could to Winchester, for messengers had arrived announcing that the king had indeed died and that he had just been buried near the abbey of Ambrius within the Ring of Giants which, in life, he had had erected.² Hearing of the king's death, the bishops and abbots and all the other clergy of that region had gathered in the city of Winchester and had overseen his funeral rites, as befitted such a king. Because Aurelius had once commanded that he be buried in the cemetery that he himself had established, they carried him there and buried him in royal pomp.

And so Uther, the brother of Aurelius, in the presence of both the clergy and the common folk, took the crown of the island and was elevated to the kingship. Remembering Merlin's explanation of the star, Uther ordered two dragons to be fashioned from gold in the likeness of the dragon that he had seen in the beam of the star. These were made with wondrous skill. He presented one to the parishioners of the cathedral church of Winchester; the other one he carried with him into battle. And it was from that time on that he was called Uther Pendragon, by which in the British tongue we mean "head of the dragon." Uther received this title on account of the fact that Merlin had foreseen his kingship in the dragon. ...

... As Easter approached, Uther summoned all the nobility of the realm to London so that he could receive the crown and celebrate the holy day with honor. All the nobility gathered just before the feast day, arriving from all the various cities of the kingdom. The king celebrated the feast itself with great solemnity as he had planned, and then made merry with his vassals. All the guests enjoyed themselves, for Uther had welcomed them gladly. The noblemen had even brought their wives and daughters to that joyous feast. Among the nobles present there was Gorlois, the duke of Cornwall, with his wife Igera, whose beauty surpassed that of all the other women of Britain. When the king beheld her there among the other women, he was suddenly consumed with such love that he forgot all else and could think of nothing but her. Igera alone it was to whom Uther continually directed the serving trays, Igera alone it was to whom he sent his personal attendants with goblets of wine. He smiled at her many times, and engaged her in pleasant conversation. When her husband noticed this, he became quite angry and left the court without permission. No one there could persuade Gorlois to stay, for he feared losing the one thing that he loved above all else. Uther grew furious and ordered Gorlois to return to the court so that Uther could obtain justice for the insult he had suffered. But Gorlois continued to flee, and this infuriated Uther even more. He swore that he would ravage all of Gorlois's lands unless the duke gave him immediate satisfaction. While this feud was still hot between them, Uther wasted no time in assembling a great army, and he made for Cornwall, setting flame to every city and town along the way. Gorlois, however, did not dare to engage Uther in battle, since his own army was far smaller; instead, he decided to fortify his castles until help could arrive from Ireland. Because he was more concerned about his wife's safety than his own, he placed her in the castle of Tintagel by the sea, for it was his best-protected stronghold. He, on the other hand, took refuge in the castle of Dimilioc so that, if any misfortune occurred, they would not both be in danger.¹

¹ That beam ... kingdom of Britain Merlin's prophecy refers to the continental conquests of Uther's future son, King Arthur, and to the reigns of Arthur's successors.

² Ring of Giants ... had erected The ruins now known as Stonehenge are located approximately 20 miles northwest of Winchester. According to a legend recounted by Geoffrey, Merlin arranged for the Ring of Giants to be transported magically from Ireland.

When this was announced to the king, he came to the castle where Gorlois was and laid siege to it, barring every exit. Uther still remembered his love for Igera, and so, after a week had passed, he summoned his old comrade-at-arms, Ulfin of Rhyddcaradoc, and told him what he was feeling in these words: "I burn with love for Igera, and I hold myself in bodily peril unless I can have her. Advise me as to how I can quench my desire, or else I shall perish from this torment within." Ulfin answered: "What advice can anyone give you? There is no way to get to where Igera is kept in the castle of Tintagel. That fortress is surrounded by the sea on three sides, and there is no means of access other than a narrow causeway. It only takes three armed knights to defend that approach, even if you brought the entire kingdom of Britain against them. If only the prophet Merlin would set his mind to this problem. Only then do I think you will be able to achieve your desire."

The hopeful king then summoned Merlin to him; for even Merlin had come along with Uther's army. Merlin soon stood before the king, who commanded him to offer his advice as to how he could sate his desire for Igera. When Merlin perceived the torment that the king suffered for his great love of that woman, he said: "For your wish to be fulfilled, it will be necessary to employ new arts that are unheard of in this day and age. By means of certain concoctions of mine, I will be able to give you the appearance of Gorlois, so that you will look exactly like him to all eyes. If you follow my instructions, I shall make you look just like him, and I shall make Ulfin look like Jordan of Tintagel, Gorlois's servant. I too shall assume a different guise and come with the two of you. In this way, you will be able to gain safe access to Igera in her castle."

The king agreed to this plan, and followed all of Merlin's instructions diligently. After handing over command of the siege to his officers, he submitted himself to Merlin's craft and was transformed in appearance to look just like Gorlois. Ulfin was changed into Jordan, and Merlin himself took on the form of Britahel so that no one would be able to perceive who they really were. They then took the road up toward Tintagel and reached the castle at dusk. Once the warden there was notified that the duke had arrived, the castle gates were opened and the three men were allowed to pass inside. Who would have thought anything but that Gorlois himself had come home? The king spent the entire night with Igera, making love with her and thus sating his desire. Indeed, even Igera herself was taken in by the false shape that the king had assumed. He deceived her with many lying words that he had taken great care in devising. He also told her that he had come secretly from his besieged stronghold at Dimilioc just to check up on his beloved wife and his castle. She, of course, believed everything that Uther told her. That very night they conceived Arthur, that renowned man who in later days won great repute for his extraordinary prowess.

In the meantime, when it was noticed that the king was not present at the siege of Dimilioc, the army, acting without permission, attempted to raze the walls and thereby provoke the besieged duke to battle. Acting just as rashly, Gorlois issued forth with his troops, thinking that he would be able to fight off so many armed men with his meager force. Gorlois, however, was among the first to be killed in the course of the skirmish, and his soldiers were scattered. Castle Dimilioc was then captured, though the treasure there was divided most unevenly, for everyone just snatched up whatever spoils he could according to his own strength or good fortune. Only after these outrageous acts of violence had settled down did messengers come to Igera to inform her of the death of the duke and the outcome of the siege. But when they beheld the king, who sat next to Igera still wearing the duke's form, they turned red and marveled greatly that the man whom they had left for dead could have gotten to Tintagel safe and sound. They knew nothing of the the castle ... danger Geoffrey's geography of the northern coast of Cornwall is reasonably accurate and would seem to rely upon an eyewitness account; it is quite possible that Geoffrey himself had visited the region. Both Tintagel Castle and Dimilioc Castle existed in Geoffrey's day.

concoctions that Merlin had prepared. The king smiled at these rumors and embraced the duchess, saying: "I am of course not slain, but am still living, as you can plainly see. But I do regret the destruction of my castle and the slaughter of so many of my men. We must be wary that the king does not come here and capture us in this castle. I will go now to meet with him and will make my peace with him so that nothing worse happens to us." He then left the castle and came to his own camp and, shedding the form of Gorlois, he turned back into Uther Pendragon. When he learned of all that had occurred, he did indeed bemoan the death of Gorlois, but he also rejoiced that Igera was now freed from the bond of marriage. Returning to Tintagel, he captured the castle and took Igera to him, thus achieving his desire. From that day on, Uther and Igera lived together as equals bound by mutual affection, and they had a son and a daughter. The son's name was Arthur and the daughter's was Anna. ...

from BOOK 9

After the death of Uther Pendragon, the leaders of all the various provinces of Britain gathered together in the city of Silchester. They urged Dubricius, the archbishop of Caerleon to consecrate Uther's son Arthur as the next king.¹ Indeed, necessity dictated this action, since the Saxons had heard of Uther's death and were now summoning more of their countrymen out of Germany under the leadership of Colgrim, and they hoped to exterminate the Britons. The Saxons had in fact already subdued all the lands that lay from the River Humber to where Caithness meets the sea.

Dubricius, greatly concerned about the calamity about to befall the land, summoned all the other bishops and invested Arthur with the crown of the kingdom. Although Arthur was only fifteen years old at the time, he was a youth of outstanding virtue and largesse. His innate goodness made him exhibit such grace that he was beloved by almost all the people. On being invested with the royal insignia, Arthur upheld the ancient custom and dispensed gifts to one and all. Such a great number of soldiers flocked to him that he began to run out of gifts to give them. Yet for a man in whom great generosity dwells in the company of great courage, such empty-handedness can last only for a time, and habitual poverty cannot afflict him. Thus Arthur, who indeed possessed both great courage and generosity, was determined to attack the Saxons so that he could distribute their riches among his men. Justice spurred him on as well, since by right of inheritance he ought to have had control over the entire island. ...

[Here follows a long series of battles in which Arthur defeats enemies foreign and domestic, ending with the Scots, who beg for mercy.]

Having pardoned the Scots, the king headed for York to celebrate the feast of Christmas, which was drawing near. As he entered the city, he was grieved that all the holy churches had been abandoned, for Archbishop Samson had been driven out, as had all the other men of faith there, and the half-burnt churches no longer celebrated their services to God. The fury of the pagans had indeed prevailed there. Arthur therefore gathered the clergy and the people together and appointed his chaplain Piramus as the new archbishop. Arthur then rebuilt all the churches that had been destroyed and established communities of religious men and women there. He also restored titles and property to all those who had been driven out by the Saxon occupation.

With him there were three brothers of royal blood: Loth, Urien, and Anguselus.² They had been eminent men before the coming of the Saxons and had the governance of those regions. Desiring to honor the decrees of his own father, Arthur gave Anguselus royal power over the Scots, and he gave Urien the scepter of Moray. Back in the days of Aurelius Ambrosius, Loth had married the king's sister Anna, by whom he fathered

¹ Arthur ... next king Geoffrey's account of King Arthur is the first known attempt, aside from the brief catalogue of Arthur's battles in the ninth century Historia Britorum (traditionally ascribed to the Welsh monk Nennius) to treat Arthur as an historical figure and to describe the king's entire career from birth to death. Falling in line with certain Welsh traditions, Geoffrey is the first historian to describe Arthur as a king rather than a victorious general.

² Loth ... Anguselus The origins of the figures of Loth and Anguselus are obscure, but Urien derives from the sixth-century Brittonic hero Urien Rheged. The poet Taliesin was connected to Urien's court, and several of his poems in praise of Urien survive.

Gawain and Mordred. Arthur now granted him the earldom of Lothian and the other neighboring lands that had once belonged to him. Finally, having restored the entire kingdom to its former state of pristine dignity, Arthur married a woman by the name of Guinevere, who sprang from a noble Roman family.¹ She had been brought up in the household of Duke Cadur and surpassed all the other women of the island in beauty.

... At long last, having pacified all the cities and peoples of Gaul, he returned to Britain at the first approach of spring.

When the solemn feast of Pentecost began to draw near, Arthur, rejoicing in his triumph, decided to hold court and place the crown of the kingdom of Britain upon his head. He summoned all the kings and dukes who were subject to him to this feast so that he could celebrate it all the more honorably and renew the pacts with his vassals all the more effectively. Informing his household of his plans, he took their advice to hold the court in Caerleon.² This city was located in Glamorgan-shire on the river Usk, at a lovely site not far from where the Severn empties into the sea. It had a great abundance of riches, above all that of the other cities, and thus was an excellent place to hold a high feast. On one side of the city, moreover, the noble Usk flowed in such a way that the kings and princes who were coming from across the sea would be able to get there by ship. On the other side, which was surrounded by fields and royal forests, the buildings were so impressive that the golden gables of their roofs seemed to rival Rome. There were also two great churches there. One had been erected in honor of the martyr Julius, and it was adorned with a choir of the most beautiful virgins who had dedicated themselves to God. The other church had been founded in the name of Aaron, the blessed companion of Julius.

¹ Guinevere ... family This is the earliest extant mention of Guinevere in a Latin text. Geoffrey draws her name, at least, from Welsh traditions concerning Arthur's wife Gwenhwyfar (literally "White Phantom").

² Caerleon Geoffrey's detailed description of the city of Caerleon probably reflects his intimate knowledge of the areas along the Welsh border. His association of King Arthur with Caerleon continues into the later romance traditions; Arthur's more famous court at Camelot does not appear until the romance Lancelot, or, The Knight of the Cart (Le chevalier de la charrette), written by Chrétien de Troyes in the later twelfth century.

It was served by a house of canons and was the site of the third metropolitan see of Britain. It also had a school with two hundred philosophers who were most learned in astronomy and other arts. They diligently observed the motion of the stars, and, employing reasonable arguments, they would explain to King Arthur the omens of things to come. Caerleon, then, which was endowed with so many fine things, was made ready for the great feast.

And so messengers were sent to invite the vassals from the various realms. Both those from Gaul as well as those from the neighboring islands had to come to the court. And so there arrived Anguselus, the king of Alban, which is now called Scotland; and Urien, the king of Moray; Cadvan, the king of Venedotia, which is now called North Wales; Eddelin, the king of Demetia, which is now called South Wales; and King Cadur of Cornwall. The three archbishops of the metropolitan sees of London, York, and Caerleon also came, and Dubricius was the archbishop of Caerleon. He was the foremost prelate in Britain, and he held the apostolic see with such piety that he was able to relieve the pain of the suffering through his very words. The earls of the noble cities also attended: Morvid, the earl of Gloucester; Mauron of Worcester; Anarawd of Salisbury; Arthgal of Caer Gweir, which is now called Warwick; Jugin of Leicester; Cursalem of Chester; Kinmarc of Durham; Galluc of Winchester; Urgennius of Bath; Jonathal of Dorchester; and Boso of Rydychen, that is, Oxford. In addition to these earls came other noble heroes: Donaut map Papo; Cheneus map Coil; Pederur map Peredur; Gruffudd map Nogoid; Regin map Clawd; Eddelein map Cledauc; Kingar map Bangan; Kinmarc; Gorbonian map Sgoit; Clofaut; Rhun map Neton; Kinbelin map Trunat; Cathleus map Cadell; Kinlith map Nethon; and many others whom it would take too long to enumerate here.³ From the outlying islands came Gillamorus, the king of Ireland; Malvasius, the king of Iceland; Doldavius, the king of Gothnoble heroes ... enumerate here All the "noble heroes" mentioned here have distinctively Welsh names, many incorporating the Welsh patronymic map ("son of"). This list of Arthur's men resembles—in style, though not in content—the vast catalogs of Arthur's heroes in Welsh texts such as Culhwch and Olwen (c. eleventh century) or The Dream of Rhonabwy (c. twelfth or thirteenth century).

land; Gunuasius, the king of the Orkneys; King Loth of Norway; and King Aschill of Denmark. From other distant lands across the sea came Holdwin, the duke of the Ruteni; Leodegarius, the count of Bologna; Bedivere the Cup-Bearer, the duke of Normandy; Borrellus of Cenomania; Kay the Seneschal,¹ the duke of Anjou; and Guitard of Poitou; along with the twelve peers of the Gauls,² who were led by Gerin of Chartres. Duke Hoel of the Armorican Britons was also there with his vassals. They all came with such a train of equipment and mules and horses that it is well-nigh impossible to describe. There did not remain one prince of any merit on this side of Spain who did not attend this court when summoned. And this is no wonder, for Arthur's generosity was renowned all over the world, and this made all men love him.

Once everyone had gathered together in the city in order to celebrate the solemn feast, the archbishops arrived at the palace to bestow the royal crown. Since Dubricius was the prelate of the diocese where the court was being held, he made ready to celebrate the high mass. The king, as soon as he was robed, was led with great ceremony to the church of the metropolitan see. On both his right and left he was escorted by an archbishop. Ahead of him marched the four kings of Alban, Cornwall, Demetia, and Venedotia. It was their duty to walk before him carrying golden swords. A great company of clerics also preceded him, chanting in wondrous harmony. From the opposite direction, the archdeacons and priests escorted the queen in all her regalia to the church of the devoted virgins. The four queens of the abovementioned kings came with her, carrying morning-doves, as was the custom. All the other women who were there marched in her train with great delight. As the procession drew to a halt, there was such beautiful music and singing coming from both churches that the knights who were there did not know which church they should attend first. They crowded together first towards one, then toward the other; if the entire day had passed in this kind of celebration they would not have grown bored.

After the holy mass was celebrated in both churches, the king and queen put aside their crowns and adopted less formal garments. The king then retired to his hall to feast with the men, while the queen withdrew to hers with the women, for they still maintained the Trojan custom of celebrating feast days separately, the men with the men and the women with the women. Once they were all seated according to their proper rank, Kay the Seneschal, clothed all in ermine, brought in the food, accompanied by one thousand young nobles who were also clad in ermine.³ On the other side of the king's hall, Bedivere the Cup-Bearer, followed by another thousand young men all clad in miniver,⁴ distributed the drinks in different chalices of various styles and shapes. In the queen's hall, countless attendants in different types of fine clothing, performed their duties, each having his own particular task. If I were to describe every detail of this feasting, I would draw my history out far too long.

Britain had at that point attained such a state of dignity that it surpassed all other kingdoms in its courtliness, in the extravagance of its fineries, and in the polished manners of its citizens. Every individual knight of fame and virtue in the kingdom bore a livery and arms of a unique color. The women of those days had a similar style of dress. And those ladies would only grant their love to a man who had thrice proven his worth in battle. They were therefore made all the more chaste and the men all the more virtuous out of love for them.

Finishing their meals, the men went down to the fields outside the city, organizing themselves into groups for the playing of various games. The knights quickly matched off for competitions on horseback and arranged a mock battle. The ladies looked on from atop the city walls: the games inspired them with the maddening flames of love. Some of the other men whiled away their time at archery, others with spear-throwing; some cast heavy rocks and stones, while others still played at dice and a host of other amusements. What's ¹ Kay the Seneschal In later renditions of Arthurian legend (but not in Geoffrey), Kay is also identified as foster-brother to Arthur. Kay is said to act as Arthur's seneschal (or steward) in the vast majority of the legends.

² twelve peers of the Gauls The Twelve Peers of France were Charlemagne's vassals and companions in the French cycles of chansons de geste. Geoffrey's inclusion of them here implicitly places Arthur above even Charlemagne.

³ ermine I.e., dressed in the highly valued furs of ermines, which are of the weasel family.

⁴ miniver Unspotted white fur derived from ermines; like ermine, miniver was traditionally worn by members of the medieval nobility.

more, they had put aside all ill-will toward one another. Whoever achieved victory in a contest received the most generous gifts from Arthur himself. Three whole days passed by in this way. On the morning of the fourth day, Arthur summoned everyone to him who had performed service in whatever office that he held. Each man was granted possession of cities and castles, bishoprics and archbishoprics, and many other high honors. . . .

[Into this happy scene come Roman ambassadors, demanding tribute from Arthur. He refuses, deciding instead to attempt to defeat Rome. He assembles a fleet to sail across to the continent, and war ensues.]

from BOOK 10

When Arthur heard of the Romans' advance, he yielded Britain to the custodianship of his nephew Mordred¹ and Queen Guinevere. Then he made his way with the army to Southampton, where he set out across the sea amid stormy winds. Around midnight that same evening, while the king's ship sailed amid the innumerable ships of his fleet as they plowed the waves with good winds and high spirits, a portentous dream befell the king. Sound asleep, Arthur dreamt that he saw a bear flying through the air, whose growling made all the coastlands tremble. Then he saw a terrible dragon flying towards him from out of the west, and the light from the dragon's eyes lit up all the land. As these two creatures came together, they engaged in a furious battle. But the dragon attacked the bear many times with his flaming breath, and the bear finally fell to the earth, burnt to a crisp. This awakened the king, and he immediately related his dream to those who were standing about. Interpreting the dream, they said that the dragon symbolized him, while the bear must represent some giant that he would fight with; the fight between the dragon and the bear portended the battle that would occur between them, and the dragon's victory, they claimed, indicated Arthur's victory. Arthur, on the other hand, believed that the vision referred to the imminent war between himself and the Roman emperor. As the night wore on and the red dawn approached, they landed in Barfleur. They pitched their tents at once and awaited the arrival of the kings of the islands and of the leaders of the provinces of Gaul.

In the meantime, news came to King Arthur that a certain giant of marvelous size had come up from Spain and had kidnapped Helen, the niece of Duke Hoel of Brittany, fleeing with her to the top of that hill that is now called Mont-St.-Michel.² The knights of the region had gone in pursuit, but to no avail. Whether they attacked him by sea or by land, the giant would either sink their ships with heavy rocks or would finish them off with other sundry weapons. Indeed, he had even captured many of them and eaten them while still half-alive. So on the following night, two hours past midnight, King Arthur woke up Kay his seneschal and Bedivere his cup-bearer and secretly left the camp, stealing his way up toward the mountain. For King Arthur possessed such strength and courage that he scoffed at bringing the entire army against such monsters. He wanted to impress his men by vanquishing the creature himself.

As they approached the mountain, they perceived a fire burning atop it and another fire on a hill nearby. So the king ordered Bedivere the Cup-Bearer to sail over to the mountain; there was no other way across since the hill rose up out of the sea. While he was attempting to climb up, Bedivere heard a woman's screams issuing from above him. At first he was struck with horror, fearing that the monster was drawing near. But his courage soon returned, and he drew his sword. When he reached the summit, at first he saw nothing at all except for the fire that he had sighted earlier. But then he noticed a recently dug grave and beside it an old woman who was moaning and bewailing. When she saw him, however, she ceased her lament at once and spoke to him thus: "O unlucky man! What ill fortune has led you to this place? Oh, you will suffer a death of the most unspeakable agonies! I do pity you, for this very night that most detestable monster will devour the flower of your youth! For soon that most wicked and nameless giant will be here. He carried the two of us up to this mountain—Duke Hoel's niece, whom I have just buried here, and myself her nurse—and without delay he will mete you out some unspeakable death."

¹ Mordred Mordred is mentioned in the Annales Cambriae (c. 970) as falling, along with Arthur, at the Battle of Camlann in 537. There, as elsewhere in the Welsh genealogies and triads, his name appears as Medrawd. The form Mordred is distinctly Cornish, which may indicate Geoffrey's familiarity with Cornish sources or local folklore.

² Mont-St.-Michel Located off the coast of France between Normandy and Brittany, Mont St. Michel was the site of an impressive abbey and town, which is to this day surrounded by water when the tide is high. The story of the giant who plagued the area perhaps reflects Geoffrey's knowledge of local folklore, though no extant story antedates this one.

"Alas!" she continued, "How terrible was my dear girl's fate! When this wicked creature gathered her into his embrace, such fear seized her tender breast that it ended her life, which should have seen many more years. However, since in unclean union he failed to lay with her—she who was my kindred spirit, my life, all my sweetness and light—he instead raped me. He did this, I confess, with great force and violence, in spite of God and my old age. Flee, my dear! Flee before he returns to have his way with me again. When he sees you he will tear you up most hideously."

Bedivere was moved as much as is humanly possible. He calmed the woman with kind words and promised to hurry back with help. So he hastened back to Arthur and told him everything that had happened, whereupon Arthur, groaning over the girl's fate, announced that he would attack the giant by himself and would call for them to assist him only if necessary. They then made their way to the higher hill and, entrusting their horses to their squires, began to climb up. Arthur led the ascent.

There by his fire was that inhuman creature, his mouth stained with the gore of half-eaten pigs. Some of them he had gobbled up, while others he had roasting on spits over the fire. The giant was caught off guard by the approach of the men and made immediately for his cudgel, which was itself so heavy that two young men could scarcely lift it off the ground. The king then unsheathed his sword, drew his shield up before him, and made a rush for the giant before he could get hold of the cudgel. But the giant noticed the king's hostile intention. He seized the club and struck the king against his shield with such force that the sound of the blow reverberated across the waters and caused the king himself to go deaf. The king now burned with a bitter anger. He lifted up his sword and dealt the giant such a blow that, though not lethal, made the blood gush all over his face and eyes, blinding him. The giant had, however, fended off the main force of the blow with his club and so avoided a mortal wound to his forehead. Unable to see because of the bleeding and now even angrier than before, the giant rose up and, just as a cornered boar will turn on the hunter, threw himself at the king's sword. He grabbed the king by his middle and forced him to kneel on the ground. Recovering his strength, the king quickly wriggled out of his grasp and began swiftly lashing out with his sword, now here, now there, not ceasing until he had dealt a mortal blow by driving his sword into the giant's head at that point where the brain is protected by the skull. The evil creature screamed and finally fell with the greatest tumult, like an oak uprooted by blasts of great winds.

The king then laughed in relief. Bedivere came up and cut off the giant's head and gave it to one of the squires to carry back down to the camp for everyone to behold. The king then said that he had never encountered anyone of such strength since he slew the giant Retho¹ atop Mount Aravius. This Retho had summoned Arthur to fight in single combat and had been collecting the beards of kings with which to make a fur coat. He had sent a message to Arthur that requested that the king rip his own beard out and send the ripped-out beard up to him. He promised that, since Arthur was eminent above all other kings, he would find Arthur's beard a place of honor among the other beards. If Arthur refused, he would challenge the king to combat: whichever of the two proved stronger would receive the loser's coat and beard. Arthur won the day soon after the contest began, and so he received the other's beard and coat. Since that day, Arthur maintained, he had met no one stronger than Retho.

Having secured this victory as noted above, they returned to their tents with the giant's head just before daybreak. The men all crowded around to see it, giving great praise to him who had freed the land from such a gluttonous monster. But Hoel, mourning over the death of his niece, ordered a church to be built upon the grave of that girl who now lay upon the hilltop. The church took its name from the girl's burial site, and is still called Helen's Tomb in the present day. ...

¹ Retho The giant Retho appears in Welsh traditions as Rhita Mawr.

[Several more encounters between British and Roman forces ensue, and Geoffrey tells of a British victory in a major battle fought in "a lowland by the name of Saussy" near the town of Autun.]

Having achieved this victory, Arthur commanded the bodies of his own chief vassals to be separated from the enemy corpses. Once this was done, he had their bodies prepared for burial as if they were kings, and then had each carried to the abbey of his native territory and honorably interred. Bedivere the Cup-Bearer, however, was carried off by the Neustrians with great lamentation to the city of Bayeux, which his great-grandfather, Bedivere I, had founded. There he was laid to an honorable rest in a cemetery in the southern part of the city near the walls. Kay, on the other hand, who was grievously wounded, was brought to Chinon, a fortress that he himself had built. He succumbed to his wounds shortly thereafter, and was buried, as befit the leader of the Angevins, at an anchorage in the forest, not far from his castle. Holdwin, the duke of the Ruteni, was borne to Flanders and laid to rest in his city of Théroutanne. Other earls and vassals, on Arthur's orders, were brought to nearby abbeys. Taking pity on his enemies, Arthur ordered their bodies to be buried in their native soil as well, and he had the body of Lucius conveyed to the Roman Senate, telling them to expect no other tribute from Britain.

King Arthur wintered in those parts and spent his time subduing the cities of the Allobroges. As summer approached, he desired to head for Rome. However, just as he was about to cross the mountains, news reached Arthur that his nephew Mordred, in whose keeping he had left the governance of Britain, had proven himself to be a tyrant and a traitor. Mordred had seized the throne of Britain and now took his wicked pleasure with Guinevere, who had broken her marriage vows. ...

from BOOK II

My noble Earl,¹ Geoffrey of Monmouth does not fall silent here. Instead, drawing on the abovementioned source in the British tongue as well as on the assistance of Walter of Oxford, a man most expert in historical matters,² I will now in my humble style briefly relate the battles that this famous king fought with his nephew upon returning to Britain after his great victory.

When the news of the wicked deed reached King Arthur's ears, he immediately postponed the campaign that he had hoped to wage against Leo, emperor of the Romans. Placing Hoel, the duke of the Armorican Britons, in charge of the armies in Gaul in order to pacify those regions, Arthur returned to Britain accompanied by only the insular kings and their forces. Meanwhile, that most wicked traitor Mordred had sent the Saxon Chelric into Germany in order to muster whatever allies he could and to bring them back as swiftly as possible to Britain. He even promised to give Chelric that part of the island that lay north of the Humber up to the borders of Scotland, as well as all the domains in Kent that Hengist and Horsa had once held under King Vortigern. Chelric, fulfilling his side of the bargain, brought eight hundred ships filled with armed pagan men, who obeyed that traitor as if he were the real king. Mordred had also made alliances with the Scots, Picts, and Irish, all of whom had long nurtured a hatred for his uncle. All counted, Mordred's troops numbered around eight hundred thousand and were composed of pagan and Christian alike.

Placing his trust in the enormous army he had amassed, Mordred marched out to meet Arthur as he attempted to land in Richborough. The two forces met in battle, and Mordred's troops inflicted great slaughter on the others, who were still in the process of disembarking. King Anguselus of Scotland, the king's nephew Gawain, and countless others fell on the field of battle that day. Anguselus was succeeded in Scotland by ¹ noble Earl Robert, Earl of Gloucester (d. 1147), son of Henry I of England and patron to whom Geoffrey dedicates his History.

² Walter ... historical matters Archbishop of Oxford and a friend of Geoffrey's, Walter of Oxford (died c. 1150) reputedly lent Geoffrey the Welsh book he alludes to above (the existence of which is entirely unsubstantiated).

Ywain, the son of his brother Urien.¹ This Ywain later distinguished himself through many valiant deeds during the wars that followed. At last, through great effort, Arthur's forces managed to come ashore, returning the terrible onslaught that they had suffered and setting Mordred's army to flight. Being used to constant warfare, they had arranged their forces partly on foot and partly on horseback: whenever the infantry needed to attack or retreat, the cavalry would charge at an angle, thus attempting to break the enemy lines and force them to retreat. The traitor Mordred regrouped his troops and entered Winchester the next night. When this was reported to Queen Guinevere, she gave up hope and fled from York to Caerleon, where she joined the nuns at the Church of St. Julius the Martyr and was determined to live chastely.

Arthur was now kindled with an even greater wrath, having lost so many hundreds of his men. Three days later, after having given his fallen warriors a decent burial, he approached Winchester and besieged the wretched traitor who had taken refuge there. But Mordred did not wish to abandon all of his plans yet, and so, exhorting his men in various ways, he issued out of the city with his troops in formation and pitched a battle against his uncle. As the fighting began, great slaughter befell both sides. But Mordred's men got the worst of it, and he was forced to abandon the field. Caring little for the burial of his dead, Mordred at once took to flight by boat, making his way towards Cornwall.² Arthur, on the other hand, was greatly concerned that so many of the enemy had escaped. He pursued them with great haste into Cornwall and awaited their arrival at the River Camlann.³ Mordred, since he was a bold man and ever swift to attack in battle, quickly arranged his troops. He hoped either to be victorious or to perish in the attempt, not desiring to flee any longer. Sixty thousand armed soldiers still remained of his allies, and he placed them in six battle-groups, assigning 6,666 to each group. Then he formed one last group from the remainder. He assigned commanders to all of the divisions, and took personal command of the last division. With the troops now arranged, Mordred encouraged them, promising them the possessions of their enemies if they were able to emerge triumphant from this battle.

Arthur was also arranging his troops on the other side of the field. He divided them into nine companies of infantrymen, each of which was arranged in a square, with a left wing and a right wing. Then, appointing commanders to each division, he urged them all to destroy the thieves and traitors who had been brought to their land by his treacherous nephew and who still hoped to take away all of their possessions. He told them that many of these barbarians from various kingdoms were unwarlike by nature and completely ignorant of the arts of war. It would be nothing at all, he said, for worthy men as expert in war as themselves to emerge victorious if they rushed bravely onto the field and fought valiantly.

Both Arthur and Mordred exhorted their own troops in this way. Then, in a sudden onslaught, the two armies advanced upon the field and strove to inflict one another with many dire blows. Great carnage was suffered on both sides, countless groans issued from the dying men. Indeed, the clashing of these warriors is almost too grievous and laborious to describe. Men all around inflicted wounds and were wounded in turn, killed and were killed.

After they had passed much of the day in this way, Arthur rushed in with a battalion of 6,666 men against the company where he knew Mordred to be. Clearing the way with their swords, they penetrated Mordred's bodyguard and inflicted the most fearsome slaughter. The traitor finally fell there, and many thousands with

¹ Urien Owein ap Urien is a historical, sixth-century Welsh hero. The figure of Ywain would later appear prominently in the cycle of Arthurian romances, beginning with Yvain (c. 1175) by Chrétien de Troyes.

² took to flight ... Cornwall Geoffrey's geography is a bit murky here. Winchester is neither on the sea nor on a major waterway. Moreover, the traditional sites for the subsequent Battle of Camlann place that battlefield on the northern side of Cornwall, surely out of Mordred's direct escape route.

³ River Camlann Camlann was, according to long-standing Welsh traditions, the site of Arthur's last battle; the Annales Cambriae states that it occurred in the year 537 and that both Arthur and Mordred fell there. Geoffrey seems to be the first to identify the spot with the River Camel in Cornwall. Certain Welsh traditions pre-dating Geoffrey attribute the cause of the battle to a dispute between Gwenhwyfar (Guinevere) and an otherwise unknown woman named Gwenhwyfach.

him. However, the rest of the enemy force did not flee the field because of Mordred's death, but instead gathered together from all around the battlefield and made a last stand with all the boldness they could muster. They fought most bitterly, for almost all the commanders from both sides were there with their men. On Mordred's side there fell that day the Saxon leaders Chelric, Elafius, Egbrict, and Bruniggus; the Irish leaders Gillapatric, Gillabor, Gillafer, and Gillarum; as well as all the Scottish and Pictish leaders along with everyone they commanded. On Arthur's side, there fell King Olberic of Norway, King Aschill of Denmark, Cador Limenic, and Cassibelaunus, along with many soldiers of both British and foreign origin whom he had brought with him. However, even the illustrious King Arthur was mortally wounded. He was carried away to be healed of his wounds on the isle of Avalon, and he gave the crown of Britain to his kinsman Constantine, son of Duke Cador of Cornwall, in the year of our Lord 542. ...

from BOOK 12

[Having recounted the fates of the kings who followed Arthur, Geoffrey turns to the subject of the Britons' decline and the fall of Cadwallader, the last British king.]

... And so, as I had begun to say, the Britons were afflicted with a lamentable civil discord, and they destroyed the well-being of their country with their terrible divisiveness. Then yet another misfortune struck them: a dire and infamous famine afflicted them so badly that they were deprived of the support of any food at all; their only solace remained in the art of hunting. A deadly plague followed on the heels of this famine, striking down such a multitude of people in so short a space of time that the living were unable to bury the dead.¹ The wretched survivors gathered together in companies and fled from their homeland, seeking out lands across the seas. Beneath the swollen sails of their ships, they lamented greatly, crying out: "You gave us up, O God, like we were sheep for the slaughter, and dispersed us among the heathens!"² Even King Cadwallader himself, taking a wretched ship over to Armorica, added his voice to their lament, saying: "Woe unto us sinners for the many wicked deeds with which we did not hesitate to offend God while we believed we still had time to repent. Now, snatching us out of our native land, the vengeance of His might falls upon us whom neither the Romans nor the Scots nor Picts nor even the treasonous wives of the Saxons were able to exterminate. In vain, however, have we recovered our homeland from them so many times, since it was not God's will that we would reign here for all time. He is the True Judge, and when He saw that we did not wish to refrain from our wickedness in the least and that no foreign people could dislodge us from our land, He directed his righteous indignation upon us fools, and now we desert our own homeland in droves. Come back, Romans! Come back, Scots and Picts! Come back, Huns and Saxons! Behold! Britain now lies open for you, for the wrath of God has emptied that which you could not empty. Your force has not expelled us, but rather the might of the King of Kings, Whom we have never ceased to offend." When Cadwallader arrived upon the shores of Armorica, lamenting in this way, he made his way with all his host to King Alan, the grandson of King Solomon, who gave him an honorable welcome.

For eleven years, Britain was completely abandoned by all the Britons, except for those few who were spared from death in certain districts of Wales. The land was abhorred by the Britons, and even the Saxons who remained there during this trying period continued to die without any hope of relief. But when this terrible plague finally abated, the Saxons, preserving their ancient custom, sent word to their compatriots back in Germany that the island was now emptied of its native people and would be easy to subdue if they came to dwell there. When this news was reported to them, that wicked folk gathered together a great host of men and women and landed in the province of Northumbria, and they took up residence in the deserted provinces of Scotland and Cornwall. No one was there to prevent their settlement, except for the meager remnant of the Britons who had survived but had now withdrawn to

¹ deadly plague ... the dead The Annales Cambriae place this plague in the year 682; it has been suggested that the Annales are erroneously referring to the Great Plague of 664 recorded by Bede.

² You gave us up ... heathens Psalms 44.11: "You made us like sheep for food, and have scattered us among the nations."

the remote forests of Wales.

From that moment forth the power of the Britons in the isle of Britain came to a close and the Angles then began to rule. After a little time, the Britons began to regain their strength, so Cadwallader turned his attention once more to his kingdom, which had now been cleansed of the plague. He went to Brittany to ask King Alan there for aid in restoring him to his former power. Cadwallader was determined on this course of action, but the voice of an Angel called to him just as the fleet was getting underway. It told him to abandon his plans: God did not want the Britons to reign in Britain any longer, not before the day that Merlin had foretold to Arthur should arrive. The Angel commanded him to go to Pope Sergius in Rome to do penance so that he might be numbered among the blessed. The Angel told him further that the British people would regain the island through their great faith in days to come after the predestined time had passed. And that day, moreover, would not come until the Britons could recover the holy relics that they had lost during the invasions of the pagans.

When that blessed man heard the Angel's message, he went at once to King Alan and explained what had been revealed to him. Then Alan consulted various prophetic tomes concerned with the Eagle of Shaftesbury, as well as books of the verses of the Sybil and of Merlin, to see whether Cadwallader's vision conformed to one of the recorded prophecies. Since he could discover no discrepancy, he believed Cadwallader's vision to be a divine dispensation. Cadwallader therefore acted on the advice that the Angel had given him and laid Britain aside. He directed his son Yvor and his nephew Yni to rule over the Britons who remained on the island, lest the descendants of that ancient race lose their freedom because of the foreign invasions. Then Cadwallader himself, putting aside the concerns of this world, journeyed to Rome on account of the Lord and the Eternal Kingdom, and he was confirmed in his faith by Pope Sergius. There he was seized by an unexpected illness. On the first day of May in the year of our Lord 689, Cadwallader left behind the weakness of this flesh and entered the great hall of the Kingdom of Heaven.

So Yvor and Yni gathered ships together and, summoning all the men that they could, sailed to the island. For seventy-nine years they fought with great ferocity against the Angles but with little success, for the abovementioned plague and famine, as well as their own penchant for civil war, had caused this once proud people to degenerate to such a degree that they could no longer fend off their enemies. Through their habitual barbarity, they were no longer called Britons but "Welsh," a term derived either from their leader Gualo or from Queen Galaes or indeed from their own barbarity.¹ But the Saxons acted more wisely. They established peace and concord among themselves, and they tilled the fields and rebuilt the cities and towns. Casting aside the power of the Britons, they ruled all of Logres under their leader, Athelstan, who was the first to wear the royal crown.²

Having degenerated from the nobility they had enjoyed as Britons, the Welsh never again regained the kingship of the island. They instead persisted foolishly in their quarrels with the Saxons or among themselves and were hence constantly engaged in foreign wars and civil unrest.

I leave it to my contemporary Caradoc of Llancarvan to record the kings who continued to rule in Wales, and to William of Malmesbury and Henry of Huntington to discuss the kings of the Saxons.³ But I insist that they all be silent in regard to the kings of the Britons, since they do not have that book in the British tongue which Walter the Archdeacon of Oxford obtained from Wales. This same book, which deals so truthfully with the honor of the native princes, I have endeavored to translate into Latin as accurately as I possibly could.

—C. 1138

¹ "Welsh" ... own barbarity The Anglo-Saxon word wealh, which is the ancestor of the modern term Welsh, meant "foreigner" or "slave"; hence, Geoffrey's etymology is not far from the mark.

² Athelstan ... crown King Athelstan of Wessex (reigned 924–40) was the grandson of King Alfred and was erroneously believed by various medieval writers to have been the first sovereign over all England.

³ Caradoc ... the Saxons Caradoc of Llancarvan was the author of a twelfth-century life of Gildas. The Welsh Chronicle of the Princes (Brut y Tywysogion) had long been attributed to him, perhaps on Geoffrey's authority, but modern scholarship has proven that authorship impossible. The famed historian William of Malmesbury (1080–1142) was the author of The Deeds of the Bishops of England (Gesta Pontificum Angliae) and The Deeds of the Kings of England (Gesta Regum Angliae). Henry of Huntington (1084–1155) was composing his own History of the English (Historia Anglorum) at the same time that Geoffrey was writing The History of the Kings of Britain.

THE FOUR BRANCHES OF THE MABINOGI

Until 1282, when the last native prince of Wales was killed by the forces of Edward I, the Welsh were an independent nation with their own customs, laws, and language, and a literary tradition going back centuries. Despite the trauma of conquest and assimilation into England's empire, Wales has survived; today it is a distinct nation within the U.K., with its own government and National Assembly, and more than half a million people still speak Welsh.

The Mabinogi, a classic of Welsh literature, is a suite of four stories in Middle Welsh. They were composed, or at least put into their current form—it is hard to say which, because we do not know who the author was—in the late eleventh or early twelfth century, and they survive in two fourteenth-century manuscripts¹ and two thirteenth-century fragments.² They were not read in English until 1838–49, when Lady Charlotte Guest published her translation of “the Mabinogion,” a collection that included the Mabinogi along with seven other stories. (The word mabinogion is a plural form that occurs only once in the manuscripts; Guest repurposed it, using it as the title for her volume.)

Mab means “boy” or “son,” so scholars initially thought that mabinogi meant either “tales for children” (and so, less plausibly, “instructions for young bards”) or else “tales of (a hero’s) boyhood,” because there are some exceptional children in the stories. Eric Hamp, a historical linguist, eventually showed that the word originally came from an expression that meant “the material relating to the family of Maponos.” Maponos is a Divine Son figure, a Celtic god whose name appears elsewhere in medieval Welsh literature as Mabon ap Modron, and although Mabon is not a character in the Mabinogi, the stories seem to have their roots in pre-Christian myth.

Because the Mabinogi has “branches” (many people just call it the “Four Branches”), it can be imagined as an actual tree of narrative:³ four flowering limbs with their own twiggy divisions, fanning out from a gnarled old hollow trunk, which is the life story—or “heroic biography”—of Pryderi son of Pwyll (or, in this translation, Carey son of Sage), the only character who is mentioned in all four stories. A “heroic biography” typically highlights life events common to traditional heroes: their fathers are gods, or gods disguised as animals (think of Zeus in Greek mythology); they are born in unusual circumstances; their mothers lose them and they are raised by animals or outsiders; they grow up faster or slower than other boys; and so on. Carey has adventures as a baby, he is precocious, and he has what scholars call a “cognate animal”: a horse born near the same time as he is, which is fated to belong to him.

But the trunk of the tree is hollow because Carey is not the main character in any of the Branches, and he is rarely the focus of the narrative. The First Branch tells how he was born and raised and got his name—and, in a brief passage at the end, how he took power and got married—but the story deals mostly with his parents. In the Second Branch, he survives a catastrophic war in Ireland which he does nothing to cause and nothing to prevent, and readers are not told about any heroic deeds he performs. In the Third Branch, he plays sidekick to his mother’s second husband but is then whisked away by magic, leaving the other man to figure out how to lift the enchantment. And at the start of the Fourth Branch, Carey dies as collateral damage in a wizard’s scheme to orchestrate a rape; everyone then forgets about him.

¹ The White Book of Rhydderch, National Library of Wales Mss. Peniarth 4 and 5, c. 1350, and the Red Book of Hergest, Oxford, Jesus College Ms. 111, c. 1400.

² In National Library of Wales Ms. Peniarth 6.

³ This widespread metaphor appears in Isidore of Seville’s Etymologies (sixth century), which derives the Latin word codex (“book”) from caudex, meaning “stalk (of a plant).” The metaphor made its way into medieval scholarly and literary culture; French Arthurian romances, for example, are known for having branches.

At first, scholars could not resist suggesting that the trunk used to be solid—that the story used to be more about Carey—and speculating that the story in its surviving form must have been mangled by an unskilled author. Certainly, the story does incorporate traditional lore; one example of this is its frequent use of the phrase “one of the three” in reference to the so-called Triads of Britain (Trioedd Ynys Prydein), which record different kinds of legendary information in groups of three (the three most generous men who ever lived in Britain, the three most famous cows, the three worst betrayals, etc.). But many scholars were interested only in uncovering these and other indications of older legends. The Victorian poet and critic Matthew Arnold, for example, once compared the Mabinogi to a peasant’s hut built using the ruins of a pagan temple. “The mediaeval story-teller,” he wrote, “is pillaging an antiquity of which he does not fully possess the secret.” J.R.R. Tolkien said something similar about Beowulf in his famous lecture “The Monsters and the Critics”—he compared it to a tower built from the stones of an older hall—but Tolkien’s point was that the “tower” (Beowulf) had its own artistic integrity, and should not be pushed over and dismantled just to see what little bits of lore and trivia had gone into making it. Most academics today feel the same way about the Four Branches. Fifty years ago, even experts who had worked closely with the text were saying it presented “a broken design and mutilated fragments, great confusions and unanswerable problems.” Over the past two generations, however, scholars and readers have come around to the view that the stories make sense on their own terms; that they are part of one coherent literary work; and that however they got to be the way they are, their medieval audience found them meaningful and entertaining.

The stories are set in the primal past, a time when the sea level was lower, the whole island of Britain was controlled by the Welsh (as it very largely was, before the Romans came), and the king was a giant. Still, the Welsh are distinctly Welsh, not generically “Celtic,” just as people in the Middle Ages never just “spoke Celtic.” The British and Gaelic groups of languages (Welsh, Cornish, and Breton vs. Irish, Manx, and Scottish Gaelic) are very different, and although the Second Branch shows us the Welsh and Irish talking to each other easily without interpreters, historically they could not have done so. Medieval Celtic speakers were also not called “Celts” by themselves or by anyone else; they were aware of cultural links with other “Celts” (and sometimes those links do help us understand their literature better), but that did not make them automatic allies.

Just as the Welsh are recognizably Welsh, Wales is recognizably Wales: readers always know exactly where in Dyfed (southwest Wales), Gwynedd (northwest Wales), or further regions events take place. The Four Branches are full of place-names and references to the landscape. The story happens “once upon a time” but not “in a land far, far away”; the names given to parts of the landscape bear witness to the truth of what happened. And the text is not only geographically but also historically and politically aware. When Caswallawn son of Beli conquers Britain at the end of the Second Branch, he alienates the Welsh from “the crown of London”; in the Third Branch, Wales is still a familiar place, but the rest of the island is filled with city-dwellers the Welsh cannot relate to, and castles appear in the Welsh countryside where they never existed before. These developments might contain a memory of the Roman invasion of Britain or the Anglo-Saxon invasions after the Romans left, but they also seem to reflect the Norman Conquest. As the Anglo-Normans kept up their advance, the Mabinogi became a witness to a vanished order.

All of this means that the Mabinogi bridges many genres: it is part pre-Christian myth, part fairytale, part guide to how nobles should act (in the genre of the Speculum Principum or “Mirror for Princes”), and part dramatization of political and social issues that affect the real Wales in historical time.

The main, overarching concern seems to be the handling of family and social tensions, and how the law can only do so much to smooth these over. Honor and status are crucial in the world of the Mabinogi. In anthropological terms, this is a “shame” rather than a “guilt” culture; the characters go to great lengths to protect, regain, or increase their honor, or avoid being publicly shamed. Medieval Welsh law (and Irish law as well) saw most crimes as offenses against the honor of a man (whether it was assaulting him, stealing from him, killing someone under his protection, doing something to his wife or daughter, making up an unflattering nickname, etc.), and the offender had to pay compensation according to the victim's status. We have a good example in the Second Branch, when the king of Ireland is insulted and the king of Britain compensates him according to Welsh law, as well as giving him a powerful magic artifact. But the Irish will not let their king forget the insult, which eventually leads to enormous destruction. The law states that no one is entitled to revenge and compensation for the same offence. At some point, the material remedies in the law have to be considered equivalent to the emotions involved, or society collapses.

The Four Branches of the Mabinogi have had a lasting influence abroad as well as in Wales, and not just in the Middle Ages. Lloyd Alexander's 1960s fantasy series The Chronicles of Prydain is based on them. The animated feature film Y Mabinogi/Otherworld (dir. Derek Hayes, 2003) sent modern teenagers back in time to play key characters. Most recently, the New Stories from the Mabinogion series, edited by Penny Thomas and published by Seren Press, invited some of the best contemporary Welsh writers to give the old tales a wildly inventive reboot. (The First Branch is retold in The Ninth Wave by Russell Celyn Jones, and the Second in White Ravens by Owen Sheers; both were published in 2010.)

THE FIRST BRANCH¹

PWYLL PENDEUC DYFED

SAGE, PRINCE OF DYFED

Sage (*Pwyll*²), the Prince of Dyfed, was lord over the seven districts of Dyfed.³ Once upon a time he was ¹ The First Branch Translated by Matthieu Boyd (Fairleigh Dickinson University), with the modernization assistance of Stacie Lents (Fairleigh Dickinson University). The Four Branches have previously been translated into English by Charlotte Guest, Gwyn Jones and Thomas Jones, Patrick Ford, Jeffrey Gantz, Sioned Davies, John Bollard, and Will Parker. Despite some key differences—Guest leaves out the passages involving sex, and Jones and Jones use “thou” instead of “you,” for example—all these translations are necessarily similar; if you want a close rendering of the text that will help in your quest to decode the original, you are already well served. This translation is different. Specially commissioned by Broadview Press, it is by a Celtic Studies scholar working with a contemporary American playwright, and its primary purpose is to make the text accessible and engaging for twenty-first-century undergraduate readers in North America.

² Pwyll The philosophy of this translation is that names should be made as meaningful in English as they are to readers of the Welsh. According to the University of Wales dictionary, Geiriadur Prifysgol Cymru, pyyll can mean “deliberation, consideration, care, caution; discretion, prudence, wisdom, patience, understanding, intelligence, perception, judgment, mind, wit(s), reason, (common) sense, sanity.” It is one of the hardest names in this text for North Americans to pronounce, since it contains the notoriously difficult voiceless lateral ll. Calling the character Prince Sage is a way of addressing both issues.

³ the seven districts of Dyfed The seven districts (cantrefi) are Peibidiog, Cemaïs, Emllyn, Rhos, Deugleddyf, Gwarthaf, and Penfro;

in Arberth,⁴ one of his chief courts, and he decided that he felt like going hunting. The part of his realm where he decided to hunt was Glyn Cuch.⁵ He set out from Arberth that night, got as far as Penn Llwyn Diarwya, and spent the night there. Early the next day he got up and went to Glyn Cuch to run his dogs in the forest. He blew his horn to start the hunt, and took off after the dogs, but got separated from his entourage. As he listened for the barking of his dogs, he heard different barking that he didn't recognize. The voices of the other dogs were coming from the opposite direction. And he saw a clearing in the forest, a sort of field; as his own dogs reached the edge of the clearing on one side, a stag bolted out of the forest on the opposite side with the other dogs running after it. It made it to the middle of the clearing, and then, in a flash, the other dogs were on it and tackled it to the ground.

Sage hardly gave the stag a second glance, but he was fascinated by the color of the dogs. He had seen plenty of hunting dogs in his time, but never any that color. They were pure white, except for their ears, which were they correspond to modern Pembrokeshire and the western part of Carmarthenshire, in southwest Wales.

⁴ Arberth The modern town of Narberth.

⁵ Glyn Cuch The valley of the Cuch, a tributary of the river Teifi on the boundary between modern Pembrokeshire and Carmarthenshire.

as vibrant red as their bodies were white.¹ He charged at the strange dogs and drove them off their kill. Then he set his own dogs on the carcass.

As he was letting his dogs feed, Sage saw a rider coming after the other pack on a huge gray-speckled horse, with a hunting horn hanging around his neck, wearing a gray wool hunting smock. The rider came up to him and said: "Sir, I know who you are, but I refuse to acknowledge you."

"... All right,"² said Sage, "maybe that's your prerogative."

"God knows," said the stranger, "it's not the dignity of my rank that's preventing me."

"What is it then, sir?"

"I swear to God," he said, "it's because you're so ignorant and rude."

"Sir, how was I rude?"

"I have never seen such rudeness—when someone's dogs make a kill, you don't set your own dogs on their stag! I call that rude. And although I won't beat you up over a stag, I swear to God, I will do a hundred stags' worth of damage to your reputation."

"Sir," said Sage, "if I've done something wrong, let me compensate you to win back your friendship."

"How do you propose to do that?"

"In a way that's appropriate to your rank; I just have no idea who you are ..."

"I'm a crowned king in the land I come from."

"My lord," said Sage, "I salute you. So, what land do you come from?"

"The Otherworld,"³ he said. "I am Arawn,⁴ a king of the Otherworld."

"My lord," said Sage, "how can I gain your friendship?"

"Here's how," he said. "There's another king of the Otherworld, Summerbright (*Hafgan*⁵), whose kingdom borders mine. He never stops attacking me. Save me from his persecution—which you can easily do—and you'll have my friendship."

"Of course; I'd be happy to," said Sage. "Tell me how."

"I'm about to," said Arawn. "Here's how you can do it. Make an alliance with me. I'll put you in my place in the Otherworld. I'll give you the loveliest woman you ever saw to sleep with every night. I'll make you look exactly like me, so that your transformation will be convincing to my serving-boys and court officials and anyone who knows me. And that's how it will be, until a year from tomorrow. A year from tomorrow we'll meet back here."

"All right," said Sage. "So, I'll be there for a year. Can you tell me something about this enemy of yours that I'll be facing?"

"Summerbright and I have agreed to a duel a year from tonight; we'll meet at the crossing of the river that divides our kingdoms. You'll go there disguised as me. You need to wound him, but only once. He won't survive it. Now here's the thing: although he'll ask you to hit him again, don't—not even if he begs you. Because every time I thought I'd finished him off, the next day he'd be back, fighting me like nothing ever happened."⁶

"All right," said Sage. "But what should I do about my own realm?"

"We'll switch places," said Arawn, "I'll arrange it so that no man or woman in your realm figures out that I am not you."

¹ as vibrant ... white In the early literature of Ireland and Wales, white red-eared animals are supernatural or have supernatural associations. It has been suggested that these features are based on real animals, such as today's Chillingham Herd of wild cattle, which are mostly white with russet ears.

² All right The Welsh word here is ie (pronounced similarly to the English word "yeah"), which has a semantic range very similar to "all right" or "okay" in colloquial English today.

³ Otherworld The Welsh name is Annufn (pronounced "Annuvin"), from "in-world" or "un-world."

⁴ Arawn The name has no obvious meaning, but one suggestion is that it is a borrowing of the Biblical name Aaron.

⁵ Hafgan Pronounced "HAV-gan." An alternative reading is Summersong (haf "summer" + cân "song").

⁶ Now here's ... ever happened Summerbright is protected by international folktale motif E11.1 ("Second blow resuscitates. First kills."). What Arawn is telling Sage is that he personally discovered the secret, by trying and failing to kill Summerbright, and that you can never reset the counter; if you negate your one potentially fatal blow by striking more than once, someone else has to take over for you.

"I understand," said Sage. "I'll leave right now."

"You'll have an easy journey and nothing will stand in your way until you reach my kingdom. I'll guide you there."

Arawn did as he had promised, and guided Sage until they could see Arawn's court and its outbuildings. Arawn pointed them out. "There: the court and the kingdom are under your rule now. Go to the court. Everyone will think they recognize you; and as you pay attention to the way everyone treats you, you'll become familiar with the customs of the court."

Sage approached the court, where he could see sleeping quarters and halls and rooms; the buildings were more beautifully decorated than anything he'd ever seen. As he went into the great hall to take off his boots, squires and serving-boys rushed to pull them off for him; all the servants greeted him formally as they approached. Two knights¹ came and took off his hunting clothes for him, then dressed him in a golden outfit of brocaded silk.

The hall was prepared. Then he saw the warband² and the courtiers coming in, the most glittering and elite gathering anyone ever saw. And the queen was with them ... the most beautiful woman anyone ever saw ... wearing a golden outfit of luminous brocaded silk. They all went to wash up, and sat down for dinner. The way they were seated, Sage had the queen on one side and a man he guessed was an earl³ on the other. From talking to the queen, he realized that she was the most extraordinary woman he had ever met, and the most gracious in the way she spoke and acted. So the people of the Otherworld ate and drank, and poets and musicians performed for them;⁴ they all had a great time. Of all the courts Sage had ever seen anywhere in the world, this one had the most amazing variety of food and drink and golden vessels and royal jewels.

Then it was time for everyone to go to bed, and Sage went to bed with the queen. When they got into the bed together, he turned his face to the side, with his back to her. He didn't say a word to her till morning. The next day, they were friendly and enjoyed talking to one another. But whatever affection they shared during the day, every night for the next year was like the first.

Sage spent the year hunting, listening to the bards, drinking, making new friends and relaxing with them, until the night of the duel.

Even in the most remote parts of the kingdom everyone was as keenly aware of the approaching duel as Sage was himself. He went to the meeting-place, and the nobles of the realm went with him. When he reached the river crossing, a knight got up and said:

"Nobles, listen carefully. This is a duel between our two kings, one on one. Each has laid claim to the other's land.⁵ Now all of you keep a safe distance, and leave them to it."

Then the two kings charged at one another in the middle of the crossing, and clashed. In that first encounter, the pretend Arawn (Sage) hit Summerbright in the middle of his shield-boss so that the shield split in two, all his armor was shattered, and Summerbright flew the length of his arm plus his spear-shaft off the back of his horse, and hit the ground. It was a fatal blow.

¹ knight This word, marchawg, can mean "horseman" or "mounted warrior" as well as "knight." It is unclear whether any of the "knights" in the Four Branches were bound by the rules of chivalry that we normally associate with medieval knights.

² warband This word, teulu, has a wide range of possible meanings: "family; tribe, nation; household; retinue, entourage; host, crowd, people." In the specific context of a medieval Welsh court, it refers to the lord's bodyguard or household troops, who were the closest thing he had to a standing army.

³ earl This title, iarll, is not represented in the Welsh laws, and seems to have been imported to Wales.

⁴ people of the Otherworld ate ... for them Literally, "they consumed food and drink and cerdddeu and carousing." Cerdddeu can mean either poems or songs; both were regular entertainment in the courts of medieval Wales. Later, cerdddeu is translated as "listening to the bards" or "bardic entertainment."

⁵ Each has ... land Literally, "Each one is a claimant on the other, and that regarding land and territory." This is legal language that is used again in the Third Branch.

"Sir," said Summerbright, "what right did you have to my death? I had no claim against you,¹ and I really don't know why you'd want to kill me, either. But now that you've started the job, by God, finish it."

"Sir," said Sage, "I might well have regrets. Find someone else to finish you off, because I won't."

"My noble lords," said Summerbright, "take me away—death is truly upon me. There's no way I can keep protecting or providing for you."

"Gentlemen," said the pretend Arawn, "start taking names, and find out who owes me allegiance."

"My lord," said the noblemen, "everyone does. You're the only king left in all the Otherworld."

"All right," he said, "whoever submits of their own free will should be treated fairly. Whoever doesn't, should be made to at swordpoint."

Then he accepted homage from the men and started to take over the land. Before noon the next day, the two kingdoms were under his control.

After that, Sage headed back to his own people, and went to Glyn Cuch. When he got there, King Arawn was waiting for him. They were glad to see each other.

"All right," said the real Arawn, "I heard what happened. May God reward you for your friendship."

"All right," said Sage, "when you get back to your land, you'll see for yourself what I did for you."

"May God reward you for what you've done," said Arawn.

Then Arawn made Sage, Prince of Dyfed, look like himself again, and took his own appearance back. Arawn traveled to the Otherworld court, and he was overjoyed to be back with his courtiers and his warband, since he hadn't seen them for a year. Of course, they hadn't missed him, and didn't see his arrival as anything out of the ordinary.

Arawn spent that day relaxing and enjoying himself, sitting and talking with his wife and his noblemen. And when it was time for sleep instead of drinking, they all went to bed. Arawn got into bed, and his wife came to him. Right away he started talking to her and caressing her, and they made love. That hadn't happened for a year, so she was suspicious.

"God," she told herself, "what a different mood he's in tonight compared to the past year!"

She stayed up thinking for a long time. After a while, Arawn woke up, and tried talking to her once, twice, and a third time. She never answered.

"Why are you so silent?" he said. "Aren't you going to talk to me?"

"Oh, I'll talk," she said. "I mean, I've already said more than I've been allowed to for a year, at least behind closed doors. I guess the rules have changed."

"Excuse me?" he said. "We talk all the time."

"Shame on me for saying it, but for the past year the routine has been that from the time we get between the sheets, we don't fool around, we don't talk—you haven't even turned your face to me, let alone more."

He lay there thinking. "Oh my Lord," he said to himself, "I can't believe how loyal that man was—he's a real friend." Then he spoke to his wife:

"Sweetheart, don't be mad at me. I swear to God," he said, "from a year ago until last night, it wasn't me sleeping with you, or even lying down next to you."

Then he told her the whole story.

"As God is my witness," she said, "you do realize what he turned down, right? That's quite a bond you inspired. Nothing would make him break it, not even me."

"That's just what I was telling myself a minute ago," he said.

"No wonder," she answered.

Meanwhile, Sage, Prince of Dyfed, came home to assume his functions. He started by asking the nobles of the realm what his rule over them had been like for the last year, compared to what it was before that.

"My lord," they said, "you were never so wise, so friendly, or so generous with your property. Your decision-making was never better than it's been this past year."

"For God's sake," said Sage. "Well, you should really be thanking the man who was actually here. This is what happened"—and he told them everything.

"All right, my lord," they said, "we thank God you made that friendship. As for the standard of government we got this past year, you won't take that away from us, surely?"

¹ I had ... you The fact that Sage's blow is potentially fatal for Summerbright is enough to let him know that he is not really fighting Arawn—and that Summerbright has therefore made no claim against his opponent.

"Absolutely not, I swear to God," said Sage.

From then on, Sage's friendship with Arawn grew stronger and stronger. They sent each other horses and hunting hounds and hawks and all kinds of presents that each one thought the other would enjoy. And because of how he had spent that year in the Otherworld and ruled it so successfully, and united the two kingdoms through his prowess and daring, the title Sage, Prince of Dyfed, fell out of use and Sage was called Sage the Otherworld Ruler (Pwyll Penn Annwn) from then on.

Some time later, Sage was in Arberth, one of his chief courts. A feast had been prepared for him, and he had a huge crowd of people with him. After the first sitting,¹ Sage got up to go for a walk. He went to the top of a hill, called the Mound of Arberth,² that overlooked the court.

"My lord," said one of the courtiers, "the special magical feature of this mound is that whenever any nobleman sits there, he can't walk away without one of two things happening: either he gets beaten up, or else he sees a wonder."

"I'm not afraid of getting beaten up with this many men around me. A wonder, though—I'd love to see that. I'll go and sit on the mound," he said.

So he sat on the mound. And as he sat there with his entourage, they saw a woman on a magnificent pale horse, wearing a shining golden outfit of brocaded silk, coming along the highway that went by the mound. Her horse was ambling at a slow and easy pace, so far as anyone could see, as she drew level with the mound.

"Men," said Sage, "do any of you know that woman riding by?"

"No, my lord," they said.

"Someone go and intercept her," he said, "and find out who she is."

One of Sage's men got up, but when he tried to head her off, she'd already gone past him. He chased after her as fast as he could go on foot. But the faster he hurried, the farther in front of him she ended up. When he realized he couldn't possibly catch up with her, he went back to Sage and told him, "My lord, no one can possibly catch up with her on foot."

"All right," said Sage. "Go to the court and get the fastest horse you know of, and go after her that way."

The man got the horse and rode off after the woman. He came to level grassland, and set his spurs to the horse. But the more his spurs tore up the horse's sides, the farther the woman was in front of him. Her horse was still going at the same slow pace. Meanwhile, his horse was exhausted, and when it had helplessly slowed to a walk, he went back to where Sage was waiting.

"My lord," he said, "no one can catch up with that lady there. I don't know of any horse in the realm faster than the one I was just riding, and even it didn't let me catch up to her."

"All right," said Sage. "There's some kind of magic going on here. Let's head back to court."

They went to the court, and whiled away the rest of the day.

The next day, they got up and killed time until they could go and eat. After the first sitting, Sage said, "All right, those of us who went yesterday, let's go up on the mound again. And you," he said to one of the squires, "bring out the fastest horse you know of." The squire did as he was told, and they headed for the mound, taking the horse with them.

Then, as they were sitting there, they saw the same woman on the same horse, wearing the same clothes, going the same way.

"There," said Sage, "it's the woman from yesterday. Get ready, boy, to find out who she is."

"With pleasure, my lord."

The lady passed by. The squire mounted his horse, but before he'd even settled in the saddle, she'd gone past him, and had already put some distance between them. Her pace seemed no different from the day before. The man put his horse into a walk, and he thought that no matter how slowly it went, he was sure to catch up with her. But that wasn't good enough. So he gave his horse free rein, but got no closer to her than if he'd been on foot. And the more his spurs cut up the horse's sides, the farther she was ahead of him, and her pace was no faster than before. When he realized he

¹ first sitting The higher-ranking members of the court ate first, then the lower ranks and servants.

² Mound of Arberth This hill exists, but now has castle ruins on it. Hills and mounds have Otherworld associations; there is much more evidence of this from Ireland, where the Túatha Dé Danann or "fairies" were understood to live in hollow hills.

could never catch up with her, he went back to Sage.

"My lord," he said, "my horse can't do any better than you just saw."

"I noticed," he said. "No one can catch up with her. But I swear to God, she must have business with someone from around here—if only she weren't too stubborn to say so. Let's go back to court now."

They went to the court, and spent that night with bardic performances and drinking, until they'd had their fill. And the next day they killed time again until lunch. When they'd finished eating, Sage said, "Is everyone here who was up on the mound yesterday and the day before yesterday?"

"Present, my lord," they said.

"Let's go and sit on the mound," he said, "and you," he said to his stableboy, "saddle my horse—properly, mind you!—and lead it to the road. And bring my spurs!" The lad did.

They went to the mound and sat. They hadn't been there even a short while when they saw the lady coming the same way, looking exactly the same, riding at the same pace. "Hey, lad," said Sage, "I see the lady. Bring my horse." Sage mounted his horse, but by the time he did, she was already past him. He wheeled after her, and gave free rein to his spirited horse. It went leaping forward, and he thought that by the second or third leap, he'd have caught up with her. And yet he wasn't any closer to her than before. He spurred the horse as fast as it could go. And he saw that he was not going to be able to catch up to her.

Finally Sage tried using his words. "Maiden," he said, "for the sake of the man you love most, wait for me!"

"Of course," she said, "and it would have been a lot easier on the horse if you'd just asked me a while back."

The maiden stopped and waited, and held back the part of her headdress that was meant to cover her face. She looked him in the eye, and they started talking.

"My lady," he said, "where are you from, and where are you off to?"

"My own errands," she said, "and I'm happy to see you."

"You are welcome here," he said. As he looked at her, he realized that no woman¹ he had ever seen had anything to offer compared with her beauty.

"My lady," he said, "will you tell me anything about these errands of yours?"

"Yes, by God," she said. "The main errand I had was to try and see you."

"That," said Sage, "is the best errand you could possibly have, as far as I'm concerned. Will you tell me who you are?"

"Yes, my lord," she said. "I am Rhiannon, daughter of Hyfaidd² the Old, and I'm going to be married to a man against my will.³ I never wanted any other man than you. And I will never have another, either, unless you reject me. I came here to find out how you feel about that."

"I swear to God," said Sage, "here is my answer for you: if I had my pick of all the women in the world, you're the one I'd choose."

"All right," she said, "if that's how you truly feel, set a date with me before I'm given to another man."

"The sooner the better," said Sage. "Let's have it any place you want."

"All right, my lord," she said. "One year from tonight, at Hyfaidd's court, I'll have a wedding feast made ready in your honor."

"I can't wait," he said.

"My lord," she said, "be well, and remember to keep your promise. Now I have to go."

Then they parted, and Sage went back to his warband and courtiers. Whenever they asked him questions about the maiden, he changed the subject. They waited for a year until the appointed time, and

¹ woman The Welsh says "maidens or women," a distinction between virgins and sexually experienced women that presumably encompasses two different ideals of feminine beauty—both of which this lady seems to surpass.

² Hyfaidd Pronounced "HUH-vythe" (to rhyme with scythe).

³ I'm going ... my will "Celtic" women are often stereotyped as strong, independent, and feisty, but Rhiannon and the other strong female characters of early Welsh and Irish literature live in a patriarchal society, and their stories are told for a patriarchal society, even when they themselves are breaking the rules. We know from law-texts that in medieval Welsh society women's status was clearly subordinate to men's, although women did enjoy some freedoms uncommon in medieval Europe, such as easy divorce.

Sage got ready with an entourage of a hundred knights. He traveled to the court of Hyfaidd the Old, and when he got there they were delighted to see him; he was received with incredible joy and a huge celebration, and all the resources of the court were put at his disposal. The great hall was prepared, and they all sat down. The way they were seated, Sage was between Hyfaidd the Old and Rhiannon, and after that everyone was seated according to rank.

They ate and drank and talked. Then, just as after-dinner drinks were starting, a young man came in: he was brown-haired, tall, and lordly, and wore brocaded silk. And when he reached the head of the hall, he greeted Sage and his companions.

"In God's name, welcome, my friend. Come and sit down," said Sage.

"No," he said, "I'm a petitioner, and I'll say my piece."

"Go right ahead," said Sage.

"My lord," he said, "my business is with you. I've come to ask a favor."

"Whatever you ask of me, if I can get it, it's yours."¹

"What!?" said Rhiannon. "Why on earth would you answer him like that?"

"Well, he did, my lady, and these noblemen are my witnesses," said the man.

"Friend," said Sage, "what's your request?"

"Tonight you're supposed to sleep with the woman I love most. I've come to ask for her and for the feast you have here."

Sage said nothing—there was no answer he could give.

"Now you keep quiet," said Rhiannon. "No man was ever such an imbecile."

"Dear one," he said, "I didn't know who he was."

"That's the man I told you I was being married to against my will," she said: "Gwawl son of Clud, a rich man with lots of followers. And since you gave your word the way you did, you have to hand me over;

otherwise you can say goodbye to your reputation."

"My love," he said, "what kind of answer is that? I could never make myself do what you say."

"Give me to him," she said, "and I'll make sure he never gets me."

"How is that even possible?" said Sage.

"I'll give you a little bag," she said. "Keep it with you and don't lose it. Now, he's asking for the feast and the decorations and supplies. But none of those things is in your power to give. I'll give the feast to the warband and courtiers, and that'll be your answer as far as the stuff goes. As for me, I'll set a date with him, a year from tonight, for him to sleep with me. When the year is up, you come back with this bag and have your hundred horsemen waiting in the orchard up there. And when he's as drunk and self-satisfied as he can possibly get, come in by yourself in ragged clothes, carrying the bag, and don't ask for anything except to have the bag filled with food. I'll arrange it so that even if all the food and drink in seven districts were put into it, it would be no fuller than it was to start with. After he's put a lot in, he'll ask you, 'Will your bag ever be full?' You'll say, 'No, not unless a very wealthy nobleman gets up and compresses the food in the bag with his feet, and says, 'Enough has been put in here.'" And I'll make sure he gets up to trample the food in the bag. Then as soon as he does, you flip the bag and send him tumbling in head over heels, then tie it shut. And make sure you have a decent hunting horn slung round your neck, so when he's tied up in the bag, you can blow your horn, which will be a signal to your horsemen to come as soon as they hear it and storm the court."

"My lord," said Gwawl, "it's high time I had an answer to what I asked."

"Everything you asked for," said Sage, "so far as it is in my power, you shall have."

"My friend," said Rhiannon, "I've already given the food and supplies to the men of Dyfed and the warband and courtiers assembled here. So I can't very well give them to anyone else. But a year from tonight, we'll prepare a feast in this very court just for you, my friend, and you can sleep with me."

Gwawl went home, and Sage went back to Dyfed. Everyone killed time that year until it was time for the feast at the court of Hyfaidd the Old. Gwawl son of

¹ Whatever ... yours In medieval literature, a lord who feels secure in his ability to be generous will often grant requests before listening to what they are—and it is not unusual for a character to appear unannounced at court and demand an unspecified "boon." In Culhwch and Olwen, the earliest Welsh Arthurian tale, King Arthur gives a wiser answer: "Anything you can name except my ship, my mantle, my sword, my lance, my shield, my dagger, and my wife."

Clud came to the feast that was prepared for him; he arrived at the court and was warmly received. Meanwhile, Sage the Otherworld Ruler came to the orchard the way Rhiannon had told him to, with a hundred knights and the special bag. He put on dingy rags, and wore rough gaiters to cover his feet. When he could see the after-dinner drinks starting, he went into the hall; and when he reached the head of the hall he greeted Gwawl son of Clud and his companions, both men and women.

"May God be with you," said Gwawl, "and, in God's name, welcome."

"My lord," said the disguised Sage, "may God reward you. I have business with you."

"Your business is welcome," said Gwawl. "And if you have a reasonable request to make of me, it's yours."

"It's reasonable, my lord," said Sage, "and I'm only asking out of dire need. This is my request: to fill up this little bag that you see here with food."

"That's a modest request, and of course you shall have it," said Gwawl. "Give him food," he ordered, and an army of servants got up and started to fill the bag. But no matter how much they put into it, it got no fuller than before.

"Mister," said Gwawl, "will your bag ever be full?"

"No, I swear to God," said Sage, "it never will ... unless a landed nobleman of wealth and property gets up and stands with both feet in the bag and says, 'Enough has been put in here.'"

"Get up right now, you stud," said Rhiannon to Gwawl son of Clud:

"With pleasure," he said. He got up and put both feet in the bag, and Sage flipped it over so that Gwawl tumbled in, head over heels. Sage immediately closed the bag, tied a knot in the drawstrings, and blew his horn. Then the warband stormed the court, and seized everyone who had come with Gwawl and took them all prisoner. And Sage threw off the rags and the gaiters and the dingy cloak he was wearing.

As each of his followers came in, they all gave the bag a whack, and asked, "What's in here?"

"A badger," someone said. They turned it into a game: each one walloped the bag with his foot and his staff. (That was the entire game.) Everyone who came along was asking, "What are you playing at there?"

"A round of badger-in-a-bag," they said. And that's the first time anyone ever played badger-in-a-bag.¹

"My lord," said the man in the bag, "please listen—being killed in a bag is no way to die."

"My lord," said Hyfaidd the Old, "he's right. It's only fair to listen to him. That's no way for him to die."

"All right," said Sage, "tell me how I should deal with him. I'll do whatever you say."

"Here's what you'll do," said Rhiannon. "This is the time when you're expected to satisfy petitioners and pay the musicians. He can pay off everyone for you. Then make him promise that there will never be questions asked or vengeance taken for this. That will be punishment enough for him."

"He's good with that" said the man in the bag.

"And I'm good with that too," said Sage, "if it's what Hyfaidd and Rhiannon recommend."

"It is," they said.

"Done," said Sage. "Choose some guarantors to represent you."

"We'll stand on his behalf," said Hyfaidd, "until his men are free to represent him."

At that point they let Gwawl out of the bag and released his top men.

"Now ask Gwawl for guarantors," said Hyfaidd. "We'll tell you who to take."

Hyfaidd named the guarantors.

"Spell out the terms of our agreement yourself," Gwawl said to Sage.²

"The way Rhiannon spelled them out," said Sage, "is good enough for me."

The sureties were bound by those terms.

"All right, my lord," said Gwawl, "I'm hurt—in fact I'm seriously injured—and I need a bath. With your permission, I'll be going. I'll leave some noblemen behind to represent me, to deal with everyone who comes to you with requests."

"Excellent," said Sage. "You do that."

So Gwawl went home.

The hall was prepared for Sage and his followers, and for the people of the court as well. They all sat

¹ the first ... badger-in-a-bag This makes it sound like a well-known game, but no evidence has been found of people playing it.

² Spell out ... Sage Gwawl is trying to get him to make another mistake.

down for dinner, and the seating arrangements were the same as they had been the year before. They ate and drank until it was time for sleep. Sage and Rhiannon headed for the bedroom, and spent that night in mutually enjoyable and satisfying ways.

Early in the morning, Rhiannon said: "My lord, get up and pay the musicians, and don't refuse anyone who's hoping for a gift today."

"I'll be glad to," said Sage. "Today and every day while this feast lasts." Then Sage got up and called for silence, and ordered the petitioners and musicians to come forward, and announced that they would all have whatever they asked for. And so it was done. The feast went on, and no one was denied anything as long as it lasted. And when it was over, Sage said to Hyfaidd: "My lord, with your permission I'd like to leave for Dyfed tomorrow."

"All right," said Hyfaidd, "God go with you. Set a date and time for Rhiannon to follow you."

"By God," said Sage, "we'll leave together."

"Is that how you want it, my lord?" asked Hyfaidd.

"Yes, by God," said Sage.

They next day they left for Dyfed and reached the court at Arberth, and a feast was prepared for them there. The most distinguished men and women in the land flocked to them. None of them left Rhiannon without her giving them a special present, like a brooch, a ring, or a precious stone.

Sage and Rhiannon ruled the land successfully that year and the next.¹ In the third year, the people began to obsess over the fact that Sage, a man they loved so much, both as a lord and as a foster-brother, was still childless. They called him to a meeting at Preseli in Dyfed.

"My lord," they said, "you're not so very young, and it doesn't look like this woman you're with now is going to give you any children. So we'll be needing you to take another wife who can. You won't live forever, and although you might like things to stay the way they are,

that's not going to work."

"Look," said Sage, "I haven't been with her that long, and a lot of things could happen. Give me until the end of the year: let's meet again a year from now, and if I still have no children I'll do as you say."

They made the appointment, but before the year was up, he had a son. The night the baby was born, in Arberth, some women were brought in to look after the boy and his mother. The women kept watch for part of the night, but before midnight all of them—there were six—fell asleep, along with the boy's mother, Rhiannon.

The women woke up at first light. They looked at the place where they had laid the boy, and there was no sign of him.

"Oh shit!"² said one of them. "The baby's gone."

"Well," said another, "if we're only burned alive or executed for losing him, we'll be getting off lightly."

"Is there any way in the world to get us out of this?" said a third.

"Yes," said a fourth. "I have the perfect plan."

"What's that?" they all wanted to know.

"There's a deerhound here," said the woman with the plan, "and she has puppies. Let's kill some of the puppies, smear the blood on Rhiannon's face and hands, scatter the bones on top of her, and swear she ate the baby. She won't be able to contradict all six of us."

And that's what they did.

As dawn approached, Rhiannon woke up and called. "Ladies," she said, "where's the baby?"

"Mother," they said, "don't ask us where the baby is. There's nothing left of us but bruises and scratches from struggling with you. Seriously, we never saw anything like it. You were like a one-woman army. We couldn't fight you off! You tore your son apart and devoured him. Don't go asking us about him."

"You miserable creatures," said Rhiannon, "for the love of God who knows everything, don't tell lies about me. God, who knows everything, knows that that's a lie. But if you're afraid, I swear to God I'll protect you."

Sage ... next Kingship, in early Ireland involved a symbolic marriage between the king and the land. Sovereignty was represented as a woman, a transforming "Loathly Lady" figure. Rhiannon's marriage to the prince of Dyfed sacralizes his rule, and the problems she has with her husband are linked to his problems in becoming a fully realized lord.

¹ Oh shit! The Welsh och in fact has no scatological connotation, but it is difficult to find equivalents in modern English that do not have scatological or sexual connotations; this was the most forceful expression of surprise and dismay in the language, and in modern English "alas" or "oh no!" simply do not have the same force.

"God knows," they said, "we have to look out for ourselves."

"You poor things," she said, "nothing bad will happen to you if you tell the truth." She spoke to them with fairness and pity, but the women kept giving her the same answer.

At that point, Sage the Otherworld Ruler got up, along with the warband and the courtiers, and there was no keeping the incident quiet. The news spread like wildfire, and all the nobles heard it. They got together and sent messengers to Sage, demanding he divorce his wife for committing such a monstrous act. Sage answered: "They have no grounds for making me divorce my wife except if she's barren. But I know that she did have a child. So I won't be divorcing her. If she committed a crime, let her be punished for it."

As for Rhiannon, she sent for sages and wise men to assess her case. When it seemed to make more sense to plead guilty than to go on wrangling with the women, she pled guilty. Her sentence was to stay at that court in Arberth for seven years. There was a mounting-block outside the gate, and she was supposed to sit there every day and tell the whole story to everyone she thought didn't know it, and offer to carry any guest or traveler to the court on her back,¹ if he would let her. But people rarely did. And that's how she spent a good part of the next year.

At that time, the lord of Gwent Below-the-Wood (Gwent Is-Coed) was Teirnon Roaring Torrent² (Teirnon Twryf Lliant), who was the best man in the world.

Teirnon owned a mare. In all his realm there was no horse or mare more beautiful. But every May Eve³ she gave birth, and no one knew what became of her foal.

One night Teirnon spoke with his wife. "Wife," he said, "it's kind of pathetic how we let the mare have a foal every year without holding on to even one of them."

"What are we supposed to do about it?" she said.

"Tonight is May Eve," he said. "May God strike me down if I don't find out what's happening to the foals."

He had the mare brought inside, then armed himself and started keeping watch. As night fell, the mare gave birth to a big handsome foal, which got to its feet at once. Teirnon stood up to admire the size of the foal, and as he did, he heard some kind of racket. Then, unbelievably, a giant claw reached in through the window and grabbed the foal by the mane. Teirnon drew his sword and chopped off the mysterious arm at the elbow, so that part of the arm stayed inside with the foal. Then he heard crashing and screaming at the same time. He opened the door and ran after the noise. He couldn't see what was making it because the night was so dark, but he rushed after it and tried to catch up. He remembered he had left the door open, and came back. On the doorstep was a little boy in swaddling clothes, with a piece of brocaded silk wrapped around him. As soon as he picked the baby up, he noticed that the boy was strong for his age.

Then he locked the door, and went to the bedroom where his wife was.

"My dear," he said, "are you sleeping?"

"No, dear," she said. "I was sleeping, but you woke me up."

"Here's a son for you, if you want," he said, "which is something you never had."

"Darling," she said, "what's this all about?"

"Here's what happened," said Teirnon, and told her the whole thing.

"All right, dear," she said, "what kind of clothes is he wearing?"

"A brocaded silk wrap," he said.

"He's from a good family," she said. "Darling, it would make me the happiest woman in the world to keep this baby. If you don't mind, I'll take some women into my confidence, and we'll say I was pregnant."

"Fine with me," he said.

¹ offer to ... back The character Rhiannon seems to be based on a horse goddess, Epona. Her association with horses—the fact that she first showed up on a horse, and is now forced to carry people on her own back—may be seen as expressive of her mythological origins.

² Roaring Torrent The epithet is probably a reference to prowess in battle—sweeping away his enemies like a roaring torrent.

³ May Eve In the pre-Christian Celtic calendar, the year was divided into dark (winter) and light (summer) halves. The one began on November 1, the other on May 1. At both these times, the normal barriers between this world and the Otherworld, and the living and the dead, were believed to break down. The modern North American Hallowe'en is based on this. In this story May Eve functions as a second Hallowe'en.

And that's what they did. They had the boy christened, in the way that was done in those days.¹ The name they gave him was Gwri Golden-Hair (Gwri Wallt Euryr). This was because of his full head of hair, which was yellow as gold.

The boy was raised at the court until he was a year old. And before he was a year old he was walking with confidence, and was huskier than an extra-large three-year-old. A year later he was the size of a six-year-old. Before the end of his fourth year, he was bargaining with the stableboys to let him lead the horses to water.

"Dear," Teirnon's wife asked him, "where's the foal you saved the night you found the boy?"

"I turned it over to the stableboys," he said, "and told them to take care of it."

"Don't you think it would be a good idea, darling," she said, "to have it broken in, and give it to the boy? Since the night you found him, the foal was born too and you saved it."

"I have no objection," said Teirnon. "I'll let you give it to him."

"Darling," she said, "may God reward you. I'll give it to him." So the boy got the horse, and she went to the grooms and stableboys and ordered them to take care of it, break it in so the boy could ride it, and let her know how he was doing.

Meanwhile, they heard about Rhiannon and her punishment. Because of his precious find on May Eve, Teirnon kept an ear out for news, and was always asking questions, so he heard countless people who had been to the court repeatedly complaining about Rhiannon's tragic story and her punishment. Teirnon thought for a while, and gave the boy a searching glance. He realized that as far as appearances went, he had never seen a boy look more like his father than that one looked like Sage the Otherworld Ruler. (He knew what Sage looked like because he, Teirnon, had been one of his men in the past.) After that, he started brooding about how wrong it was for him to keep the boy when he knew that he was the son of another man.² As soon as he got the chance to talk to his wife in private, he asked her if it could possibly be right for them to keep the boy, considering that he was the reason why a noblewoman like Rhiannon was being subjected to such awful punishment, and considering that he was the son of Sage the Otherworld Ruler.

Teirnon's wife agreed that they should send the boy back to Sage.

"There are three things we will get from doing that," she said. "First, Rhiannon will give us thanks and a hefty reward for setting her free from her punishment. Second, Sage will thank us for raising his son and bringing him back to him. The third thing is that if the boy grows up to be a gentleman, he'll be our foster-son, and he'll always do the best he can for us."

So that's what they did. The very next day, Teirnon got ready to travel with two other knights; and the boy, riding the horse that Teirnon had given him, made a fourth. They all set out for Arberth, and it wasn't long until they got there. When they approached the court, they saw Rhiannon sitting by the horse-block. When they came up to her, she spoke: "Sir," she said, "go no further. I will carry each of you to the court. That is my punishment for killing my own son and eating him."

"Ma'am," said Teirnon, "I don't think any of these people will ride on your back."

"Whoever wants to can go ahead," said the boy. "I sure won't."

"God knows, buddy," said Teirnon, "none of us will."

They entered the court, and were met with a huge celebration; the servants were busy laying out a feast, because Sage had just come back from a tour of Dyfed. They went into the hall and washed up. Sage was glad to see Teirnon, and they went to sit down. The way they were seated, Teirnon was between Sage and Rhiannon, with Teirnon's two companions up the table from Sage, with the boy between them. After they had finished eating and had started drinking, they talked. Teirnon told the whole story about the mare and the boy, and about how the boy had been in his and his wife's care, and how they had raised him.

¹ They had ... those days Since the characters frequently mention God, it is not clear whether this refers to a pagan naming ceremony, or just to an older way of performing the Christian ritual.

² how wrong ... another man We might have expected something like "how wrong it was for him to keep the boy now that he knew who his (biological) father was"—because obviously Teirnon knew all along that he wasn't the father. The point may be that Teirnon thought the boy must have a supernatural father, but now that he realizes the father is human, normal social rules apply.

"So there you see your son, my lady," said Teirnon. "Whoever told lies about you did you a real injustice. When I heard about the abuse you had to bear, I was devastated, and I couldn't ignore it. But now I don't think there's anyone in this whole gathering who won't acknowledge the boy as a son of Sage."

"Of course," said everyone; "we're all convinced."

"I swear to God," said Rhiannon, "I'd be delivered of my cares if that were true."

"My lady," said one of the lords, Pendaran of Dyfed, "you've given your son a good name: Carey (Pryderi).¹ And it's best that he be called Carey, son of Sage the Otherworld Ruler."

"Make sure his own name doesn't suit him better," said Rhiannon.

"What's his name?" said Pendaran of Dyfed.

"We called him Gwri Golden-Hair."

"His name will be Carey," said Pendaran of Dyfed.

"That's better," said Sage. "His name should come from the words his mother instinctively spoke when she found out the good news."

So that's what they called him.

"Teirnon," said Sage, "may God reward you for raising this boy until today. If he grows up to be a gentleman, it will be right for him to pay you back."

"My lord," said Teirnon, "don't forget the woman who raised him: no one in the world could have suffered more grief at losing him than she has. It would be right for him to remember what that woman and I did for him."

"I swear to God," said Sage, "I'll provide for you—for you and your people—as long as I live, the same way I provide for my own people. Of course, if the boy survives, it would be more appropriate for him to support you. And if the nobles here would advise it, and if you agree—since you've raised him till today—we'll give him to Pendaran of Dyfed, to be his foster-son from now on.² But you'll all be companions and foster-fathers to him."

"That's the best plan," said everyone.

So the boy was given to Pendaran of Dyfed, and the noblemen of the land agreed to help him. Teirnon Roaring Torrent and his men went home, feeling happy and appreciated. Before Teirnon was allowed to leave, he was offered the most beautiful treasures, the best horses, and the most prized hounds. But he wouldn't accept anything.

After that, everyone stayed in their territories. Carey, son of Sage the Otherworld Ruler was brought up with the care and attention you'd expect, until he grew up to be the most physically impressive, the most handsome, and the most accomplished of all the young men in the realm. And the years went by, until the life of Sage the Otherworld Ruler reached its end, and he died. Then it was Carey who ruled the seven districts of Dyfed, dearly beloved by his people and by everyone he met. He went on to conquer the three districts of Ystrad Tywi and the four districts of Ceredigion, which are called the seven districts of Seisyllwch. And he, Carey son of Sage the Otherworld Ruler, kept his thoughts on conquering those lands until he felt inclined to get married. The wife he chose was Busty,³ daughter of Gwyn Gohoyw, son of Gloyw Flowing Hair, son of Warlord Cassnar, who were noblemen of this island.

So ends this branch of the Mabinogi.

—? 12TH CENTURY

¹ Pryderi From pryder, "(cause of) anxiety, concern, distress, disquiet, fear; care, solicitude, charge, protection, custody; vigilance, alertness." It is a near equivalent to the English word care, which can mean "worry" ("her face was lined with care") as well as "attentiveness" ("her makeup was applied with care").

² we'll give ... now on It might seem strange that as soon as Rhiannon and Sage find their long-lost son, Sage places him in foster care—but that is what medieval Welsh society would have expected him to do. Fosterage was an important means of increasing family prestige and forging alliances. (Foster siblings make good allies because they are not competitors for inheritance; in medieval Welsh history we see one prince after another blinding and castrating his male relatives to disqualify them from succession.)

³ Busty The Welsh is Cigfa (pronounced "KIG-va"). The cig-element means either "breast" or "meat."

THE SECOND BRANCH
BRANWEN UERCH LLYR
BLANCHE CROWE, DAUGHTER OF LLYR

In those days, Benedict Crowe (*Bendigeidfran*¹) son of Llyr was the king of this island, and wore the crown of London. One afternoon he was at Harlech in Ardudwy,² which was one of his courts. He was sitting on the rock of Harlech overlooking the sea.

With him were his brother Manawydan³ son of Llyr, his half-brothers Val (Nisien) and Rival (Efnisien),⁴ and all the noblemen that you'd expect to find around a king. Benedict Crowe's half-brothers were the sons of Eurosdydd by Benedict Crowe's mother Penarddun, daughter of Beli son of Mynogan. One of them, Val, was incredibly sweet-natured; he somehow had a way of making peace between two armies who were at each other's throats. His brother Rival was the opposite: he could take two brothers who were the best of friends and turn them into enemies.

As the king and his brothers were sitting on the rock, they suddenly caught sight of thirteen ships coming from the south of Ireland. The ships were gliding briskly along with the wind in their sails, closing in fast.

"I see ships over there," said the king, "coming boldly to land. Tell the men of the court to arm themselves and go see what they're up to."

The men armed themselves and rushed down to the shore. As they watched the ships come closer, they agreed that they'd never seen ships so handsomely equipped, complete with magnificent streaming banners of brocaded silk.

Then one of the ships pulled ahead of the others, and the men on shore could see a shield being hoisted over the deck. It was upside-down as a sign of peace. The men on shore edged forward to get within earshot. Meanwhile, the ships launched some boats, which came in close to shore so that the men in the boats could greet the king.

Benedict Crowe heard them perfectly well from where he sat on the high rock above them. "May God be with you," he answered. "Welcome. Who owns this fleet of ships, and who's in charge of them?"

"My lord," they said, "Matholwch,⁵ king of Ireland, is here. He owns these ships."

"Why is he here?" said Benedict Crowe. "And does he want to come ashore?"

"Not unless he gets what he came for. He has a proposal for you."

"What kind of proposal?"

"He wants to ally himself with you, my lord," they said. "He has come to ask for Blanche Crowe (Branwen)⁶ daughter of Llyr, your sister, in marriage. If it pleases you, he wants to unite Ireland with the Island of the Mighty,⁷ so that they can be mightier together."

"All right," said Benedict Crowe. "Have him come ashore, and we'll discuss it."

They took his answer back to Matholwch.

"It would be my pleasure," said the Irish king. He went ashore, and was warmly received; there was a great gathering in the court that night, with the assembled followers of both kings.

¹ Bendigeidfran Pronounced "ben-dig-AID-vran." The name means "blessed raven" or "holy crow." Scholars sometimes refer to him as "Bran the Blessed." He has the raven/crow element in common with his sister Branwen.

² Ardudwy On the coast of modern Merionethshire, in northwest Wales.

³ Manawydan Pronounced "man-uh-WID-an." This name corresponds to the Gaelic Manannán mac Lir, who is one of the Túatha Dé Danann or pagan gods of Ireland, having a special association with the sea and the Isle of Man.

⁴ Val... Efnisien These names are obvious counterparts. The name Efnisien (pronounced "ev-NIS-yen") contains the word efnys meaning "hostile, enemy," while Nisien ("NIS-yen") is found elsewhere as a saint's name.

⁵ Matholwch Pronounced "math-OH-look," ending with the -ch sound in Bach or loch. In this form the name has no special meaning and does not correspond to any name in Irish. There seems to have been an older form Mallohwhch, which could have meant something like "slow-moving water."

⁶ Branwen The name means white, pure, or sacred (gwen) raven/crow (bran).

⁷ the Island... Mighty The island of Britain.

The next day they held a meeting, and decided to give Blanche Crowe to Matholwch. She was one of the three chief matriarchs of this island,¹ and the fairest maiden in the world.

It was decided that Matholwch would sleep with her² in Aberffraw,³ and travel home from there. The two groups set out, with Matholwch and his followers traveling by ship, and Benedict Crowe and his followers by land, till they reached Aberffraw.

There they took their seats at the marriage feast. The way they were seated, the king of the Island of the Mighty had Manawydan on one side of him and Matholwch on the other, and Blanche Crowe daughter of Llyr sat with them. They were actually not in a feasting hall, but in tents. Benedict Crowe was a giant; he was too big to fit inside any house.

So they drank, and then they drank some more, and while they drank, they talked. When they felt it might be a good idea to take a break from drinking, they went to bed.

That night, Matholwch slept with Blanche Crowe.

In the morning, the court officials started to discuss where to house the horses and the servants that all the visitors had brought.⁴ They divided them up and put them everywhere they could find, all the way to the sea. While that was going on, Rival (the troublemaker we told you about) came along, past where they were keeping Matholwch's horses. He asked who owned them.

¹ one of ... this island This is the first example in the Four Branches of the formula used to refer to the Triads (see the introduction). Literally, the text calls her "the third chief matriarch," but this means she is one of the proverbial three. What is not clear is whether there were three chief matriarchs in Britain at any one time, or whether Branwen was one of the three chief matriarchs in the history of Britain—but considering the contents of most extant Triads, it is probably the second of these.

² sleep with her As in the First Branch, there is no actual "wedding"; a couple gets married by sleeping together in a formalized way after a feast.

³ Aberffraw On the island of Anglesey, in northwest Wales.

⁴ the horses ... brought If they came in ships, why did the Irish bring so many horses? At least one scholar, Jenny Rowland, thinks of these horses as Branwen's dowry, but the text does not explicitly say what they are. The servants here are clearly not part of the dowry.

"These horses belong to Matholwch, King of Ireland," they told him.

"What are they doing here?" he said.

"The king of Ireland is here; he slept with your sister Blanche Crowe, and these are his horses."

"Is that how they toss away a woman worth as much as she is, my own sister—they give her away without even consulting me? They couldn't have insulted me more."

Then he attacked the horses. He cut their lips from their teeth, their ears from their heads, and their tails from their bodies, and whenever he could get a grip on their eyelids, he cut them to the bone. The horses were disfigured and lost all their value.

Soon the news reached Matholwch; he was told that his horses had been cut up and maimed, making them worthless.

"All right, my lord," someone said, "you've been humiliated.⁵ They did this on purpose to insult you."

"God knows, it seems incredible that if they wanted to see me humiliated, they would have let me marry a maiden so good, so noble, and so beloved by her people."

"My lord," said someone else, "it's an obvious insult. All you can do is get back in your ships and leave."

So Matholwch started for his ships.

Benedict Crowe heard that the Irish king had left without a proper leave-taking, and sent messengers (Iddig son of Anarawg and Hyfaidd the Tall) to ask him why. They caught up with him and asked what he was thinking, and why he was going away.

"God knows," said Matholwch, "if I had known this would happen, I would never have come. I've been completely humiliated. No one ever went on a worse adventure. But you know what I just don't understand about what happened?"

"No, what?" they said.

"You gave me Blanche Crowe daughter of Llyr, one of the three chief matriarchs of this island and the daughter of a king of the Island of the Mighty, and I slept with her, and then I was put to shame. If you were going to insult me, I can't believe you didn't do it before

⁵ you've been humiliated The Irishman is not empathizing with Matholwch ("You must feel so humiliated"); he is saying that the king has publicly lost face.

I was given a woman worth as much as she is."

"God knows, my lord, the king didn't mean for you to be insulted," said the messengers, "and none of his counsellors even suggested it. Of course it was embarrassing for you—but it was even more of an insult to Benedict Crowe for someone to play a sick joke like that on his guest."

"All right," said Matholwch, "I guess that's true. But it's not like he can somehow un-insult me."

The messengers went back to Benedict Crowe and told him what Matholwch had said.

"Well," said Benedict Crowe, "there's no advantage to letting him leave angry. It's unacceptable."

"All right, my lord," said his men, "you should keep sending messengers after him."

"I will," he said. "Get up, Manawydan son of Llyr, Hyfaidd the Tall, and Solo Stoutshield,¹ and go after him. Tell him he'll have healthy horses for every one that was ruined. Also, he'll have his honor-price: a piece of silver as thick as his finger and as long as he is tall, and a gold plate the size of his face.² Tell him what kind of man was involved here, and make it clear that what he did was against my will; tell him the man is my half-brother and so I can't kill him or have him put to death. Matholwch just needs to come and see me, and I'll make peace on whatever terms he likes."

The messengers went after Matholwch and told him all that in a friendly way, and he listened.

"Men," he said, "let's talk this through."

The Irish talked amongst themselves and decided that if they rejected that offer, they would probably end up with more shame instead of more compensation. So they chose to accept, and went back to the court in peace. The tents and pavilions were arranged like the tables in a banquet-hall, and everyone sat down to eat in the same place they'd been sitting at the start of the feast.

Matholwch and Benedict Crowe were talking, and Benedict Crowe thought Matholwch sounded depressed—not his usual cheerful self. He thought the Irish king was sulking because he'd been given too little compensation for the wrong he'd suffered.

"My friend," said Benedict Crowe, "you're not as good a talker now as you were the other night. If that's because your compensation feels small, I can increase it as much as you like. And you'll get your new horses tomorrow."

"My lord," said Matholwch, "may God reward you."

"To top off your compensation," said Benedict Crowe, "I'll give you a cauldron. The special magical feature of this cauldron is that if one of your men gets killed today, toss him in and by tomorrow he'll be as healthy as ever, just not able to talk."

Matholwch thanked him for it, and was clearly very excited at the prospect. And the next day he was paid his horses. They gave him all the broken-in horses they had available, then moved over into the next townland and paid him in colts, till they had the full count. The district was called Colt-Counting Country (*Tal Ebolion*³) from then on.

Then on the second night of the feast they were sitting together, and Matholwch said:

"My lord, how did you get hold of that cauldron you gave me?"

"I got it from a man who had been in your country. For all I know, he got it there."

"Who was that man?" asked Matholwch.

"Llassar Firebrand Barter (*Llassar Llaes Gyfnewid*⁴)," said Benedict Crowe. "He came here from Ireland with his wife Bertha Battlebunch (*Cymidei Cymeinfoll*⁵); they'd escaped from an iron house in Ireland after it was heated up white-hot while they were still inside. I can't believe you wouldn't know about that."

"Actually, I do, my lord," said Matholwch, "and I'll tell you what I know. One day I was hunting in Ireland, on top of the mound above a lake called the Lake of the Cauldron. I saw a huge man with reddish-blond hair coming out of the lake, with a cauldron on his back. He

¹ Solo Stoutshield In the Welsh, Unig Glew Ysgwyd. The name could also be Unig Glew Ysgwydd, with "shoulder" for "shield."

² a piece ... face This is the compensation specified in the actual Welsh laws for an offense against the honor of a king.

³ Tal Ebolion As Ifor Williams explains, this is a folk etymology; the original place name was actually Tal-y-Bolion, "the end of the deep cavities," because there were many caves and ridges in the area.

⁴ Llassar Llaes Gyfnewid This name is difficult to interpret.

⁵ Cymidei Cymeinfoll In Patrick Ford's rendering, this literally means "distended, bloated with warriors"; "her name is simply a description of her capacity and her function." The translation used here refers to the "bunch" of "battlers" she "births."

was a big man, too—I mean gigantic. He looked like someone who was not to be messed with. His wife came out behind him, and if he was big, well, she was more than twice his size. They walked up and greeted me.”

“All right,” I said, “where are you two headed?”

“This is the situation, my lord,” said the man. “In six weeks this woman will be pregnant, and six weeks later she’ll give birth to a boy who’s a fully armed warrior.”

“I took them in and supported them. For the first year no one minded, but after that there was trouble. Before four more months went by, they were making themselves hated and unwelcome in the land, insulting, harassing, and assaulting noble men and women. At that point my people turned on me and demanded that I give them up. They gave me a choice: my kingdom or the giants. Easier said than done! The giants wouldn’t go of their own free will, and we couldn’t force them. Because we didn’t know what else to do, we built a house completely made of iron, and when it was ready, we called in every blacksmith in Ireland, and everyone who owned a hammer or a pair of tongs, and made a pile of coal as high as the roof.¹

“We coaxed the whole family in with unlimited food and drinks. When we saw them getting tipsy, we started a fire and blew the bellows strategically placed around the house—one man to each two bellows—and kept on blowing till the house turned white-hot, with all of them inside. They went and huddled in the middle of the room, and tried to decide what to do. The man waited until the iron wall was melting, and almost out of his mind from the heat, he charged the wall with his shoulder and broke out of there with his wife at his heels. None of the others escaped. And I suppose at that point, my lord,” Matholwch ended, “he came over to you.”

“Yes, by God,” said Benedict Crowe, “he did, and he gave me the cauldron.”

“How have you dealt with them, my lord?”

“I’ve been splitting them up and spreading them around. They’ve multiplied, and they’re thriving all over the place, fortifying wherever they are with the best men and weapons anyone ever saw.”

The two kings went on talking to their hearts’ content, and the music and partying went on until everyone decided they would rather go to sleep.

In the end, everyone had a great time at the feast.

When it was over, Matholwch left for Ireland, taking Blanche Crowe with him. They sailed from Abermenai in their thirteen ships, and landed in Ireland, where the people were overjoyed to see them. None of the high-born Irish men or Irish ladies who came to meet with Blanche Crowe left without a brooch, a ring, or a royal jewel so precious one would never have imagined it being given away. During that first year in Ireland she became known everywhere, and she couldn’t believe her good fortune, her fame, and all the new friends she was making. Meanwhile, she became pregnant. Her son was named Gwern son of Matholwch. They put him in foster care at the best place for young men in all of Ireland.²

But then, in the second year, everything changed. People started to grumble about the insult Matholwch had received in Wales, and the sick joke that had been played on him involving his horses. His foster-brothers and the other men closest to him started making snide remarks about it, making no effort to hide their resentment. In the end there was full-blown civil unrest, and it got so bad that there was no way to pacify the people except by taking revenge on Blanche Crowe for the insult.

Blanche Crowe was kicked out of the king’s bed and forced to do the baking for the court. Every day, the butcher, with his hands bloody from cutting up meat, was told to come and punch her in the head. All that was her punishment.

“All right, my lord,” Matholwch’s men told him, “now, ban all ships, ferries, and rowboats from traveling to Wales, and lock up everyone from Wales who comes here, so they can’t go back. That way news of this won’t

¹ we built ... the roof The notion of cooking people to death in iron houses occurs frequently in early Irish literature as a way of dealing with difficult enemies.

² They put ... of Ireland We are not told where this was, but it is probably fair to imagine something like the boy-troop of Ulster in the early Irish epic Táin Bó Cúailnge (The Cattle-Raid of Cooley). Fosterage was a well-established practice in early Ireland as well as in Wales (see also the situation of Carey in the First Branch); in fact one of the questions St. Patrick was supposedly asked about Christ is whether he had many foster-parents, which would have added to his status.

spread.” Matholwch agreed, and for no less than three years, that was how things stood.

Then Blanche Crowe raised a starling on the end of her kneading-trough. She taught it language, and told it how to recognize her brother. Then she wrote a letter about the way she was being treated, tied it around the base of the bird’s wing, and sent it to Wales.

The bird came to this island and found Benedict Crowe in Caer Saint in Arfon,¹ where he happened to be sitting in council. It landed on his shoulder and ruffled its feathers, so that they noticed the letter, and they realized the bird was tame. Then they untied the letter and looked at it. When he heard what it said,² Benedict Crowe was devastated to hear about his sister’s punishment. He sent out messengers to muster the entire island for battle. He had all the recruits from 154 districts come before him, and protested to them that his sister was being abused. They talked it over and decided to invade Ireland, leaving seven men behind as regents, with Caradog son of Bran in charge. Those men and their seven knights were left in Edeirnon, which is why the town got the name Seven Knights. The seven men were Caradog son of Bran, Hyfaidd the Tall, Solo Stoutshield, Iddig son of Anarawg Curly-Hair, Ffodor son of Erfyll, Wlch Bonelip, and Llashar son of Llassar Llaesgyngwyd;³ they had Pendaran of Dyfed with them as a junior aide.⁴ Those seven stayed behind as stewards of this island, with Caradog son of Bran as chief steward.

Meanwhile Benedict Crowe and his army were sailing for Ireland. The sea wasn’t as big in those days;

it amounted to no more than two rivers, called the Lli and the Archan. Later on, the sea expanded and conquered whole kingdoms.⁵ But at that time, Benedict Crowe just waded in, carrying the army’s orchestra on his back,⁶ and headed for Ireland.

One day Matholwch’s swineherds were on the seashore with their pigs.⁷ They looked out to sea, and what they saw frightened them so much that they ran to Matholwch.

“My lord,” they said, “greetings.”

“God be with you,” said the king. “What’s your news?”

“My lord,” they said, “our news is strange: we saw a forest on the ocean, where we never saw a single tree before.”

“Strange indeed,” said Matholwch. “Was there anything else?”

“Yes, my lord,” they said. “There was a huge mountain next to the forest, and it was moving. There was a high ridge on the mountain, with a lake on either side of it. And the forest, the mountain—it was all moving.”

“All right,” said Matholwch. “I’m sure no one here knows anything about any of that, except maybe Blanche Crowe. Let’s ask her.”

He sent messengers to Blanche Crowe.

“My lady,” said the messengers, “what do you think they saw?”

“I’m no lady,” she said, “but I know what they saw: the men of the Island of the Mighty are on their way over after hearing about how I’ve been abused and humiliated.”

“What was the forest on the sea?”

“Ships’ masts and yard-arms,” she said.

“Oh shit!”⁸ they said. “What about the mountain next to the ships?”

¹ Arfon In northwest Wales.

² When he ... it said The Welsh says “when [the letter] was read” (and not “when Bendigeidfran had read the letter”) because it was common for medieval lords—who were not always comfortably literate—to have someone else read documents aloud to them.

³ Llassar Llaesgyngwyd This could be the same as the giant Llassar Llaes Gyfnewid (“Llassar Firebrand Barter”) who brought the cauldron from Ireland. Earlier in the list are the names of some of the men who were sent as messengers after Matholwch.

⁴ junior aide This expression, gwas ieuanc, is normally translated “young lad,” but that is not right here, because in the First Branch, Pendaran of Dyfed is already old and high-ranking enough to foster Carey, and Carey is now old enough to go to war. The word gwas can mean “servant, attendant, employee, officer; vassal; slave” as well as “boy, lad,” etc., hence the interpretation here as “junior aide.”

⁵ the sea ... kingdoms Cantre’r Gwaelod, “The Bottom District,” is the most famous of the legendary drowned lands; its story is told in a poem in the Black Book of Carmarthen.

⁶ carrying ... his back Literally, “with all there was of string music on his own back.”

⁷ their pigs A minor point: in the Fourth Branch pigs are introduced to Dyfed as a gift from Arawn, the Otherworld king. They are described as a complete novelty to the Welsh.

⁸ Oh shit! See note 2 on page 166.

"My brother Benedict Crowe," she said, "wading. No ship can hold him."

"What about the high ridge with the lakes on either side of it?"

"That was him," she said, "looking at this island. He must be furious. The lakes on either side of the ridge are his eyes on either side of his nose."

Then Matholwch called up all of Ireland's fighting men, and while the coastal areas scrambled to defend themselves, he held a meeting.

"My lord," the nobles told him, "there's really nothing you can do except retreat across the Shannon—that's a river in Ireland¹—and destroy the bridge, so you put the river between you and him. There are sucking stones² at the bottom that prevent any ship or vessel from crossing."

They retreated across the river and destroyed the bridge.

Benedict Crowe brought his fleet ashore and advanced to the riverbank.

"My lord," said his nobles, "you know the special magical feature of this river—no one can cross it—and there's no bridge. Do you have any idea how we can build a bridge?"

"A great leader must do more than build a bridge for his people; he must be a bridge for his people. I will be your bridge."

That's when those words were first spoken, and they've become proverbial.

Then Benedict Crowe lay down across the river. They put planks on his back, and his army marched over on top of him.

As soon as he got up, messengers greeted him in the name of his kinsman Matholwch, and swore that Matholwch had only ever meant well.

"... and Matholwch is going to hand over the kingship of Ireland to Gwern—your own nephew, your sister's son—and he'll do it in your presence, to make up for the injustice and the insult to Blanche Crowe. Then you can tell Matholwch where to spend his retirement,³ either here or on the Island of the Mighty."

"All right," said Benedict Crowe, "although why shouldn't I take the kingship myself? We'll discuss your offer. But until you come up with something better, you'll get no answer from me."

"All right," they said, "we'll be back with the best response we can get. Wait for our message."

"I'll wait," he said, "if you hurry."

The messengers scurried off to Matholwch.

"My lord," they said, "come up with a better offer for Benedict Crowe. He wouldn't listen to the one we took him."

"Men," said Matholwch, "any ideas?"

"My lord," said his noblemen, "we think this is your only option. He's never been able to fit inside a house. Build one in his honor, with enough room for him and the men of the Island of the Mighty on one side, and you and your army on the other. Surrender your kingship and pay homage to him. He'll be so honored that you're building him a house—the one thing he has never had—that he'll make peace with you."

The messengers took that offer to Benedict Crowe and he talked it over with his men. They decided to accept it, after Blanche Crowe told them to. She was just trying to prevent the whole country from being destroyed.

So the armies made a truce,⁴ and the Irish went ahead and built the house, big and grand enough for Benedict Crowe. But the Irish still had a trick up their sleeve: they drove a peg on either side of the house's one hundred columns and hung a leather bag on each peg, with an armed warrior inside.

Remember Rival? He went inside before anyone else, and looked round the house with a merciless glare. He noticed the leather bags hanging on the posts, and went up to one of them.

¹ that's ... Ireland This is an editorial comment by the narrator.

² sucking stones This is a literal translation of mein sugyn. Other translators have "magnetic stones," but magnetic stones would not be a real threat to a fleet of wooden ships. (At least some medieval scholars had a limited knowledge of how magnets worked, and it is not unreasonable to expect the medieval Welsh to have had this knowledge as well.)

³ tell Matholwch ... retirement The Welsh has "provide for Matholwch wherever you like," etc., which suggests that Bendigeidfran is being asked to support Matholwch in his retirement.

⁴ truce This is the same word as "peace" later on; since peace is formally declared when the house is completed, it seems that at this point the word refers to only provisional peace.

"What's in this bag?" he asked the Irishman inside.¹

"Flour, mister," said the man.

Rival felt around until he found the man's head, and squeezed until he felt his fingers pop through the bone and meet inside the brain.

Then he let him go, put his hand on another bag, and said, "What have we got here?"

"Flour," said the Irishman.

Rival played the same trick on all of them, until only one of the whole two hundred (two per post) was left. He went up to that one asking "What have we got here?"

"Flour, mister," said the Irishman.

Rival felt around until he found his head, and squeezed it the same way he'd squeezed the others. That one was wearing a helmet, so it took a bit more effort, but he didn't relax his grip until he had killed him. Then he spoke a verse:²

"This bag contains: the flour of fighting men, breakfast of champions, put to the grind against boys with the stomach for battle."³

Then the armies trooped in. The men of the Island of Ireland came in on one side, and the men of the Island of the Mighty on the other. Once they all sat down, they got along fine.

The little boy, Gwern, was made king of Ireland. Then peace was declared.

What's in ... inside Literally, "'What's in this bag?' he said to one of the Irishmen." It is not entirely clear from the original which Irishman is being referred to; other translators seem to have taken it that an Irishman who is not inside one of the bags is questioned repeatedly and answers "flour" every time. This translation, however, suggests that Rival addresses the Irishman in each bag, and that all are supposed to be equally stupid, since each one gives the same bad answer. The house should appear to be empty when Rival walks in, since we are told that both the British and Irish armies come in afterwards.

² verse The technical term is englyn, a short poem with a highly formalized structure.

This bag ... for battle Literally, "There is in this bag a sort of flour, (of) champions, fighters, descenders to the grind, facing battle-ready warriors." Rival is playing off the answer "flour" he got from the Irishmen; "the grind" (as Will Parker puts it) is the grind of battle, but also the mill that turns grain into flour.

After the ceremony, Benedict Crowe called the boy over to him. Then he sent him on to Manawydan. Everyone who saw the boy found him adorable.

His uncle Val called him over, and he toddled over happily.

"Why doesn't my nephew—my sister's son—come here to me?" said Rival. "Even if he weren't king of Ireland, I'd still want to make friends."

"Absolutely," said Benedict Crowe.

The boy went over to him with a big smile.

"I confess to God," Rival said to himself, "my family will think what I'm about to do is unbelievably sick and twisted."

He stood up, took the boy by the feet, and in the same motion, before anyone could stop him, he swung him face first into the fire.

When Blanche Crowe saw her son sizzling in the fire, she tried to dive into it from where she was sitting between her two brothers. Benedict Crowe picked her up in one hand, and took his shield in the other—and everyone else in the house jumped up, setting off the biggest uproar that ever took place under one roof, with everyone seizing his weapons. That's when Morddwyd Tyllion said: "Watch out, Gwern's goons, here comes Morddwyd Tyllion!"⁴ With weapons being brandished everywhere, Benedict Crowe kept his sister safe between his shield and his shoulder.

The Irish lit a fire under the cauldron of rebirth. They threw in their corpses till the pot was full, and the next morning the dead came out fighting as well as before, except they couldn't speak.

When Rival saw the corpses piling up, with not even a sliver of room in the cauldron for the men of the Island of the Mighty, he said to himself, "Oh, God—woe is me for getting the men of my island slaughtered! And shame on me if I can't find some way to prevent this."

⁴ Watch out ... Tyllion Literally, "Dogs of Gwern, beware Morddwyd Tyllion!" (since Gwern was just made king of Ireland, the statement is directed toward the Irish). The Welsh is Gwern gwn; the translation preserves the alliteration, which is clearly one reason why this was a memorable utterance. The name Morddwyd Tyllion, which occurs only here, means "Pierced Thighs." For complicated reasons involving the wounded Fisher King of Arthurian romance, some scholars think this name refers to Benedict Crowe.

Then he lay down with the Irish corpses, and two bare-bottomed Irishmen came along and threw him in the cauldron, thinking he was one of them. He stretched himself out in the cauldron till it broke in four. So did his heart.

So, thanks to Rival, the men of the Island of the Mighty had their victory, such as it was: only seven men escaped death, not counting Benedict Crowe, who'd been wounded in the heel by a poisoned spear. The seven survivors were Carey,¹ Manawydan, Glifieu son of Taran, Taliesin,² Ynawg, Gruddyeu son of Muriel, and Heilyn son of Gwyn the Old—and Benedict Crowe told them to cut off his head.

"Take my head, carry it to the White Hill in London, and bury it facing France. You'll be on the road a long time. First you'll feast in Harlech for seven years with the birds of Rhiannon singing to you, and the head will be as good company for you then as it ever was when it had the rest of me attached. Then you'll spend eighty years in Gwales in Pembroke. You can stay there until you open the door facing Aber Henfelen, in the direction of Cornwall, and until then the head will be perfectly preserved. But as soon as you open the door, you won't be able to stay there; you'll need to go to London and bury the head. Now be off with you."

So they cut off his head, and the seven men and Blanche Crowe crossed the sea together. They landed at Aber Alaw (the mouth of the river Alaw) in Colt-Counting Country, where they sat down and rested.

Blanche Crowe looked out at what she could see of Ireland and the Island of the Mighty.

"Oh, Jesus," she said. "I'm sorry I was ever born. Two whole lovely islands were destroyed because of me." She gave a deep sigh.

Then her heart broke, and she died.

They made her a four-sided grave, and buried her there on the banks of the Alaw.

After that, the seven men headed for Harlech, carrying the head. On the way they met a group of men and women.

"What's the news?" said Manawydan.

They answered, "You mean besides the fact that Caswallawn son of Beli³ just conquered the island and was crowned king in London?"

"What happened to Caradog son of Bran and the seven men who stayed here with him?"

"Caswallawn took them by surprise and killed six of them. Caradog died of a broken heart, as he watched his men be slaughtered by a floating sword without knowing who was at the other end of it. Caswallawn was wearing a magic cloak, so no one could see him, only his sword. But Caswallawn hadn't wanted Caradog to die because he was his nephew, the son of his first cousin." (Caradog was one of the proverbial three men whose hearts broke from grief.) "Pendaran of Dyfed was only a junior aide,⁴ and escaped to the woods," they said.

The seven survivors went on to Harlech, where they sat down to a feast, and began to gorge themselves with food and drink.⁵ Just as they were starting to dig in, three birds⁶ came and started singing to them; all the songs they had ever heard were just noise by comparison. The birds were away in the distance, far out to sea, but they could see them as clearly as if they had been right there. With the birds singing away in the background, they went on feasting for seven years.

When the seven years were up, they moved to Gwales in Pembroke. The place had a great hall fit for a king, overlooking the sea, and that's where they went. Inside, they saw two doors standing open, and one that was closed—the one facing Cornwall.

"There," said Manawydan. "That's the door we're not supposed to open."

¹ Carey From the First Branch. This is the only time he receives an individual mention in the Second.

² Taliesin Other than Carey and Manawydan, the legendary bard Taliesin is the only character on the list who has a significant presence elsewhere in medieval Welsh literature.

³ Caswallawn ... Beli This character corresponds, at least in name, to the historical chief Cassivellaunus, who fought Julius Caesar when he invaded Britain in 55 and 54 BCE.

⁴ a junior aide Again, other translators call Pendaran "a young lad"; the possibility emphasized in the present translation is that he escaped because he was not important enough for Caswallawn to bother killing.

⁵ began to ... drink Sioned Davies has "an endless supply of food and drink commenced." The Welsh construction is impersonal ("there began self-satiation/self-supply from food and drink"), and in any case it is not clear where the food and drink are coming from.

⁶ three birds These are identified both earlier and later in the text as the Birds of Rhiannon, but it is never made clear how or if they are connected with Rhiannon (from the First Branch).

That night they were safe and sound, with everything they needed, and at last they could relax. They lost all memory of the horrors they had seen and experienced, and forgot that there was any sadness in the world.

They spent eighty years there,¹ and soon realized that they had never spent a more carefree or enjoyable time. It never soured on them; none of them could tell from looking at the others that any time had passed since they arrived, and having the head around never felt any more uncomfortable than having Benedict Crowe with them while he lived. That eighty-year episode is what's known as the Party of the Amazing Head.² (Meanwhile, the Party of Blanche Crowe and Matholwch is the name we give to the expedition to Ireland.)

One day, though, Heilyn son of Gwyn said to himself: "Shame on my beard³ if I don't open the door to see if what they say about it is true." So he opened the door, and looked out on Cornwall and Aber Henfelen.

And when he did, all the loss they'd ever felt, and all the relatives and friends they'd ever lost, and all the harm that ever touched them flooded in as raw as if they were facing it again, right there, all at the same time—and the worst was when it finally became real to them that their lord was dead.

Then they knew that they could not stay where they were, and they started taking the head to London.

However long they were on the road, they reached the White Hill and buried the head there.

Burying the head like that was one of the three fortunate concealments in the history of this island, and digging it up again⁴ was one of the three unfortunate disclosures, because as long as the head was hidden there, no oppression would ever reach this island from across the sea.

So that's what it says in this tale, which is the tale of those men, known as "The Men Who Set Out from Ireland."

Meanwhile, back in Ireland, there was no one left alive, except for five pregnant women in a cave in the wilderness. Those five women gave birth to five sons at the same time. They raised those five boys until they were old enough to start having thoughts about women, and desiring them. So they took turns sleeping with each other's mothers. They went on to settle and repopulate the land, dividing it between the five of them, which is how there came to be five provinces of Ireland.⁵ They searched the now-deserted battlefields, scavenging for gold and silver, until they became rich.

That's how this branch of the Mabinogi ends: with the Slapping of Blanche Crowe,⁶ which was one of the three unfortunate slaps in the history of this island; the Assembly of Benedict Crowe, when the armies of 154 districts went to Ireland to avenge the Slapping of Blanche; the seven years of feasting in Harlech, and the singing of the Birds of Rhiannon; and the eighty-year-long Party of the Head.

—? 12TH CENTURY

¹ They spent ... there Assuming people in the outside world have a normal human lifespan, these eighty years (and perhaps the earlier seven) seem not to translate to the same length of time for everyone else. Rhiannon and Caswallawn are still around as (not unusually old) characters in the Third Branch, which is an immediate sequel to this one, and when Carey goes to pay homage to Caswallawn, he is thanked for his allegiance, not asked why he is eighty-seven years late. Distortion of time is common when dealing with the Otherworld: three days in the Otherworld might translate to three, thirty, or three hundred years in the human world, for example.

² Party of the Amazing Head The word used to describe the head, urdaul, is understood by most translators as urddol ("noble"), so the standard rendering of this phrase in the scholarly literature is "The Assembly of the Noble Head." The other readings give us "great and terrible" or "amazing, miraculous."

³ Shame on my beard A real insult: a wife who wished shame on her husband's beard was legally required to pay him compensation.

⁴ digging it up again According to the Triads, it was King Arthur who dug it up, because he was offended by the idea that Britain owed its protection to anyone or anything besides himself.

⁵ five provinces of Ireland Ireland traditionally has five provinces. Four of them are Ulster in the north, Connacht in the west, Leinster in the east, and Munster in the south. The fifth, depending on which source you read, is either the central province of Mide (the more common configuration) or a second division of Munster.

⁶ Slapping of Blanche Crowe Earlier we're told that the butcher punches her upside the head (he "gives her a box on the ear," in the traditional phrasing), not that he slaps her.

MARIE DE FRANCE

c. 1155 – 1215

Although she is widely credited with being the earliest female poet in French, and is among the most important women writers of the Middle Ages, little is known about Marie de France; no surviving documents refer to her life outside of her literary activity. What has come down to us are three works, which vary widely in genre: the Lais (c. 1160), a collection of short romance narratives; the Ysopet or Fables (probably after 1180), a collection commonly accepted as the earliest translation of Aesop into French; and the Espurgatoire Saint Patrice (Saint Patrick's Purgatory, c. 1190), a didactic tale in which Owein, an Irish knight, makes a spiritual journey through a purgatorial cave. A fourth work, the Vie Sainte Audree (Life of St. Audrey, early 1200s), which tells the life and miracles of an Anglo-Saxon royal saint, is sometimes also attributed to her.

Marie's name is known from the self-identification she makes in each of her texts; this occurs most forcefully and descriptively in the epilogue of the Ysopet:

I shall name myself so that it will be remembered;
Marie is my name, I am of France.
It may be that many clerks will take my labor on themselves.
I don't want any of them to claim it.

"France" itself is a slippery designation here, since it had multiple possible meanings in this period; it may be intended to convey that she was from Continental Europe instead of England, for instance, or from northern France instead of the southern Languedoc. The "noble king" to whom she dedicates her Lais is usually identified as Henry II, the Angevin French king of England from 1154–89, whose court used the Anglo-Norman dialect in which Marie's works come down to us. Marie's historical identity remains unknown, though various candidates have been suggested, including Marie de Meulan or de Beaumont, Norman-born wife of Hugh Talbot, a baron with lands in both northern France and England (born c. 1140s); Marie, abbess of Barking and sister of Thomas Becket (died after 1173); and Marie, abbess of Shaftesbury and half-sister of Henry II (d. 1216). In the absence of solid links to the poet, however, such identifications can only be speculative. It is clear from her dedications to a king and, in the Fables, a "count William" that Marie had connections to noble courts, and it is highly likely that she was of noble birth; her works reveal a level of education and culture that would not usually have been available to a layperson of lower rank during this time. She could read Latin, as well as French, and may have known some Breton.

The Lais of Marie de France are brief narratives written in octosyllabic rhyming couplets, the conventional form for French narrative during this time. This collection is made up of twelve stories, each prefaced by a short prologue in which Marie often refers to a Breton lai as a source. The exact meaning of the term lai remains disputed, but it seems clear that these were Celtic tales of romance that often involved elements of the fantastic. The compressed space of the form requires Marie to handle her material with considerable finesse; her tight narrative control and economy of language lend the romances a down-to-earth precision without sacrificing meaning or nuance.

Many of the lais have a strongly female focus, and in this regard offer a certain contrast to the romances of Marie's contemporaries. The works of male romancers, while treating the subject of love, often emphasized the tension between love and chivalric pursuits, and the need to balance the two in order to fulfill both personal needs and social responsibilities. Marie is largely uninterested in such concerns, and focuses instead on the personal desires of her characters, especially those of her female characters. Her lais often depict intensely intimate love relationships that take place in a courtly society whose dynastic and feudal demands the characters must negotiate—sometimes successfully, sometimes not.

The two lais presented here use fantastical elements to approach human emotion and relationships. In Bisclavret, the title character makes a startling confession to his wife that leads us to an examination of the clash between his innate nobility and his dangerous appearance. Lanval, the second lai, is drawn from the larger literary universe of Arthurian legend. It recounts the tale of a knight whose inherent worth is unrecognized by the Arthurian court, and who is unable to escape this uncaring and arbitrary society through the love of an otherworldly fairy figure.

*Bisclavret (The Werewolf)*¹

Quant de lais faire m'entremet,
 Ne voil ublier Bisclaveret.
Bisclaveret ad nun en bretan,
Garwaf l'apelent li Norman.
 5 Jadis le poeit hume oïr, [col. b]
 E sovent suleit avenir,
 Humes plusurs garual devindrent
 E es boscages meisun tindrent.
 Garualf, c'est beste salvage:
 10 Tant cum il est en cele rage,
 Hummes devure, grant mal fait,
 Es granz foré[s] converse e vait.
 Cest afere les ore ester;
 Del bisclaveret voil cunter.
 15 En Bretagne maneit un ber,
 Merveille l'ai oï loër;
 Beaus chevalers e bons esteit
 E noblement se cunteneit.
 De sun seinur esteit privez
 20 E de tuz ses veisins amez.
 Femme ot espuse mut vailant

Since I have undertaken to compose lais,
 I don't want to forget Bisclavret.
Bisclavret is the name in Breton;
 the Normans call it Garwaf.
 There was a time when one would hear,
 and it often used to happen,
 that many people became werewolves and kept house in the woods.²
 The werewolf is a wild beast:
 when it is in that frenzy,
 it devours people and does great harm.
 It lives in and roams the great forests.
 Now I let this matter be;
 I want to tell of the bisclavret.
 In Brittany there lived a baron whom I have heard marvelously praised;
 he was a handsome, good knight
 and conducted himself nobly.
 He was dear to his lord
 and beloved by all his neighbors.
 He had married a very worthy wife

Bisclavret (The Werewolf) Edited and translated by Claire M. Waters, 2014. This lai appears on ff. 131va–133vb of Harley 978. A later hand has added the title “Bisclaveret” in the upper left margin.

Quant de lais ... the woods When referring to werewolves generally in her opening lines, Marie uses the name she has identified as Norman: “garual/garwaf.” After this, in talking about her protagonist, she uses the Breton “bisclaveret.” This translation signals the change in terms at line 14, where she switches to “bisclaveret,” but thereafter translates “bisclaveret” as “werewolf” when it is used with a definite article or seems to be a generic term, and as “Bisclavret” (a name) when it specifically designates the protagonist himself—which is usually at key moments in the story.

E que mut feseit beu semblant.
 Il amot li e ele lui,
 Mes d'une chose ert grant ennui:
 25 Que en la semeine le deperdeit
 Treis jurs entiers, que ele ne saveit
 U deveneit nē u alout,
 Ne nul des soens nient ne sout.
 Une feiz esteit repeirez
 30 A sa meisun joius e liez.
 Demandé li ad e enquis:
 "Sire," fait ele, "beau duz amis,
 Une chose vus demandasse
 Mut volenters, si jeo osasse;
 35 Mes jeo creim tant vostre curuz,
 Que nule rien tant ne redut."
 Quant il l'oï, s[i] l'acola,
 Vers li la traist, si la beisa.
 "Dame," fait il, "demandez!
 40 Ja cele chose ne me direz, [f. 132r]
 Si jo la sai, ne la vus die."
 "Par fei," fet ele, "ore sui garie!
 Sire, jeo sui en tel effrei
 Les jurs quant vus partez de mei;
 45 El lever en ai mut grant dolur
 E de vus perdre tel poür,
 Si jeo n'en ai hastif cunfort,
 Bien tost en puis aver la mort.
 Kar me dites u vus alez,
 50 U vus estes, u vus conversez!
 Mun escient que vus amez,
 E si si est, vus meserrez."
 "Dame," fet il, "pur Deu, merci!
 Mal m'en vendra si jol vus di,
 55 Kar de m'amur vus partirai
 E mei memes en perdirai."
 Quant la dame l'ad entendu,
 Ne l'ad neent en gab tenu.
 Suventefeiz li demanda;
 60 Tant le blandi e losenga
 Que s'aventure li cunta;
 Nule chose ne li cela.
 "Dame, jeo devienc bisclavret:
 En cele grant forest me met,
 65 Al plus espés de la gaudine, Si vif de preie e de ravine."

who seemed lovely.
 He loved her and she him,
 but she was greatly troubled by one thing:
 each week she lost him
 for three whole days, when she did not know what became of him nor where he went,
 nor did any of his people know at all.
 One day he had returned to his house joyful and happy.
 She questioned him and made an inquiry:
 "Lord," she said, "fair sweet beloved,
 I would very much like to ask you
 one thing, if I dared;
 but I am so afraid of your anger that there is nothing I fear more."
 When he heard this, he embraced her,
 drew her toward him and kissed her.
 "Lady," he said, "go ahead and ask!
 You will never say anything to me that, if I know, I will not tell you."
 "By my faith," she said, "now I am restored!
 Lord, I am so anxious on those days when you leave me;
 when I arise I am so sad about it and have such fear of losing you that if I do not get reassurance shortly,
 very soon I may die of it.
 So do tell me where you go,
 where you are, where you live!
 It is my belief you are in love,
 and if it is so, you do wrong."
 "Lady," he said, "mercy, by God!
 Trouble will come to me if I tell you,
 for I will divide you from my love and destroy myself in doing so."
 When the lady had heard him,
 she considered it no joke.
 Many times she asked him;
 she cajoled and flattered him so much that he told her his situation;
 he hid nothing from her.
 "Lady, I become a werewolf:
 I go into that great forest,
 to the deepest part of the woods,
 and live on prey and plunder."

Quant il li aveit tut cunté,
 Enquis li ad e demaundé
 Si il se despuille u vet vestu.
 70 "Dame," fet il, "jeo vois tut nu."
 "Di mei, pur Deu, u sunt voz dras."
 "Dame, ceo ne dirai jeo pas;
 Kar si jeo les eüsse perduz
 E de ceo feusse aparceüz
 75 Bisclaveret sereie a tuz jurs; [col. b]
 Jamés n'averie mes sucurs,
 De si k'il me fussent rendu.
 Pur ceo ne voil k'il seit seü."
 "Sire," la dame li respunt, 80 "Jeo vus eim plus que tut le mund:
 Nel me devez nient celer,
 Ne [mei] de nule rien duter;
 Ne semblereit pas amisté.
 Quei ai jeo forfait? pur queil peché 85 Me dutez vus de nule rien?
 Dites mei, si ferez bien!"
 Tant l'anguissa, tant le suzprist,
 Ne pout el faire, si li dist.
 "Dame," fet il, "delee cel bois,
 90 Lez le chemin par unt ieo vois,
 Une vielz chapele i esteit,
 Ke meinte feiz grant bien me feit:
 La est la piere cruose e lee
 Suz un bussun, dedenz cavee;
 95 Mes dras i met suz le buissun
 Tant que jeo revie[n]c a meisun."
 La dame oï cele merveille;
 De poür fu tute vermeille.
 De l'aventure se esfrea,
 100 E maint endroit se purpensa,
 Cum ele s'en puïst partir;
 Ne voleit mes lez lui gisir.
 Un chevaler de la cuntree,
 Que lungement l'aveit amee
 105 E mut preié[e] e mut requise
 E mut duné en sun servise—
 Ele ne l'aveit unkes amé
 Ne de s'amur aseüré—
 Celui manda par sun message,
 110 Si li descoveri sun curage. [f. 132v]
 "Amis," fet ele, "seez leéz!

When he had told her everything,
 she inquired and asked him
 whether he undressed or went clothed.
 "Lady," he said, "I go quite naked."
 "Tell me, by God, where your clothes are."
 "Lady, that I will not tell;
 for if I should lose them and were discovered through this I would be a werewolf always;
 there would never again be hope for me,
 until they were returned to me.
 For this reason I don't want it known."
 "Sir," the lady replied to him,
 "I love you more than all the world:
 you must hide nothing from me,
 nor mistrust me in any way;
 that would not seem like friendship.
 What have I done wrong? For what misdeed do you mistrust me in any way?
 You will do well to tell me!"
 She so tormented and pestered him that he could not do otherwise, and so he told her.
 "Lady," he said, "near this wood,
 beside the path by which I travel,
 there stands an old chapel,
 which many times has been a great help to me:
 there the stone is hollow and wide,
 carved-out inside, below a bush;
 I put my clothes under the bush
 until I return home."
 The lady heard this marvel;
 she turned quite red with fear.
 She was terrified by this adventure,
 and she thought hard concerning her situation,
 how she could get away;
 she did not want to lie beside him any more.
 A knight of that land,
 who had loved her a long time and greatly implored and courted her and greatly devoted himself to her service—
 she had never loved him or promised him her love—
 she sent for this man by messenger and revealed her feelings to him.
 "Friend," she said, "rejoice!

Ceo dunt vus estes travaillez
 Vus otri jeo sanz nul respit:
 Ja n'i averez nul cuntredit.
 115 M'amur e mun cors vus otrei:
 Vostre drue fetes de mei!"
 Cil l'en mercie bonement
 E la fiance de li prent;
 E ele le met par serement.
 120 Puis li cunta cumfaïtement
 Ses sires ala e k'il devint;
 Tute la veie kë il tint
 Vers la forest l[i] enseigna;
 Pur sa despuille l'enveia.
 125 Issi fu Bisclaveret trahiz
 E par sa femme maubailiz.
 Pur ceo que hum le perdeit sovent,
 Quidouent tuz communalment
 Que dunc s'en fust del tut alez.
 130 Asez fu quis e demandez,
 Mes n'en porent mie trover;
 Si lur estuit lesser ester.
 La dame ad cil dunc espusee,
 Que lungement avait amee.
 135 Issi remist un an entier,
 Tant que li reis ala chacier;
 A la forest ala tut dreit,
 La u li bisclaveret esteit.
 Quant li chiens furent descuplé,
 140 Le bisclaveret unt encuntré.
 A lui cururent tute jur
 E li chien e li veneür,
 Tant que pur poi ne l'eurent pris
 E tut deciré e maumis,
 145 De si qu'il ad le rei choisi: [col. b]
 Vers lui curut quere merci.
 Il l'aveit pris par sun estrié,
 La jambe li baise e le pié.
 Li reis le vit, grant poür ad;
 150 Ses cumpainuns tuz apelad.

That for which you have labored
 I grant you without delay:
 you will find no resistance.
 I grant you my love and my body;
 take me as your lover!"
 He thanked her warmly
 and accepted her promise,
 and she bound him to her by oath.
 Then she told him exactly how her lord went away and what became of him;
 she taught him the whole path
 he took to the forest;
 she sent him for the discarded clothes.
 Thus Bisclavret was betrayed and brought to ruin by his wife.
 Since they had often known him to be missing, everyone generally believed that this time he had gone away for good.
 He was widely sought and asked after,
 but they could not find him at all;
 so they had to let it be.
 The lady then married him
 who had loved her for a long time.
 Things remained this way for a whole year,
 until the king went hunting;
 he went straight to the forest
 where the werewolf was.
 When the hounds were unleashed,
 they found the werewolf.
 The hounds and hunters
 chased it all day,
 so that they very nearly caught it and completely tore it to shreds and destroyed it, until it saw the king:
 it ran to him to ask mercy.¹
 It had taken him by the stirrup,
 it kisses his leg and his foot.
 The king saw it and was very much afraid;
 he called all his companions.

¹ it ran to him ... mercy Although the noun "bisclaveret" is masculine, here the werewolf is referred to in English as "it" when it is in wolf form; the human protagonist Bisclavret, who is of course the same "person," is "he." This both helps to distinguish the wolf from the king and other masculine characters and conveys his dual nature; it also helps to account for the term "beast," which is several times applied to the wolf, and which is feminine in Old French. Only at the end, when the wise counselor seems to realize that the werewolf is indeed also the man Bisclavret, is the werewolf called "he" in the translation (ll. 283–92).

“Seignurs,” fet il, “avant venez!
 Ceste merveillē esgardez,
 Cum ceste beste se humilie!
 Ele ad sen de hume, merci crie.
 155 Chacez mei tuz ces chiens arere,
 Si gardez quē hum ne la fiere!
 Ceste beste ad entente e sen.
 Espleitez vus! Alum nus en!
 A la beste durrai ma pes,
 160 Kar jeo ne chacerai hui mes.”
 Li reis s'en est turné atant.
 Le bisclaveret li vet siwant;
 Mut se tint pres, n'en vout partir,
 Il n'ad cure de lui guerpier.
 165 Li reis l'enmeine en sun chastel;
 Mut en fu liez, mut li est bel,
 Kar unke mes tel n'ot veü.
 A grant merveille l'ot tenu
 E mut le tient a grant chierté.
 170 A tuz les suens ad comaundé
 Que sur s'amur le gardent bien
 E li ne mesfacent de rien,
 Ne par nul de eus ne seit feruz;
 Bien seit abevreiz e peüz.
 175 Cil le garderent volenters.
 Tuz jurs entre les chevalers
 E pres del rei se alout cuchier.
 N'i ad celui que ne l'ad chier;
 Tant esteit franc e deboneire,
 180 Unc ne volt a rien mesfeire. [f. 133r]
 U ke li reis deüst errer,
 Il n'out cure de deseverer;
 Ensemble od li tuz jurs alout.
 Bien s'aparceit quē il l'amout.
 185 Oēz après cument avint.
 A une curt ke li rei tint
 Tuz les baruns aveit mandez,
 Ceus ke furent de lui chacez,
 Pur aider sa feste a tenir
 190 E lui plus beal faire servir.
 Li chevalier i est alez,

“Lords,” he said, “come here!
 Look at this wonder,
 how this beast humbles itself!
 It has human understanding, it begs mercy.
 Get all these dogs away from me,
 make sure that no one strikes it!
 This beast has intelligence and understanding.
 Hurry up! Let's go!
 I will extend my peace to the beast,
 for I will hunt no more today.”
 The king turned back at once.
 The werewolf goes along following him;
 it stayed very close, it would not leave,
 it has no desire to part from him.
 The king leads it into his castle;
 he was very happy about it, it was delightful to him,
 for he had never seen such a thing.
 He considered it a great wonder and held it very dear.
 He commanded all his people to take good care of it for love of him and not ill-treat it in any way,
 nor should any of them strike it;
 it should be given plenty to drink and eat.
 They willingly took care of it.
 Every day it went to bed
 among the knights and close to the king.
 There is no one who does not hold it dear;
 it was so noble and kind,
 it never wished to do wrong in any way.
 Wherever the king had to go,
 it did not care to be apart from him;
 it always went along with him.
 He could see well that it loved him.
 Listen to what happened afterwards.
 One time when the king held court
 he had sent for all his barons,
 those who were his vassals,¹ to help him celebrate and to serve him as pleasingly as possible.
 The knight went along there,

those who were his vassals Literally, “those who were enfeoffed/endowed by him”—that is, to whom the king had granted land in return for their loyalty and service to him. The homophones chacer/chaser (both of which could be spelled with either an -s- or a -c- in Anglo-Norman), meaning “to hunt” and “to endow with land” are an intriguing pair in this lai where hunting is so important to the plot.

Richement e bien aturnez,
 Ki la femme Bisclaveret ot.
 Il ne saveit ne ne quidot
 195 Que il le deüst trover si pres.
 Si tost cum il vint al paleis
 E le bisclaveret le aparceut,
 De plain esleis vers li curut;
 As denz le prist, vers li le trait.
 200 Ja li eüst mut grant leid fait
 Ne fust li reis ki l'apela,
 De une verge le manaça.
 Deus feiz le vout mordre al jur.
 Mut s'esmerveillent li plusur,
 205 Kar unkes tel semblant ne fist
 Vers nul hume k'il veïst.
 Ceo dient tut par la meisun
 Ke il nel fet mie sanz reïsun:
 Mesfait li ad, coment que seit,
 210 Kar volenters se vengereit.
 A cele feiz remist issi,
 Tant que la feste departi
 E li barun unt pris cungé;
 A lur meisun sunt repeiré.
 215 Alez s'en est li chevaliers, [col. b]
 Mien escient, tut as premiers,
 Que le bisclaveret asailli;
 N'est merveille s'il le haï.
 Ne fu puis gueres lungement,
 220 Ceo m'est avis, si cum jeo entent,
 Que a la forest ala li reis,
 Que tant fu sages e curteis,
 U li bisclaveret fu trovez;
 E il i est od li alez.
 225 La nuit quant il s'en repeira,
 En la cuntree herberga.
 La femme le bisclaveret le sot.
 Avenantment se appareïlot;
 Al demain vait al rei parler,
 230 Riche present li fait porter.
 Quant Bisclaveret la veit venir,
 Nul hume nel poeit retenir;
 Vers li curut cum enragiez.
 Oiez cum il est bien vengiez:
 235 Le neis li esracha del vis!
 Quei li p[e]üst il faire pis?

well and richly dressed,
 who had Bisclavret's wife.
 He did not know nor expect that he would find Bisclavret so close.
 As soon as he came to the palace
 and the werewolf saw him,
 it ran toward him at full speed;
 it grabbed him with its teeth and dragged him toward it.
 It would have done him great injury were it not for the king, who called to it and threatened it with a staff.
 Twice that day it tried to bite the knight.
 Everyone is astonished,
 for it had never acted like this toward anyone it saw.
 Everyone in the household says that surely it is not doing this without a reason:
 the knight has in some way done it wrong
 and now it would willingly avenge itself.
 Things went along this way until the festivities broke up and the barons took their leave;
 they went back to their houses.
 The knight the werewolf had attacked went away, I believe,
 among the first;
 it's no wonder if it hated him.
 It was not long after,
 it seems to me, as I understand it,
 that the king, who was so wise and courteous,
 went to the forest
 where the werewolf had been found,
 and it went with him.
 At night, when the king came back from there,
 he took lodging in the area.
 The wife of the werewolf found this out.
 She dressed herself becomingly;
 the next day she goes to talk to the king,
 she has a rich gift brought to him.
 When Bisclavret sees her coming,
 no one could hold him back;
 he ran toward her as though he were mad.
 Hear how well he avenged himself:
 he tore the nose from her face!
 What worse could he have done to her?

De tutes parz l'unt manacié;
 Ja l'eüssent tut depescié,
 Quant un sages humme dist al rei:
 240 "Sire," fet il, "entent a mei!¹
 Ceste beste ad esté od vus;
 N'i ad ore celui de nus
 Que ne l'eit veü lungement
 E pres de li alé sovent.
 245 Unke mes humme ne tucha
 Ne felunie ne mustra,
 Fors a la dame que ici vei.
 Par cele fei ke jeo vus dei,
 Aukun curuz ad il vers li,
 250 E vers sun seignur autresi. [f. 133v]
 Ceo est la femme al chevaler
 Que taunt par suliez avoir chier,
 Que lung tens ad esté perduz;
 Ne s[e]ümes u est devenuz.
 255 Kar metez la dame en destreit,
 Si aucune chose vus direit,
 Pur quei ceste beste la heit;
 Fetes li dire s'el le seit!
 Meinte merveille avum veü
 260 Quë en Bretagne est avenu."
 Li reis ad sun conseil creü:
 Le chevaler ad retenu;
 De l'autre part ad la dame prise
 E en mut grant destresce mise.
 265 Tant par destresce e par poür
 Tut li cunta de sun seignur:
 Coment ele l'aveit trahi
 E sa despoille li toli,
 L'aventure qu'il li cunta,
 270 E quei devint e u ala.
 Puis que ses dras li ot toluz,
 Ne fud en sun païs veüz.
 Tresbien quidat e bien creeit
 Que la beste Bisclaveret seit.
 275 Le reis demande la despoille;
 U bel li seit u pas nel voille,
 Ariere la fet aporter.
 Al bisclaveret la fist doner.

They threatened him from all sides;
 they would surely have torn him all to pieces,
 when a wise man said to the king:
 "Sire," he said, "listen to me!
 This beast has been living with you;
 there is now not one of us who has not watched it for a long time and often been near it.
 It has never touched anyone nor shown any wickedness,
 except to the lady I see here.
 By the faith I owe you,
 he has some cause for anger against her,
 and also against her husband.
 This is the wife of the knight whom you used to hold so dear,
 who has been missing for a long time;
 we never knew what became of him.
 Put the lady under duress about this,
 to see if she will tell you anything about why this beast hates her;
 make her tell it if she knows!
 We have seen many a wonder come to pass in Brittany."
 The king had faith in his counsel:
 he arrested the knight;
 moreover he took the lady and put her to severe torture.
 On account of such torture and out of fear
 she told him all about her lord:
 how she had betrayed him
 and taken his clothes away,
 the adventure that he told her,
 and what he became and where he went.
 Since she had taken away his clothes,
 he had not been seen in his country.
 She fully believed and supposed that the beast must be Bisclavret.
 The king asks for the discarded clothes;
 whether she likes it or not,
 she has them brought back.
 He had them given to the werewolf.

¹*entent a mei* In his speeches to the king, the wise man mostly uses the polite second-person form "vus," but occasionally uses the informal second person, as in this line ("entent" is an informal second-person command) or l. 289 ("En tes chambres le fai mener": "tes" and "fai" are informal).

Quant il les urent devant li mise,
 280 Ne se prist garde en nule guise.
 Li produme le rei apela,
 Cil ki primes le cunseilla:
 "Sire, ne fetes mie bien:
 Cist nel fereit pur nule rien,
 285 Que devant vus ses dras reveste [col. b]
 Ne muet la semblance de beste.
 Ne savez mie que ceo munte:
 Mut durement en ad grant hunte.
 En tes chambres le fai mener
 290 E la despoille od li porter;
 Une grant piece l'i laissons.
 S'il devient hume, bien le verums."
 Li reis memes le mena
 E tuz les hus sur lui ferma.
 295 Al chief de piece i est alez,
 Deuz baruns ad od li menez;
 En la chambrë entrent tut trei.
 Sur le demeine lit al rei
 Trova il dormant le chevalier.
 300 Li reis le curut embracier;
 Plus de cent feiz l'acole e baise.
 Si tost cum il pot aver aise,
 Tute sa tere li rendi;
 Plus li duna ke jeo ne di.
 305 La femme ad del païs ostee
 E chacie de la cuntree.
 Cil s'en alat ensemble od li
 Pur ki sun seignur ot trahi.
 Enfanz en ad asés eüz;
 310 Puis unt esté bien cunüz
 Del semblant e del visage:
 Plusurs femmes del lignage,
 Ceo est verité, senz nes sunt ne[es]
 E [si vivei]ent esnasees.
 315 L'aventure ke avez oïe
 Veraie fu, n'en dutez mie.
 De Bisclavret fu fet li lais
 Pur remembrance a tutdis mais.

—C. 1160

When they had put them in front of it,
 it did not take any notice at all.
 The wise man, the one who had first advised the king, addressed him:
 "Sire, you are not doing this properly:
 he wouldn't, for anything,
 put his clothing back on in front of you nor change his animal appearance.
 You have no idea how important this is:
 he feels terrible shame about it.
 Have him led into your rooms
 and take the clothing with him;
 we'll leave him there for a good while.
 We shall see if he becomes a man."
 The king himself led the wolf in and closed all the doors on him.
 After a while he went there,
 taking two barons with him;
 all three of them enter the chamber.
 On the king's own bed
 he found the knight sleeping.
 The king ran to embrace him;
 more than a hundred times he hugs and kisses him.
 As soon as he could get an opportunity,
 he returned all his land to him;
 he gave him more than I say.
 He banished the wife from the country and drove her out of the region.
 The man for whom she had betrayed her lord went along with her.
 She had a number of children by him, who were quite recognizable in appearance and face:
 many women of that line,
 in truth, were born without noses
 and lived like that, noseless.
 The adventure you have heard was true, have no doubt.
 The lai of Bisclavret was made to be remembered forevermore.

*Lanval*¹

- L'aventure d'un autre lai,
 Cum ele avient, vus cunterai. [f. 134r]
 Fait fu d'un mut gentil vassal;
 En bretons l'apelent Lanval.
 5 A Kardoel surjurnot li reis
 Artur, li pruz e li curteis,
 Pur les Escos e pur les Pis,
 Que destrui[ei]ent le païs;
 En la tere de Loengre³ entroënt
 10 E mut suvent la damagoënt.
 A la Pentecoste en esté
 I aveit li reis sujurné.
 Asez i duna riches duns
 E as cuntes e as baruns.
 15 A ceus de la table runde—
 N'ot tant de teus en tut le monde—
 Femmes e tere departi
 Par tut, fors un ki l'ot servi:
 Ceo fu Lanval, ne l'en sovient,
 20 Ne nul de[s] soens bien ne li tient.
 Pur sa valor, pur sa largesce,
 Pur sa beauté, pur sa prûesce
 L'envioënt tut li plusur;
 Tel li mostra semblant d'amur,
 25 Si al chevaler mesavenist,
 Ja une feiz ne l'en pleinsist.
 Fiz a rei fu de haut parage,
 Mes luin ert de sun heritage.
 De la meisné le rei fu.
 30 Tut sun avoir ad despendu,
 Kar li reis rien ne li dona
 Ne Lanval rien ne li demanda.
 Ore est Lanval mut entrepris,
 Mut est dolent e mut pensis.
 3 Seignurs, ne vus esmerveillez:
 Hume estrange descunseillez
- I shall tell you the adventure of another lay, just as it happened.
 It was made about a very noble vassal;
 in Breton they call him Lanval.
 King Arthur, the valiant and courteous, was staying at Carlisle² on account of the Scots and Picts who were ravaging the country:
 they came into the land of England and repeatedly caused destruction there.
 At Pentecost,⁴ in the summer,
 the king was staying there.
 He gave many rich gifts
 both to counts and to noblemen.
 To the members of the Round Table—they had no equal in all the world—he shared out wives and land
 among all except one who had served him:
 that was Lanval, whom he does not remember,
 nor do any of his men favor him.
 For his valor, his generosity,
 his beauty, his prowess,
 most people envied him;
 many a one pretended to love him who wouldn't have complained for a moment
 if something bad had befallen the knight.
 He was a king's son, of high lineage,
 but he was far from his heritage.
 He was part of the king's household.
 He has spent all his wealth,
 for the king gave him nothing,
 nor did Lanval ask him for anything.
 Now Lanval is very unhappy,
 very sorrowful and anxious.
 Lords, do not wonder:
 a foreign man without support

¹ Lanval Edited and translated by Claire M. Waters, 2014. This lai appears on ff. 133vb–138va of Harley 978 and is given the title “Lanval” in the upper margin by a later hand.

² Carlisle In the far north of England, very close to the western end of Hadrian's Wall.

³ Loengre Old French “Loengre” or “Logres” is taken from the Celtic name for England; in modern Welsh it is Lloegr. The name often appears in Arthurian romances.

⁴ Pentecost The feast of Pentecost takes place seven weeks after Easter, in mid- to late May or early June (in the western Christian Church). Ecclesiastical feast days are often used to mark time in medieval texts.

Mut est dolent en autre tere, [col. b]
 Quant il ne seit u sucurs quere.
 Le chevaler dunt jeo vus di,
 40 Que tant aveit le rei servi,
 Un jur munta sur sun destrer,
 Si s'est alez esbaneer.
 Fors de la vilè est eissuz,
 Tut sul est en un pre venuz;
 45 Sur une ewe curaunt descent—
 Mes sis cheval tremble forment.
 Il le descengle, si s'en vait;
 En mi le pre vuiltrer le lait.
 Le pan de sun mantel plia
 50 Desuz sun chief puis le cucha.
 Mut est pensis pur sa mesaise;
 Il ne veit chose ke li plaise.
 La u il gist en teu maniere,
 Garda aval lez la riviere,
 55 Vit venir deus dameiseles;
 Unc n'en ot veü plus beles.
 Vestues ierent richement,
 Lacie[es] mut estreitement
 En deus blians de purpre bis;
 60 Mut par aveient bel le vis.
 L'eisnee portout un[s] bacins,
 Doré furent, bien faiz e fins
 (Le veir vus en dirai sanz faile);
 L'autre portout une tuaile.
 65 Eles s'en sunt alees dreit
 La u li chevaler giseit.
 Lanval, que mut fu enseigniez,
 Cuntre eles s'en levad en piez.
 Celes l'unt primes salué,
 70 Lur message li unt cunté:
 "Sire Lanval, ma dameisele,
 Que tant est pruz e sage e bele, [f. 134v]
 Ele nus envei[e] pur vus;
 Kar i venez ensemble od nus!
 75 Sauvement vus i cundurums:
 Veez, pres est li paveilluns!"
 Li chevalers od eles vait;
 De sun cheval ne tient nul plait,
 Que devant li peist al pre.

is very sorrowful in another land
 when he does not know where to seek help.
 The knight of whom I'm telling you,
 who had served the king so well,
 got on his horse one day
 and went off to enjoy himself.
 He went out of the town;
 all alone, he came to a meadow;
 he dismounts beside running water—
 but his horse trembles terribly.¹
 He unsaddles it and it goes off;
 he lets it roll around in the middle of the meadow.
 He folded the end of his mantle and lay down with it under his head.
 He is very worried by his difficult situation;
 he sees nothing that pleases him.
 As he lay there like this he looked down toward the bank,
 he saw two maidens coming;
 he had never seen any more beautiful.
 They were richly dressed and very tightly laced
 in tunics of dark purple;
 they had exceedingly lovely faces.
 The elder carried basins of gold, fine and well made (I shall tell you the truth without fail);
 the other carried a towel.
 They went right along to where the knight was lying.
 Lanval, who was very well bred,
 got to his feet to meet them.
 They greeted him first and told him their message:
 "Sir Lanval, my lady,
 who is most noble, wise and beautiful,
 sends us for you;
 now come along with us!
 We will take you there safely:
 look, the pavilion is right close by!"
 The knight goes with them;
 he takes no heed of his horse,
 who is off grazing in the meadow.

¹ The knight ... trembles terribly The Celtic otherworld is often reached by crossing a stream or other body of water, so the implication is that the horse can sense its proximity here.

80 Treskē al tref l'unt amené,
 Que mut fu beaus e bien asis.
 La reine Semiramis,
 Quant ele ot unkes plus aveir
 E plus pussaunce e plus saveir,
 85 Ne l'emperere Octovien N'esligasent le destre pan.
 Un aigle d'or ot desus mis;
 De cel ne sai dire le pris,
 Ne des cordes ne des peissuns
 90 Que del tref tienent les giruns;
 Suz ciel n'ad rei ki[s] esligast
 Pur nul aver k'il i donast.
 Dedenz cel tref fu la pucele:
 Flur de lis, rose nuvele,
 95 Quant ele pert al tens d'esté,
 Trespassot ele de beauté.
 Ele jut sur un lit mut bel—
 Li drap valeient un chastel—
 En sa chemise senglement.
 100 Mut ot le cors bien fait e gent.
 Un cher mantel de blanc hermine,
 Covert de purpre alexandrine,
 Ot pur le chaut sur li geté.
 Tut ot descobert le costé,
 105 Le vis, le col e la peitrine;
 Plus ert blanche que flur d'espine.
 Le chevaler avant ala [col. b]
 E la pucele l'apela;
 Il s'est devant le lit asis.
 110 "Lanval," fet ele, "beus amis,
 Pur vus vienc jeo fors de ma tere;
 De luinz vus sui venu[e] quere.
 Se vus estes pruz e curteis,
 Emperere ne quens ne reis
 11 N'ot unkes tant joie ne bien;
 Kar jo vus aim sur tute rien."
 Il l'esgarda, si la vit bele;
 Amurs le puint de l'estencele
 Que sun quor alume e esprent.

They led him up to the tent,
 which was very beautiful and well situated.
 Not Queen Semiramis,¹
 when she had her greatest wealth and greatest power and greatest wisdom, nor the emperor Octavian²
 could have bought the right flap.
 A golden eagle was set on top of it;
 I can't tell its value,
 nor of the cords nor the stakes
 that held the sides of the tent;
 no king under heaven could buy them
 for any wealth he might offer.
 Inside the tent was the maiden:
 she surpassed in beauty
 the lily or the new rose
 when it appears in summer.
 She lay on a very beautiful bed—
 the sheets were worth a castle—
 in nothing but her shift.
 Her body was very elegant and comely.
 She had thrown on for warmth
 a costly mantle of white ermine, lined with alexandrine silk.
 Her side was entirely uncovered,
 her face, her neck and her breast;
 she was whiter than hawthorn blossom.
 The knight went forward
 and the maiden called to him;
 He sat beside the bed.
 "Lanval," she said, "handsome friend,
 for you I have come out of my own land;
 I have come from afar to look for you.
 If you are valiant and courteous,
 no emperor, count, or king
 ever had such joy or good fortune;
 for I love you more than anything."
 He looked at her, and saw she was beautiful;
 love stings him with a spark that lights and inflames his heart.

Queen Semiramis Assyrian queen of the ninth century BCE who was widely known in classical and medieval legend as a powerful warrior and ruler.

Octavian The historical Gaius Octavius, later Augustus, ruled Rome as Emperor from 27–14 BCE. The thirteenth-century Old French romance Octavian, which presents itself as being about the emperor but has no relation to his actual biography, may derive from older vernacular traditions known to Marie.

120 Il li respunt avenantment.
 "Bele," fet il, "si vus pleiseit
 E cele joie me aveneit
 Que vus me vousisiez amer,
 Ja n[e] s[av]riez rien comander 125 Que jeo ne face a mien poeir,
 Turt a folie u a saveir.
 Jeo frai voz comandement;
 Pur vus guerpirai tutes genz.
 Jamés ne queor de vus partir:
 130 Ceo est la rien que plus desir."
 Quant la meschine l'oï parler,
 Celui que tant la peot amer,
 S'amur e sun cors li otreie.
 Ore est Lanval en dreite veie!
 135 Un dun li ad duné après:
 Ja cele rien ne vudra mes
 Quë il nen ait a sun talent;
 Doinst e despense largement,
 Ele li troverat asez.
 140 Mut est Lanval bien herberger:
 Cum plus despendra richement,
 Plus averat or e argent. [f. 135r]
 "Ami," fet ele, "or vus chasti,
 Si vus comant e si vus pri,
 145 Ne vus descovrez a nul humme!
 De ceo vus dirai ja la summe:
 A tuz jurs m'avriez perdue,
 Se ceste amur esteit seüe;
 Jamés ne me purriez veer
 150 Ne de mun cors seisine avoir."
 Il li respunt que bien tendra
 Ceo que ele li comaundera.
 Delez li s'est al lit cuchiez:
 Ore est Lanval bien herberger.¹
 155 Ensemble od li la relevee
 Demurat tresque a l[a] vespree,
 E plus i fust, së il poïst
 E s'amie lui cunsentist.
 "Amis," fet ele, "levez sus!
 160 Vus n'i poëz demurer plus.
 Alez vus en, jeo remeindrai;
 Mes un[e] chose vus dirai:

He replies to her becomingly.
 "Beautiful one," he says, "if it pleased you that such joy should come to me that you should wish to love me,
 you could command nothing that I would not do to the best of my power, be it folly or wisdom.
 I will do what you command;
 for you I will give up everyone.
 I never wish to part from you:
 this is what I most desire."
 When the maiden heard him speak,
 the one who could love her so well,
 she grants him her love and her body.
 Now Lanval is on the right path!
 She gave him still one more gift:
 he will never again want for anything but that he will have as much of it as he likes;
 let him give and spend generously,
 she will provide him with enough.
 Lanval is very well situated:
 the more richly he spends,
 the more gold and silver he will have.
 "Friend," she says, "now I warn you,
 I command and beg you,
 tell no one about this!
 I will tell you the whole truth:
 you would lose me forever
 if this love were known;
 you could never see me again
 or have possession of my body."
 He replies that he will certainly hold to what she commands.
 He lay down beside her on the bed:
 now Lanval is well lodged.
 All afternoon he stayed with her until the evening,
 and he would have stayed longer, if he could
 and his beloved had consented.
 "Friend," she says, "get up!
 You can't stay here any more.
 You go on, I will remain;
 but one thing I will tell you:

¹ Ore est ... herberger Because this repeats line 140, above, editors sometimes change it.

Quant vus vodrez od mei parler,
 Ja ne savez cel liu penser
 165 U nuls puïst aver sa amie
 Sanz repreoce, sanz vileinie,
 Que jeo ne vus seie en present
 A fere tut vostre talent;
 Nul humme fors vus ne me verra
 170 Ne ma parole nen orra."
 Quant il l'oï, mut en fu liez;
 Il la baisa, puis s'est dresciez.
 Celes quë al tref l'amenerent
 De riches dras le cunreerent;
 175 Quant il fu vestu de nuvel,
 Suz ciel nen ot plus bel dancel.
 N'esteit mie fous ne vileins. [col. b]
 L'ewe li donent a ses meins
 E la tuaille a suer;
 180 Puis li portent a manger.
 Od s'amie prist le super:
 Ne feseit mie a refuser.
 Mut fu servi curteisement,
 E il a grant joie le prent.
 185 Un entremés i ot plener,
 Que mut pleiseit al chevalier:
 Kar s'amie baisout sovent
 E acolot estreitement.
 Quant del manger furent levé,
 190 Sun cheval li unt amené.
 Bien li unt la sele mise;
 Mut ad trové riche servise.
 Il prent cungé, si est muntez;
 Vers la cité s'en est alez.
 195 Suvent esgarde ariere sei.
 Mut est Lanval en grant esfrei;
 De s'aventure vait pensaunt
 E en sun curage [d]otaunt.
 Esbaïz est, ne seit que creïr,
 200 Il ne la quide mie a veïr.
 Il est a sun ostel venuz;
 Ses humme[s] treve bien vestuz.
 Icele nuit bon ostel tient;
 Mes nul ne sot dunt ceo li vient.
 205 N'ot en la vile chevalier
 Ki de surjur ait grant mestier
 Quë il ne face a lui venir

when you want to talk with me, there is no place you can think of where one could have his beloved without reproach or base behavior, that I will not be with you at once to do all your will;
 no man but you will see me
 or hear my words."
 When he heard this, he was delighted;
 he kissed her, then got up.
 The maidens who brought him to the tent covered him with rich clothes;
 when he was newly dressed,
 there was no handsomer young man under heaven.
 He was not at all foolish or base.
 They give him water for his hands and the towel to dry them;
 then they bring him to the table.
 He took supper with his beloved:
 it would not do to refuse.
 He was served very courteously,
 and he accepts it with great joy.
 There was an excellent extra dish that greatly pleased the knight—
 for he often kissed his lady and embraced her tightly.
 When they got up from eating,
 they brought him his horse.
 They have put its saddle on well;
 it has had excellent care.
 He takes his leave; he mounted,
 he went toward the city.
 Several times he looks back.
 Lanval is greatly troubled;
 he goes along thinking about his adventure
 and worrying to himself.
 He is astonished, he doesn't know what to think,
 he cannot believe she is true.
 He came to his lodging;
 he finds his men handsomely dressed.
 That night he keeps a rich table,
 but no one knew where this comes from.
 There was no knight in the town who greatly needed sustenance whom Lanval does not have brought to him

- E richement e bien servir.
 Lanval donout les riches duns,
 210 Lanval aquitout les prisuns,
 Lanval vesteit les juggleürs,
 Lanval feseit les granz honurs: [f. 135v]
 N'i ot estrange ne privé
 A ki Lanval nen [e]üst doné.
 215 Mut ot Lanval joie e deduit:
 U seit par jur u seit par nuit,
 S'amie peot veer sovent,
 Tut est a sun comandement.
 Ceo m'est avis, memes l'an,
 220 Après la feste seint Johan,
 [De si] qu'a trente chevalier
 S'ierent alé esbanïer
 En un vergier desuz la tur
 U la reïne ert a surjur.
 225 Ensemble od eus [esteit] Walwains
 E sis cusins, li beaus Ywains.
 E dist Walwains, li francs, li pruz,
 Que tant se fist amer de tuz:
 "Par Deu, seignurs, nus feimes mal
 230 De nostre cumpainun Lanval,
 Que tant est larges e curteis,
 E sis peres est riches reis,
 Que od nus ne l'avum amené."
 Atant se sunt ariere turné;
 235 A sun ostel rev[u]nt ariere,
 Lanval ameinent par preere.
 A une fenestre entaillie
 S'esteit la reïne apuïe[e];
 Treis dames ot ensemble od li.
 240 La maisné [le rei] choisi;
 Lanval choisi e esgarda.
 Une des dames apela;
 Par li manda ses dameiseles,
 Les plus quointes, les plus beles:
 245 Od li s'irrunt esbainïer
 La u cil erent al vergier.
 Trente en menat od li e plus; [col. b]
 Par les degrez descendent jus.
 Les chevalers encuntre vunt,

and well and richly served.
 Lanval gave rich gifts,
 Lanval ransomed prisoners,
 Lanval clothed minstrels, Lanval did great honor:
 there was no stranger or dear friend to whom Lanval would not give.
 Lanval had great joy and pleasure:
 he can see his beloved often,
 whether by day or by night;
 she is entirely at his command.
 That same year, as I understand,
 after the feast of St. John,
 about thirty knights were going out to enjoy themselves in an orchard below the tower
 where the queen was staying.
 Gawain was with them and his cousin, the handsome Yvain.¹ Gawain, the noble, the worthy,
 who made himself so beloved by everyone, said,
 "By God, my lords, we do wrong not to have brought along with us
 our companion Lanval,
 who is so generous and courteous,
 and whose father is a rich king."
 They turned back at once;
 they go back to his lodging
 and persuade Lanval to accompany them.
 The queen was leaning on a window ledge;
 she had three ladies along with her.
 She looked at the king's household;
 she looked at Lanval and considered him.
 She called one of her ladies;
 she had her send for her maidens,
 the most elegant and lovely:
 they will go with her to enjoy themselves
 there where the men were in the orchard.
 She took thirty or more of them with her;
 they go down by the stairs.
 The knights, who are delighted to see them,

¹ Gawain ... handsome Yvain Gawain, the nephew of King Arthur, is one of the central figures in Arthurian romance, and is often noted for his courtesy. Yvain is the hero of a romance by Chrétien de Troyes, Le chevalier au lion (The Knight with the Lion), in which he is Gawain's close friend, though not his cousin.

250 Que pur eles grant joië unt.
 Il les unt prises par les mains;
 Cil [parlemen]z [n']ert pas vilains.
 Lanval s'en vait a une part,
 Mut luin des autres. Ceo li est tart 255 Que s'amie puïst tenir,
 Baiser, acoler e sentir;
 L'autrui joie prise petit,
 Si il n'ad le suen delit.
 Quant la reïne sul le veit,
 260 Al chevaler en va tut dreit;
 Lunc lui s'asist, si l'apela,
 Tut sun curage li mostra:
 "Lanval, mut vus ai honuré
 E mut cheri e mut amé.
 265 Tute m'amur poëz aveir;
 Kar me dites vostre voleir!
 Ma drüerie vus otrei;
 Mut devez estre lié de mei."
 "Dame," fet il, "lessez m'ester!
 270 Jeo n'ai cure de vus amer.
 Lungement ai servi le rei;
 Ne li voil pas mentir ma fei.
 Ja pur vus ne pur vostre amur
 Ne mesfrai a mun seignur."
 275 La reïne s'en curuça;
 Irie[e] fu, si mesparla.
 "Lanval," fet ele, "bien le quit,
 Vuz n'amez gueres cel delit.
 Asez le m'ad humme dit sovent
 280 Que des femmez n'avez talent.
 Vallez avez bien afeitiez;
 Ensemble od eus vus dedueiz. [f. 136r]
 Vileins cüarz, mauveis failliz,
 Mut est mi sires maubailliz
 285 Que pres de lui vus ad suffert;
 Mun escient que Deus en pert!"
 Quant il l'oï, mut fu dolent;
 Del respundre ne fu pas lent.
 Teu chose dist par maltalent
 290 Dunt il se repenti sovent.
 "Dame," dist il, "de cel mestier Ne me sai jeo nient aidier;

go to meet them.
 They took the ladies by the hand;
 the conversation was not unrefined.
 Lanval wanders off by himself,
 quite far from the others. It seems long to him until he can have his beloved,
 kiss, embrace, and touch her;
 he little values others' joy
 if he does not have what pleases him.
 When the queen sees him alone,
 she goes right to the knight;
 she sat by him and addressed him,
 she showed him all her feelings:
 "Lanval, I have honored you greatly and loved you and held you very dear.
 You can have all my love;
 so tell me your desire!
 I am willing to be your lover;
 you should be delighted with me."
 "Lady," he says, "let me be!
 I have no interest in loving you.
 For a long time I have served the king;
 I don't want to betray my faith to him.
 Never for you or for your love shall I wrong my lord."
 The queen became furious;
 she was angry, and spoke wrongly.
 "Lanval," she says, "it's quite clear to me
 you have no interest in that pleasure.
 People have often told me that you have no desire for women.
 You have shapely young men and take your pleasure with them.
 Base coward, infamous wretch,
 my lord is greatly harmed
 by having allowed you near him;
 I believe that he will lose God by it!"¹
 When he heard this, he was very distressed;
 he was not slow to respond.
 Out of anger he said something that he would often regret.
 "Lady," he said, "I know nothing about that line of work;

¹ People have often ... God by it The queen implies that since Lanval's (supposed) preference for young men is a sin, the king's (supposed) toleration of it makes him sinful as well—he is tainted by association.

Mes jo aim, si sui amis
 Cele ke deit aver le pris
 295 Sur tutes celes que jeo sai.
 E une chose vus dirai,
 Bien le sachez a descovert:
 Une de celes ke la sert,
 Tute la plus povre meschine,
 300 Vaut meuz de vus, dame reïne,
 De cors, de vis e de beauté,
 D'enseignement e de bunté."
 La reïne s'en [part] atant,
 En sa chambrë en vait plurant.
 305 Mut fu dolente e curuciee
 De ceo k'il [l']out avilee.
 En sun lit malade cucha;
 Jamés, ceo dit, ne levera,
 Si li reis ne l'en feseit dreit
 310 De ceo dunt ele se pleinerait.
 Li reis fu del bois repeiriez;
 Mut out le jur esté haitez.
 As chambres la reïne entra.
 Quant el le vit, si se clamma;
 315 As piez li chiet, merci crie,
 E dit que Lanval l'ad hunie.
 De drüerie la requist; [col. b]
 Pur ceo que ele l'en escundist,
 Mut [la] laidi e avila.
 320 De tele amie se vanta,
 Que tant iert cuinte e noble e fiere
 Que meuz valut sa chamberere,
 La plus povre que [la] serveit,
 Que la reïne ne feseit.
 325 Li reis s'en curuçat forment;
 Juré en ad sun serment:
 S'il ne s'en peot en curt defendre,
 Il le ferat arder u pendre.
 Fors de la chambre eissi li reis,
 330 De ses baruns apelat treis;
 Il les enveit pur Lanval,
 Quë asez ad dolur e mal.
 A sun [o]stel fu revenuz;
 Il s'est bien aparceüz
 335 Qu'il avait perdue s'amie:
 Descovert ot la drüerie.
 En une chambre fu tut suls,

but I love and am the beloved of one who should be valued more highly than all the women I know.
 And I'll tell you one thing,
 know it well and openly:
 any one of those who serve her,
 even the poorest maid,
 is worth more than you, lady queen, in body, face, and beauty,
 in manners and goodness."
 The queen leaves at once;
 she goes into her chamber, crying.
 She was very upset and angry
 that he had insulted her in this way.
 She took to her bed, sick;
 never, she says, will she get up
 if the king would not do the right thing about the complaint she would make to him.
 The king returned from the woods;
 he had had a very pleasant day.
 He went into the queen's rooms.
 When she saw him, she made her appeal;
 she falls at his feet and asks for mercy
 and says that Lanval has shamed her.
 He asked her to be his lover;
 because she refused him this,
 he insulted her and said ugly things.
 He boasted of such a beloved,
 one who was so elegant, noble, and proud,
 that her chambermaid,
 the poorest girl who served her,
 was worth more than the queen.
 The king got extremely angry;
 he swore his oath on this:
 if Lanval cannot defend himself in court,
 he will have him burnt or hanged.
 The king went out of the chamber and called three of his nobles;
 he sends them for Lanval,
 who has sorrow and trouble enough.
 He had gone back to his lodging;
 it was quite evident to him that he had lost his beloved:
 he had revealed their love.
 He was all alone in a chamber,

Pensis esteit e anguissus;
 S'amie apele mut sovent,
 340 Mes ceo ne li valut neent.
 Il se pleigneit e suspirot,
 D'ures en autres se pasmot;
 Puis li crie cent feiz merci
 Que ele par[ol]t a sun ami.
 345 Sun quor e sa buche maudit;
 Ceo est merveille k'il ne s'ocit.
 Il ne seit tant crier ne braire
 Ne debate ne sei detraire
 Que ele en veulle merci avoir
 350 Sul tant que la puisse veoir.
 Oi las, cument se cuntendra?
 Cil ke li reis ci enveia, [f. 136v]
 Il sunt venu, si li unt dit
 Que a la curt voise sanz respit:
 355 Li reis l'aveit par eus mandé,
 La reine l'out encusé.
 Lanval i vet od sun grant doel;
 Il l'eüssent ocis [sun] veoil.
 Il est devant le rei venu;
 360 Mut fu dolent, taisanz e mu,
 De grant dolor mustre semblant.
 Li reis li dit par maltalant,
 "Vassal, vus me avez mut mesfait!
 Trop començastes vilein plait
 365 De mei hunir e aviler
 E la reine lendengier.
 Vanté vus estes de folie:
 Trop par est noble vostre amie,
 Quant plus est bele sa meschine
 370 E plus vaillante que la reine."
 Lanval defent la deshonor
 E la hunte de sun seignur
 De mot en mot, si cum il dist,
 Que la reine ne requist;
 375 Mes de ceo dunt il ot parlé
 Reconut il la verité,
 De l'amur dunt il se vanta:
 Dolent en est, perdue l'a.
 De ceo lur dit qu'il en ferat
 380 Quanque la curt esgarderat.
 Li reis fu mut vers li irez;
 Tuz ses hummes ad enveiez

he was anxious and distraught;
 he calls on his beloved over and over,
 but it did him no good at all.
 He lamented and sighed,
 he fainted repeatedly;
 then a hundred times he begs her to have pity
 and appear to her beloved.
 He curses his heart and his mouth;
 it's a wonder he does not kill himself.
 He cannot cry out or wail
 or reproach or torment himself enough to make her take pity on him, even enough that he might see her.
 Alas, what will he do?
 Those the king sent there arrived, and said to him that he must go to the court without delay:
 the king had sent the order through them,
 the queen had accused him.
 Lanval goes there in his great sorrow;
 they could have killed him for all he cared.
 He came before the king;
 he was very sad, silent and unspeaking,
 he has the appearance of great sorrow.
 The king said to him angrily,
 "Vassal, you have done me a great wrong!
 You began too base a suit to shame and revile me
 and insult the queen.
 You boasted foolishly:
 your beloved is far too exalted when her maid is more beautiful and worthy than the queen."
 Lanval denies the dishonor and shame of his lord
 word by word, just as he said it,
 in that he had not requested the queen's love;
 but he acknowledged the truth of what he had said concerning the love about which he boasted:
 he is distressed, for he has lost her.
 Concerning this he says that he will do whatever the court decides.
 The king was quite furious with him;
 he sent for all his men

Pur dire dreit quei il en deit faire,
 [Que hum] ne li puis[se] a mal retraire.
 385 Cil unt sun commandement fait,
 U eus seit bel, u eus seit lait.
 Comunement i sunt alé [col. b]
 E unt jugé e esgardé
 Que Lanval deit avoir un jur;
 390 Mes plegges truisse a sun seignur
 Qu'il atendra sun jugement
 E revendra en sun present:
 Si serat la curt esforcie[e],
 Kar n'i ot dunc fors la maisné[e].
 395 Al rei revienent li barun,
 Si li mustrent la reisun.
 Li reis ad plegges demandé.
 Lanval fu sul e esgaré;
 N'i aveit parent nē ami.
 400 Walwain i vait, ki l'a plevi,
 E tuit si cumpainun après.
 Li reis lur dit: "E jol vus les
 Sur quanke vus tenez de mei,
 Teres e fieus, chescun par sei."
 405 Quant plevi fu, dunc n'ot el;

 Alez s'en est a sun ostel.
 Li chevaler l'unt conveé;
 Mut l'unt blasmé e chastié
 K'il ne face si grant dolur, 410 E maudient si fol'amur.
 Chescun jur l'aloënt veer,
 Pur ceo k'il voleient saveir
 U il beüst, u il mangast;
 Mut dotouent k'il s'afolast.
 415 Al jur que cil orent numé
 Li barun furent asemblé.
 Li reis e la reïne i fu,
 E li plegge unt Lanval rendu.
 Mut furent tuz pur li dolent:
 420 Jeo quid k'il en i ot teus cent
 Ki feissent tut lur poeir
 Pur lui sanz pleit delivre avoir; [f. 137r]
 Il iert retté a mut grant tort.
 Li reis demande le recort
 425 Sulunc le cleim e les respuns;
 Ore est trestut sur les baruns.

to say rightly what he must do about this,
 so that no one can blame him for it.
 They did what he ordered,
 whether they liked it or not.
 They all went off together and judged and decided that Lanval should have his day in court;
 but he must provide guarantees for his lord that he will await his judgment and return to his presence:
 a larger court will be gathered,
 for now there was no one there but the household.
 The nobles return to the king and tell him their judgment.
 The king demanded guarantees.
 Lanval was alone and in great distress;
 he had no relative or friend.
 Gawain goes there, who stands surety for Lanval,
 and all his companions go after him.
 The king says to them: "I commend him to you on the basis of whatever you may hold of me, lands and fiefs, each one for himself."
 Once the pledge was made, there was nothing more to do;
 Lanval went off to his lodging.
 The knights went along with him;
 they greatly rebuked and counseled him
 not to be in such sorrow,
 and they curse such mad love.
 Every day they went to see him,
 because they wanted to know whether he was drinking, or if he was eating;
 they were greatly afraid that he would go mad.
 On the day that they had named the nobles gathered.
 The king and queen were there,
 and the guarantors brought Lanval.
 Everyone was very sad for him:
 I believe that there were some hundred there who would have done anything in their power to free him without a trial;
 he was very wrongly accused.
 The king asks for the record of the claim and the rebuttals;
 now it is entirely up to the nobles.

Il sunt al jugement alé;
 Mur sunt pensifs e esgaré
 Del franc humme d'autre pais
 430 Quë entre eus ert si entrepris.
 Encumbrer le veulent plusur
 Pur la volenté sun seignur.
 Ceo dist li quoens de Cornwaille:
 "Ja endreit [nus] n'i avera faille;
 435 Kar ki que en plurt e ki que en chant,
 Le dreit estuet aler avant.
 Li reis parla vers sun vassal,
 Que jeo vus oi numer Lanval;
 De felunie le retta
 440 E d'un mesfait l'acheisuna.
 Nuls ne l'apele fors le rei;
 Par cele fei ke jeo vus dei,
 Ki bien en veut dire le veir,
 Ja n'i deüst respuns avoir—
 445 Si pur ceo nun, que a sun seignur
 Deit [hum] par tut fairë honor,
 E ma dame s'en curuça
 D'un'amur dunt il se vanta.
 Un serement l'engagera,
 450 E li reis le nus pardura.
 E s'il peot aver sun guarant
 E s'amie venist avant
 E ceo fust veir k'il en deüst,
 Dunt la reïne se marist,
 455 De ceo avera il bien merci,
 Quant pur vilté nel dist de li.
 E s'il ne peot garant avoir, [col. b]
 Ceo li devum faire saveir:
 Tut sun servise per[t] del rei,
 460 E sil deit cungeer de sei."
 Al chevaler unt enveé,
 Si li unt dit e nuntié
 Que s'amie face venir
 Pur lui tencer e garentir.
 465 Il lur dit qu'il ne poeit:
 Ja p[a]r li sucurs nen avereit.
 Cil s'en rev[un]t as jugeürs,
 Ki n'i atendent nul sucurs.
 Li reis les hastot durement
 470 Pur la reïne kis atent.
 Quant il deveient departir,

They went to sit in judgment;
 they are very anxious and dismayed over the noble man from another country who was in such trouble among them.
 Some want to find him guilty
 according to their lord's wishes.
 The count of Cornwall said,
 "We must not fall short,
 for whoever may weep or sing,
 the law must take precedence.
 The king has spoken against his vassal,
 whom I hear you call Lanval;
 he charged him with a crime
 and accused him of wrongdoing.
 No one accuses him but the king;
 by the faith I owe you,
 if one wants to speak the truth about this,
 there would not even be a case—
 except for this, that a man should do honor to his lord in all matters, and my lady became angry
 concerning a love of which he boasted.
 He will be bound by oath,
 and the king will hand him over to us.
 And if he can have his guarantor—
 if his lady should come forward and what he said about her,
 which made the queen angry, was true—
 then he will certainly receive mercy,
 since he did not say it out of baseness.
 And if he cannot produce proof,
 we must make him understand this:
 he loses all his service to the king and must take his leave of him."
 They sent to the knight,
 and they told him and announced that he should have his beloved come to defend and bear witness for him.
 He told them that he could not:
 he would never get help from her.
 They go back to the judges,
 who expect no help from that quarter.
 The king urged them fiercely
 for the sake of the queen who is waiting.
 Just as they were about to give their verdict,

Deus puceles virent venir
 Sur deus beaus palefreiz amblanz.
 Mut par esteient avenanz;
 475 De cendal purpre sunt vestues
 Tut senglement a lur char nues.
 Cil les esgard[e]nt volenters.
 Walwain, od lui treis chevalers,
 Vait a Lanval, si li cunta;
 480 Les deus puceles li mostra.
 Mut fu haitié, forment li prie
 Qu'il li deïst si ceo ert [s]'amie.
 Il lur addit ne seit ki sunt
 Ne dunt vienent ne u eles vunt.
 485 Celes sunt alees avant
 Tut a cheval; par tel semblant Descendirent devant le deïs,
 La u seeit Artur li reis.
 Eles furent de grant beuté,
 490 Si unt curteisement parlé:
 "Reis, fai tes chambres delivrer
 E de palies encurtiner, [f. 137v]
 U ma dame puïst descendre:
 Si ensemble od vus veut ostel prendre."
 495 Il lur otria mut volenters,
 Si appela deus chevalers:
 As chambres les menerent sus.
 A cele feiz ne distrent plus.
 Li reis demande a ses baruns
 500 Le jugement e les respuns
 E dit que mut l'unt curucié
 De ceo que tant l'unt delaié.
 "Sire," funt il, "nus departimes
 Pur les dames que nus veïmes;
 505 [Nus n'i avum] nul esgart fait.
 Ore recumencerum le plait."
 Dunc assemblerent tut pensif;
 Asez i ot noise e estrif.
 Quant il ierent en cel esfrei,
 510 Deus puceles de gent cunrei—
 Vestues de deus palies freis,
 Chevauchent deus muls espanneis—
 Virent venir la rue aval.
 Grant joie en eurent li vassal;
 515 Entre eus dïent que ore est gariz
 Lanval, li pruz e li hardiz.

they saw two maidens coming on two beautiful brisk palfreys.
 They were extremely lovely;
 they were dressed in nothing but purple taffeta
 down to their bare skin.
 Everyone gazes at them eagerly.
 Gawain, and three knights with him,
 goes to Lanval, and told him;
 he showed him the two maidens.
 He was very happy, and begged him
 to say whether this was his beloved.
 Lanval tells them that he does not know who they are nor where they come from nor where they are going.
 The maidens went along on their horses; in this fashion they got down in front of the dais where King Arthur was sitting.
 They were very beautiful and spoke courteously:
 "King, have your chambers made ready and hung with silks
 where my lady can dismount:
 she wants to take lodging with you."
 He very willingly granted this to them,
 and called two knights:
 they led them up to the chambers.
 At that time they said no more.
 The king asks his nobles
 for the judgment and the verdict and says that they have made him very angry
 by delaying for so long.
 "Sire," they say, "we broke off our discussion on account of the ladies that we saw;
 we have not made a decision.
 Now we will resume the trial."
 Then they gathered, quite concerned;
 there was a great deal of noise and debate.
 While they were in this disarray,
 they saw coming down the road
 two maidens of noble bearing;
 dressed in cool silks,
 they ride two Spanish mules.
 The vassals were delighted by this;
 they say to each other that now Lanval,
 the bold and strong, is saved.

Yweins i est a lui alez,
 Ses cumpainuns i ad menez.
 "Sire," fet il, "rehaitiez vus!
 520 Pur amur Deu, parlez od nus!
 Ici viennent deus dameiseles
 Mut acemees e mut beles:
 Ceo est vostre amie vereiment!"
 Lanval respunt hastivement
 525 E dit qu'il pas nes avuot
 Ne il nes cunut ne nes amot.
 Atant furent celes venues; [col. b]
 Devant le rei sunt descendues.
 Mut les loèrent li plusur
 530 De cors, de vis e de color;
 N'i ad cele meuz ne vausist
 Que unkes la reïne ne fist.
 L'aisnee fu curteise e sage;
 Avenantment dist sun message:
 535 "Reis, kar nus fai chambres baillier
 A oés ma dame herbergier;
 Ele vient ici a tei parler."
 Il les cumandë amener
 Od les autres quë ainçais v[i]ndrent.
 540 Unkes des muls nul plai ne tindrent.
 Quant il fu d'eles deliverez,
 Puis ad tuz ses baruns mandez
 Que le jugement seit renduz:
 Trop ad le jur esté tenuz.
 545 La reïne s'en curuceit,
 Que si lunges les atendeit.
 Ja departissent a itant,
 Quant par la vile vient errant
 Tut a cheval une pucele:
 550 En tut le secle n'ot plus bele.
 Un blanc palefrei chevachot,
 Que bel e süef la portot.
 Mut ot bien fet e col e teste:
 Suz ciel nen ot plus bele beste.
 555 Riche atur ot al palefrei:
 Suz ciel nen ad quens ne rei
 Ki tut peüst eslegier
 Sanz tere vendre u engagier.
 Ele iert vestue en itel guise:
 560 De chainsil blanc e de chemise,
 Que tuz les costez li pareient,

Yvain went to him,
 taking his companions with him.
 "Sir," he says, "rejoice!
 For the love of God, speak to us!
 Here come two maidens,
 very elegant and beautiful:
 surely it is your beloved!"
 Lanval responds hastily and says that he did not recognize them
 nor did he know them nor love them.
 Just then the maidens arrived;
 they dismounted before the king.
 Many people gave great praise
 to their bodies, faces and coloring;
 both of them were certainly worth more than the queen ever was.
 The elder was courteous and wise;
 she spoke her message becomingly:
 "King, provide rooms for us
 in order to receive my lady;
 she is coming here to speak to you."
 He orders that they be taken to the others who arrived earlier.
 They did not need to worry about the mules.
 When he had sent them off,
 he ordered all his nobles
 that the judgment be given:
 too much of the day had been taken up.
 The queen was getting angry
 that she was kept waiting so long by them.
 They were about to take a decision, when through the town they saw a maiden come riding on a horse:
 in all the world there was none more beautiful.
 She rode a white palfrey,
 which carried her well and gently.
 It had a well-shaped neck and head:
 there was no handsomer animal under heaven.
 The palfrey was richly harnessed:
 no count or king under heaven
 could have afforded the whole thing without selling or mortgaging land.
 She was dressed in this manner:
 in a shift of white linen,
 which let both her sides be seen,

Que de deus parz laciez esteient. [f. 138r]
 Le cors ot gent, basse la hanche,
 Le col plus blanc que neif sur branche,
 565 Les oilz ot vairs e blanc le vis,
 Bele buche, neis bien asis,
 Les surcilz bruns e bel le frunt
 E le chef cresp e aukes blunt;
 Fil d'or ne gette tel luur
 570 Cum s[i] chev[e]l cuntre le jur.
 Sis manteus fu de purpre bis;
 Les pans en ot entour li mis.
 Un espervier sur sun poin tient,
 E un leverer après [li] vient.
 575 Il n'ot al burc petit ne grant
 Ne li veillard ne li enfant
 Que ne l'alassent esgarder.
 Si cum il la veent errer,
 De sa beauté n'iert mie gas.
 580 Ele veneit meins que le pas.
 Li jugeür, que la veeient,
 A merveille le teneient;
 Il n'ot un sul ki l'esgardast
 De dreite joie ne s'eschaufast.
 585 Cil ki le chevaler amoënt
 A lui veneient, si li cuntouent
 De la pucele ki veneit,
 Si Deu plest, que le delivereit:
 "Sire cumpain, ci en vient une,
 590 Mes el n'est pas fave ne brune;
 Ceo'st la plus bele del mund,
 De tutes celes kē i sunt."
 Lanval l'oï, sun chief dresça;
 Bien la cunut, si suspira.
 595 Li sanc li est munté al vis;
 De parler fu aukes hastifs.
 "Par fei," fet il, "ceo est m'amie! [col. b]
 Or m'en est gueres ki m'ocie,
 Si ele n'ad merci de mei;
 600 Kar gariz sui, quant jeo la vei."
 La damē entra al palais;
 Unc si bele n'i vient mais.
 Devant le rei est descendue
 Si que de tuz iert bien ve[ü]e.

as it was laced on either side.
 She had a lovely body, a long waist,
 a neck whiter than snow on a branch,
 sparkling eyes and white skin,
 a beautiful mouth, a well-formed nose,
 dark eyebrows and a lovely forehead
 and curling golden hair;
 no golden thread casts such a gleam
 as did her hair in the sun.
 Her mantle was dark purple;
 she had wrapped its ends around her.
 She had a sparrowhawk on her fist,
 and a greyhound ran behind her.¹
 There was no one in the town, great or small,
 not the old men nor the children,
 who did not go to look at her.
 As they saw her pass,
 there was no joking about her beauty.
 She came along quite slowly.
 The judges, who saw her,
 considered it a great marvel;
 there was not one who looked at her
 who did not grow warm with true joy.
 Those who loved the knight
 came to him, and told him
 of the maiden who was coming,
 who, if it pleased God, would set him free:
 "Sir companion, here comes one who is not tawny nor dark;
 she's the loveliest in the world,
 of all the women who live."
 Lanval heard this, he lifted his head;
 he knew her well, and sighed.
 The blood rose to his face;
 he was very quick to speak.
 "In faith," he said, "it is my beloved!
 Now I care little who may kill me,
 if she does not take pity on me;
 for I am cured when I see her."
 The lady entered the palace;
 such a beauty had never come there.
 She dismounted before the king
 so that she could easily be seen by all.

¹ She had a sparrowhawk ... behind her The sparrowhawk and the greyhound are both typically courtly animals and thus markers of high status.

605 Sun mantel ad laissié cheir,
 Que meuz la puissent veer.
 Li reis, que mut fu enseigniez,
 Il s'est encuntre l[i] dreschiez,
 E tuit li autre l'enurerent,
 610 De li servir se presenterent.
 Quant il l'orent bien esgardee
 E sa beauté forment loëe,
 Ele parla en teu mesure,
 Kar de demurer nen ot cure:
 615 "Reis, jeo ai amé un tuen vassal:
 Veez le ici, ceo est Lanval!
 Acheisuné fu en ta curt.
 Ne vuil mie que a mal li turt
 De ceo qu'il dist; ceo sachez tu
 620 Que la reine ad tort eü:
 Unc nul jur ne la requist.
 De la vantage kë il fist,
 Si par me peot estre aquitez,
 Par voz baruns seit deliverez!"
 625 Ceo qu'il jugerunt par dreit
 Li reis otrie ke issi seit.
 N'i ad un sul que n'ait jugié
 Que Lanval ad tut desrainié.
 Deliverez est par lur esgart,
 630 E la pucele s'en depart.
 Ne la peot li reis retenir;
 Asez gent ot a li servir. [f. 138v]
 Fors de la sale aveient mis
 Un grant perrun de marbre bis,
 635 U li pesant humme muntoënt,
 Que de la curt le rei venoent:
 Lanval esteit munté desus.
 Quant la pucele ist fors a l'us,
 Sur le palefrei, detriers li,
 640 De plain eslais Lanval sailli.
 Od li s'en vait en Avalun,
 Ceo nus recuntent li Bretun,
 En un isle que mut est beaus;
 La fu ravi li dameiseaus.
 645 Nul humme n'en oï plus parler,
 Ne jeo n'en sai avant cunter.

—c. 1160

She let her mantle fall
 so that they could see her better.
 The king, who was very well-bred,
 got up to meet her,
 and all the others honored her
 and offered themselves to serve her.
 When they had looked at her well and greatly praised her beauty,
 she spoke in this way,
 for she did not wish to delay:
 "King, I have fallen in love with one of your vassals:
 you see him here, it is Lanval!
 He was accused in your court.
 I do not wish it to be held against him, concerning what he said; you should know that the queen was wrong:
 he never asked for her love.
 And concerning the boast he made,
 if he can be acquitted by me,
 have your nobles set him free!"
 The king grants that, whatever they judge by law,
 it shall be so.
 There is not one who does not judge that Lanval has completely won his case.
 He is freed by their decision,
 and the maiden takes her leave.
 The king could not keep her;
 she had enough people to serve her.
 Outside the hall was set a great block of dark marble,
 where heavy men mounted,
 who were coming from the king's court:
 Lanval had climbed up on it.
 When the maiden came through the gate,
 with one leap Lanval
 jumped on the palfrey, behind her.
 With her he went to Avalon,¹
 so the Bretons tell us,
 to a very beautiful island;
 the young man was carried off there.
 No one ever heard another word of him,
 and I can tell no more.

Avalon The island of Avalon is often associated with the Celtic otherworld.

MIDDLE ENGLISH LYRICS

The Middle English poems in this section are for the most part difficult to date with any precision. In some cases they draw on relatively sophisticated lyric traditions from continental sources, but very largely they seem to be rooted in popular traditions that were probably already old when the earliest surviving copies of these poems were made. Like most short medieval poems that have survived, they are anonymous. From the familiarity with medieval Latin exhibited in some of the poems and their survival in manuscripts containing Latin alongside English (and French) texts, we may infer that many were read and quite possibly written by clerics—though even in these cases the authors may well have been adapting existing popular materials. Such poems have by convention been referred to for centuries as “medieval lyrics,” though the term has been thought by some to be both anachronistic (the earliest appearance of the word “lyric” in English is in 1581) and somewhat misleading; in tone and subject matter many of these poems have little in common with the poems we have become accustomed to think of as “lyrical.”

The majority of medieval lyrics that have survived deal with religious subjects, the most common being devotion to Jesus or the Virgin Mary (or both), often with a focus on Christ’s Passion as it is linked to the theme of salvation and sacrifice, or Mary’s roles as intercessor and suffering mother (“Stond well, moder, under Rode”). Other religious lyrics contemplate Adam’s fall and the transitory nature of life (“Farewell this world, I take my leve “To dy, to dy / forever”), or the importance of constancy in faith. A number of religious lyrics draw on the conventions of secular literature, employing the topoi of so-called courtly love. Such is the case, for example, in “I sing of a maiden,” in which Christ appears as a lover-knight and Mary is depicted as an unblemished maiden who chooses Christ as her son in the way that a secular poem might depict a lady bestowing her favor on a lover.

Modern readers may find a more immediate appeal in the lyrics that deal with secular themes. Earthly love is a frequent subject of these poems, sometimes dwelling on the perceived virtue and attractiveness of the beloved (“Betwene Mersh and Averil”), sometimes employing lewd word play (“I have a gentil cock”), and often taking the form of a lover’s lament or complaint about a beloved’s absence (“My lefe is faren in a lond”). Satires against women (such as “Of all creatures women be best”) are common; most authorities think it probable that these medieval lyrics were all (or almost all) written by men, even those written in a woman’s voice (such as “I lovede a child of this cuntree”).

The range of emotion and expression in the lyrics is remarkably wide. Some poems are light-hearted celebrations of the pleasures of the ale-house (“Bring us in good ale”) or the simple joy of experiencing nature’s abundance (“Sumer is icumen in”). There is a refreshing directness (and sometimes a refreshing crudity) to many of these poems. Yet even those lyrics that clearly aim at comic entertainment can employ sophisticated poetic devices, such as internal rhyme, wordplay and allegory. Some lyrics (such as “Foweles in the frith”) are ambiguous and perhaps ambivalent in their content, capable of both secular and religious readings.

We do not know how many of these poems were set to music, but the practice was apparently common; several manuscripts have come down to us that provide music to accompany their lyrics.

Sumer is iumen in. Hude sing cucu. Swyde sed and blowes med and springe þe wede nu. Sing cucu. Awe bleteþ after lomb. Houþ after calue cu. Bulluc steretþ. bucke ueretþ gurie sing cucu. Cucu cucu. Wel singes þu cucu ne swik þu nauer nu.
 sing cucu nu. Sing cucu.
 sing cucu. Sing cucu nu.

Hanc vocem cantare possunt quatuor loci. pancia
 ribus autem qm a tribus nt. saltem duobus no debet dici. preter eos qui dicunt pedem. Ante autem sic. Cucu qly cetisim mchoat cu bus q cetis pedes. Et q uenit ad primam notam post cruce. mchoat alius. Et sic de cetis.
 singlu repaueat ad pauca nesci qm habet hanc unius longe note.

Harley Manuscript 978, now in the British Museum, is a miscellany dating from the second half of the thirteenth century; it was compiled and transcribed by monks at Reading Abbey. The page shown here provides the music as well as the English words to "Sumer is iumen in," which remains perhaps the best known of all medieval lyrics. Between the lines alternative words in Latin (focused on the "celicus agricola," or heavenly farmer) are provided by the monks.

*Sumer is icumen in*¹

Sumer° is icumen° in summer / has come
 Lhude° sing, cuccu. loudly
 Groweth sed° and bloweth° med° seed / blooms / meadow
 And springth the wude° nu°— wood / now
 Sing, cuccu.° cuckoo

Awe° bleteth after lomb, ewe
 Lhouth after calve cu,²
 Bulluc sterteth, bucke verteth,
 Murie° sing,³ cuccu. merry
 Cuccu, cuccu, thou
 Well singes thu,° cuccu—
 Ne swik thu naver nu!⁴

Sing, cuccu, nu.⁵ Sing, cuccu.
 Sing, cuccu. Sing, cuccu, nu.
 —EARLIER 13TH CENTURY

Foweles in the frith

Foweles° in the frith,° birds / wood
 The fisses° in the flod,° fishes / river, stream
 And I mon waxe wod:⁶
 Much sorw I walk with
 For beste of bon and blod.⁷

—LATER 13TH CENTURY

Betwene Mersh and Averil

Betwene Mersh° and Averil,° March / April
 When spray beginneth to springe,⁸
 The lutel° fowl hath hire will little
 On hire lud to singe.⁹
 Ich libbe° in love-longinge I live
 For semlokest° of alle thinge— the most fair, seemly
 He° may me blisse bringe; she
 Ich am in hire baundoun.° power, control

An hendy hap ich habbe ihent!¹⁰
 Ichot° from Hevene it is me sent. I know
 From alle wimmen my love is lent,
 And light on Alisoun.¹¹

On hue hire hair is fair enough,
 Hire browe browne, hire eye blake;
 With lossum chere he° on me logh,¹² she
 With middle small and well imake.° fashioned Bote° he me wolfe° to hire take, unless / will
 For to ben hire owen make,¹³
 Longe to liven ichulle° forsake, I shall
 And feye fallen adoun.¹⁴

Nightes when I wende° and wake— twist, turn
 Forthy mine wonges waxeth won¹⁵—
 Levedy,° all for thine sake, lady
 Longinge is ilent me on.¹⁶
 In world nis non so witer mon
 That all hire bounte tell con:¹⁷

⁸ When ... springe When twigs/shoots begin to grow.

⁹ The lutel ... singe The little bird has her wish to sing in her language.

¹⁰ An hendy ... ihent I have received a fair fortune!

¹¹ From alle ... on Alisoun My love is taken from all women, and falls upon Alisoun.

¹² With lossum ... logh With beautiful face she laughed at me.

¹³ For to ... make To be her own lover/companion.

¹⁴ Longe ... adoun I shall not live long, and fated to die, fall down.

¹⁵ Forthy ... won Therefore my cheeks grow pale.

¹⁶ Longinge ... on Longing has fallen on me.

¹⁷ In world ... con In the world there is no man so wise that he could tell all her virtue.

¹ Sumer is icumen in In the preparation of the texts of this lyric and the others reproduced here, several editions have been consulted, among them those of R.T. Davies, Thomas G. Duncan, and Theodore Silverstein.

² Lhouth ... cu The cow lows after the calf.

³ Bulluc ... sing The bullock starts, the buck breaks wind, sing merrily!

⁴ Well singes ... naver nu You sing well, cuckoo—now never cease!

⁵ cuccu, nu Cuckoo, now.

⁶ mon ... wod Must go mad.

⁷ For ... blod For beast of bone and blood.

Hire swire is whittore then the swon,¹
And fairest may in toun.²

30 Ich am for wowing° all forwake,° wooing / exhausted
Wery so water in wore,³
Lest eny reve me my make,
Ich habbe iyirned yore.⁴
Betere is tholien while sore
Then mournen evermore.⁵
35 Geynest° under gore,⁶ fairest Herkne to my roun!^o song, cry

—LATER 13TH CENTURY—EARLY 14TH CENTURY

Stond well, moder, under Rode

“Stond well, moder,° under Rode.° mother / rood, cross
Behold thy sone with glade mode°— mind, heart
Blithe° moder might thou be.” joyful
“Sone, how shulde I blithe stonde?
5 I se thine fet,° I se thine honde,° feet / hands
Nailed to the harde Tree.”

“Moder, do wey° thy wepinge. away
I thole° deth for monkinde— suffer
For my gult° thole I non.” sin
10 “Sone, I fele the dedestounde:° hour of death
The swerd is at mine herte grounde,
That me bihet Simeon.”⁷

“Moder, thou rewe all of thy bern:⁸
Thou woshe° away the bloody tern°— wash / tears
15 It doth me worse then my ded.”^o death “Sone, how may I teres werne?⁹
I se the bloody stremes erne° run
From thine herte to my fet.”

“Moder, now I may thee seye,° say
20 Betere is that ich one deye¹⁰
Then all monkunde° to helle go.” mankind
“Sone, I se thy body beswungen,° hung
Fet and honden thourhout stongen°— pierced
No wonder thah me be wo.”¹¹

25 “Moder, now I shall thee telle,
Yef I ne deye thou gost to helle:¹²
I thole ded for thine sake.”
“Sone, thou art so meke and minde,¹³
Ne wit me naht, it is my kinde¹⁴
30 That I for thee this sorewe make.”

“Moder, mercy, let me deye!
For Adam out of helle beye,° to redeem
And his kun that is forlore.”¹⁵
“Sone, what shall me to rede?¹⁶
35 My peine pineth me to dede.¹⁷
Lat° me deye thee before.” let “Moder, now thou might well leren° learn

Whet sorewe haveth that children beren,¹⁸
Whet sorewe it is with childe gon.”

¹ Hire swire ... swon Her neck is whiter than the swan.

² And ... in toun And she is the fairest maiden in town.

³ Ich am ... in wore I am all wearied from wooing, as weary as water on the shore.

⁴ Lest ... yore Lest any deprive me of my beloved, whom I have yearned for for so long.

⁵ Betere ... evermore It is better to suffer miserably for a while than to mourn forever.

⁶ Geynest under gore Loveliest under clothing (a common expression meaning “most beautiful”).

The swerd ... Simeon The sword that Simeon promised me has pierced the bottom of my heart. See Luke 2.25–35.

⁸ rewe ... bern Have pity on your child.

⁹ how ... werne How may I deny my tears?

¹⁰ Betere ... deye It is better that I alone die.

¹¹ No wonder ... wo No wonder though I grieve.

¹² Yef ... helle If I do not die you will go to hell.

¹³ meke and minde Gentle and thoughtful.

¹⁴ Ne wit ... kinde Do not blame me, it is my nature.

¹⁵ kun ... forlore Kin that is lost.

¹⁶ what shall ... rede What shall I do?

¹⁷ peine ... dede Pain tortures me to death.

¹⁸ sorewe ... beren Sorrow they have who bear children.

40 "Sorewe, iwis,^o I con thee telle!
Bote it be the pine of helle,
More sorewe wot^o I non."

indeed, truly

know

"Moder, rew of moder care,¹
For now thou wost of moder fare,² 45 Thou thou be clene maiden-mon."³

"Sone, help at alle nede
Alle tho that to me grede,^o Maiden, wif and fol wimmon."^o cry out

prostitutes

"Moder, may I no lengore^o dwelle.
50 The time is come I shall to helle.
The thridde^o day I rise upon."
"Sone, I will with thee founden.^o
I deye, iwis, for^o thine wounden,^o
So soreweful ded nes never non."⁴ longer third go

of wounds

55 When he ros tho^o fell hire sorewe,
Hire blisse sprong the thridde morewe:^o
Blithe moder were thou tho.
Levedy, for that ilke blisse,⁵
Besech thy sone of sunnes lisse⁶—
60 Thou be oure sheld ayein oure fo.⁷

then

morrow, morning

Blessed be thou, full of blisse,
Let us never Hevene misse, Thourh thy swete sones might.
Louerd,^o for that ilke blod
65 That thou sheddest on the Rod,
Thou bring us into Hevene light.
Amen.

Lord

—LATER 13TH CENTURY—EARLY 14TH CENTURY

I lovede a child of this cuntree

I lovede a child of this cuntree,^o
And so I wende^o he had do me;⁸
Now myself the sothe^o I see,
That he is far.^o country

thought truth

far away, remote

5 Were it undo that is ido,
I wolde bewar.⁹

He seide to me he wolde be true,
And change me for non other new;
Now I sikke^o and am pale of hue,
10 For he is far.

sigh

Were it undo that is ido,
I wolde bewar.

He said his sawes^o he wolde fulfille:
Therfore I let him have all his wille;
15 Now I sikke and mourn stille,¹⁰
For he is far.

promises

Were it undo that is ido,
I wolde bewar.

—C. 14TH CENTURY

I have a gentil cock

I have a gentil^o cock,
Croweth^o me day:
He doth^o me risen erly
My matins^o for to say.

noble

who crows makes

morning prayers

5 I have a gentil cock,
Comen he is of gret:^o
His comb^o is of^o red coral,
His tail is of jet.

great or noble family

crest / like

¹ rew ... care Pity a mother's care.² wost ... fare Know of motherhood.³ clene maiden-mon Pure virgin.⁴ So soreweful ... non There was never such a sorrowful death.⁵ Levedy ... blisse Lady, for that same joy.⁶ of sunnes lisse Relief of sins.⁷ ayein oure fo Against our foe.⁸ I lovede ... do me I loved a young man of this country, and so I believed he also loved me.⁹ Were it ... bewar If whatever done could be undone, I would be careful.¹⁰ stille Continually.

I have a gentil cock,
 10 Comen he is of kinde:
 His comb is of red coral,
 His tail is of inde.^o

indigo

His legges ben of asor,¹
 So gentle and so smale;
 15 His spores^o arn of silver whit
 Into the wortewale.²

spurs

His eynen^o arn of cristal,
 Loken^o all in aumber:^o
 And every night he percheth him 20 In mine ladye's chaumber.
 —EARLIER 15TH CENTURY

eyes set / amber

I sing of a maiden

I sing of a maiden
 That is makeles:^o
 King of alle kinges
 To here sone she ches.³

matchless, unique

5 He cam also^o stille^o Ther his moder was,
 As dew in Aprille
 That falleth on the grass.

as / quietly, gently

He cam also stille
 10 To his moderes bowr,^o
 As dew in Aprille
 That falleth on the flowr.

chamber

He cam also stille
 Ther his moder lay,
 15 As dew in Aprille
 That falleth on the spray.

Moder and maiden
 Was never non but she:⁴
 Well may swich^o a lady 20 Godes moder be.
 —EARLIER 15TH CENTURY

such

Adam lay ibounden

A dam lay ibounden,^o
 Bounden in a bond:
 Foure thousand winter
 Thought he not too long.
 5 And all was for an apple,
 An apple that he tok,
 As clerkes^o finden
 Wreten in here^o book.

bound scholars their

Ne hadde the apple take ben,⁵ 10 The apple taken ben,
 Ne hadde never our Lady
 A ben Hevene Quen.⁶
 Blissed be the time
 That apple take was!
 15 Therfore we moun^o singen,
 "Deo gracias!"⁷

may

—EARLIER 15TH CENTURY

Farewell this world, I take my leve forever

Farewell this world, I take my leve forever,
 I am arrestid^o to appere affore^o at rest, waiting / before Godis face.
 O mercyfull God, Thow knowest that I had lever^o rather Than all this worldis good to haue an owre^o space hour
 5 For to make aseth^o for my gret trespase. amends
 My harte, alas, is brokyn for that sorow.
 Som be this day that shall not be to-morow.

¹ Moder ... but she Never was any but she both mother and maiden.

⁵ Ne hadde ... ben Had the apple never been taken.

⁶ A ben ... Quen Been Queen of Heaven.

⁷ "Deo gracias!" I.e., Deo gratias. Latin: Thanks be to God!

¹ ben of asor Are like azure.

² Into the wortewale Up to the root (of the cock's spur).

³ To here ... ches She chose for her son.

This world, I see, is but a chery fayre,¹
 All thyngis passith and so moste I algate.^o inevitably

10 This day I satt full royally in a chayre
 Tyll sotyll^o deth knokkid at my gate subtle
 And vnavisid^o he said to me, "Chekmate!" unexpected
 Loo,^o how sodynly he maketh a devorce^o look / separation
 And wormes to fede^o here he hath feed
 layde my corse.^o corpse

15 Speke softe, ye folkis,^o for I am layde a^o slepe. folks / to
 I haue my dreme,^o in triste is myche dream, vision treason.²

From dethis^o hold fayn^o wold I make a lepe death's / glad
 But my wisdom ys torned into feble^o reason: weak
 I see this worldis joye lastith but a season.
 20 Wold God I had remembrid this beforne!
 I say no more but beware of an horne.^o summons

This febyll world, so false and so vnstable, Promoteth his lovers but for a lytill while,
 But at last he geueth them a bable^o bauble, toy 25 Whan his payntid trowth^o is painted truth
 torned into gile.^o deceit

Experyence cawsith^o me the trowth to causes compile,^o gather
 Thynkyng this: to^o late, alas, that I began; too
 For foly and hope disseyveth^o many a man. tricks, deceives

Farewell my frendis, the tide^o abidith^o time / waits for no man;

30 I moste departe hens^o and so shall ye, hence
 But in this passage^o the beste songe that I can journey
 Is Requiem Eternam.³ I pray God grant it me.
 Whan I haue endid all myn aduersite^o adversity
 Graunte me in paradise to haue a mancyon,^o mansion
 35 That shede his blode for my redempcion.
 Beati mortui qui in Domino moriuntur.
 Humiliatus sum vermis.⁴

—15TH CENTURY

¹ is but ... fayre Is only a cherry festival (i.e., is passing or transient, like the time of cherry harvest).

² in triste ... treason Proverbial: "in trust is much treason," i.e., confidence is often deceived.

³ Requiem Eternam Latin: Eternal rest (a requiem is a mass sung for the dead).

⁴ Beati ... vermis Latin: Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. I am humbled by (or with) worms.

Bring us in good ale

Bring us in good ale, and bring us in good ale,
 B Fore our blessed Lady sak,^o bring us in sake good ale.

Bring us in no browne bred, fore that is mad of brane;⁵
 Nor bring us in no whit bred, fore therin is no game:
 But bring us in good ale, and bring us in good ale,
 Fore our blessed Lady sak, bring us in good ale.

Bring us in no befe, for ther is many bones;
 But bring us in good ale, for that goth downe at ones,^o once
 And bring us in good ale, and bring us in good ale,
 10 Fore our blessed Lady sak, bring us in good ale.

Bring us in no bacon, for that is passing fat;
 But bring us in good ale, and give us inought^o enough
 of that,
 And bring us in good ale, and bring us in good ale,
 Fore our blessed Lady sak, bring us in good ale.

15 Bring us in no mutton, for that is ofte lene;⁶
 Nor bring us in no tripes, for they be seldom clene:
 But bring us in good ale, and bring us in good ale,
 Fore our blessed Lady sak, bring us in good ale.

Bring us in no egges, for ther ar many shelles;
 20 But bring us in good ale, and give us nothing elles,^o else
 And bring us in good ale, and bring us in good ale,
 Fore our blessed Lady sak, bring us in good ale.

Bring us in no butter, for therin ar many heres;^o hairs
 Nor bring us in no pigges flesh, for that will mak us bores:^o boars
 25 But bring us in good ale, and bring us in good ale,
 Fore our blessed Lady sak, bring us in good ale.

Bring us in no podinges, for therin is all gotes blod;⁷
 Nor bring us in no venison, for that is not for our good:

⁵ mad of brane Made of bran.

⁶ ofte lene Often lean.

⁷ gotes blod I.e., goat's blood puddings.

30 But bring us in good ale, and bring us in good ale,
Fore our blessed Lady sak, bring us in good ale.

Bring us in no capon's^o flesh, for that is ofte fowl's is ofte der;^o dear, costly
Nor bring us in no dokes^o flesh for they ducks'
slobber in the mer:^o pond
But bring us in good ale, and bring us in good ale,
Fore our blessed Lady sak, bring us in good ale.

—LATER 15TH CENTURY

Of all creatures women be best

In every place ye may well see
That women be trewe^o as tirtill^o on tree, true / turtledove
Not liberal^o in langage but ever in secree,¹ licitious
And gret joye amonge them is for to be.

5 Of all creatures women be best,
*Cuius contrarium verum est.*²

The stedfastnes of women will never be don,
So gentil,^o so curtes,^o they be everichon,³ noble / courteous
Meke^o as a lambe, still^o as a stone, meek / quiet
10 Croked^o nor crabbed^o find ye none. pervse / twisted

Of all creatures women be best,
Cuius contrarium verum est.

Men be more cumbers^o a thousandfold, troublesome
And I mervail^o how they dare be so bold marvel
15 Against women for to hold,
Seeing them so pascient,^o softe and cold. patient

Of all creatures women be best,
Cuius contrarium verum est.

For tell a woman all your counsaile
20 And she can kepe it wonderly well:
She had lever^o go quik^o to hell rather / alive
Than to her neighbour she wold it tell.

in secree In secret, i.e., discreet.

² Cuius ... est Latin: The opposite of this is true.

³ they be everichon Is each one.

Of all creatures women be best,
Cuius contrarium verum est.

25 Now say well by women or elles^o be still, else
For they never displesed man by ther will:
To be angry or wroth they can no skill,⁴
For I dare say they think non^o ill. no

30 Of all creatures women be best,
Cuius contrarium verum est.

Trow ye that women list to smater,⁵
Or against ther husbondes for to clater?^o make noise
Nay! they had lever fast, bred and water,
Then for to dele^o in suche a matter. deal, act

35 Of all creatures women be best,
Cuius contrarium verum est.

To the tavern they will not go,
Nor to the alehous never the mo,^o more
For, God wot,^o ther hartes wold be wo^o knows / sorry
40 To spende ther husbondes money so.

Of all creatures women be best,
Cuius contrarium verum est.

—LATER 15TH CENTURY

*My lefe is faren in a lond*⁶

My lefe is faren in a lond—
Alas! why is she so?
And I am so sore bound
I may nat com her to.
5 She hath my hert in hold,^o imprisoned
Where-ever she ride or go,
With trew love a thousandfold.

—LATER 15TH CENTURY

⁴ can no skill Are completely unable.

Trow ye ... smater Do you believe that women enjoy chattering?

My lefe ... lond My love has gone away (to another land). This lyric is referred to in Chaucer's Nun's Priest's Tale (1.112).

THE CRISES OF THE FOURTEENTH CENTURY

CONTEXTS

Britain in the fourteenth century suffered an unprecedented series of crises and catastrophes. The first of these was the great famine of 1315-18. Whereas we tend to think of famine as resulting from drought, the famine of the early fourteenth century was the result of too much water rather than too little. In Britain, as in the rest of Europe, a pattern of extraordinarily wet weather was repeated for several years; as the chronicle account below details, rot was followed by hunger, pestilence, and universal hardship.

The next great upheaval was the series of conflicts that eventually became known as the Hundred Years' War. Since the time of Henry II in the early thirteenth century, the English had held considerable territory in what is now France, and English kings continued to nurture ambitions of increasing their power on the other side of the English Channel. The French nobles' refusal to recognize Edward III's claim to the French throne acted as a spark to ignite conflict, and hostilities broke out in 1337 and would not truly end until 1453. With the help of the new technology of the longbow English forces at first enjoyed great success—most notably at the battles of Crécy (1346) and Poitiers (1356) under the leadership of Edward the Black Prince. Under the leadership of Henry V they inflicted a massive defeat upon the French armies at Agincourt (1415), but with the death of Henry V in 1422 and the extraordinary rise to military glory of the sixteen-year-old peasant Jeanne D'Arc (who is credited with leading the French to victory at Orléans in 1429) the tide of the conflict turned. By 1450 the English had abandoned almost all their possessions on the Continent, and the map of France had come to resemble closely its present-day shape. France had been left exhausted and impoverished by the struggle, but the events of the previous century helped to nurture a national myth that before long carried the French nation to new prosperity. The war gave rise to a national mythology in England too; the fact that the British had lost a vast expanse of territory was largely forgotten, while the famous victories of the Black Prince and of Henry V provided an ongoing source of nourishment for national pride.

The upheaval caused by the plague known as the Black Death that swept across Europe in the 1340s turned out to be just as long-lasting as that of the Hundred Years' War—and even more severe in its effects. The Black Death (so named for the color of the sores it brought with it) probably originated in China in 1320. Initially its spread was gradual, but once it reached the Crimean port of Calla in 1346 it began to spread much more rapidly; by the end of 1347 it was devastating much of continental Europe, and in the summer of 1348 it reached Britain. In many areas of Europe close to half the population succumbed; in some areas the figure exceeded seventy percent. The toll in Britain is believed to be in the range of a third of the people dead; not until a century later did the population begin to recover substantially. As the documents below indicate, the effects of such a vast and sudden demographic event were wide-ranging. One of the most significant was a persistent shortage of labor, which in turn contributed to scarcities and price increases. The almost universal response from the authorities was to attempt to impose wage and price controls, with mixed results; the aftershocks of the plague continued to ripple through the economic system, contributing significantly to the destabilizing and eventual disappearance of the feudal order.

Both the Hundred Years' War and the Black Death were underlying causes for another great fourteenth-century upheaval—the Uprising of 1381, sometimes called the Peasants' Revolt (though many non-peasants were involved). The shortage of labor caused by the Black Death—and the attempts of the authorities to suppress it, most notably Edward III's 1351 Statute of Laborers—had created a climate of restlessness among the peasantry. Thirty years on, when Parliament responded to the mounting costs of the wars with France by imposing a new tax on all adults (termed a "poll tax"), the action sparked the first widespread rebellion of commoners in English history. Though the revolt was suppressed, in its wake the peasantry were emboldened in dealing with their lords; feudal relationships of outright servitude began to die out, replaced by lease-hold arrangements under the terms of which peasants paid rent for the land they farmed.

The Great Famine

The chronicle excerpt below is of interest for its comments about such matters as price controls and relations between the Scots and the English as well as for its description of the effects of the famine.

from Anonymous (the "Monk of Malmesbury"), Life of Edward the Second (fourteenth century)

In this parliament [of February–March, 1315], because merchants going about the country selling victuals charged excessively, the earls and barons, looking to the welfare of the state, appointed a remedy for this malady; they ordained a fixed price for oxen, pigs and sheep, for fowls, chickens, and pigeons, and for other common foods. . . . These matters were published throughout the land, and publicly proclaimed in shire courts and boroughs. . . .

By certain portents the hand of God appears to be raised against us. For in the past year there was such plentiful rain that men could scarcely harvest the corn or bring it safely to the barn. In the present year worse has happened. For the floods of rain have rotted almost all the seed, so that the prophecy of Isaiah might seem now to be fulfilled; for he says that "ten acres of vineyard shall yield one little measure and thirty bushels of seed shall yield three bushels";¹ and in many places the hay lay so long under water that it could neither be mown nor gathered. Sheep generally died and other animals were killed in a sudden plague. It is greatly to be feared that if the Lord finds us incorrigible after these visitations, he will destroy at once both men and beasts; and I firmly believe that unless the English Church had interceded for us, we should have perished long ago. . . .

After the feast of Easter [in 1316] the dearth of corn² was much increased. Such a scarcity has not been seen in our time in England, nor heard of for a hundred years. For a measure of wheat sold in London and the neighboring places for forty pence, and in other less thickly populated parts of the country thirty pence was a common price. Indeed during this time of scarcity a great famine appeared, and after the famine came a severe pestilence, of which many thousands died in many places. I have even heard it said by some, that in Northumbria dogs and horses and other unclean things were eaten. For there, on account of the frequent raids of the Scots, work is more irksome, as the accursed Scots despoil the people daily of their food. Alas, poor England! You who once helped other lands from your abundance, now poor and needy are forced to beg. Fruitful land is turned into a salt-marsh; the inclemency of the weather destroys the fatness of the land; corn is sown and tares³ are brought forth. All this comes from the wickedness of the inhabitants. Spare, O Lord, spare thy people! For we are a scorn and a derision to them who are around us. Yet those who are wise in astrology say that these storms in the heavens have happened naturally; for Saturn, cold and heedless, brings rough weather that is useless to the seed; in the ascendant now for three years he has completed his course, and mild Jupiter duly succeeds him. Under Jupiter these floods of rain will cease, the valleys will grow rich in corn, and the fields will be filled with abundance. For the Lord shall give that which is good and our land shall yield her increase. . . .

² corn Grain.

³ tares Weeds.

ten acres . . . bushels Cf. Isaiah 5.10.

[In 1318] the dearth that had so long plagued us ceased, and England became fruitful with a manifold abundance of good things. A measure of wheat, which the year before was sold for forty pence, was now freely offered to the buyer for sixpence. ...

The Hundred Years' War

The Chronicle of Jean Froissart of Valenciennes is among the most valuable historical records we possess of the course of fourteenth-century history. Froissart (c.1337–c.1404) was in direct contact with many of the nobility on both sides of the conflict between France and England. His Chronicle appeared in four volumes between 1370 and 1400, and survives in over one hundred manuscript copies. The excerpt below describes the battle fought at Crécy in 1346, beginning with a French lord's unsuccessful attempt to give the French King, Philip VI, good tactical advice.

The second excerpt below may perhaps be regarded as an early equivalent of a newspaper; it is from a letter sent by Edward the Black Prince to the people of London, recounting the story of the English victory at Poitiers (1356).

from Jean Froissart, Chronicle (late fourteenth century)

The lord Moyne said [to the king of France], "Sir, I will speak, since it pleases you to order me, but with the assistance of my companions. We have advanced far enough to reconnoitre your enemies. Know, then, that they are drawn up in three battalions and are awaiting you. I would advise, for my part (submitting, however, to better counsel), that you halt your army here and quarter them for the night; for before the rear shall come up and the army be properly drawn out, it will be very late. Your men will be tired and in disorder, while they will find your enemies fresh and properly arrayed. On the morrow, you may draw up your army more at your ease and may reconnoitre at leisure on what part it will be most advantageous to begin the attack; for, be assured, they will wait for you."

The king commanded that it should be so done; and the two marshals rode, one towards the front, and the other to the rear, crying out, "Halt banners, in the name of God and St. Denis." Those that were in the front halted; but those behind said they would not halt until they were as far forward as the front. When the front perceived the rear pushing on, they pushed forward; and neither the king nor the marshals could stop them, but they marched on without any order until they came in sight of their enemies. As soon as the foremost rank saw them, they fell back at once in great disorder, which alarmed those in the rear, who thought they had been fighting. There was then space and room enough for them to have passed forward, had they been willing to do so. Some did so, but others remained behind.

All the roads between Abbeville and Crécy were covered with common people, who, when they had come within three leagues of their enemies, drew their swords, crying out, "Kill, kill"; and with them were many great lords who were eager to make show of their courage. There is no man, unless he had been present, who can imagine, or describe truly, the confusion of that day, especially the bad management and disorder of the French, whose troops were beyond number.

The English, who were drawn up in three divisions and seated on the ground, on seeing their enemies advance, arose boldly and fell into their ranks. That of the Prince was the first to do so, whose archers were formed in the manner of a portcullis, or harrow, and the men-at-arms in the rear.¹ The earls of Northampton and Arundel, who commanded the second division, had posted themselves in good order on his wing to assist and succor the Prince, if necessary.

You must know that these kings, dukes, earls, barons, and lords of France did not advance in any regular order, but one after the other, or in any way most pleasing to themselves. As soon as the King of France came in sight of the English his blood began to boil, and he cried out to his marshals, "Order the

¹ archers were formed ... in the rear A portcullis (a kind of gate) and a harrow (a farming implement) both have prongs or teeth; in this formation, lines of bowmen would probably have advanced like the arms of a V ahead of the main troops. Lines of bowmen were roughly "vertical" in relation to the "horizontal" line of men-at-arms.

Genoese¹ forward, and begin the battle, in the name of God and St. Denis." There were about fifteen thousand Genoese cross-bowmen; but they were quite fatigued, having marched on foot that day six leagues, completely armed, and with their cross-bows. They told the constable that they were not in a fit condition to do any great things that day in battle. The Earl of Alençon, hearing this, said, "This is what one gets by employing such scoundrels, who fail when there is any need for them."

During this time a heavy rain fell, accompanied by thunder and a very terrible eclipse of the sun; and before this rain a great flight of crows hovered in the air over all those battalions, making a loud noise. Shortly afterwards it cleared up and the sun shone very brightly; but the Frenchmen had it in their faces, and the English at their backs.

When the Genoese were somewhat in order they approached the English and set up a loud shout in order to frighten them; but the latter remained quite still and did not seem to hear it. They then set up a second shout and advanced a little forward; but the English did not move. They hooted a third time, advancing with their cross-bows presented, and began to shoot. The English archers then advanced one step forward and shot their arrows with such force and quickness that it seemed as if it snowed.

When the Genoese felt these arrows, which pierced their arms, heads, and through their armor, some of them cut the strings of their cross-bows, others flung them on the ground, and all turned about and retreated, quite discomfited. The French had a large body of men-at-arms on horseback, richly dressed, to support the Genoese. The King of France, seeing them fall back, cried out, "Kill me those scoundrels; for they stop up our road, without any reason." You would then have seen the above-mentioned men-at-arms lay about them, killing all that they could of these runaways.

The English continued shooting as vigorously and quickly as before. Some of their arrows fell among the horsemen, who were sumptuously equipped, and, killing and wounding many, made them caper and fall among the Genoese, so that they were in such confusion they could never rally again. In the English army there were some Cornish- and Welshmen on foot who had armed themselves with large knives. These, advancing through the ranks of the men-at-arms and archers, who made way for them, came upon the French when they were in this danger and, falling upon earls, barons, knights and squires, slew many, at which the king of England was afterwards much exasperated.²

From a fifteenth-century manuscript of Froissart's Chronicles, "The Battle of Crécy."

From a fifteenth-century manuscript of Froissart's Chronicles, "The Battle of Poitiers."

¹ Genoese The Genoese (from Genoa, in Italy) are here fighting for the French as mercenaries; hence the comment of the Earl of Alençon, below.

² slew many ... much exasperated It would have been typical at this time to capture aristocratic enemy fighters and return them for ransom, rather than killing them.

Late after vespers,¹ the King of France had not more about him than sixty men, every one included. Sir John of Hainault, who was of the number, had once remounted the king; for the latter's horse had been killed under him by an arrow. He said to the king, "Sir, retreat while you have an opportunity, and do not expose yourself so needlessly. If you have lost this battle, another time you will be the conqueror." After he had said this, he took the bridle of the king's horse and led him off by force; for he had before entreated him to retire.

The king rode on until he came to the castle of La Broyes, where he found the gates shut, for it was very dark. The king ordered the governor of it to be summoned. He came upon the battlements and asked who it was that called at such an hour. The king answered, "Open, open, governor; it is the fortune of France." The governor, hearing the king's voice, immediately descended, opened the gate, and let down the bridge. The king and his company entered the castle; but he had with him only five barons—Sir John Hainault, the lord Charles of Montmorency, the lord of Beaujeu, the lord of Aubigny, and the lord of Montfort. The king would not bury himself in such a place as that, but, having taken some refreshments, set out again with his attendants about midnight, and rode on, under the direction of guides who were well acquainted with the country, until, about daybreak, he came to Amiens, where he halted.

This Saturday the English never quitted their ranks in pursuit of anyone, but remained on the field, guarding their positions and defending themselves against all who attacked them. The battle was ended at the hour of vespers. When, on this Saturday night, the English heard no more hooting or shouting, nor any more crying out to particular lords, or their banners, they looked upon the field as their own and their enemies as beaten.

They made great fires and lighted torches because of the darkness of the night. King Edward [III] then came down from his post, who all that day had not put on his helmet, and, with his whole battalion, advanced to the prince of Wales [Edward the "Black Prince"], whom he embraced in his arms and kissed, and said, "Sweet son, God give you good preference. You are my son, for most loyally have you acquitted yourself this day. You are worthy to be a sovereign." The prince bowed down very low and humbled himself, giving all honor to the king his father.

The English, during the night, made frequent thanksgivings to the Lord for the happy outcome of the day, and without rioting; for the King had forbidden all riot or noise.

from Prince Edward, Letter to the People of London (1356)

Very dear and very much beloved: As concerning news in the parts where we are, know that since the time when we informed our most dread lord and father, the King [Edward III], that it was our purpose to ride forth against the enemies in the parts of France, we took our road through the country of Périgieux and of Limousin, and straight on towards Bourges in Vienne, where we expected to have found the [French] king's son, the count of Poitiers.² ...

And then our people pursued them as far as Chauvigny, full three leagues further; for which reason we were obliged that day to take up our quarters as near to that place as we could, that we might collect our men. And on the morrow we took our road straight towards the king, and sent out our scouts, who found him with his army; set himself³ in battle array at one league from Poitiers, in the fields; and we went as near to him as we could take up our post, we ourselves on foot and in battle array, and ready to fight with him.

Where came the said Cardinal [Talleyrand], requesting very earnestly for a little respite, that so there might parley together certain persons of either side, and so attempt to bring about an understanding and good peace; the which he undertook that he would bring about to a good end. Whereupon we took counsel, and granted him his request; upon which there were ordered

¹ vespers The hour for evening service in monastic practice; probably around 6:00 in the evening. This is one of the "canonical hours" used for telling time in monasteries.

² the [French] king's son ... Poitiers I.e., the French king, who at this time was Jean II, son of Philip VI; his son, the Dauphin, was later to become Charles V.

³ set himself I.e., the French king.

certain persons of the one side and the other to treat upon this matter; which treating was of no effect. And then the said Cardinal wished to obtain a truce, by way of putting off the battle at his pleasure; to which truce we would not assent. And the French asked that certain knights on the one side and the other should take equal shares, so that the battle might not in any manner fail: and in such manner was that day delayed; and the battalions on the one side and the other remained all night, each one in its place, and until the morrow, about half prime;¹ and as to some troops that were between the said main armies, neither would give any advantage in commencing the attack upon the other. And for default of victuals, as well as for other reasons, it was agreed that we should take our way, flanking them, in such manner that if they wished for battle or to draw towards us, in a place that was not very much to our disadvantage, we should be the first; and so forthwith it was done. Whereupon battle was joined, on [September 19,] the eve of the day before St. Matthew; and, God be praised for it, the enemy was discomfited, and the King was taken, and his son; and a great number of other great people were both taken and slain; as our very dear bachelor Messire Neele Lorraine, our chamberlain, the bearer hereof, who has very full knowledge thereon, will know how to inform and show you more fully, as we are not able to write to you. To him you should give full faith and credence; and may our Lord have you in his keeping. Given under our privy seal, at Bordeaux, the 22nd day of October.

The Black Death

The excerpted letter below by Ralph of Shrewsbury, Bishop of Bath and a distinguished scholar as well as an administrator, was sent to several of his subordinates just after the plague had begun. The second excerpt, from the Chronicle of Henry Knighton, provides a much more wide-ranging sense of the devastation wrought by the Black Death.

from Ralph of Shrewsbury, Letter (17 August 1348)

... Since the disaster of such a pestilence has come from the eastern parts to a neighboring kingdom, it is greatly to be feared, and being greatly to be feared, it is to be prayed devoutly and without ceasing that such a pestilence not extend its poisonous growth to the inhabitants of this kingdom, and torment and consume them.

Therefore, to each and all of you we mandate, with firm enjoining, that in your churches you publicly announce this present mandate in the vulgar tongue² at opportune times, and that in the bowels of Jesus Christ you exhort your subordinates—regular, secular, parishioners, and others—or have them exhorted by others, to appear before the Face of the Lord in confession, with psalms and other works of charity.

Remember the destruction that was deservedly pronounced by prophetic utterance on those who, doing penance, were mercifully freed from the destruction threatened by the judgment of God. ...

from Henry Knighton, Chronicle (1378–96)

In that year and the following year there was a universal mortality of men throughout the world. It began first in India, then in Tarsus, then it reached the Saracens and finally the Christians and Jews. ...

On a single day 1,312 people died in Avignon, according to a calculation made in the pope's presence. On another day more than 400 died. 358 of the Dominicans in Provence died during Lent. At Montpellier only seven friars survived out of 140. At Magdalen seven survived out of 160, which is quite enough. From 140 Minorites [i.e., Franciscans] at Marseilles not one remained to carry the news to the rest. ... At the same time the plague raged in England. It began in the autumn in various places and after racing across the country it ended at the same time in the following year.

... Then the most lamentable plague penetrated the coast through Southampton and came to Bristol, and virtually the whole town was wiped out. It was as if sudden death had marked them down beforehand, for few lay sick for more than two or three days, or even for half a day. Cruel death took just two days to burst out all over a town. At Leicester, in the little parish of St. Leonard, more than 380 died; in the parish of Holy Cross more than 400; in the parish of St. Margaret 700; and a great multitude in every parish. The Bishop of Lincoln sent word through the whole diocese, giving general power to every priest (among the regular as well as the secular clergy) to hear confession and grant absolution with full and complete authority except only in cases of debt.¹ In such cases the penitent, if it lay within his power, ought to make satisfaction while he lived, but certainly others should do it from his goods after his death. Similarly the Pope granted plenary remission of all sins to those at the point of death, the absolution to be for one time only, and the right to each person to choose his confessor as he wished.² This concession was to last until the following Easter.

¹ halfprime About 9:30 in the morning. Like vespers, prime is part of the monastic way of measuring time, the "canonical hours."

² vulgartongue I.e., the vernacular (the language of the land) rather than Latin.

In the same year there was a great murrain³ of sheep throughout the realm, so much so that in one place more than 5,000 sheep died in a single pasture, and their bodies were so corrupt that no animal or bird would touch them. And because of the fear of death everything fetched a low price. For there were very few people who cared for riches, or indeed for anything else. A man could have a horse previously valued at 40s. for half a mark, a good fat ox for 4s., a cow for 12d., a bullock for 6d., a fat sheep for 4d., a ewe for 3d., a lamb for 2d., a large pig for 5d., a stone of wool for 9d. And sheep and cattle roamed unchecked through the fields and through the standing corn, and there was no one to chase them and round them up. For want of watching animals died in uncountable numbers in the fields and in bye-ways and hedges throughout the whole country; for there was so great a shortage of servants and laborers that there was no one who knew what needed to be done. There was no memory of so inexorable and fierce a mortality since the time of Vortigern, King of the Britons, in whose time, as Bede testifies in his De gestis Anglorum,⁴ there were not enough living to bury the dead. In the following autumn it was not possible to hire a reaper for less than 8d. and his food, or a mower for 12d. with his food.⁵ For which reason many crops rotted unharvested in the fields; but in the year of the pestilence, as mentioned above, there was so great an abundance of all types of grain that no one cared.

¹ among the regular ... cases of debt "Regular" clergy are those bound by a rule of communal life (i.e., most commonly, monks), who ordinarily would not have the "care of souls," that is, the duty of hearing confession or other interactions with lay people. That was the job of the "secular" clergy, the clergy who lived and worked in the outside world, such as parish priests or bishops.

² the right ... as he wished Like the call for regular clergy to take on the care of souls, the concessions on remission (i.e., forgiveness) of sins and on the right to choose a confessor reflect the church's anxiety about the salvation of the faithful in a time of crisis. Ordinarily one would have been expected to confess to one's parish priest.

³ murrain Infectious disease of livestock.

The Scots, hearing of the cruel plague of the English, declared that it had befallen them through the revenging hand of God, and they took to swearing "by the foul death of England"—or so the common report resounded in the ears of the English. And thus the Scots, believing that the English were overwhelmed by the terrible vengeance of God, gathered in the forest of Selkirk with the intention of invading the whole realm of England. The fierce mortality came upon them, and the sudden cruelty of a monstrous death winnowed the Scots. Within a short space of time around 5,000 died, and the rest, weak and strong alike, decided to retreat to their own country. But the English, following, surprised them and killed many of them. ...

After the aforesaid pestilence many buildings of all sizes in every city fell into total ruin for want of inhabitants. Likewise, many villages and hamlets were deserted, with no house remaining in them, because everyone who had lived there was dead, and indeed many of these villages were never inhabited again. In the following winter there was such a lack of workers in all areas of activity that it was thought that there had hardly ever been such a shortage before; for a man's farm animals and other livestock wandered about without a shepherd and all his possessions were left unguarded. And as a result all essentials were so expensive that something which had previously cost 1d. was now worth 4d. or 5d.

⁴ Bede ... Anglorum De Gestis Anglorum (On the Deeds of the English) by Venerable Bede (673–735), English scholar.

⁵ In the following autumn ... with his food Before the Black Death, laborers were typically hired for 2 or 3 pence per day, so these wages represent a roughly four-fold increase. (The abbreviation "d." is of the Latin denarius, or penny.)

Confronted by this shortage of workers and the scarcity of goods the great men of the realm, and the lesser landowners who had tenants, remitted part of the rent so that their tenants did not leave. Some remitted half the rent, some more and some less; some remitted it for two years, some for three and some for one—whatever they could agree with their tenants. Likewise those whose tenants held by the year, by the performance of labor services (as is customary in the case of serfs), found that they had to release and remit such works, and either pardon rents completely or levy them on easier terms, otherwise houses would be irretrievably ruined and land left uncultivated. And all victuals and other necessities were extremely dear.

Fourteenth-century manuscript: plague victims.

The Uprising of 1381

The following excerpts from a 1350 set of London wage and price regulations and from the Statute of Laborers imposed the following year by King Edward III provide some sense of the economic background for the Uprising of 1381 (or the “Peasants’ Revolt”). As the Statute of 1363 demonstrates, regulations continued to tighten thereafter in an attempt to maintain traditional social distinctions between ranks, which were threatened by the economic upheaval that followed the plague. The passage by Froissart recounts a sermon by one of the leading figures of the rebellion, John Ball, and the letter that follows was allegedly written by Ball as a coded message to those sympathetic to the uprising. The extended passage from the Chronicle of Henry Knighton, a canon of St. Mary’s Abbey in the city of Leicester, provides a vivid account of the climax of the rebellion.

from Regulations, London (1350)

To amend and redress the damages and grievances which the good folks of the city, rich and poor, have suffered and received within the past year, by reason of masons, carpenters, plasterers, tilers, and all manner of laborers, who take immeasurably more than they have been wont to take, by assent of Walter Turk, mayor, the aldermen, and all the commonalty of the city, the points under-written are ordained, to be held and firmly observed for ever; that is to say:

In the first place, that the masons, between the Feasts of Easter and St. Michael,¹ shall take no more by the working-day than 6d., without victuals or drink; and from the Feast of St. Michael to Easter, for the working-day, 5d. And upon Feast Days, when they do not work, they shall take nothing. And for the making or mending of their implements they shall take nothing.

Also, that the carpenters shall take, for the same time, in the same manner.

Also, that the plasterers shall take the same as the masons and carpenters take.

Also, that the tilers shall take for the working-day, from the Feast of Easter to St. Michael 5 ½ d., and from the Feast of St. Michael 4 ½ d.

Also, that the laborers shall take in the first half year 3 ½ d., and in the other half 3d. . . .

Also, that the tailors shall take for making a gown, garnished with fine cloth and silk, 18d.

Also, for a man’s gown, garnished with linen thread and with buckram, 14d.

Also, for a coat and hood, 10d.

Also, for a long gown for a woman, garnished with fine cloth or with silk, 2s. 6d.

Also, for a pair of sleeves, to change, 4d.

Also, that the porters of the city shall not take more for their labor than they used to take in olden time, on pain of imprisonment.

¹ St. Michael The Feast of St. Michael the Archangel is held on 29 September.

Also, that no vintner shall be so daring as to sell the gallon of wine of Vernaccia for more than 2s., and wine of Crete, wine of the River, Piemont, and Clare, and Malveisin, at 16d. ...

Also, that a pair of spurs shall be sold for 6d., and a better pair for 8d., and the best at 10d. or 12d., at the very highest.

Also, that a pair of gloves of sheepskin shall be sold for one penny, and a better pair at 1 ½ d., and a pair at 2d., so going on to the very highest.

Also, that the shearmen shall not take more than they were wont to take; that is to say, for a short cloth 12d., and for a long cloth 2s.; and for a cloth of striped serge, for getting rid of the stripes, and shearing the same, 2s.

Also, that the farriers¹ shall not take more than they were wont to take before the time of the pestilence, on pain of imprisonment and heavy ransom; that is to say, for a horse-shoe of six nails 1 ½ d., and for a horse-shoe of eight nails 2d.; and for taking off a horse-shoe of six nails or of eight, one halfpenny; and for the shoe of a courser 2 ½ d., and the shoe of a charger 3d.; and for taking off the shoe of a courser or charger, one penny.

Also, if any workman or laborer will not work or labor as is above ordained, let him be taken and kept in prison until he shall have found good surety, and have been sworn to do that which is so ordained. And if anyone shall absent himself, or go out of the city, because he does not wish to work and labor, as is before mentioned, and afterwards by chance be found within the city, let him have imprisonment for a quarter of the year, and forfeit his chattels which he has in the city, and then let him find surety, and make oath, as is before stated. And if he will not do this, let him forswear the city for ever.

from Statute of Laborers (1351)

Because a great part of the people and especially of the workers and servants has now died in the pestilence, some, seeing the needs of the masters and the scarcity of servants, are not willing to serve unless they receive excessive wages, and others, rather than gain their living through labor, prefer to beg in idleness. We, considering the grave inconveniences which might come from such a shortage, especially of ploughmen and such laborers, have held deliberation and discussion concerning this with the prelates and nobles and other learned men sitting by us, by whose consenting counsel we have seen fit to ordain that every man and woman of our kingdom of England, of whatever condition, whether serf or free, who is able bodied and below the age of 60 years, not living from trade or carrying on a definite craft, or having private means of living or private land to cultivate, and not serving another—if such a person is sought after to serve in a suitable service appropriate to that person's status, that person shall be bound to serve whomever has seen fit so to offer such employment, and shall take only the wages, liveries, reward or salary usually given in that place in the twentieth year of our reign in England, or the usual year of the five or six preceding ones. This is provided so that in thus retaining their service, lords are preferred before others by their serfs or land tenants, so that such lords nevertheless thus retain as many as shall be necessary, but not more. And if any man or woman, being thus sought after for service, will not do this, the fact being proven by two faithful men before the sheriffs or the bailiffs of our Lord the King, or the constables of the town where this happens to be done, immediately through them, or some one of them, that person shall be taken and sent to the next jail, and remain there in strict custody until offering security for serving in the aforesaid form. And if a reaper or mower, or other worker or servant, of whatever standing or condition, who is retained in the service of anyone, departs from the said service before the end of the agreed term without permission or reasonable cause, that person shall undergo the penalty of imprisonment, and let no one, under the same penalty, presume to receive or retain such a person for service. Let no one, moreover, pay or permit to be paid to anyone more wages, livery, reward or salary than was customary, as has been said.

¹ farriers Smiths who shoe horses.

... Likewise saddlers, skinnners, tawyers,¹ cordwainers,² tailors, smiths, carpenters, masons, tilers, shipwrights, carters and all other artisans and laborers shall not take for their labor and handiwork more than what, in the places where they happen to labor, was customarily paid to such persons in the said twentieth year and in the other usual years preceding, as has been said. And anyone who takes more shall be committed to the nearest jail in the aforesaid manner.

Likewise, let butchers, fishmongers, innkeepers, brewers, bakers, those dealing in foodstuffs and all other vendors of any victuals, be bound to sell such victuals for a reasonable price, having regard for the price at which such victuals are sold in the adjoining places, so that such vendors may have moderate gains, and not excessive ones, according as the distance of the places from which such victuals are carried may seem reasonably to require. And if anyone sells such victuals in another manner, and is convicted of it in the aforesaid way, that person shall pay double what was received to the injured party, or in default of the injured party, to another who shall be willing to prosecute in this behalf. ...

And because many sturdy beggars refuse to labor so long as they can live from begging alms, giving themselves up to idleness and sin and, at times, to robbery and other crimes, let no one, under the aforesaid pain of imprisonment, presume, under color of piety or alms, to give anything to those who can very well work, or to cherish them in their sloth, so that thus they may be compelled to work for the necessities of life.

from Statute (1363)

... Item. Regarding the outrageous and excessive apparel of diverse people, violating their estate and degree, to the great destruction and impoverishment of the whole land, it is ordained that grooms (both servants of lords and those employed in crafts) shall be served meat or fish once a day, and the remaining occasions shall be served milk, butter, and cheese, and other such food, according to their estate. They shall have clothes for their wear worth no more than two marks, and they shall wear no cloth of higher price which they have bought themselves or gotten in some other way. Nor shall they wear anything of silver, embroidered items, nor items of silk, nor anything pertaining to those things. Their wives, daughters, and children shall be of the same condition in their clothing and apparel, and they shall wear no veils worth more than 12 pence a veil.

Item. Artisans and yeomen³ shall not take or wear cloth for their clothing or stockings of a higher price than 40 shillings for the whole cloth, by way of purchase or by any other means. Nor may they take or wear silk, silver, or jeweled cloth, nor shall they take or wear silver or gold belts, knives, clasps, rings, garters, or brooches, ribbons, chains, or any manner of silk apparel which is embroidered or decorated. And their wives, daughters and children are to be of the same condition in their dress and apparel. And they are to wear no veils made of silk, but only of yarn made within the kingdom, nor are they to wear any manner of fur or of budge,⁴ but only of lamb, rabbit, cat, or fox. ...

Item. Knights who have land or rent valued up to 200 marks a year shall take and wear clothes of cloth valued at 6 marks for the whole cloth, and nothing of more expensive cloth. And they shall not wear cloth of gold or mantles or gowns furred with pure miniver⁵ or ermine, or any apparel embroidered with jewels or anything else. Their wives, daughters, and children will be of the same condition. And they shall not wear ermine facings or lettice⁶ or any jeweled apparel, except on their heads. All knights and ladies, however, who have land or rent of more than 400 marks a year, up to the sum of 1,000 marks, shall wear what they like, except ermine and lettice, and apparel with jewels and pearls, unless on their heads.

Item. Clergy who have any rank in a church, cathedral, college, or schools, or a cleric of the King who has an estate that requires fur, will wear and use it according to the constitution of the same. All other clergy who have 200 marks from land a year will wear

³ yeomen Freeholders; those who farm their own land.

⁴ budge Lamb's wool fur.

⁵ miniver Ermine when taken in its white winter coat.

⁶ lettice White-gray fur.

¹ tawyers Producers of white leather.

² cordwainers Shoemakers.

and do as knights who receive the same rent. Other clergy with the same rent will wear what the esquires who have 100 pounds in rent wear. All of them, both clergy and knights, may wear fur in winter, and in the same manner will wear *linure*¹ in summer.

Item. Carters, ploughmen, ploughdrivers, cowherds, shepherds, swineherds, and all other keepers of animals, wheat threshers and all manner of people of the estate of a groom occupied in husbandry, and all other people who do not have 40 shillings' worth of goods or chattels will not take or wear any kind of cloth but blanket, and russet worth 12 pence, and shall wear belts of linen according to their estate. And domestic servants shall come to eat and drink in the manner pertaining to them, and not excessively. And it is ordained that if anyone wears or does contrary to the above, that person will forfeit to the King all the apparel thus worn against this ordinance.

Item. In order to maintain this ordinance and keep it in all points without exception, it is ordained that all makers of cloth within the realm, both men and women, shall confirm that they make their cloth according to the price set by this ordinance. And all the clothmakers shall buy and sell their varieties of cloth according to the same price, so that a great supply of such cloths will be made and put up for sale in every city, borough, and merchant town and elsewhere in the realm, so that no lack of supply of such cloths shall cause the violation of this ordinance. And to that end the said clothmakers will be constrained in any way that shall seem best to the King and his council. And this ordinance on new apparel shall take effect at the next Candlemas.² from Jean Froissart, Chronicles (late fourteenth century), Account of a Sermon by John Ball

There was a foolish priest in the county of Kent called John Ball, who, for his foolish words, had been three times in the Archbishop of Canterbury's prison; for this priest used oftentimes, on the Sundays after Mass, when the people were going out of the minster,³ to go into the cloister⁴ and preach, and made the people to assemble about him, and would say thus, "Ah, ye good people, things are not going well in England, nor shall they do so till everything be common, and till there be no villeins⁵ nor gentlemen, but we be all united together, and the lords be no greater masters than we be. What have we deserved, or why should we be kept thus in serfdom? We be all come from one father and one mother, Adam and Eve; whereby can they say or show that they be greater lords than we be, except that they cause us to earn and labor for what they spend? They are clothed in velvet and camlet furred with gris,⁶ and we be vested with poor cloth; they have their wines, spices, and good bread, and we have the drawing out of the chaff and drink water; they dwell in fair houses and we have the pain and travail, rain and wind in the fields; and by what cometh of our labors they keep and maintain their estates: we be called their bondmen, and unless we readily do them service, we be beaten; and we have no sovereign to whom we may complain, nor that will hear us and do us right. Let us go to the King—he is young—and show him what serfage we be in, and show him how we will have it otherwise, or else we will provide us with some remedy, either by fairness or otherwise."⁷ Thus John Ball said on Sundays, when the people issued out of the churches in the villages; wherefore many of the lowly people loved him, and said how he said truth; and so they would murmur one with another in the fields and in the ways as they went together, affirming how John Ball spoke the truth.

³ minster Cathedral church.

⁴ cloister Here, covered walkway connecting buildings of the Cathedral.

⁵ villeins Peasants subject to lords or attached to manors.

⁶ camlet furred with gris Fabric imported from the East and trimmed with gray fur.

⁷ the King... fairness or otherwise The young King mentioned here is Richard II, who had come to the throne at the age of only ten years old, after the death of his grandfather, Edward III, in 1377; for the first three years of his kingship the kingdom was actually ruled by a council of nobles. This problematic royal transition contributed to the general uncertainties and tensions in England.

linure Fine linen.

Candlemas The Feast of the Purification of the Virgin Mary, celebrated on 2 February.

John Ball, Letter to the Common People of Essex (1381)¹

Johan Schep² sometime³ Seynte Marie's priest of York⁴ and now of Colchester, greeteth wel Johan Nameless, and Johan the Millere, and Johon Cartere, and biddeth them that they be ware of gyle in borough,⁵ and stondeth togidre in God's name, and biddeth Peres Ploughman⁶ go to his werk, and chastise wel Hobbe the Robbere,⁷ and taketh with you Johan Trewman, and alle his felowes, and no mo,⁸ and look schappe you to one head,⁹ and no mo.

Johan the Millere hath ygrounde smal,^o ground finely
smal, smal;

The Kyng's Sone of Hevene schal paye for al.

Be ware or^o ye be woe; before

Knoweth your freend fro your foe;

Haveth ynow and seith 'Hoo';¹⁰

And do wel and better,¹¹ and fleeth sinne,

And seeketh peace, and hold you therinne;

And so biddeth Johan Trewman and alle his felowes.

¹ John Ball ... 1381 Text has been modernized for The Broadview Anthology from Fourteenth Century Verse and Prose, ed. Kenneth Sisam (Oxford: Clarendon, 1970).

² Johan Schep Alias for John Ball; priests were often referred to as shepherds. The various Johns named in this letter are probably allegorical aliases for figures involved in the revolt.

³ sometime Formerly.

⁴ Seynte Marie's priest of York Priest of Saint Mary's Church in York.

⁵ gyle in borough Trickery in town.

⁶ Peres Ploughman This is a reference to William Langland's poem Piers Plowman, which contains sharp criticism of abuses by both ecclesiastical and secular powers.

⁷ Hobbe the Robbere This figure appears in Piers Plowman, Passus 5.1.463; "Hobbe" is a nickname for Robert.

⁸ mo More.

⁹ look schappe you to one head Be sure that you follow one head, i.e., one leader.

¹⁰ Haveth ... 'Hoo' I.e., have what you need and say, "Enough."

¹¹ do wel and better Dowel and Dobet (Do-Well and Do-Better) are characters in Piers Plowman.

from Henry Knighton, Chronicle (1378–96)

In the year 1381, the second of the reign of King Richard II, during the month of May ... that impious band began to assemble from Kent, from Surrey, and from many other surrounding places. Apprentices also, leaving their masters, rushed to join these. And so they gathered on Blackheath, where, forgetting themselves in their multitude, and neither contented with their former cause nor appeased by smaller crimes, they unmercifully planned greater and worse evils and determined not to desist from their wicked undertaking until they should have entirely extirpated the nobles and great men of the kingdom.

So at first they directed their course of iniquity to a certain town of the Archbishop of Canterbury called Maidstone, in which there was a jail of the said Archbishop, and in the said jail was a certain John Ball, a chaplain who was considered among the laity to be a very famous preacher; many times in the past he had foolishly spread abroad the word of God, by mixing tares with wheat, too pleasing to the laity and extremely dangerous to the liberty of ecclesiastical law and order, execrably introducing into the Church of Christ many errors among the clergy and laymen. For this reason he had been tried as a clerk and convicted in accordance with the law, being seized and assigned to this same jail for his permanent abiding place. On [June 12,] the Wednesday before the Feast of the Consecration, they came into Surrey to the jail of the King at Marshalsea, where they broke the jail without delay, forcing all imprisoned there to come with them to help them; and whomsoever they met, whether pilgrims or others of whatever condition, they forced to go with them.

On [June 14,] the Friday following the Feast of the Consecration, they came over the bridge to London; here no one resisted them, although, as was said, the citizens of London knew of their advance a long time before; and so they directed their way to the Tower where the King was surrounded by a great throng of knights, esquires, and others. It was said that there were in the Tower about one hundred and fifty knights together with one hundred and eighty others. ...

John Leg and a certain John, a Minorite, a man active in warlike deeds, skilled in natural sciences, an intimate friend of Lord John, duke of Lancaster, hastened with three others to the Tower for refuge, intending to hide themselves under the wings of the King. The people had determined to kill the Archbishop and the others above mentioned with him; for this reason they came to this place, and afterwards they fulfilled their vows. The King, however, desired to free the Archbishop and his friends from the jaws of the wolves, so he sent to the people a command to assemble outside the city, at a place called Mile End, in order to speak with the King and to treat with him concerning their designs. The soldiers who were to go forward, consumed with folly, lost heart, and gave up, on the way, their boldness of purpose. Nor did they dare to advance but, unfortunately, struck as they were by fear, like women, kept themselves within the Tower.

But the King advanced to the assigned place, while many of the wicked mob kept following him. . . . More, however, remained where they were. When the others had come to the King they complained that they had been seriously oppressed by many hardships and that their condition of servitude was unbearable, and that they neither could nor would endure it longer. The King, for the sake of peace, and on account of the violence of the times, yielding to their petition, granted to them a charter with the great seal, to the effect that all men in the kingdom of England should be free and of free condition, and should remain both for themselves and their heirs free from all kinds of servitude and villeinage forever. This charter was rejected and decided to be null and void by the King and the great men of the kingdom in the Parliament held at Westminster in the same year, after the Feast of St. Michael.

While these things were going on, behold those degenerate sons, who still remained, summoned their father the Archbishop with his above-mentioned friends without any force or attack, without sword or arrow, or any other form of compulsion, but only with force of threats and excited outcries, inviting those men to death. But they did not cry out against it for themselves, nor resist, but, as sheep before the shearers, going forth barefooted with uncovered heads, ungirt, they offered themselves freely to an undeserved death, just as if they had deserved this punishment for some murder or theft. And so, alas! before the King returned, seven were killed at Tower Hill, two of them lights of the kingdom, the worthy with the unworthy. John Leg and his three associates were the cause of this irreparable loss. Their heads were fastened on spears and sticks in order that they might be told from the rest. . . .

Whatever representatives of the law they found or whatever men served the kingdom in a judicial capacity, these they slew without delay.

On the following day, which was Saturday, they gathered in Smithfield, where there came to them in the morning the King, who although only a youth in years yet was in wisdom already well versed. Their leader, whose real name was Wat Tyler, approached him; already they were calling him by the other name of Jack Straw. He kept close to the King, addressing him for the rest. He carried in his hand an unsheathed weapon which they call a dagger, and, as if in childish play, kept tossing it from one hand to the other in order that he might seize the opportunity, if the King should refuse his requests, to strike the King suddenly (as was commonly believed); and from this thing the greatest fear arose among those about the King as to what might be the outcome.

They begged from the King that all the warrens, well waters, park, and wood, should be common to all, so that a poor man as well as a rich should be able freely to hunt animals everywhere in the kingdom—in the streams, in the fish ponds, in the woods, and in the forest; and that he might be free to chase the hare in the fields, and that he might do these things and others like them without objection. When the King hesitated about granting this concession Jack Straw came nearer, and, speaking threatening words, seized with his hand the bridle of the horse of the King very daringly. When John de Walworth, a citizen of London, saw this, thinking that death threatened the King, he seized a sword and pierced Jack Straw in the neck. Seeing this, another soldier, by name Radulf Standyche, pierced his side with another sword. He sank back, slowly letting go with his hands and feet, and then died. A great cry and much mourning arose: "Our leader is slain." When this dead man had been meanly dragged along by the hands and feet into the church of St. Bartholomew, which was near by, many withdrew from the band, and, vanishing, betook themselves to flight, to the number it is believed of ten thousand. . . .

After these things had happened and quiet had been restored, the time came when the King caused the offenders to be punished. So Lord Robert Tresillian, one of the judges, was sent by order of the King to inquire into the uprisings against the peace and to punish the guilty. Wherever he came he spared no one, but caused great slaughter. . . .

For whoever was accused before him in this said cause, whether justly or as a matter of spite, he immediately passed upon him the sentence of death. He ordered some to be beheaded, others to be hanged, still others to be dragged through the city and hanged in four different parts thereof; others to be disemboweled, and the entrails to be burned before them while they were still alive, and afterwards to be decapitated, quartered, and hanged in four parts of the city according to the greatness of the crime and its desert. John Ball was captured at Coventry and led to St. Albans, where, by order of the King, he was drawn and hanged, then quartered, and his quarters sent to four different places.

From a fifteenth-century manuscript of Froissart's Chronicles,
"The Death of Wat Tyler."

SIR GAWAIN AND THE GREEN KNIGHT

Little is known about Sir Gawain and the Green Knight apart from what the poem itself tells us. Its author is anonymous. The work is preserved in a single manuscript copy that was originally bound up with three other poems, Pearl, Cleanness, and Patience, which are generally regarded as having the same author. Like Sir Gawain and the Green Knight they are written in alliterative verse. The collection is known to have belonged to a private library in Yorkshire during the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. It came to light in the nineteenth century, and Sir Gawain and the Green Knight was edited and printed for the first time in 1839. By the middle of the twentieth century the great interest and imaginative power of the poem had been generally acknowledged, and had attracted an increasing number of scholarly studies and commentaries.

The poem is written in a regional dialect characteristic of northwestern England at the time of its probable composition during the last quarter of the fourteenth century. That would mean that the Gawain-poet was a contemporary of Chaucer, who died in 1400; but even a brief comparison of their work shows how widely they were separated linguistically and culturally.

In the northern country reflected in the wintry landscapes of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, an older literary language seems to have persisted, relatively unmarked by French, a language which the poet associates with the elaborately courtly manners displayed by Gawain and his hostess. In Chaucer a reader may gain the impression that the English and French components of his language have formed a comfortable liaison, so much so that he uses both indifferently and without reserving either for particular tasks. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight creates a different impression: that the two elements have not yet reached an accommodation, and that the poet and his audience are sufficiently alive to the nuances of words still novel and alien to their regional culture that French words tend to be used for distinctive purposes.

The poem is composed in a unique stanza form, made up of a varying number of long alliterative lines followed by a “bob and wheel”: five short lines rhyming a b a b a, of which the first consists of only two syllables. The number of stressed alliterative words in each long line also varies, the norm being three.

Evidently it suits the poet’s purposes to present himself as a simple popular entertainer whose occasional comments to his audience—“I schal telle yow how thay wroght”—and explanatory remarks about incidents in the story—“Wyt ye wel, hit watz worth wele ful hoge”—create an impression of the close relationship that a storyteller must maintain with his listeners. In oral narration such remarks would arise spontaneously, but here they are contrived as part of a deliberate purpose. It is not difficult to understand why the poet should have adopted the manner of an oral tale in a written work. Alliterative poetry is addressed to the ear, not to the eye, and its effects are not fully realized unless what Chaucer called the “rum-ram-ruf” of its pounding consonants is heard. Until displaced by rhyming verse it was also the established form of English poetry, and it seems evident from Sir Gawain and the Green Knight that its author felt a strong attachment to native tradition and culture. That may explain why he adopted the persona of a popular storyteller in addressing his audience, when the tale itself—particularly the three episodes in Gawain’s bedchamber—prove him unusually cultivated and well acquainted with the literature of courtly manners and ideals.

Sir Gawain and the Green Knight represents the close fusion of three separate stories which may have been individually familiar to the poet’s audience, but which have not survived in any similar combination in England or any other country. The first is the legend of the beheading game, which provides the opening and closing episodes of the poet’s story. The second is the “exchange of winnings” proposed by Gawain’s host in the central episodes of his adventure, which overlaps with the third motif, the sexual testing of Gawain. Combining these three elements into a single romance was not in itself a remarkable feat. The poet’s achievement lies in having amalgamated them in such a way that while they appear unrelated, the outcome of one is determined by Gawain’s behavior in the quite separate circumstances of the other.

In Sir Gawain and the Green Knight the beheading story takes substantially the same form as it does in Fled Bricrend, an Irish hero tale that was first recorded around 1100, but is probably several centuries older. There are, however, many differences of details between the versions. The giant is no longer terrifying and ugly but physically attractive, splendidly dressed, and mounted on a horse which like himself is emerald green. He makes his challenge on New Year’s Day and requires his opponent to stand the return blow a year and a day later at the Green Chapel, which must be found without directions. Gawain is chosen as the court’s representative, promises to meet the Green Knight as stipulated, and decapitates him. The victim picks up his head, leaps into his saddle, and after reminding Gawain of his undertaking gallops away. At the Green Chapel a year later Gawain stands three swings from the Green Knight’s axe. The first two are checked just short of his neck, and the third gashes the flesh as punishment for Gawain’s dishonesty in a matter which has no evident connection with the beheading game. In this and other respects Sir Gawain and the Green Knight is a much more elaborate reworking of the legend, but its dependence upon the earlier Irish version is obvious. There are reasons for supposing that the major changes in the Gawain-poet’s version of the tale—the challenger’s color, the midwinter setting, and the year’s interval between blows, for instance—were of his own devising, for these are not inconsequential details but parts of the imaginative purpose that integrates the whole poem.

None of the analogues of the temptation theme used by the poet are very closely related to his story of Gawain’s attempted seduction, and no source of the motif has been found in legend. In the Welsh Mabinogi Pwyll spends a year at the court of Arawn in his friend’s likeness, sleeping beside the queen but respecting her chastity; but while his self-restraint is tested no attempt is made to seduce him. The story is one of many legends which require the hero or heroine to undergo a trial of patience, forbearance or self-denial, usually in preparation for some task that demands special powers. The French romance of Le Chevalier à l’Épée is distantly related to this theme, and one of several works which seem to have contributed to the Gawain-poet’s version of the temptation story.

The James Winny translation of the poem which appears below has been widely praised for its sensitivity to nuances of meaning; given the facing-text presentation, the translator has not felt it necessary to imitate the alliterative qualities of the Middle English verse, and has thus been able to convey the sense of the original as clearly as possible for the modern reader.

Sir Gawayn and the Grene Knyght

FITT I

Sithen the sege and the assaut watz sesed at Troye,
The borgh brittened and brent to brondez and askez,
The tulk that the trammes of tresoun ther wroght
Watz tried for his tricherie, the trewest on erthe.

*Sir Gawain and the Green Knight*¹

PART I

When the siege and the assault were ended at Troy,
The city laid waste and burnt into ashes,
The man who had plotted the treacherous scheme
Was tried for the wickedest trickery ever.

¹ Sir Gawain and the Green Knight The translation is that of James Winny.

5 Hit watz Ennias the athel¹ and his highe kynde
 That sithen depreced provinces, and patrounes bicomme
 Welneghe of al the wele in the west isles.
 Fro riche Romulus to Rome ricchis hym swythe;
 With gret bobbaunce that burghes he biges upon fyrst,
 10 And nevenes hit his aune nome, as hit now hat;
 Ticius to Tuskan and teldes bigynnes,
 Langaberde in Lumbardie lyftes up homes,
 And fer over the French flod Felix Brutus
 On mony bonkkes ful brode Bretayn he settez 15 with wyne;
 Where werre and wreke and wonder
 Bi sythez hatz wont therinne,
 And oft both blyse and blunder
 Ful skete hatz skyfted synne.

20 Ande quen this Bretayn watz bigged bi this burn rych, Bolde bredden therinne, baret that lofden,
 In mony turned tyme tene that wroghten.
 Mo ferlyes on this folde han fallen here oft
 Then in any other that I wot, syn that ilk tyme.
 25 Bot of alle that here bult, of Bretayne kynges,
 Ay watz Arthur the hendest, as I haf herde telle.
 Forthi an aunter in erde I attle to schawe,
 That a selly in syght summe men hit holden,
 And an outrage awenture of Arthurez wonderez.
 30 If ye wyl lysten this laye bot on little quile
 I schal telle hit as-tit, as I in toun herde,² with tonge,³
 As hit is stad and stoken⁴
 In stori stif and stronge,
 35 With lel letteres loken,
 In londe so hatz ben longe.

This kyng lay at Camylot upon Krystmasse
 With mony luflych lorde, ledez of the best,
 Rekenly of the Rounde Table alle tho rich brether,
 40 With rych revel oryght and rechles merthes.

It was princely Aeneas and his noble kin
 Who then subdued kingdoms, and came to be lords
 Of almost all the riches of the western isles.
 Afterwards noble Romulus hastens to Rome;
 45 With great pride he gives that city its beginnings,
 And calls it by his own name, which it still has.
 Ticius goes to Tuscany and sets up houses,
 Langobard in Lombardy establishes homes,
 And far over the French sea Felix Brutus
 On many broad hillsides settles Britain 15 with delight;
 Where war and grief and wonder
 Have visited by turns,
 And often joy and turmoil
 Have alternated since.

20 And when Britain had been founded by this noble lord,
 Valiant men bred there, who thrived on battle.
 In many an age bygone they brought about trouble.
 More wondrous events have occurred in this country
 Than in any other I know of, since that same time.
 25 But of all those who dwelt there, of the British kings
 Arthur was always judged noblest, as I have heard tell.
 And so an actual adventure I mean to relate
 Which some men consider a marvelous event,
 And a prodigious happening among tales about Arthur.
 30 If you will listen to this story just a little while I will tell it at once, as I heard it told in court.
 As it is written down
 In story brave and strong,
 35 Made fast in truthful words,
 That had endured long.

The king spent that Christmas at Camelot
 With many gracious lords, men of great worth,
 Noble brothers-in-arms worthy of the Round Table,
 40 With rich revelry and carefree amusement, as was right.

¹ Ennias the athel Here athel is used as a title appropriate to a prince (Aeneas), but at 2065 the word is applied to Gawain's guide.

² as I in toun herde It seems unlikely that the poet had either read or heard this particular tale recited. Although the beheading game figures in an Irish legend and the test of chastity has many analogues, no other surviving story combines them in a single narrative. But originality was not expected of medieval storytellers.

³ with tonge Compare wyth syght, 197 and 226, and meled with his muthe, 447, for similar constructions.

⁴ stad and stoken Set down and fixed.

Ther tournayed tulkes by tyme¹ ful mony,
 Justed ful jolilé thise gentyle knyghtes,
 Sythen kayred to the court caroles to make.
 For ther the fest watz ilyche ful fifteen dayes,
 45 With alle the mete and the mirthe that men couthe avyse;
 Such glaume and gle glorious to here,
 Dere dyn upon day, daunsyng on nyghtes,
 Al watz hap upon heghe in hallez and chambrez
 With lordez and ladies, as levest him thoght.
 50 With all the wel of the worlde thay woned ther samen,
 The most kyd knyghtez under Krystes selven,
 And the lovelokkest ladies that ever lif haden,
 And he the comlokest kyng that the court haldes;
 For al watz this fayre folk in her first age,¹ 55 on sille,
 The hapnest under heven,
 Kyng hyghest mon of wyll;e
 Hit were now gret nye to neven
 So hardy a here on hille.
 60 Wyle Nwe Yer watz so yep that hit watz nwe cummen,
 That day double on the dece watz the douth served.
 Fro the kyng watz cummen with knyghtes into the halle,
 The chauntré of the chapel cheved to an ende,
 Loude crye watz ther kest of clerkez and other,
 65 Nowel² nayted onewe, nevened ful ofte;
 And sythen riche forth runnen to reche hondeselle,
 Yeghed yeres-giftes on high, yelde hem bi hond,³
 Debated busily aboute tho giftes;
 Ladies laghed ful loude, thogh thay lost haden,
 70 And he that wan watz not wrothe, that may ye wel trawe.⁴
 Alle this mirthe thay maden to the mete tyme;
 When thay had waschen worthily thay wenten to sete,
 The best burne ay abof,⁵ as hit best semed,
 Whene Guenore, ful gay, graythed in the myddes,
 75 Dressed on the dere des, dubbed al aboute,
 Smal sendal bisides, a selure hir over
 Of tryed tolouse, of tars tapites innoghe,

There knyghts fought in tournament again and again,
 Jousting most gallantly, these valiant men,
 Then rode to the court for dancing and song.
 For there the festival lasted the whole fifteen days
 45 With all the feasting and merry-making that could be devised:
 Such sounds of revelry splendid to hear,
 Days full of uproar, dancing at night.
 Everywhere joy resounded in chambers and halls
 Among lords and ladies, whatever pleased them most.
 50 With all of life's best they spent that time together,
 The most famous warriors in Christendom,
 And the loveliest ladies who ever drew breath,
 And he the finest king who rules the court.
 For these fair people were then in the flower of youth 55 in the hall.
 Luckiest under heaven,
 King of loftiest mind;
 Hard it would be
 Bolder men to find.
 60 When New Year was so fresh that it had hardly begun,
 Double helpings of food were served on the dais that day.
 By the time the king with his knights entered the hall
 When the service in the chapel came to an end,
 Loud cries were uttered by the clergy and others,
 65 "Nowel" repeated again, constantly spoken;
 And then the nobles hurried to hand out New Year's gifts,
 Cried their wares noisily, gave them by hand,
 And argued excitedly over those gifts.
 Ladies laughed out loud, even though they had lost,
 70 And the winner was not angry, you may be sure.
 All this merry-making went on until feasting time.
 When they had washed as was fit they took their places,
 The noblest knight in a higher seat, as seemed proper;
 Queen Guenevere gaily dressed and placed in the middle,
 75 Seated on the upper level, adorned all about;
 Fine silk surrounding her, a canopy overhead
 Of costly French fabric, silk carpets underfoot

¹ in her first age In their youth.

² Nowel I.e., Noël, a Christmas greeting.

³ Andsythen ... hond Some have suggested that hondeselle are given to servants and yerres-giftes to equals. But Arthur is said figuratively to have received a hanselle at 491.

⁴ Ladies ... trawe The lines refer to some kind of Christmas game, perhaps involving guesses and paying a forfeit of kisses when the guess is wrong.

⁵ The best burne ay abof Members of the court are seated according to social degree, at the hyghe table, 107, or at sidbordez, 115. The reference to lordes and ladis that longed to the Table, 2515, suggests that the poet saw the Round Table as a social institution.

That were enbrawd and beten wyth the best gemmes
That myght be preved of prys¹ wyth penyes to bye, 80 in daye.²

The comlokest to discrye
Ther glent with yghen gray;³
A semloker that ever he syghe
Soth moght no mon say.

85 Bot Arthure wolde not ete til al were served,
He watz so joly of his joyfnes, and sumquat childgered:
His lif liked hym lyght, he lovied the lasse
Auther to longe lye or to longe sitte,
So bisied him his yonge blod and his brayn wylde.
90 And also an other maner meved him eke
That he thurgh nobelay had nomen, he wolde never ete Upon such a dere day er hym devised were
Of sum aventurus thyng an uncouth tale,
Of sum mayn mervayle, that he myght trawe,
95 Of alderes, of armes, of other aventurus,
Other sum segg hym bisoght of sum siker knyght
To joyne wyth hym in justyng, in jopardé to lay Lede, lif for lyf, leve uchon other,
As fortune wolde fulsun hom, the fayrer to have.
100 This watz the kynges countenance where he in court were,
At uch farande fest among his fre meny
in halle.

Therfore of face so fere
He stighdez stif in stalle,
105 Ful yep in that Nw Yere
Much mirthe he mas withalle.

Thus ther stondes in stale the stif kyng hisselven,
Talkkande bfore the hyghe table of trifles ful hende.
There gode Gawan⁴ watz graythed Gwenore bisyde, 110 And Agravain à la dure mayn on that other syde sittes, Bothe the kynges sistersunes and ful siker knyghtes;
Bischof Bawdewyn abof biginez the table,
And Ywan, Uryn son, ette with hymselfen.
Thise were dight on the des and derworthly served,
115 And sithen mony siker segge at the sidbordez.

That were embroidered and studded with the finest gemms
That money could buy at the highest price 80 anywhere.

The loveliest to see Glanced round with eyes blue-grey;
That he had seen a fairer one
Truly could no man say.

85 But Arthur would not eat until everyone was served,
He was so lively in his youth, and a little boyish.
He hankered after an active life, and cared very little
To spend time either lying or sitting,
His young blood and restless mind stirred him so much.
90 And another habit influenced him too,
Which he had made a point of honor: he would never eat
On such a special day until he had been told
A curious tale about some perilous thing,
Of some great wonder that he could believe,
95 Of princes, of battles, or other marvels;
Or some knight begged him for a trustworthy foe
To oppose him in jousting, in hazard to set
His life against his opponent's, each letting the other,
As luck would assist him, gain the upper hand.
100 This was the king's custom when he was in court,
At each splendid feast with his noble company in hall.

Therefore with proud face
He stands there, masterful,
105 Valiant in that New Year,
Joking with them all.

So there the bold king himself keeps on his feet,
Chatting before the high table of charming trifles.
There good Gawain was seated beside Guenevere,
110 And Agravain à la Dure Main on the other side;
Both the king's nephews and outstanding knights.
Bishop Baldwin heads the table in the highest seat,
And Ywain, son of Urien, dined as his partner.
These knights were set on a dais and sumptuously served,
115 And after them many a true man at the side tables.

¹ proved of prys Proved of value.

² in daye Literally, ever.

³ yghen gray Virtually obligatory in medieval heroines.

⁴ gode Gawan So characterized throughout the story, even after his disgrace. The spelling of the hero's name varies considerably. He is Gawan consistently throughout Part I. Later the poet or his scribe prefers the form Gawayn or Gawayne, which is used throughout Part 4. For alliterative purposes he is occasionally referred to as Wawan, Wawayn, or Wowen. Less frequently he is Gavan or Gavayn.

Then the first cors come with crakkyng of trumpes,
 Wyth mony baner ful bryght that therbi henged;
 Nwe nakryn noyse with the noble pipes,
 Wylde werbles and wyght wakned lote,
 120 That mony hert ful highe hef at her towches.
 Dayntés dryven therwyth of ful dere metes,
 Foyssoun of the fresche, and on so fele disches
 That pine to fynde the place the peple bifome
 For to sette the sylveren that sere sewes halden 125 on clothe.
 Iche lede as he loved hymselfe
 Ther laght withouten lothe;
 Ay two had disches twelve,
 Good ber and bryght wyn bothe.

130 Now wyl I of hor servise say yow no more,
 For uch wyghe may wel wit no wont that ther were.
 An other noyse ful newe neghed bilive
 That the lude myght haf leve liflode to cache;¹
 For unethe watz the noyce not a whyle sesed, 135 And the fyrst cource in the court kyndely served,
 Ther hales in at the halle dor an aghlich mayster,
 On the most² on the molde on mesure hyghe;
 Fro the swyre to the swange so sware and so thik,
 And his lyndes and his lymes so longe and so grete, 140 Half etayn in erde I hope that he were,
 Bot mon most I algate mynn hym to bene,
 And that the myriest in his muckel that myght ride;
 For of his bak and his brest al were his bodi sturne,
 Both his wombe and his wast were worthily smale, 145 And alle his fetures folyande, in forme that he hade, ful clene;
 For wonder of his hwe men hade,
 Set in his semblaunt sene;
 He ferde as freke were fade,
 150 And overal enker-grene.

And al grathed in grene this gome and his wedes:
 A strayte cote ful strenght, that stek on his sides,
 A meré mantile abof, mensked withinne
 With pelure pured apert, the pane ful clene
 155 With blythe blaunner ful bryght, and his hode bothe,
 That watz laght fro his lokkez and layde on his schulderes;

¹ haf leve liflode to cache Arthur will not eat until he has sen a selly, 475, which is about to arrive.

Then the first course was brought in with trumpets blaring,
 Many colorful banners hanging from them.
 The novel sound of kettledrums with the splendid pipes
 Waked echoes with shrill and tremulous notes, 120 That many hearts leapt at the outburst of music.
 At the same time servings of such exquisite food,
 Abundance of fresh meat, in so many dishes
 That space could hardly be found in front of the guests
 To set down the silverware holding various stews 125 on the board.
 Each man who loved himself
 Took ungrudged, pair by pair,
 From a dozen tasty dishes,
 And drank good wine or beer.

130 Now I will say nothing more about how they were served,
 For everyone can guess that no shortage was there.
 Another noise, quite different, quickly drew near,
 So that the king might have leave to swallow some food.
 For hardly had the music stopped for a moment,
 135 And the first course been properly served to the court,
 When there bursts in at the hall door a terrible figure,
 In his stature the very tallest on earth.
 From the waist to the neck so thick-set and square,
 And his loins and his limbs so massive and long, 140 In truth half a giant I believe he was,
 But anyway of all men I judge him the largest,
 And the most attractive of his size who could sit on a horse.
 For while in back and chest his body was forbidding,
 Both his belly and waist were becomingly trim,
 145 And every part of his body equally elegant in shape.
 His hue astounded them,
 Set in his looks so keen;
 For boldly he rode in,
 150 Completely emerald green.

And all arrayed in green this man and his clothes:
 A straight close-fitting coat that clung to his body,
 A pleasant mantle over that, adorned within
 With plain trimmed fur, the facing made bright 155 With gay shining ermine, and his hood of the same Thrown back from his hair and laid over his shoulders.

On the most Not "one of the biggest" but "the very biggest."

Watz never sene in that sale wyth syght er that tyme, with yghe.

200 He loket as layt so lyght,
So sayd al that hym syghe;
Hit semed as no mon myght
Under his dynttez dryghe.

Whether hade he no helme ne no hawbergh¹ nauther,
Ne no pysan ne no plate that pented to armes,
205 Ne no schafte ne no schelde to schwve ne to smyte,
Bot in his on honde he hade a holyn bobbe,
That is grattest in grene when grevez ar bare,
And an ax in his other, a hoge and unmete,
A spetos sparthe to expoun in spelle, quoso myght.
210 The lenkthe of an elnyerde the large hede hade,
The grayn al of grene stele and of golde hewen,
The bit burnyst bryght, with a brod egge
As wel schapen to schere as scharp rasores,
The stele of a stif staf the sturne hit bi grypte,
215 That watz wounden wyth yrn to the wandez ende,
And al bigraven with grene in gracios werkes;
A lace lapped aboute, that louked at the hede,
And so after the halme halched ful ofte,
Wyth tryed tasselez therto tacched innoghe
220 On botounz of the bryght grene brayden ful ryche.
This hathel heldez hym in and the halle entres,
Drivande to the heghe dece, dut he no wothe,
Haylsed he never one, bot heghe he over loket.
The fyrst word that he warp, "Where is," he sayd, 225 "The governour of this gyng? Gladly I wolde Se that segg in syght, and with hymself speke
raysoun."²
To knyghtez he kest his yghe,
And reled hym up and down;
230 He stemmed, and con studie
Quo walt ther most renoun.

Ther watz loking on lenthe the lude to beholde,
For uch mon had mervayle quat hit mene myght

Had any man in that hall before thought to see with his eyes.

200 His glance was lightning swift,
All said who saw him there;
It seemed that no one could
His massive blows endure.

Yet he had no helmet nor hauberk either,
No neck-armour or plate belonging to arms,
205 No spear and no shield to push or to strike;
But in one hand he carried a holly-branch
That is brilliantly green when forests are bare,
And an axe in the other, monstrously huge;
A cruel battle-axe to tell of in words, if one could.
210 The great head was as broad as a measuring-rod,
The spike made entirely of green and gold steel,
Its blade brightly burnished, with a long cutting-edge
As well fashioned to shear as the keenest razor.
The grim man gripped the handle, a powerful staff,
215 That was wound with iron to the end of the haft
And all engraved in green with craftsmanly work.
It had a thong wrapped about it, fastened to the head,
And then looped round the handle several times,
With many splendid tassels attached to it 220 With buttons of bright green, richly embroidered.
This giant bursts in and rides through the hall,
Approaching the high dais, disdainful of peril,
Greeting none, but haughtily looking over their heads.
The first words he spoke, "Where is," he demanded, 225 "The governor of this crowd? Glad should I be To clap eyes on the man, and exchange with him a few words."
He looked down at the knights,
As he rode up and down,
230 Then paused, waiting to see
Who had the most renown.

For long there was only staring at the man,
For everyone marveled what it could mean

¹ hawbergh I.e., hauberk, coat of chain mail.

² raysoun Words, implicit in speke but evidently idiomatic.

That a hathel and a horse myght such a hwe lach
 As growe gren as the gres and grener hit semed,
 Then grene aumayl on golde glowande bryghter.
 Al studied that ther stod, and stalked hym nerre
 With al the wonder of the worlde what he worche schulde.
 For fele sellyez had thay sen, bot such never are;
 Forthi for fantoun and fayrye the folk there hit demed.
 Therefore to answare watz arghe mony athel freke,
 And al stouned at his steven and stonstil seten
 In a swogh sylence thurgh the sale riche;
 As al were slypped upon slepe so slaked hor lotez
 in hyghe;
 I deme hit not al for doute,
 Bot sum for cortaysye,
 Bot let hym that al schulde loute
 Cast unto that wyghe.

Thenne Arthour bfore the high dece that aventure byholdez,
 And rekenly hym reverenced, for rad was he never,
 And sayde, "Wyghe, welcum iwys to this place,
 The hede of this ostel Arthour I hat;
 Lyght luflych adoun and lenge, I the praye,
 And quat-so thy wylle is we schal wyt after."
 "Nay, as help me," quoth the hathel, "he that on hygh syttes,
 To wone any quyle in this won hit watz not myn ernde;
 Bot for the los of the, lede, is lyft up so hyghe,
 And thy burgh and thy burnes best ar holden,
 Stifest under stel-gere on stedes to ryde,
 The wyghtest and the worthyest of the worldes kynde,
 Preve for to playe wyth in other pure laykez,
 And here is kydde cortaysye, as I haf herd carp,
 And that hatz wayned me hider, iwylis, at this tyme.
 Ye may be seker bi this braunch that I bere here
 That I passe as in pes, and no plyght seche;
 For had I founded in fere in fehtyng wyse,
 I have a haubergh at home and a helme bothe,
 A schelde and a scharp spere, schinande bryghte,
 Ande other weppenes to welde, I wene wel, als;
 Bot for I wolde no were, my wedez ar softer.
 Bot if thou be so bold as alle burnez tellen,
 Thou wyl grant me godly the gomen that I ask bi ryght."

Arthour con onsware,
 And sayd, "Sir cortays knyght,

That a knight and a horse might take such a color
 And become green as grass, and greener it seemed
 Than green enamel shining brightly on gold.
 All those standing there gazed, and warily crept closer,
 Bursting with wonder to see what he would do;
 For many marvels they had known, but such a one never;
 So the folk there judged it phantasm or magic.
 For this reason many noble knights feared to answer:
 And stunned by his words they sat there stock-still,
 While dead silence spread throughout the rich hall
 As though everyone fell asleep, so was their talk stilled
 at a word.
 Not just for fear, I think,
 But some for courtesye;
 Letting him whom all revere
 To that man reply.

Then Arthur confronts that wonder before the high table,
 And saluted him politely, for afraid was he never,
 And said, "Sir, welcome indeed to this place;
 I am master of this house, my name is Arthur.
 Be pleased to dismount and spend some time here, I beg,
 And what you have come for we shall learn later."
 "No, by heaven," said the knight, "and him who sits there,
 To spend time in this house was not the cause of my coming,
 But because your name, sir, is so highly regarded,
 And your city and your warriors reputed the best,
 Dauntless in armor and on horseback afield,
 The most valiant and excellent of all living men,
 Courageous as players in other noble sports,
 And here courtesy is displayed, as I have heard tell,
 And that has brought me here, truly, on this day.
 You may be assured by this branch that I carry
 That I approach you in peace, seeking no battle.
 For had I traveled in fighting dress, in warlike manner,
 I have a hauberk at home and a helmet too,
 A shield and a keen spear, shining bright,
 And other weapons to brandish, I assure you, as well;
 But since I look for no combat I am not dressed for battle.
 But if you are as courageous as everyone says,
 You will graciously grant me the game that I ask for
 by right."

In answer Arthur said,
 "If you seek, courteous knight,

If thou crave batayl bare,¹
Here faylez thou not to fyght.”

“Nay, frayst I no fyght, in fayth I the telle,
280 Hit arn aboute on this bench bot berdlez chylder.
If I were hasped in armes on a heghe stede,
Here is no mon me to mach, for myghtez so wayke.
Forthy I crave in this court a Crystemas gomen,²
For hit is Yol and Nwe Yer, and here ar yep mony.
285 If any so hardy in this hous holdez hymselfen,
Be so bolde in his blod, brayn³ in hys hede,
That dar stifly strike a strok for an other,
I schal gif hym of my gyft thys giserne ryche,
This ax, that is hevè innogh, to hondele as hym lykes,
290 And I schal bide the fyrst bur as bare as I sitte.⁴
If any freke be so felle to fonde that I telle,
Lepe lyghtly me to, and lach this weppen,
I quit-clayme hit for ever, kepe hit as his awen,
And I schal stonde hym a strok, stif on this flet, 295 Ellez thou wyl dight me the dom to dele hym an other barlay;⁵
And yet gif hym respite
A twelmonyth and a day;
Now hyghe, and let se tite
300 Dar any herinne oght say.”

If he hem stouned upon fyrst, stiller were thanne
Alle the heredmen in halle, the hyghe and the lowe.
The renk on his rouncé hym ruched in his sadel,
And runischly his red yghen he reled aboute,
305 Bende his bresed browez, blycande grene,
Wayved his berde for to wayte quo-so wolde ryse.
When non wolde kepe hym with carp he coghed ful hyghe,
Ande rimed hym ful richely, and ryght hym to speke:
“What, is this Arthures hous?” quoth the hathel thenne,
310 “That al the rous rennes of thurgh ryalmes so mony?
Where is now your sourquydrye and your conquestes,
Your gryndellayk and your greme, and your grete wordes?

¹ batayl bare Either “without armor” (compare 290) or—as suggested by thre bare mote, 1141—“in single combat.”

² a Crystemas gomen In earlier times the midwinter festival included many games and sports now forgotten. Many of them involved mock-violence, of which traces remained in Blind Man’s Buff, played by striking a blindfolded victim and inviting him to guess who had struck him. Others exposed a victim to ridicule by playing a trick on him.

A combat without armor;
You will not lack a fight.”

“No, I seek no battle, I assure you truly;
280 Those about me in this hall are but beardless children.
If I were locked in my armor on a great horse,
No one here could match me with their feeble powers.
Therefore I ask of the court a Christmas game,
For it is Yule and New Year, and here are brave men in plenty.
285 If anyone in this hall thinks himself bold enough,
So doughty in body and reckless in mind
As to strike a blow fearlessly and take one in return,
I shall give him this marvelous battle-axe as a gift,
This ponderous axe, to use as he pleases;
290 And I shall stand the first blow, unarmed as I am.
If anyone is fierce enough to take up my challenge,
Run to me quickly and seize this weapon,
I renounce all claim to it, let him keep it as his own,
And I shall stand his blow unflinching on this floor, 295 Provided you assign me the right to deal such a one in return;
And yet grant him respite
A twelvemonth and a day.
Now hurry, and let’s see 300 What any here dare say.”

If he petrified them at first, even stiller were then
All the courtiers in that place, the great and the small.
The man on the horse turned himself in his saddle,
Ferociously rolling his red eyes about,
305 Bunched up his eyebrows, bristling with green,
Swung his beard this way and that to see whoever would rise.
When no one would answer he cried out aloud,
Drew himself up grandly and started to speak.
“What, is this Arthur’s house?” said the man then,
310 “That everyone talks of in so many kingdoms?
Where are now your arrogance and your victories,
Your fierceness and wrath and your great speeches?

³ brayn Crazy, reckless; usually braynwod, as at 1461.

⁴ as bare as I sitte Without the protection of armor.

⁵ barlay An obscure term, possibly meaning “by law,” or here, “by agreement.”

Now is the revel and the renoun of the Rounde Table
 Overwalt wyth a worde of on wyghes speche,
 315 For al dares for drede withoute dynt schewed!"
 Wyth this he laghes so loude that the lorde greved;
 The blod schot for scham into his schyre face and lere;

He wex as wroth as wynde,
 320 So did alle that ther were.
 The kyng as kene bi kynde
 Then stod that stif mon nere,

And sayde, "Hathel, by heven, thy askyng is nys,
 And as thou foly hatz frayst, fynde the behoves.
 325 I know no gome that is gast of thy grete wordes,
 Gif me now thy geserne, upon Godez halve,
 And I schal baythen thy bone that thou boden habbes."
 Lyghtly lepez he him to, and laght at his honde,
 Then feersly that other freke upon fote lyghtis.
 330 Now hatz Arthure his axe, and the halme grypez,
 And sturnely sturez hit aboute, that stryke wyth hit thought.
 The stif mon hym bifore stod upon hyght,
 Herre then ani in the hous by the hede and more.
 With sturne schere ther he stod he stroked his berde,
 335 And wyth a countenaunce dryghe he drogh down his cote,
 No more mate ne dismayd for hys mayn dintez¹
 Then any burne upon bench hade broght hym to drynk of wyne.

Gawan, that sate bi the quene,
 340 To the kyng he can encline:
 "I beseche now with sayez sene
 This melly mot be myne."²

"Wolde ye, worthilych lorde," quoth Wawan to the kyng,
 "Bid me boghe fro this benche, and stonde by yow there, 345 That I wythoute vylanye myght voyde this table,
 And that my legge lady lyked not ille,³
 I wolde com to your counseyl bifore your cort riche.
 For me think hit not semly, as hit is soth knawen,
 Ther such an askyng is hevened so hyghe in your sale,
 350 Thagh ye yourself be talenttyf, to take hit to yourselven,
 Whil mony so bolde yow aboute upon bench sytten
 That under heven I hope non hagherer of wylle,
 Ne better bodyes on bent ther baret is rered.

¹ for hys mayn dintez Because of Arthur's great practice blows.

² This melly mot be myne Let this be my combat.

Now the revelry and repute of the Round Table
 Are overthrown with a word from one man's mouth, 315 For you all cower in fear before a blow has been struck!"
 Then he laughs so uproariously that the king took offense;
 The blood rushed into his fair face and cheek
 for shame.

Arthur grew red with rage,
 320 As all the others did.
 The king, by nature bold,
 Approached that man and said,

"Sir, by heaven, what you demand is absurd,
 And since you have asked for folly, that you deserve.
 325 No man known to me fears your boastful words;
 Hand over your battle-axe, in God's name,
 And I shall grant the wish that you have requested."
 He quickly goes to him and took the axe from his hand.
 Then proudly the other dismounts and stands there.
 330 Now Arthur has the axe, grips it by the shaft,
 And grimly swings it about, as preparing to strike.
 Towering before him stood the bold man,
 Taller than anyone in the court by more than a head.
 Standing there grim-faced he stroked his beard,
 335 And with an unmoved expression then pulled down his coat,
 No more daunted or dismayed by those powerful strokes
 Than if any knight in the hall had brought him a measure of wine.

Seated by Guenevere
 340 Then bowed the good Gawain:
 "I beg you in plain words
 To let this task be mine."

Said Gawain to the king, "If you would, noble lord,
 Bid me rise from my seat and stand at your side,
 345 If without discourtesy I might leave the table,
 And that my liege lady were not displeased,
 I would offer you counsel before your royal court.
 For it seems to me unfitting, if the truth be admitted,
 When so arrogant a request is put forward in hall,
 350 Even if you are desirous, to undertake it yourself
 While so many brave men sit about you in their places
 Who, I think, are unrivalled in temper of mind,
 And without equal as warriors on field of battle.

³ that my legge lady lyked not ille That the Queen (beside whom Gawain is sitting) would not be offended if I left her side.

I am the wakkest, I wot, and of wyt feblest,
 355 And lest lur of my lyf, quo laytes the sothe:
 Bot for as much as ye are myn em I am only to praysse,
 No bounté bot your blod I in my bodé knowe;
 And sythen this note is so nys that noght hit yow falles,
 And I have frayed hit at yow fyrst, foldez hit to me;
 360 And if I carp not comlyly, let alle this cort rych bout blame."
 Ryche togeder con roun,
 And sythen thay redder alle same,
 To ryd the kyng wyth croun
 365 And gif Gawan the game.

Then comaunded the kyng the knyght for to ryse;
 And he ful radly upros, and ruchched hym fayre,
 Kneled down before the kyng, and cachez that weppen;
 And he luflyly hit hym laft, and lyfte up his honde
 370 And gef hym Goddez blessing, and gladly hym biddes
 That his hert and his honde schulde hardi be bothe.
 "Kepe the, cosyn," quoth the kyng, "that thou on kyrf sette,
 And if thou redez hym ryght, redly I trowe
 That thou schal byden the bur¹ that he schal bede after."
 375 Gawan gotz to the gome with giserne in honde,
 And he baldly hym bydez, he bayst never the helder.
 Then carppez to Sir Gawan the knyght in the grene,
 "Refourme we oure forwardes, er we fyrrer passe.
 Fyrst I ethe the, hathel, how that thou hattes 380 That thou me telle truly, as I tryst may."
 "In god fayth," quoth the goode knyght, "Gawan I hatte,
 That bede the this buffet, quat-so bifallez after,
 And at this tyme twelmonyth take at the an other Wyth what weppen so thou wylt, and wyth no wygh ellez
 385 on lyve."
 That other onswarez agayn,
 "Sir Gawan, so mot I thryve,
 As I am ferly fayn
 This dint that thou schal dryve.

390 "Bigog," quoth the grene knyght, "Sir Gawan, me lykes
 That I schal fange at thy fust that I haf frayst here.²
 And thou hatz redily rehersed, bi resoun ful trwe, Clanly al the covaunant that I the kyng asked,
 Saf that thou schal siker me, segge, bi thi trawthe,

I am the weakest of them, I know, and the dullest-minded, 355 So my death would be least loss, if truth should be told;
 Only because you are my uncle am I to be praised,
 No virtue I know in myself but your blood;
 And since this affair is so foolish and unfitting for you,
 And I have asked you for it first, it should fall to me.
 360 And if my request is improper, let not this royal court bear the blame."
 Nobles whispered together
 And agreed on their advice,
 That Arthur should withdraw 365 And Gawain take his place.

Then the king commanded Gawain to stand up,
 And he did so promptly, and moved forward with grace,
 Kneeled down before the king and laid hold of the weapon;
 And Arthur gave it up graciously, and lifting his hand
 370 Gave Gawain God's blessing, and cheerfully bids
 That he bring a strong heart and firm hand to the task.
 "Take care, nephew," said the king, "that you strike one blow,
 And if you deal it aright, truly I believe
 You will wait a long time for his stroke in return."
 375 Gawain approaches the man with battle-axe in hand,
 And he waits for him boldly, with no sign of alarm.
 Then the knight in the green addresses Gawain,
 "Let us repeat our agreement before going further.
 First I entreat you, sir, that what is your name 380 You shall tell me truly, that I may believe you."
 "In good faith," said that virtuous knight, "I am called Gawain,
 Who deals you this blow, whatever happens after,
 On this day next year to accept another from you
 With what weapon you choose, and from no other person 385 on earth."
 The other man replied,
 "Sir Gawain, as I live,
 I am extremely glad
 This blow is yours to give.

390 By God," said the Green Knight, "Sir Gawain, I am pleased
 That I shall get from your hands what I have asked for here.
 And you have fully repeated, in exact terms,
 Without omission the whole covenant I put to the king;
 Except that you shall assure me, sir, on your word,

¹ thou schal byden the bur You'll be kept waiting for his blow.

² "Bigog," ... here The Green Knight does not explain why he is especially pleased that Gawain accepts the challenge.

195 That thou schal seche me thiself, where-so thou hopes
 I may be funde upon folde, and foch the such wages
 As thou deles me to-day bfore this douthe ryche.” “Where schulde I wale the?” quoth Gawan, “Where is thy place?”

I wot never where thou wonyes, bi hym that me wroght, 400 Ne I know not the, knyght, thy cort ne thi name.
 Bot teche me truly therto, and telle me how thou hattes,
 And I schal ware alle my wyt to wynne me theder,
 And that I swere the for sothe, and by my seker traweth.”
 “That is innogh in Nwe Yer,¹ hit nedes no more,”

405 Quoth the gome in the grene to Gawan the hende; “Yif I the telle trwly quen I the tape have,
 And thou me smothely hatz smyten, smartly I the teche
 Of my hous and my home and myn owen nome,
 Then may thou frayst my fare and forwardez holde;
 410 And if I spende no speche, thenne spedez thou the better,
 For thou may leng in thy londe and layt no fyrr—
 bot slokes!

Ta now thy grymme tole to the,
 And lat se how thou cnokez.”

415 “Gladly, sir, for sothe,” Quoth Gawan: his ax he strokes.

The grene knyght upon grounde graythely hym dresses,
 A littel lut with the hed, the lere he discoverez,
 His longe lovelych lokkez he layd over his croun,
 420 Let the naked nec to the note schewe.
 Gawan gripped to his ax and gederes hit on hyght,
 The kay fot on the folde he before sette,
 Let hit down lyghtly lyght on the naked,
 That the scharp of the schalk schyndered the bones,
 425 And schrank thurgh the schyire grece, and schade hit in twynne,
 That the bit of the broun² stel bot on the grounde.
 The fayre hede fro the halce hit to the erthe,
 That fele hit foyned wyth hir fete, there hit forth roled;
 The blod brayed from the body, that blykked on the grene;
 430 And nawther faltered ne fel the freke never the helder,
 Bot stythly he start forth upon styf schonkes,
 And runyschly he raght out, there as renkkez stoden,
 Laght to his luffy hed, and lyft hit up sone;
 And sythen bowez to his blonk, the brydel he cachchez,

395 That you will seek me yourself, wherever you think
 I may be found upon earth, to accept such payment
 As you deal me today before this noble gathering.” “Where shall I find you?” said Gawain, “Where is your dwelling?”

I have no idea where you live, by him who made me;
 400 Nor do I know you, sir, your court nor your name.
 Just tell me truly these things, and what you are called,
 And I shall use all my wits to get myself there,
 And that I swear to you honestly, by my pledged word.”
 “That is enough for the moment, it needs nothing more,”

405 Said the man in green to the courteous Gawain,
 “If I answer you truly after taking the blow,
 And you have dextrously struck me, I will tell you at once
 Of my house and my home and my proper name,
 Then you can pay me a visit and keep your pledged word;
 410 And if I say nothing, then you will fare better,
 For you may stay in your country and seek no further—but enough!

Take up your fearsome weapon
 And let's see how you smite.”

415 Said Gawain, “Gladly, indeed,” Whetting the metal bit.

The Green Knight readily takes up his position,
 Bowed his head a little, uncovering the flesh,
 His long lovely hair he swept over his head,
 420 In readiness letting the naked neck show.
 Gawain grasped the axe and lifts it up high,
 Setting his left foot before him on the ground,
 Brought it down swiftly on the bare flesh
 So that the bright blade slashed through the man's spine 425 And cut through the white flesh, severing it in two,
 So that the shining steel blade bit into the floor.
 The handsome head flew from the neck to the ground,
 And many courtiers kicked at it as it rolled past.
 Blood spurted from the trunk, gleamed on the green dress, 430 Yet the man neither staggered nor fell a whit for all that,
 But sprang forward vigorously on powerful legs,
 And fiercely reached out where knights were standing,
 Grabbed at his fine head and snatched it up quickly,
 And then strides to his horse, seizes the bridle,

¹ innogh in Nwe Yer Literally, “enough for this New Year's Day”; meaning that Gawain need say nothing more, as the Green Knight goes on to say.

² broun Burnished.

435 Steppez into stelbawe and strydez alofte,
 And his hede by the here in his honde haldez.
 And as sadly the segge hym in his sadel sette
 As non unhap had hym ayled, thagh hedlez he were in stedde.

440 He brayde his bulk aboute,
 That ugly bodi that bledde;
 Moni on of hym had doute
 Bi that his resounz were redde.

For the hede in his honde he haldez up even,
 445 Toward the derrest on the dece he dressez the face,
 And hit lyfte up the yghe-lyddez and loked ful brode,
 And meled thus much with his muthe, as ye may now here:

“Loke, Gawan, thou be graythe to go as thou hettez,
 And layte as lelly til thou me, lude, fynde,
 450 As thou hatz hette in this halle, herande thise knyghtes;
 To the grene chapel thou chose, I charge the, to fotte
 Such a dunt as thou hatz dalt, disserved thou habbez
 To be yederly yolden on Nw Yeres morn.
 The knyght of the grene chapel men knowen me mony, 455 Forthi me for to fynde if thou fraystez, faylez thou never.
 Therefore com, other recreaunt be calde thou behoves.”
 With a runisch rout the raynez he tornez,
 Halled out at the hal dor, his hed in his hande,
 That the fyr of the flynt flaghe fro fole hoves.
 460 To quat kyth he becom knwe non there,
 Never more then thay wyste from quethen he watz wonnen.
 What thenne?

The kyng and Gawan thare
 At that grene thay laghe and grenne;
 465 Yet breved watz hit ful bare
 A mervayl among tho menne.

Thagh Arther the hende kyng at hert hade wonder,
 He let no semblaunt be sene, bot sayde ful hyghe
 To the comlych quene wyth cortays speche, 470 “Dere dame, to-day demay yow never;
 Wel bycommes such craft¹ upon Cristmasse,
 Laykyng of enterludez, to laghe and to syng,
 Among thise kynde caroles of knyghtez and ladyez.
 Never the lece to my mete I may me wel dres,

435 Puts foot into stirrup and swings into his seat,
 His other hand clutching his head by the hair;
 And the man seated himself on horseback as firmly
 As if he had suffered no injury, though headless he sat in his place.

440 He turned his body round,
 That gruesome trunk that bled;
 Many were struck by fear
 When all his words were said.

For he holds up the head in his hand, truly,
 445 Turns its face towards the noblest on the dais,
 And it lifted its eyelids and glared with wide eyes,
 And the mouth uttered these words, which you shall now hear:

“See, Gawain, that you carry out your promise exactly,
 And search for me truly, sir, until I am found,
 450 As you have sworn in this hall in the hearing of these knights.
 Make your way to the Green Chapel, I charge you, to get
 Such a blow as you have dealt, rightfully given,
 To be readily returned on New Year’s Day.
 As the Knight of the Green Chapel I am widely known, 455 So if you make search to find me you cannot possibly fail.
 Therefore come, or merit the name of craven coward.”
 With a fierce jerk of the reins he turns his horse
 And hurtled out of the hall door, his head in his hand,
 So fast that flint-fire sparked from the hoofs.
 460 What land he returned to no one there knew,
 Any more than they guessed where he had come from.
 What then?

Seeing that green man go,
 The king and Gawain grin;
 465 Yet they both agreed
 They had a wonder seen.

Although inwardly Arthur was deeply astonished,
 He let no sign of this appear, but loudly remarked
 To the beautiful queen with courteous speech, 470 “Dear lady, let nothing distress you today.
 Such strange goings-on are fitting at Christmas,
 Putting on interludes, laughing and singing,
 Mixed with courtly dances of ladies and knights.
 None the less, I can certainly go to my food,

¹ such craft Display of skill. Arthur speaks as though the beheading had been a conjuring trick.

475 For I haf sen a selly, I may not forsake."
 He glent upon Sir Gawen, and gaynly he sayde,
 "Now sir, heng up thyn ax,¹ that hatz innogh hewen."
 And hit watz don abof the dece on doser to henge,
 Ther alle men for mervayl myght on hit loke,
 480 And bi trwe tytel therof to telle the wonder.
 Thenne thay bowed to a borde thise burnes togeder,
 The kyng and the gode knyght, and kene men hem served
 Of alle dayntyez double, as derrest myght falle;
 Wyth alle maner of mete and mynstralcie bothe,
 485 Wyth wele walt thay that day, til worthed an ende in londe.
 Now thenk wel, Sir Gawan,
 For wothe that thou ne wonde
 This aventure for to frayn
 490 That thou hatz tan on honde.

FITT 2

This hanselle hatz Arthur of aventurus on fyrst
 In yonge yer, for he yerned yelpyng to here.
 Thagh hym wordez were wane² when thay to sete wenten,
 Now ar thay stoken of sturne werk, stafful her hond.
 495 Gawan watz glad to begynne those gomnez in halle,
 Bot thagh the ende be hevy haf ye no wonder;
 For thagh men ben mery quen thay han mayn drynk,
 A yere yernes ful yerne, and yeldez never lyke,
 The forme to the fynisment foldez ful selden.
 500 Forthi this Yol overyede, and the yere after,
 And uche sesoun serlepes sued after other:
 After Crystenmasse com the crabbed lentoun
 That fraystez flesch wyth the fysche and fode more symple;
 Bot thenne the weder of the worlde wyth wynter hit threpez,³ 505 Colde clengez adoun,⁴ cloudez upliften,
 Schyre schedez the rayn in schowrez ful warme,
 Fallez upon fayre flat, flowrez there schewen,
 Bothe groundez and the grevez grene ar her wedez,
 Bryddez busken to bylde, and bremlych syngen

475 For I have witnessed a marvel, I cannot deny."
 He glanced at Sir Gawain, and aptly he said,
 "Now sir, hang your axe up, for it has severed enough."
 And it was hung above the dais, on a piece of tapestry,
 Where everyone might gaze on it as a wonder,
 480 And the living proof of this marvelous tale.
 Then these two men together walked to a table,
 The king and the good knight, and were dutifully served
 With delicious double helpings befitting their rank.
 With every kind of food and minstrelsy 485 They spent that day joyfully, until daylight ended
 on earth.
 Now take good care, Gawain,
 Lest fear hold you back
 From leaving on the quest
 490 You have sworn to undertake.

PART 2

This wonder has Arthur as his first New Year's gift
 When the year was newborn, for he loved hearing challenges.
 Though words were wanting when they sat down at table,
 Now a grim task confronts them, their hands are cram-full.
 495 Gawain was glad enough to begin those games in the hall,
 But if the outcome prove troublesome don't be surprised;
 For though men are light-hearted when they have strong drink,
 A year passes swiftly, never bringing the same;
 Beginning and ending seldom take the same form.
 500 And so that Yule went by, and the year ensuing,
 Each season in turn following the other.
 After Christmas came mean-spirited Lent,
 That tries the body with fish and plainer nourishment;
 But then the weather on earth battles with winter,
 505 The cold shrinks downwards, clouds rise higher,
 And shed sparkling rain in warming showers,
 Falling on smiling plains where flowers unfold.
 Both open fields and woodlands put on green dress;
 Birds hasten to build, and rapturously sing

¹ heng up thyn ax Arthur gaynly or aptly quotes a proverbial saying, meaning "end your strife."

² wordez were wane Because the Green Knight had taken their breath away.

³ wyth wynter hit threpez The seasons do not simply follow each other quietly but fight for succession: see 525, where autumn wind wastelez with the sunne.

⁴ Colde clengez adoun Winter is driven down into the earth, waiting to emerge again.

510 For solace of the softe somer that sues thereafter
bi bonk;

And blossomez bolne to blowe

Bi rawez rych and ronk,

Then notez noble innoghe

515 Ar herde in wod so wolnk.

After the sesoun of somer wyth the soft wyndez,

Quen Zeferus¹ sylflez hymself on sedez and erbez,

Wela wyne is the wort that waxes theroute,

When the donkande dew dropez of the levez,

520 To bide a blyful blusch of the bryght sunne.

Bot then hyghes hervest, and hardenes hym sone,

Warnez hym for the wynter to wax ful rype.

He dryves wyth droght the dust for to ryse

Fro the face of the folde to flyghe ful hyghe;

525 Wrothe wynde of the welkyn wrastelez with the sunne,

The levez lancen fro the lynde and lyghten on the grounde,

And al grayes the gres that grene watz ere.

Thenne al rypez and rotez that ros upon fyrst,

And thus yirnez the yere in yisterdayez mony,

530 And wynter wyndez agayn, as the worlde askez,

no fage;

Til Meghelmas² mone

Watz cumen wyth wynter wage;

Then thenkkez Gawan ful sone

535 Of his anious vyage.

Yet quyl Al-hal-day³ with Arther he lenges;

And he made a fare on that fest for the frekez sake,

With much revel and ryche of the Rounde Table.

Knyghtez ful cortays and comlych ladies

540 Al for luf of that lede in longynge thay were,

Bot never the lece ne the later thay nevened bot merthe;

Mony joylez for that jentyle japez ther maden.

And after mete with mournyng he melez to his eme,

And spekez of his passage, and pertly he sayde,

545 "Now, lege lorde of my lyf, leve I yow ask;

Ye knowe the cost of this cace, kepe I no more

To telle yow tenez therof, never bot trifel;

Bot I am boun to the bur barely to-mome

To sech the gome of the grene, as God wyl me wysse."

550 Then the best of the burgh bowed togeder,

510 For joy of gentle summer that follows next on the slopes.

And flowers bud and blossom

In hedgerows rich with growth,

And many splendid songs

515 From woodlands echo forth.

Then comes the summer season with gentle winds,

When Zephyrus blows softly on seeding grasses and plants,

Beautiful is the growth that springs from the seed,

When the moistening dew drips from the leaves

520 To await a joyful gleam of the bright sun.

But then autumn comes quickly and urges it on,

Warns it to ripen before winter's approach.

Dry winds of autumn force the dust to fly

From the face of the earth high into the air;

525 Fierce winds of heaven wrestle with the sun,

Leaves are torn from the trees and fall to the ground,

And all withered is the grass that was green before.

Then all ripens and rots that had sprung up at first,

And in so many yesterdays the year wears away,

530 And winter comes round again, as custom requires,

in truth;

Until the Michaelmas moon

Brought hint of winter's frost;

And into Gawain's mind

535 Come thoughts of his grim quest.

Yet until All Saints' Day he lingers in court,

And Arthur made a feast on that day to honor the knight,

With much splendid revelry at the Round Table.

The most courteous of knights and beautiful ladies

540 Grieved out of love for that noble man,

But no less readily for that spoke as if unconcerned.

Many troubled for that nobleman made joking remarks.

And after the feast sorrowfully he addressed his uncle,

Raised the matter of his quest, and openly said,

545 "Liege lord of my being, I must ask for your leave;

You know the terms of this matter, and I have no wish

To bother you with them, saving one small point;

But tomorrow without fail I set out for the blow,

To seek this man in green, as God will direct me."

550 Then the noblest in the court gathered together,

¹ Zeferus God of the West Wind.

² Meghelmas I.e., Michaelmas, the feast of St. Michael, celebrated on 29 September.

³ Al-hal-day I.e., All Hallows' Day, or All Saints' Day, celebrated 1 November.

Aywan and Errik, and other ful mony,
 Sir Doddinaval de Savage, the duc of Clarence,
 Launcelot and Lyonel, and Lucan the gode,
 Sir Boos and Sir Bydver, big men bothe,
 555 And mony other menskful, with Mador de la Port.
 Alle this compayny of court com the kyng nerre
 For to counseyl the knyght, with care at her hert.
 There watz much derve doel driven in the sale
 That so worthé as Wawan schulde wende on that ernde, 560 To dryve a delful dynt, and dele no more wyth bronde.
 The knyght mad ay god chere,
 And sayde, "Quar schulde I wonde?
 Of destinés derf and dere
 565 What may mon do bot fonde?"

He dowellez ther al that day, and dressez on the morn,
 Askez erly hys armez, and alle were thay broght.
 Fyrst a tulé tapit tyght over the flet,
 And miche watz the gild gere that glent theralofte.
 570 The stif mon steppez theron, and the stel hondelez,
 Dubbed in a dublet of a dere tars,
 And sythen a crafty capados, closed aloft,
 That wyth a bryght blaunner was bounden withinne.
 Thenne set thay the sabatounz upon the segge fotez,
 575 His legez lapped in stel with luflych greves,
 With polaynez piched therto, policed ful clene,
 Aboute his knez knaged wyth knotez of golde;
 Queme quyssewes then, that coyntlych closed
 His thik thrawen thyghez, with thwonges to tachched;
 580 And sythen the brawdren bryné of bryght stel rynggez
 Umbeweved that wygh upon wlonk stufte,
 And wel bornyst brace upon his bothe armes,
 With gode cowters and gay, and glovez of plate,
 And alle the godlych gere that hym gayn schulde
 585 that tyde;
 Wyth ryche cote-armure
 His gold sporez spend with pryde,
 Gurde wyth a bront ful sure
 With silk sayn umbe his syde.

590 When he watz hasped in armes, his harnays watz ryche:
 The lest lachet other loupe lemed of golde.
 So harnayst as he watz he herknez his masse,
 Offred and honoured at the heghe auter.
 Sythen he come to the kyng and to his cort-ferez,

Ywain and Eric, and many others,
 Sir Dodinal le Sauvage, the duke of Clarence,
 Lancelot and Lionel, and Lucan the good,
 Sir Bors and Sir Bedevere, both powerful men, 555 And several other worthy knights, including Mador de la Port.
 This group of courtiers approached the king,
 To give advice to Gawain with troubled hearts.
 Much deep sorrowing was heard in the hall
 That one as noble as Gawain should go on that quest, 560 To stand a terrible blow, and never more brandish his sword.
 Keeping an unchanged face,
 "What should I fear?" he said;
 "For whether kind or harsh 565 A man's fate must be tried."

He stays there all that day, and makes ready the next,
 Calls early for his accouterment, and all was brought in.
 First a crimson carpet was stretched over the floor,
 A heap of gilded armor gleaming brightly piled there.
 570 The brave knight steps on it and examines his armour,
 Dressed in a costly doublet of silk
 Under a well-made capados, fastened at the top
 And trimmed with white ermine on the inside.
 Then they fitted metal shoes upon the knight's feet,
 575 Clasped his legs in steel with elegant greaves
 With knee-pieces attached to them, highly polished
 And fastened to his knees with knots of gold.
 Next fine cuisses that neatly enclosed
 His thick muscular thighs, with thongs attached, 580 And then the linked mail-shirt made of bright steel rings
 Covered that man and his beautiful clothes:
 Well burnished braces on both his arms,
 With fine elbow-pieces and gloves of steel plate,
 And all the splendid equipment that would benefit him 585 at that time;
 With costly coat-armor,
 His gold spurs worn with pride,
 Girt with a trusty sword,
 A silk belt round him tied.

590 All locked in his armor his gear looked noble:
 The smallest fastening or loop was gleaming with gold.
 In armor as he was, he went to hear mass
 Offered and celebrated at the high altar.
 Then he comes to the king and his fellows at court,

595 Lachez lufly his leve at lordez and ladyez;
 And thay him kyst and conveyed, bikende hym to Kryst.
 Bi that watz Gryngolet grayth, and gurdy with a sadel
 That glemed ful gayly with mony golde frenges,
 Ayquere naylet ful nwe, for that note ryched;
 600 The brydel barred aboute, with bryght golde bounden,
 The apparayl of the paytture and of the proude skyrtez,
 The cropore and the covertor, acorde wyth the arsounnez;
 And al watz rayled on red ryche golde naylez,
 That al glytered and glent as glem of the sunne.
 605 Thenne hentes he the helme, and hastily hit kysses,
 That watz stapled stifly, and stoffed wythinne.
 Hit watz hyghe on his hede, hasped bihynde,
 Wyth a lyghtly uryoun over the aventayle,
 Enbrawden and bounden wyth the best gemmez
 610 On brode sylkyn borde, and bryddez on semez,
 As papjaye paynted pervyng bitwene,
 Tortors and trulofez entayled so thyk
 As mony burde theraboute had ben seven wynter in toun.
 615 The cercle watz more o prys
 That umbeclypped hys croun,
 Of diamauntez a devys
 That bothe were bryght and broun.¹

Then thay schewed hym the schelde, that was of schyr goulez, 620 Wyth the pentangel depaynt of pure gold hwez.
 He braydez hit by the bauderyk, aboute the hals kestes,
 That bisemed the segge semlyly fayre.
 And quy the pentangel apendez to that prynde noble
 I am in tent yow to telle, thof tary hyt me schulde:
 625 Hit is a syngne that Salomon set sumquyle
 In bytoknyng of trawthe, bi tytle that hit habbez,
 For hit is a figure that haldez fyve poyntez,
 And uche lyne umbelappez and loukez in other,
 And ayquere hit is endelez; and Englych hit callen
 630 Overal, as I here, the endeles knot.²
 Forthy hit acordez to this knyght and to his cler armez,
 For ay faythful in fyve and sere fyve sythez
 Gawan watz for gode knawen, and as golde pured,
 Voyded of uche vylany, wyth vertuez ennoured
 635 in mote;

595 Graciously takes his leave of lords and ladies;
 And they kissed and escorted him, commending him to Christ.
 By then Gringolet was ready, fitted with a saddle
 That splendidly shone with many gold fringes,
 Newly studded all over for that special purpose;
 600 The bridle striped all along, and trimmed with bright gold;
 The adornment of the trapping and the fine saddle-skirts,
 The crupper and the horse-cloth matched the saddle-bows,
 All covered with gold studs on a background of red,
 So that the whole glittered and shone like the sun.
 605 Then Gawain seizes his helmet and kisses it quickly,
 That was strongly stapled and padded inside.
 It stood high on his head, fastened at the back
 With a shining silk band over the mailed neck-guard,
 Embroidered and studded with the finest gems
 610 On a broad border of silk with birds covering the seams—
 Popinjays depicted between periwinkles,
 Turtledoves and true-love flowers embroidered so thick
 As if many women had worked on it seven years in town.
 615 A circlet still more precious
 Was ringed about his head,
 Made with perfect diamonds
 Of every brilliant shade.

Then they brought out the shield of shining gules,
 620 With the pentangle painted on it in pure gold.
 He swings it over his baldric, throws it round his neck,
 Where it suited the knight extremely well.
 And why the pentangle should befit that noble prince
 I intend to explain, even should that delay me.
 625 It is a symbol that Solomon designed long ago
 As an emblem of fidelity, and justly so;
 For it is a figure consisting of five points,
 Where each line overlaps and locks into another,
 And the whole design is continuous, and in England is called 630 Everywhere, I am told, the endless knot.
 Therefore it suits this knight and his shining arms,
 For always faithful in five ways, and five times in each case,
 Gawain was reputed as virtuous, like refined gold,
 Devoid of all vice, and with all courtly virtues 635 adorned.

¹ bryght and broun Clear and colored.

² the endeles knot No other use of this phrase is known. Like the poet's claim to have heard the story recited, and his closing of reference to its place in the best boke of romaunce, 2521, the remark should probably be regarded as poetic license. The line does not alliterate.

Forthy the pentangel nwe
 He ber in schelde and cote,
 As tulk of tale most trwe
 And gentylest knyght of lote.

40 Fyrst he watz funden fautlez in his fyve wyttez,
 And eft fayled never the freke in his fyve fynghes,
 And alle his afaunce upon folde watz in the fyve woundez
 That Cryst caght on the croys, as the crede tellez;
 And quere-so-ever thys mon in melly watz stad,
 545 His thro thought watz in that, thurgh alle other thynges,
 That alle his forsnes he feng at the fyve joyez
 That the hende heven-quene had of hir chylde;
 At this cause the knyght comlyche hade
 In the inore half of his schelde hir image depaynted, 550 That quen he blusched therto his belde never payred.
 The fyft fyve that I fynde that the frek used
 Watz fraunchyse and felaghschyp forbe al thyng,
 His clannes and his cortaysye croked were never,
 And pité,¹ that passez alle poyntez: thyse pure fyve
 555 Were harder happed on that hathel then on any other.
 Now alle these fyve sythez, for sothe, were fetled on this
 knyght,
 And uchone halched in other, that non ende hade,
 And fyched upon fyve poyntez, that fayld never,
 Ne samned never in no syde, ne sundred nouthen,
 560 Withouten ende at any noke I oquere fynde, Whereever the gomen bygan, or glod to an ende.
 Therefore on his schene schelde schapen watz the knot
 Ryally wyth red golde upon rede gowlez,
 That is the pure pentaungel wyth the peple called 665 with lore.
 Now graythed is Gawan gay,
 And laght his launce ryght thore,
 And gef them alle goud day,
 He wende for evermore.

670 He sperres the sted with the spurez and sprong on his way,
 So stif that the ston-fyr stroke out thereafter.
 Al that sey that semly syked in hert,
 And sayde sothly² al same segges til other,
 Carande for that comly, "Bi Kryst, hit is scathe 675 That thou leude, schal be lost, that art of lyf noble!

So this new-painted sign
 He bore on shield and coat,
 As man most true of speech
 And fairest-spoken knight.

640 First he was judged perfect in his five senses,
 And next his five fingers never lost their dexterity;
 And all his earthly faith was in the five wounds
 That Christ suffered on the cross, as the creed declares.
 And wherever this man found himself in battle
 645 His fixed thought was that, above all other things,
 All his fortitude should come from the five joys
 That the mild Queen of Heaven found in her child.
 For this reason the gracious knight had
 Her image depicted on the inside of his shield, 650 So that when he glanced at it his heart never quailed.
 The fifth group of five the man respected, I hear,
 Was generosity and love of fellow-men above all;
 His purity and courtesy were never lacking,
 And surpassing the others, compassion: these noble five 655 Were more deeply implanted in that man than any other.
 Now truly, all these five groups were embodied in that knight,
 Each one linked to the others in an endless design,
 Based upon five points that was never unfinished,
 Not uniting in one line nor separating either;
 660 Without ending anywhere at any point that I find,
 No matter where the line began or ran to an end.
 Therefore the knot was fashioned on his bright shield
 Royally with red gold upon red gules,
 That is called the true pentangle by learned people 665 who know.
 Now Gawain, lance in hand,
 Is ready to depart;
 He bade them all farewell,
 Not to return, he thought.

670 He set spurs to his horse and sprang on his way
 So vigorously that sparks flew up from the stones.
 All who watched that fair knight leave sighed from the heart,
 And together whispered one to another,
 Distressed for that handsome one, "What a pity indeed 675 That your life must be squandered, noble as you are!

¹ pité Cannot readily be translated in one word, as it means both pity and piety.

² sothly A dialect term meaning "quietly."

To fynde hys fere upon folde, in fayth, is not ethe.
 Warloker to haf wroght had more wyt bene,
 And haf dyght yonder dere a duk to have worthed;
 A lowande leder of ledez in londe hym wel semez,
 680 And so had better haf ben then britned to noght,
 Hadet wyth an alvisch mon, for angardez pryde.
 Who knew ever any kyng such counsel to take
 As knyghtez in cavelaciounz on Crystmasse gomnez!"
 Wel much watz the warme water that waltered of yghen, 685 When that semly syre soght fro tho wonez
 thad daye.
 He made non abode,
 Bot wyghtly went hys way;
 Mony wylsum way he rode,
 690 The bok as I herde say.

Now ridez this renk thurgh the ryalme of Logres,¹
 Sir Gawan, on Godez halve, thagh hym no gomen thoght.
 Oft leudlez and alone he lengez on nyghtez
 Ther he fonde noght hym byfore the fare that he lyked.
 695 Hade he no fere bot his fole by frythez and dounez,
 Ne no gome bot God bi gate wyth to carp,
 Til that he neghed ful neghe into the Northe Walez.
 Alle the iles of Anglesay on lyft half he haldez,
 And farez over the fordez by the forlondez,
 700 Over at the Holy Hede, til he hade eft bonk
 In the wyldrenesse of Wyrale; wonde ther bot lyte
 That auther God other gome wyth goud hert lovied.
 And ay he frayned as he ferde, at frekez that he met,
 If thay hade herde any karp of a knyght grene,
 705 In any grounde therabout, of the grene chapel;
 And al nykked hym wyth nay, that never in her lyve
 Thay seye never no segge that watz of suche hwez of grene.
 The knyght tok gates straunge
 710 In mony a bonk unbene,
 His cher ful oft con chaunge
 That chapel er he myght sene.

Many klyf he overclambe in contrayez straunge,
 Fer floten fro his frendez fremedly he rydez.
 715 At uche warthe other water ther the wyghe passed
 He fonde a foo hym byfore, bot ferly hit were,
 And that so foule and so felle that feght hym byhode.

To find his equal on earth is not easy, in faith.
 To have acted more cautiously would have been much wiser,
 And have appointed that dear man to become a duke:
 To be a brilliant leader of men, as he is well suited,
 680 And would better have been so than battered to nothing,
 Beheaded by an ogrish man out of excessive pride.
 Whoever knew a king to take such foolish advice
 As knights offer in arguments about Christmas games?"
 A great deal of warm water trickled from eyes 685 When that elegant lord set out from the city that day.
 He did not linger there,
 But swiftly went his way;
 Taking perplexing roads
 690 As I have heard books say.

Now rides this knight through the realm of England,
 Sir Gawain, in God's name, though he found it no pleasure.
 Often friendless and alone he passes his nights,
 Finding before him no food that he liked.
 695 He had no fellow but his horse by forest and hill,
 And no one but God to talk to on the way,
 Until he came very close to the north part of Wales.
 All the islands of Anglesey he keeps on his left,
 And crosses over the fords at the headlands,
 700 There at the Holyhead, and came ashore again
 In the wilderness of Wirral. There few people lived Whom either God or good-hearted men could love.
 And always as he rode he asked those whom he met
 If they had heard anyone speak of a green knight 705 Or of a green chapel in any place round about;
 And they all answered him no, that never in their lives
 Had they ever seen a man who had such color of green.
 Strange roads the knight pursued 710 Through many a dreary space,
 Turning from side to side
 To find the meeting-place.

Many fells he climbed over in territory strange,
 Far distant from his friends like an alien he rides.
 715 At every ford or river where the knight crossed
 He found an enemy facing him, unless he was in luck,
 And so ugly and fierce that he was forced to give fight.

¹ Logres Celtic name for England.

So many mervayl bi mount ther the mon fyndez,
 Hit were to tore for to telle of the tenthe dole.
 Sumwhyle wyth wormez he werrez, and with wolves als,
 Sumwhyle wyth wodwos that woned in the knarrez,
 Bothe wyth bullez and berez, and borez otherquyle,
 And etaynez that hym aneled of the heghe felle;
 Nade he ben dughty and dryghe, and Dryghtyn had served,
 Douteles he hade ben ded and dreped ful ofte.
 For werre wrathed hym not so much that wynter nas wors,
 When the colde cler water fro the cloudez schadde,
 And fres er hit falle myght to the fale erthe.
 Ner slayn wyth the slete he sleped in his ynes
 Mo nyghtez then innoghe in naked rokkez,
 Ther as claterande fro the crest the colde borne rennez,
 And henged heghe over his hede in hard iisse-ikkles.
 Thus in peryl and payne and plytes ful harde
 Bi contray caryez this knyght, tyl Krystmasse even,
 al one;
 The knyght wel that tyde
 To Mary made his mone,
 That ho hym red to ryde
 And wysse hym to sum wone.

Bi a mounte on the morne meryly he rydes
 Into a forest ful dep, that ferly watz wylde; Highe hillez on uche a halve, and holtwodez under
 Of hore okez ful hoge a hundreth togeder;
 The hasel and the haghthorne were harled al samen,
 With roghe raged mosse rayled aywhere,
 With mony bryddez unblythe upon bare twyges,
 That pitosly ther piped for pyne of the colde.
 The gome upon Gryngolet glydez hem under,
 Thurgh mony misy and myre, mon al hym one,
 Carande for his costes, lest he ne kever schulde
 To se the servyse of that syre, that on that self nyght
 Of a burde watz borne, our baret to quelle;
 And therefore sykyng he sayde, "I beseche the, lorde,
 And Mary, that is myldest moder so dere,
 Of sum herber ther heghly I myght here masse,
 And thy matyne¹ to-morne, mekely I ask,
 And therto prestly I pray my pater and ave and crede."

¹ matyne I.e., matins, morning prayer, but here a church service specifically devoted to Mary as the mother of Jesus Christ ("matins of the blessed Virgin Mary").

So many wonders befell him in the hills,
 It would be tedious to recount the least part of them.
 Sometimes he fights dragons, and wolves as well,
 Sometimes with wild men who dwelt among the crags;
 Both with bulls and with bears, and at other times boars,
 And ogres who chased him across the high fells.
 Had he not been valiant and resolute, trusting in God,
 He would surely have died or been killed many times.
 For fighting troubled him less than the rigorous winter,
 When cold clear water fell from the clouds
 And froze before it could reach the faded earth.
 Half dead with the cold Gawain slept in his armor
 More nights than enough among the bare rocks,
 Where splashing from the hilltops the freezing stream runs,
 And hung over his head in hard icicles.
 Thus in danger, hardship and continual pain
 This knight rides across the land until Christmas Eve
 alone.
 Earnestly Gawain then Prayed Mary that she send Him guidance to some place
 Where he might lodging find.
 Over a hill in the morning in splendor he rides
 Into a dense forest, wondrously wild;
 High slopes on each side and woods at their base
 Of massive grey oaks, hundreds growing together;
 Hazel and hawthorn were densely entangled,
 Thickly festooned with coarse shaggy moss,
 Where many miserable birds on the bare branches
 Wretchedly piped for torment of the cold.
 The knight on Gringolet hurries under the trees,
 Through many a morass and swamp, a solitary figure,
 Troubled about his plight, lest he should be unable To attend mass for that lord who on that same night
 Was born of a maiden, our suffering to end;
 And therefore sighing he prayed, "I beg of you, Lord,
 And Mary, who is gentlest mother so dear,
 For some lodging where I might devoutly hear mass
 And your matins tomorrow, humbly I ask;
 And to this end promptly repeat my Pater and Ave and Creed."²

² Pater ... Creed Pater Latin: Father, i.e., "The Lord's Prayer" ("Our Father, who art in Heaven ..."); Ave Latin: Hail, i.e., Ave Maria ("Hail Mary"); Creed Latin: I believe ("The Creed").

He rode in his prayere,
 And cryed for his mysdede,
 He sayned hym in sythes sere,¹
 And sayde, "Cros Kryst me spedel!"

 Nade he sayned hymself, segge, bot thrye,
 Er he watz war in the wod of a wone in a mote,
 765 Abof a launde, on a lawe, loken under boghez
 Of mony borelych bole aboute bi the diche:
 A castle the comlokest that ever knyght aghte,
 Pyched on a prayere, a park al aboute,
 With a pyked palays pynded ful thik,
 770 That umbeteye mony tre mo then two myle.
 That holde on that on syde the hathel avysed
 As hit schemered and schon² thurgh the schyre okez;
 Thenne hatz he hendly of his helme, and heghly he thonkez
 Jesus and sayn Gilyan,³ that gentyle ar bothe, 775 That cortaysly had hym kydde, and his cry herkened.
 "Now bone hostel,"⁴ cothe the burne, "I beseche yow yette!"
 Thenne gerdez he to Gryngolet with the gilt helez,
 And he ful chauncely hatz chosen to the chef gate,
 That broght bremlly the burne to the bryge ende 780 in haste.
 The bryge watz breme upbrayde,
 The gatez were stoken faste,
 The wallez were wel arayed
 Hit dut no wyndez blaste.

785 The burne bode on blonk, that on bonk hoked
 Of the depe double dich that drof to the place;
 The walle wod in the water wonderly depe,
 And eft a ful huge heght hit haied upon lofte
 Of harde hewen ston up to the tablez,
 790 Enbaned under the abataylment in the best lawe;
 And sythen garytez ful gaye gered bitwene,
 Wyth mony luflych loupe that louked ful clene:
 A better barbican that burne blusched upon never.
 And innermore he behelde that halle ful hyghe, 795 Towres telded bytwene, trochet ful thik,
 Fayre fyllyolez that fyghed, and ferlyly long,

Bewailing his misdeeds,
 760 And praying as he rode,
 He often crossed himself
 Crying, "Prosper me, Christ's cross!"

Hardly had he crossed himself, that man, three times,
 Before he caught sight through the trees of a moated building
 765 Standing over a field, on a mound, surrounded by boughs
 Of many a massive tree-trunk enclosing the moat:
 The most splendid castle ever owned by a knight,
 Set on a meadow, a park all around,
 Closely guarded by a spiked palisade
 770 That encircled many trees for more than two miles.
 That side of the castle Sir Gawain surveyed
 As it shimmered and shone through the fine oaks;
 Then graciously takes off his helmet, and devoutly thanks
 Jesus and St. Julian, who kindly are both, 775 Who had treated him courteously, and listened to his prayer.
 "Now good lodging," said the man, "I beg you to grant!"
 Then he urged Gringolet forward with his gilt spurs,
 And by good chance happened upon the main path
 That led the knight directly to the end of the drawbridge 780 with speed.
 The bridge was drawn up tight,
 The gates were bolted fast.
 The walls were strongly built,
 They feared no tempest's blast.

785 The knight sat on his horse, pausing on the slope
 Of the deep double ditch that surrounded the place.
 The wall stood in the water incredibly deep,
 And then soared up above an astonishing height,
 Made of squared stone up to the cornice,
 790 With coursings under battlements in the latest style.
 At intervals splendid watch-towers were placed,
 With many neat loop-holes that could be tightly shut:
 Better outworks of a castle the knight had never seen.
 Further inside he noticed a lofty hall
 795 With towers set at intervals, richly ornate,
 Splendid pinnacles fitted into them, wonderfully tall,

¹ in sythes sere Every time he prayed.

² hit schemered and schon See also that blenked ful quyte, 799.

³ sayn Gilyan I.e., St. Julian, patron saint of hospitality.

⁴ bone hostel "Good lodging," a traditional invocation to St. Julian.

With corvon coprounez craftyly sleghe.¹
 Chalkwhyte chymnees ther ches he innoghe²
 Upon bastel rovez, that blenked ful quyte;
 So many pynakle paynted watz poudred ayquere,
 Among the castel carnelez clambred so thik
 That pared out of papure³ purely hit semed.
 The fre freke on the fole hit fayre innoghe thocht,
 If he myght kever to com the cloyster wythinne,
 To herber in that hostel whyl halyday lested, avinant.

He calde, and son ther com
 A porter pure plesant,
 On the wal his ernde he nome,
 And haylsed the knyght erraunt.

"Gode sir," quoth Gawan, "woldez thou go myn ernde,
 To the hegh lorde of this hous, herber to crave?"
 "Ye, Peter,"⁴ quoth the porter, "and purely I trowee
 That ye be, wyghe, welcum to wone quyle yow lykez."
 Then yede the wyghe yerne and com agayn swythe,
 And folke frely hym wyth, to fonge the knyght.
 Thay let down the grete draght and derely out yeden,
 And kneled down on her knes upon the colde erthe
 To welcum this ilk wygh as worthy hom thoght;
 Thay yolden hym the brode gate, yarked up wyde,
 And he hem raysed rekenly, and rod over the brygge.
 Sere segges hym sesed by sadel, quel he lyght,
 And sythen stabled his stede stif men innoghe.
 Knyghtez and swyerez comen down thenne
 For to bryng this buerne wyth blys into halle;
 Quen he hef up his helme, ther hyghed innoghe
 For to hent it at his honde, the hende to serven;
 His bronde and his blasoun both thay token.
 Then haylsed he ful hendly tho hatelez uchone,
 And mony proud mon ther presed that prynce to honour.
 Alle hasped in his hegh wede to halle thay hym wonnen,

¹ craftyly sleghe The castle architecture abounds with craftsmanship. Sleghe, meaning skillful, intricate, subtle, is a term of some significance in the poem. Gawain's fellow-guests hope to see sleghtez of thewez, 916, skillful displays of good manners; and after creeping into his bedchamber the lady calls him a sleper unslyghe, 1209 or unwary, a related term. On being told that he cannot be killed for slyght upon erthe, 1854, while wearing the belt, Gawain tells himself that such a sleght were noble, 1858. Here the word shades off towards modern "sleight," with overtones of trickery or deceit appropriate to Topped by carved crocketing, skillfully worked.

 Chalk-white chimneys he saw there without number
 On the roofs of the towers, that brilliantly shone.
 So many painted pinnacles were scattered everywhere,
 Thickly clustered among the castle's embrasures,
 That, truly, the building seemed cut out of paper.
 To the noble on the horse it was an attractive thought
 That he might gain entrance into the castle,
 To lodge in that building during the festival days
 at his ease.
 A cheerful porter came
 In answer to his shout,
 Who stationed on the wall
 Greeted the questing knight.

"Good sir," said Gawain, "will you carry my message To the master of this house, to ask for lodging?"
 "Yes, by St. Peter," said the porter, "and I truly believe That you are welcome, sir, to stay as long as you please."
 Then the man went speedily and quickly returned,
 Bringing others with him, to welcome the knight.
 They lowered the great drawbridge and graciously came out,
 Kneeling down on their knees upon the cold ground
 To welcome this knight in the way they thought fit.
 They gave him passage through the broad gate, set open wide,
 And he courteously bade them rise, and rode over the bridge.
 Several men held his saddle while he dismounted,
 And then strong men in plenty stabled his horse.
 Knights and squires came down then
 To escort this man joyfully into the hall.
 When Gawain took off his helmet, several jumped forward
 To receive it from his hand, serving that prince.
 His sword and his shield they took from him both.
 Then he greeted politely every one of these knights,
 And many proud men pressed forward to honor that noble.
 Still dressed in his armor they brought him into hall,

the story. But many passages of the poem illustrate the poet's fondness for the elaborate craftsmanship or wylyde werke that is evident in his own writing, particularly in the entrelacement of Part 3.

² ches he innoghe He saw enough of them, meaning there were very many.

³ papure Paper, a word newly introduced into English, perhaps by the poet.

⁴ Peter I.e., St. Peter, one of Christ's twelve apostles and, traditionally, the gate-keeper of Heaven.

Ther fayre fyre upon flet fersly brenned.
 Thenne the lorde of the lede loutez fro his chambre
 For to mete wyth menske the mon on the flor;
 835 He sayde, "Ye ar welcum to welde as yow lykez
 That here is: al is yowre awen, to have at yowre wyll and welde."

"Graunt mercy," quoth Gawayn,
 "Ther Kryst hit yow foryelde."

840 As frekez that semed fayn
 Ayther other in armez con felde.

Gawan glynte on the gome that godly hym gret,
 And thught hit a bolde burne that the burgh aghte;
 A hoge hathel for the nonez, and of hyghe eldee;
 845 Brode, bryght, watz his berde, and al bever-hwed,
 Sturne, stif on the stryththe on stalworth schonkez,
 Felle face as the fyre, and fre of hys speche,
 And wel hym semed, for sothe, as the segge thught,
 To lede a lortschyp in lee of leudez ful gode.
 850 The lorde hym charred to a chambre, and cheffy cumaundez
 To delyver hym a leude, hym lowly to serve;
 And there were boun at his bode burnez innoghe,
 That broght hym to a bryght boure, ther beddyng was
 noble,

Of cortynes of clere sylk wyth cler golde hemmez,
 855 And covertorez ful curious with comlych paner
 Of bryght blaunner above, enbrawdred bisydez,
 Rudelez rennande on ropez, red golde rynges,
 Tapitez tyght to the wowe of tuly and tars,
 And under fete, on the flet, of folyande sute.

860 Ther he watz dispoyled, wyth speches of myerthe,
 The burne of his bruny and of his bryght wedez.
 Ryche robes ful rad renkkez hym broghten,
 For to charge and to chaunge, and chose of the best.
 Sone as he on hent, and happed therinne,
 865 That sete on hym semly wyth saylande skyrtez,
 The ver by his visage verayly hit semed
 Welnegh to uche hathel, alle on hwes
 Lowande and lufly alle his lymmez under,
 That a comloker knyght never Kryst made,
 870 hem thoght.

Whethen in worlde he were,
 Hit semed as he moght

Where a blazing fire was fiercely burning.
 Then the lord of that company comes down from his chamber,
 To show his respect by meeting Gawain there.

835 He said, "You are welcome to do as you please With everything here: all is yours, to have and command as you wish."

Said Gawain, "Thanks indeed, Christ repay your noblesse."

840 Like men overjoyed
 Each hugged the other close.

Gawain studied the man who greeted him courteously,
 And thought him a bold one who governed the castle,
 A great-sized knight indeed, in the prime of life;
 845 Broad and glossy was his beard, all reddish-brown,
 Stern-faced, standing firmly on powerful legs;
 With a face fierce as fire, and noble in speech,
 Who truly seemed capable, it appeared to Gawain,
 Of being master of a castle with outstanding knights.
 850 The lord led him to a chamber and quickly orders
 A man to be assigned to him, humbly to serve;
 And several attendants stood ready at his command
 Who took him to a fine bedroom with marvelous bedding;

Curtains of pure silk with shining gold borders,
 855 And elaborate coverlets with splendid facing
 Of bright ermine on top, embroidered all around;
 Curtains on golden rings, running on cords,
 Walls covered with hangings from Tharsia and Toulouse
 And underfoot on the floor of a matching kind.

860 There he was stripped, with joking remarks,
 That knight, of his mail-shirt and his fine clothes.
 Men hurried to bring him costly robes
 To choose from the best of them, change and put on.
 As soon as he took one and dressed himself in it,
 865 Which suited him well with its flowing skirts,
 Almost everyone truly supposed from his looks
 That spring had arrived in all its colors;
 His limbs so shining and attractive under his clothes
 That a handsomer knight God never made, 870 it seemed.

Wherever he came from,
 He must be, so they thought,

Be prynce withouten pere
In felde ther felle men foght.

A prince unparalleled
In field where warriors fought.

375 A cheyer¹ byfore the chemné, ther charcole brenned,
Watz grathed for Sir Gawan graythely with clothez,
Whyssynes upon queldepyntes that koynt wer bothe;
And thenne a meré mantyle watz on that mon cast
Of a broun bleaunt, enbrauded ful ryche
880 And fayre furred wythinne with fellez of the best,
Alle of ermyne in erde, his hode of the same;
And he sette in that settel semlych ryche,
And achaufed hym chefly, and thenne his cher mended.
Sone watz telded up a tabil on trestez ful fayre,
885 Clad wyth a clene clothe that cler quyt schewed,
Sanap, and salure, and sylverin sponez.
The wyghe wesche at his wylle and went to his mete:
Seggez hym served semly innoghe,
Wyth sere sewes and sete, sesounde of the best,
900 Double-felde, as hit fallez, and fele kyn fischez,²
Summe baken in bred, summe brad on the gleden,
Summe sothen, summe in sewe sавered with spyces,
And ay sawes so sleghe that the segge lyked.
The freke calde hit a fest ful frely and ofte 895 Ful hendely, quen alle the hatheles rehayted hym at onez, as hende,
"This penaunce now ye take,
And eft hit schal amende."
That mon much merthe con make,
900 For wyn in his hed that wende.

875 A chair before the fireplace where charcoal glowed
Was made ready with coverings for Gawain at once:
Cushions set on quilted spreads, both skilfully made,
And then a handsome robe was thrown over the man
Made of rich brown material, with embroidery rich, 880 And well fur-lined inside with the very best pelts,
All of ermine in fact, with a matching hood.
Becomingly rich in attire he sat in that chair,
Quickly warmed himself, and then his expression softened.
Soon a table was deftly set up on trestles,
885 Spread with a fine tablecloth, brilliantly white,
With overcloth and salt-cellar, and silver spoons.
When he was ready Gawain washed and sat down to his meal.
Men served him with every mark of respect,
With many excellent dishes, wonderfully seasoned,
890 In double portions, as is fitting, and all kinds of fish:
Some baked in pastry, some grilled over coals,
Some boiled, some in stews flavored with spices,
Always with subtle sauces that the knight found tasty.
Many times he graciously called it a feast, 895 Courteously when the knights all urged him together, as polite,
"Accept this penance now,
Soon you'll be better fed."
Gawain grew full of mirth
900 As wine went to his head.

Thenne watz spyed and spured upon spare wyse
Bi prevé poyntez of that prynce, put to hymselfen,
That he biknew cortaysly of the court that he were
That athel Arthure the hende haldez hym one, 905 That is the ryche ryal kyng of the Rounde Table,
And hit watz Wawen hymself that in that won syttez,
Comen to that Krystmasse, as case hym then lympted.
When the lorde hade lerned that he the leude hade,
Loude laghed he therat, so lef hit hym thoght,

Then he was tactfully questioned and asked
By discreet enquiry addressed to that prince,
So that he must politely admit he belonged to the court
Which noble Arthur, that gracious man, rules alone, 905 Who is the great and royal king of the Round Table;
And that it was Gawain himself who was sitting there,
Having arrived there at Christmas, as his fortune chanced.
When the lord of the castle heard who was his guest,
He laughed loudly at the news, so deeply was he pleased;

¹ A cheyer Chairs were relatively rare, and to be given one was a mark of respect. The usual form of seat is indicated by the Green Knight's reference to knights about on this bench, 280, and by Gawain's request for permission to boghe fro this benche, 344.

² fele kyn fischez Many kinds of fish. Because Christmas Eve is a fast-day, no red meat is served. The meal is jokingly referred to as penance, 897, and Gawain is promised something better on the next day, 898.

910 And alle the men in that mote maden much joye
 To apere in his presense prestly that tyme,
 That alle prys and prowes and pured thewes¹
 Apendes to hys persoun, and praysed is ever;
 Byfore alle men upon molde his mensk is the most.

915 Uch segge ful softly sayde to his fere:
 "Now schal we semlych se sleghtez of thewez
 And the teccheles termes of talkyng noble,
 Wich spede is in speche unspurd may we lerne,²
 Syn we haf fonged that fyne fader of nurture.
 920 God hatz geven us his grace godly for sothe,
 That such a gest as Gawan grauntez us to have,
 When burnez blythe of his burthe schal sitte and synge.

In menyng of manerez mere 925 This burne now schal us bryng,
 I hope that may hym here
 Schal lerne of luf-talkyng."

Bi that the diner watz done and the dere up
 Hit watz negh at the nyght neghed the tyme.
 930 Chaplaynez to the chapeles chosen the gate,
 Rungen ful rychely, ryght as thay schulden,
 To the hersum evensong of the hyghe tyde.
 The lorde loutes therto, and the lady als,
 Into a cumly closet coyntly ho entrez.
 935 Gawan glydez ful gay and gos theder sone;
 The lorde laches hym by the lappe and ledez hym to sytte,
 And couthly hym knowez and callez hym his nome,
 And sayde he watz the welcomest wyghe of the worlde;
 And he hym thonkked throly, and ayther halched other,
 940 And seten soberly samen the servise quyle.
 Thenne lyst the lady to loke on the knyght,
 Thenne com ho of hir closet with mony cler burdez.
 Ho watz the fayrest in felle,³ of flesche and of lyre,
 And of compas and colour and costes, of all other,
 945 And wener then Wenore, as the wyght thoght.
 Ho ches thurgh the chaunsel to cheryche that hende:
 An other lady hir lad bi the lyft honde,
 That watz alder then ho, an auncian hit semed,
 And heghly honowred with hathelz aboute.

¹ alle prys ... pured thewes Great excellence, military valor, and refined manners.

² Wich spede ... may we lerne We may learn without asking what success in conversation consists of.

910 And all the men in the castle were overjoyed
 To make the acquaintance quickly then
 Of the man to whom all excellence and valor belongs,
 Whose refined manners are everywhere praised,
 And whose fame exceeds any other person's on earth.

915 Each knight whispered to his companion,
 "Now we shall enjoy seeing displays of good manners,
 And the irreproachable terms of noble speech;
 The art of conversation we can learn unasked,
 Since we have taken in the source of good breeding.

920 Truly, God has been gracious to us indeed,
 In allowing us to receive such a guest as Gawain, Whose birth men will happily sit down and celebrate in song.

In knowledge of fine manners
 925 This man has expertise;
 I think that those who hear him
 Will learn what love-talk is."

When dinner was finished and Gawain had risen,
 The time had drawn on almost to night:
 930 Chaplains made their way to the castle chapels,
 Rang their bells loudly, just as they should,
 For devout evensong on that holy occasion.
 The lord makes his way there, and his lady too,
 Who gracefully enters a finely carved pew.
 935 Gawain hastens there, smartly dressed, and quickly arrives;
 The lord takes him by the sleeve and leads him to a seat,
 And greets him familiarly, calling him by his name,
 And said he was the welcomest guest in the world.
 Gawain thanked him heartily, and the two men embraced,
 940 And sat gravely together while the service lasted.
 Then the lady wished to set eyes on the knight
 And left her pew with many fair women.
 She was the loveliest on earth in complexion and features,
 In figure, in coloring and behavior above all others,
 945 And more beautiful than Guenevere, it seemed to the knight.
 She came through the chancel to greet him courteously,
 Another lady leading her by the left hand,
 Who was older than she, an aged one it seemed,
 And respectfully treated by the assembled knights.

³ the fayrest in felle Literally, the most beautiful in skin.

50 Bot unlyke on to loke tho ladyes were,
 For if the yonge watz yep, yolwe watz that other;
 Riche red on that on rayled ayquere,
 Rugh ronkled chekez that other on rolled;
 Kerhofes of that on, wyth mony cler perlez,
 55 Hir brest and hir bryght throte bare displayed,
 Schon schyrer then snawe that schedez on hillez;
 That other wyth a gorger watz gered over the swyre,
 Chymbled over hir blake chyn with chalkquyte vayles,
 Hir frount folden in sylk, enfoubled ayquere,
 60 Toretred and treleted with tryfles aboute,
 That noght watz bare of that burde bot the blake browes,
 The tweyne yghen and the nase, the naked lyppez,
 And those were soure to se and sellyly blered;
 A mensk lady on molde mon may hire calle,
 65 for Gode!
 Hir body watz schort and thik,
 Hir buttokez balgh and brode,
 More lykkerwys on to lyk
 Watz that scho hade on lode.

70 When Gawayn glent on that gay, that graciously loked, Wyth leve laght of the lorde he lent hem agaynes;
 The alder he haylses, heldande ful lowe,
 The loveloker he lappez a lyttel in armez,
 He kysses hir comlyly, and knyghtly he melez.
 75 Thay kallen hym of aquoyntaunce, and he hit quyk askez
 To be hir servaunt sothly, if himself lyked.
 Thay tan hym bytwene hem, wyth talkyng hym leden
 To chambre, to chemné, and cheffy thay asken
 Spycez,¹ that unsparly men speded hom to bryng, 80 And the wynnellych wyne therwith uche tyme.
 The lorde luflych aloft lepez ful ofte,
 Mynned merthe to be made upon mony sythez,
 Hent heghly of his hode, and on a spere hengez,
 And wayned hom to wyne the worchip therof,
 85 That most myrthe myght meve that Crystenmasse whyle:²
 "And I schal fonde, bi my fayth, to fylter wyth the best Er me wont the wede, with help of my frendez."
 Thus wyth laghande lotez the lorde hit tayt makez,
 For to glade Sir Gawayn with gomnez in halle
 90 that nyght,

950 But very different in looks were those two ladies,
 For where the young one was fresh, the other was withered;
 Every part of that one was rosily aglow:
 On that other, rough wrinkled cheeks hung in folds.
 Many bright pearls adorned the kerchiefs of one,
 955 Whose breast and white throat, uncovered and bare,
 Shone more dazzling than snow new-fallen on hills;
 The other wore a gorget over her neck,
 Her swarthy chin wrapped in chalkwhite veils,
 Her forehead enfolded in silk, muffled up everywhere,
 960 With embroidered hems and lattice-work of tiny stitching,
 So that nothing was exposed of her but her black brows,
 Her two eyes and her nose, her naked lips,
 Which were repulsive to see and shockingly bleared.
 A noble lady indeed you might call her,
 965 by God!
 With body squat and thick,
 And buttocks bulging broad,
 More delectable in looks
 Was the lady whom she led.

970 Gawain glanced at that beauty, who favored him with a look,
 And taking leave of the lord he walked towards them.
 The older one he salutes with a deep bow,
 And takes the lovelier one briefly into his arms,
 Kisses her respectfully and courteously speaks.
 975 They ask to make his acquaintance, and he quickly begs Truly to be their servant, if that would please them.
 They place him between them and lead him, still chatting,
 To a private room, to the fireplace, and immediately call
 For spiced cakes, which men hurried to bring them unstinted, 980 Together with marvelous wine each time they asked.
 The lord jumps up politely on several occasions,
 Repeatedly urging his guests to make merry;
 Graciously pulled off his hood and hung it on a spear,
 And encouraged them to gain honor by winning it, 985 So that the Christmas season would abound with mirth.
 "And I shall try, on my word, to compete with the best,
 Before I lose my hood, with the help of my friends."
 Thus with laughing words the lord makes merry,
 To keep Sir Gawain amused with games in hall
 990 that night,

¹ Spycez Spiced cakes, still a Christmas tradition. Cloves, ginger, and cinnamon were available.

² Hent heghly ... Crystenmasse whyle Another Christmas game, evidently a jumping contest, typically boisterous in character.

Til that hit watz tyme
 The lord comaundet lyght;
 Sir Gawen his leve con nyme
 And to his bed hym dight.

995 On the morne, as uch mon mynez that tyme
 That Dryghtyn for oure destyné to deye watz borne,
 Wele waxez in uche a won in world for his sake;
 So did hit there on that day thurgh dayntés mony.
 Bothe at mes and at mele messes ful quaynt¹
 1000 Derf men upon dece drest of the best.
 The olde auncian wyf heghest ho syttez,
 The lorde lufly her by lent, as I trowe;
 Gawan and the gay burde togeder thay seten,
 Even inmyddez, as the messe metely come,
 1005 And sythen thurgh al the sale as hem best semed.
 Bi uche grome at his degré graythely watz served,
 Ther watz mete, ther watz myrthe, ther watz much joye,
 That for to telle therof hit me tene were,
 And to poynte hit yet I pynded me paraventure.
 1010 Bot yet I wot that Wawen and the wale burde
 Such comfort of her compaynye caghten togeder
 Thurgh her dere dalyaunce of her derne wordez,
 Wyth clene cortays carp closed fro fylthe,
 That hor play watz passande uche prynce gomen, 1015 in vayres.
 Trumpes and nakerys,
 Much ppyng ther repayres;
 Uche mon tented hys,²
 And thay two tented thayres.

1020 Much dut watz ther dryven that day and that other,
 And the thryd as thro thronge in thereafter;
 The joye of sayn Jonez day³ watz gentyle to here,
 And watz the last of the layk, leudez ther thoghten.
 Ther wer gestes to go upon the gray morne,
 1025 Forthy wonderly thay woke, and the wyn dronken,
 Daunsed ful dreghly wyth dere carolez.
 At the last, when hit watz late, thay lachen her leve, Uchon to wende on his way that watz wyghe straunge.⁴

messes ful quaynt Finely prepared meals, set out (drest) on the high table. Elsewhere koynt, 877 is a variant spelling, again indicating skillfully made things.

² Uche mon tented hys Each man attended to his own needs or pleasures.

Until it was so late
 That lights were ordered in;
 Then taking courteous leave
 To chamber went Gawain.

995 On the next day, when everyone remembers the time
 When God who died for our salvation was born,
 Joy spreads through every dwelling on earth for his sake.
 So did it there on that day, through numerous pleasures;
 Both light meals and great dishes cunningly prepared 1000 And of exquisite quality bold men served on the dais.
 The ancient lady sits in the place of honor,
 The lord politely taking his place by her, I believe.
 Gawain and the lovely lady were seated together,
 Right in the middle of the table, where food duly came,
 1005 And was then served throughout the hall in proper sequence.
 By the time each man had been served according to rank,
 Such food and such merriment, so much enjoyment were there
 That to tell you about it would give me much trouble,
 Especially if I tried to describe it in detail.
 1010 Yet I know that Gawain and his beautiful partner
 Found such enjoyment in each other's company,
 Through a playful exchange of private remarks,
 And well-mannered small-talk, unsullied by sin,
 That their pleasure surpassed every princely amusement, 1015 for sure.
 Trumpets, kettledrums
 And piping roused all ears.
 Each man fulfilled his wishes,
 And those two followed theirs.

1020 Great joy filled that day and the one following,
 And a third as delightful came pressing after;
 The revelry on St. John's Day was glorious to hear,
 And was the end of the festivities, the people supposed.
 The guests were to leave early next morning,
 1025 And so they reveled all night, drinking the wine
 And ceaselessly dancing and caroling songs.
 At last, when it was late, they take their leave,
 Each one who was a guest there to go on his way.

³ sayn Jonez day 27 December, but three days later it is New Year's Eve—a day too early. Some editors have suggested a line may be missing here.

⁴ wyghe straunge Stranger or visitor to the castle.

Gawan gef hym god day, the godmon hym lachchez,
 1030 Ledes hym to his awen chambre, the chemné bysyde,
 And there he drawez hym on dryghe, and derely hym thonkkez
 Of the wyne worschip that he hym wayved hade,
 As to honour his hous on that hygh tyde,
 And enbelyse his burgh with his bele chere.¹

1035 "Iwysse, sir, quyl I leve, me worthez the better
 That Gawayn hatz ben my gest at Goddez awen fest."
 "Grant merci, sir," quoth Gawayn, "in god fayth hit is yowrez,
 Al the honour is your awen—the heghe kyng yow yelde!
 And I am wyghe at your wylle to worch youre hest, 1040 As I am halden therto, in hyghe and in lowe, bi right."

The lorde fast can hym payne
 To holde lenger the knyght;
 To hym answarez Gawayn
 1045 Bi non way that he myght.²

Then frayned the freke ful fayre at himselven
 Quat derve dede had hym dryven at that dere tyme
 So kenly fro the kynges kourt to kayre al his one,
 Er the halidayez holly were halet³ out of toun.
 1050 "For sothe, sir," quoth the segge, "ye sayn bot the trawthe,
 A heghe ernde and a hasty me hade fro tho wonez,
 For I am sumned myselfe to sech to a place,
 I ne wot in the worlde whederwarde to wende hit to fynde.
 I nolde bot if I hit negh myght on Nw Yeres morne 1055 For alle the londe inwyth Logres, so me oure lorde help!
 Forthy, sir, this enquest I require yow here,
 That ye telle me with trawthe if ever ye tale herde
 Of the grene chapel, quere hit on grounde stondez,
 And of the knyght that hit kepes, of colour of grene.
 1060 Ther watz stabled bi statut a steven us bitwene
 To mete that mon at that mere, yif I myght last;
 And of that ilk Nw Yere bot naked now wontez,
 And I wolde loke on that lede, if God me let wolde,
 Gladloker, bi Goddez sun, then any god weldel!
 1065 Forthi, iwysse, bi yowre wylle, wende me bihoves,
 Naf I now to busy bot bare thre dayez,
 And me als fayn to falle feye as fayly of myyn ernde."
 Thenne laghande quoth the lorde, "Now leng the byhoves,

Gawain bids goodbye to his host, who takes hold of him,
 1030 Leads him to his own room, beside the fire,
 And there he detains him, thanks him profusely
 For the wonderful kindness that Gawain had shown
 By honoring his house at that festive time,
 And by gracing the castle with his charming presence.
 1035 "Indeed, sir, as long as I live I shall be the better Because Gawain was my guest at God's own feast."
 "All my thanks, sir," said Gawain, "in truth it is yours,
 All the honor falls to you, and may the high king repay you!
 And I am at your commandment to act on your bidding, 1040 As I am duty bound to in everything, large or small,
 by right."

The lord tried strenuously
 To lengthen Gawain's stay,
 But Gawain answered him
 1045 That he could not delay.

Then the lord politely enquired of the knight
 What pressing need had forced him at that festive time
 So urgently from the royal court to travel all alone,
 Before the holy days there had completely passed.
 1050 "Indeed, sir," said the knight, "you are right to wonder;
 A task important and pressing drove me into the wild,
 For I am summoned in person to seek out a place
 With no idea whatever where it might be found.
 I would not fail to reach it on New Year's morning
 1055 For all the land in England, so help me our Lord!
 Therefore, sir, this request I make of you now,
 That you truthfully tell me if you ever heard talk
 Of a Green Chapel, wherever it stands upon earth,
 And of a knight who maintains it, who is colored green.
 1060 A verbal agreement was settled between us
 To meet that man at that place, should I be alive,
 And before that New Year little time now remains;
 And I would face that man, if God would allow me,
 More gladly, by God's son, than come by great wealth!
 1065 With your permission, therefore, I must indeed leave:
 I have now for my business only three short days,
 And would rather be struck dead than fail in my quest."
 Then the lord said, laughing, "Now you must stay,

¹ enbelyse ... bele chere Bertilak (Gawain's host) makes an uncharacteristic sortie into courtly French terms.

² Bi non way that he myght He could not by any means.

³ Er the halidayez holly were halet Before the holidays were completely over. A curious remark. Gawain reaches the castle, Hautdesert, after a long journey (towen fro ferre, 1093) as the festivities are reaching their height, having left Camelot long before the holiday season began.

For I schal teche yow to that terme bi the tymes ende, 1070 The grene chapayle upon grounde greve yow no more;
 Bot ye schal be in yowre bed, burne, at thyn ese,
 Quyle forth dayez, and ferk on the fyrst of the yere,
 And cum to that merk at mydmorn, to make quat yow likez
 in spenne.

1075 Dowellez whyle New Yeres daye,
 And rys, and raykez thenne,
 Mon schal yow sette in waye,
 Hit is not two myle henne."

Thenne watz Gawan ful glad, and gomenly he laghed:
 1080 "Now I thonk yow thryvandely thurgh alle other thyng,
 Now acheved is my chaunce, I schal at your wyll Dowelle, and ellez do quat ye demen."
 Thenne sesed hym the syre and set hym bysyde,
 Let the ladiez be fette to lyke hem the better.
 1085 Ther watz seme solace by hemself stille;
 The lorde let for luf lotez so myry
 As wygh that wolde of his wyte, ne wyst quat he myght.
 Thenne he carped to the knyght, criande loude,
 "Ye han demed to do the dede that I bidde;
 1090 Wyl ye halde this hes here at thys onez?"
 "Ye, sir, for sothe," sayd the segge trwe,
 "Whyl I byde in yowre borghe, be bayn to yowre hest."
 "For ye haf travayled," quoth the tulk, "towen fro ferre,
 And sythen waked me wyth, ye arn not wel waryst
 1095 Nauther of sostnaunce ne of slepe, sothly I knowe;
 Ye schal lenge in your lofte, and lyghe in your ese
 To-morn quyle the messequyle, and to mete wende
 When ye wyl, wyth my wyf, that wyth yow schal sitte
 And comfort yow with compayny, til I to cort torne; 1100 ye lende,
 And I schal erly ryse,
 On huntyng wyl I wende."
 Gavayn grantez alle thyse,
 Hym heldande, as the hende.

1105 "Yet firre," quoth the freke, "a forwarde we make:
 Quat-so-ever I wyne in the wod hit worthez to youre,
 And quat chek so ye acheve¹ chaunge me therforne.
 Swete, swap we so, sware with trawthe,

For I shall direct you to your meeting at the year's end.
 1070 Let the whereabouts of the Green Chapel worry you no more;
 For you shall lie in your bed, sir, taking your ease
 Until late in the day, and leave on the first of the year,
 And reach that place at midday, to do whatever pleases you
 there.

1075 Stay till the year's end,
 And leave on New Year's Day;
 We'll put you on the path,
 It's not two miles away."

Then Gawain was overjoyed, and merrily laughed:
 1080 "Now I thank you heartily for this, above everything else,
 Now my quest is accomplished, I shall at your wish Remain here, and do whatever else you think fit."
 Then the host seized him, set Gawain by his side,
 And bid the ladies be fetched to increase their delight.
 1085 They had great pleasure by themselves in private;
 In his excitement the lord uttered such merry words
 Like a man out of his mind, not knowing what he did.
 Then he said to the knight exuberantly,
 "You have agreed to carry out whatever deed I ask;
 1090 Will you keep this promise now, at this very instant?"
 "Yes, sir, assuredly," said the true knight,
 "While I am under your roof, I obey your bidding."
 "You have wearied yourself," said the man, "traveling from far,
 And then reveled all night with me: you have not recovered
 1095 Either your lost sleep or your nourishment, I am sure.
 You shall stay in your bed and lie at your ease
 Tomorrow until mass-time, and then go to dine
 When you like, with my wife, who will sit at your side
 And be your charming companion until I come home.
 1100 You stay;
 And I shall rise at dawn
 And hunting will I go."
 All this Gawain grants,
 With a well-mannered bow.

1105 "Yet further," said the man, "let us make an agreement:
 Whatever I catch in the wood shall become yours,
 And whatever mishap comes your way give me in exchange.
 Dear sir, let us swap so, swear me that truly,

¹ quat chek so ye acheve Whatever fortune you win. The remark is equivocal. Chek also has the sense of misfortune—see 1857 and 2195.

Quether, leude, so lympe, here other better."¹

"By God," quoth Gawain the gode, "I grant thetlylle,
And that yow lyst for to layke, lef hit me thynkes."

"Who bryngez uus this beverage, this bargayn is maked":

So sayde the lorde of that lede; thay laghed uchone,
Thay dronken and dalyeden and dalten untyghtel,

Thise lordez and ladyez, quyle that hem lyked;

And sythen with Frenkysch fare² and fele fayre lotez

Thay stoden and stemed and styly speken,

Kysten ful comlyly and kaghten her leve.

With mony leude ful lyght and lemande torches

Uche burne to his bed watz broght at the laste, ful softe.

To bed yet er thay yede,

Recorded covenantez ofte;

The olde lorde of that leude

Cowthe wel halde layk alofte.

FITT 3

Ful erly bifore the day the folk uprysen,

Gestes that go wolde hor gromez thay calden,

And thay busken up bilyve blonkkez to sadel,

Tyffen her takles, trussen her males,

Richen hem the rychest, to ryde alle arayde,

Lepen up lightly, lachen her brydeles,

Uche wyghe on his way ther hym wel lyked.

The leve lorde of the londe watz not the last

Arayed for the rydyng, with renkkes ful mony;

Ete a sop hastyly, when he hade herde masse,

With bugle to bent-felde he buskez bylyve.

By that any daylyght lemed upon erthe

He with his hateles on hyghe horsres weren.

Thenne thise cacheres that couthe cowpled hor houndez,

Unclosed the kenel dore and calde hem theroute,

Blwe bygly in buglez thre bare mote;³

Braches bayed therfore and breme noyse maked;

And thay chastysed and charred on chasyng that went,

Whatever falls to our lot, worthless or better."

1110 "By God," said the good Gawain, "I agree to that,

And your love of amusement pleases me much."

"If someone brings us drink, it will be an agreement,"

Said the lord of that company: everyone laughed.

They drank wine and joked and frivolously chatted

1115 For as long as it pleased them, these lords and ladies;

And then with exquisite manners and many gracious words

They stood at a pause, conversing quietly,

Kissed each other affectionately and then took their leave.

With many brisk servingmen and gleaming torches

1120 Each man was at last escorted to a bed downy soft.

Yet first, and many times

Again the terms were sworn;

The master of those folk

1125 Knew how to foster fun.

PART 3

Early before daybreak the household arose;

Guests who were leaving called for their grooms,

And they hurried quickly to saddle horses,

Make equipment ready and pack their bags.

1130 The noblest prepare themselves to ride finely dressed,

Leap nimbly into saddle, seize their bridles,

Each man taking the path that attracted him most.

The well-loved lord of the region was not the last

Prepared for riding, with a great many knights;

1135 Snatched a hasty breakfast after hearing mass,

And makes ready for the hunting-field with bugles blowing.

By the time the first glimmers of daylight appeared

He and his knights were mounted on horse.

Then experienced huntsmen coupled the hounds,

1140 Unlocked the kennel door and ordered them out,

Loudly blowing three long notes on their horns.

Hounds bayed at the sound and made a fierce noise;

And those who went straying were whipped in and turned back,

¹ Quether, leude, so lympe, here other better Whichever man wins something worthless or better. The literal sense of lymp is "falls to his lot."

² Frenkysch fare Refined manners, modeled on courtly French behavior.

³ thre bare mote Three single notes on the horn, ordering the release of the hounds.

A hundreth of hunteres, as I haf herde telle, 1145 of the best.
 To trystors vewters yod,¹
 Couples huntes of kest;
 Ther ros for blastez gode
 Gret rurd in that forest.

 1150 At the fyrst quethe of the quest quaked the wylde;
 Der drof in the dale, doted for drede,
 Highed to the hyghe, bot heterly thay were Restayed with the stablye, that stoutly ascryed.
 Thay let the herttez haf the gate, with the hyghe hedes, 1155 The breme bukkez also with hor brode paumez;
 For the fre lorde hade defende in fermysoun tyme
 That ther schulde no mon meve to the male dere.
 The hindez were halden in with hay! and war!
 The does dryven with gret dyn to the depe sladez.
 1160 Ther myght mon se, as thay slypte, slenting of arwes—
 At uche wende under wande wapped a flone—
 That bigly bote on the broun with ful brode hedez.
 What! thay brayen and bleden, bi bonkkez thay deyen,
 And ay rachches in a res radly hem folwes, 1165 Huntrez wyth hyghe horne hasted hem after Wyth such a crakkande kry as klyffes haden brusten.
 What wylde so atwaped wyghes that schotten
 Watz al toraced and rent at the resayt,
 Bi thay were tened at the hyghe and taysed to the wattres;
 1170 The ledez were so lerned at the lowe trysteres,
 And the grehoundez so grete, that gotten hem bylyve
 And hem tofylched, as fast as frekezes myght loke, ther-ryght.
 The lorde for blys abloy
 1175 Ful ofte con launce and lyght,
 And drof that day wyth joy
 Thus to the derk nyght.

Thus laykez this lorde by lynde-wodez evez,
 And Gawayn the god mon in gay bed lygez,
 1180 Lurkkez² quyl the daylyght lerned on the woves,
 Under covertour ful clere, cortyned aboute;
 And as in slomeryng he slode, sleghly he herde
 A littel dyn at his dor, and dernly upon;
 And he hevez up his hed out of the clothes,

¹ To trystors vewters yod Keepers of hounds went to their hunting-stations.

By a hundred hunters, as I have been told,
 1145 of the best.
 With keepers at their posts
 Huntsmen uncoupled hounds;
 Great clamor in the woods
 From mighty horn-blasts sounds.

 1150 At the first sound of the hunt the wild creatures trembled;
 Deer fled from the valley, frantic with fear,
 And rushed to the high ground, but were fiercely turned back
 By the line of beaters, who yelled at them savagely.
 They let the stags with their tall antlers pass,
 1155 And the wonderful bucks with their broad horns;
 For the noble lord had forbidden in the close season
 Anyone to interfere with the male deer.
 The hinds were held back with shouts of hay! and war!
 The does driven with great noise into the deep valleys.
 1160 There you might see, as they ran, arrows flying—
 At every turn in the wood a shaft whistled through the air—
 Deeply piercing the hide with their wide heads.
 What! they cry out and bleed, on the slopes they are slaughtered,
 And always swiftly pursued by the rushing hounds;
 1165 Hunters with screaming horns gallop behind
 With such an ear-splitting noise as if cliffs had collapsed.
 Those beasts that escaped the men shooting at them
 Were all pulled down and killed at the receiving points,
 As they were driven from the high ground down to the streams.
 1170 The men at the lower stations were so skilful,
 And the greyhounds so large, that they seized them quickly
 And tore them down as fast as men could number, right there.
 On horseback and on foot
 1175 The lord, filled with delight,
 Spent all that day in bliss
 Until the fall of night.

Thus this nobleman sports along the edges of woods,
 And the good man Gawain lies in his fine bed,
 1180 Lying snug while the daylight gleamed on the walls,
 Under a splendid coverlet, shut in by curtains.
 And as he lazily dozed, he heard slyly made
 A little noise at his door and it stealthily open;
 And he raised up his head from the bedclothes,

² Lurkkez Lay snug; but the term has pejorative overtones that are heard again at 1195.

185 A corner of the cortyn he caght up a lyttel,
 And waytez warly thiderwarde quat hit be myght.
 Hit watz the ladi, loflyest to beholde,
 That drow the dor after hir ful dernly and style,
 And bowed towarde the bed; and the burne schamed,¹ 190 And layde hym down lystyly and let as he slepte;
 And ho stepped stilly and stel to his bedde,
 Kest up the cortyn and creped withinne,
 And set hir ful softly on the bed-syde,
 And lenged there selly longe to loke quen he wakened.
 195 The lede lay lurked a ful longe quyle,
 Compast in his concience to quat that cace myght
 Meve other mount—to mervayle hym thoght,
 Bot yet he sayde in hymself, “More semly hit were
 To aspye wyth my spelle in space quat ho wolde.”
 200 Then he wakenede, and wroth, and to hir warde torned,
 And unlouked his yghe-lyddez, and let as hym wondered,
 And sayned hym, as bi his saghe the saver to worthe,
 with hande.
 Wyth chynne and cheke ful swete,
 Both quit and red in blande,
 Ful lufly con ho lete
 Wyth lyppez smal laghande.

“God moroun, Sir Gawayn,” sayde that gay lady,
 “Ye ar a sleper unslyghe, that mon may slyde hider;
 210 Now ar ye tan as-tyt!² Bot true uus may schape,
 I schal bynde yow in your bedde, that be ye trayst.”
 Al laghande the lady lanced tho bourdez.
 “Goud moroun, gay,” quoth Gawayn the blythe,
 “Me schal worthe at your wille, and that me wel lykez,³
 215 For I yelde me yederly, and yeghe after grace,
 And that is the best, be my dome, for me byhovez nede”:
 And thus he bourded agayn with mony a blythe laghter.
 “Bot wolde ye, lady lovely, then leve me grante,
 And deprece your prysoun, and pray hym to ryse,
 220 I wolde bowe of this bed, and busk me better;
 I schulde kever the more comfort to karp yow wyth.”
 “Nay, for sothe, beau sire,” sayde that swete,

1185 Lifted a corner of the curtain a little,
 And takes a glimpse warily to see what it could be.
 It was the lady, looking her loveliest,
 Who shut the door after her carefully, not making a sound,
 And came towards the bed. The knight felt confused, 1190 And lay down again cautiously, pretending to sleep;
 And she approached silently, stealing to his bed,
 Lifted the bed-curtain and crept within,
 And seating herself softly on the bedside,
 Waited there strangely long to see when he would wake.
 1195 The knight shammed sleep for a very long while,
 Wondering what the matter could be leading to
 Or portend. It seemed an astonishing thing,
 Yet he told himself, “It would be more fitting
 To discover straightway by talking just what she wants.”
 1200 Then he wakened and stretched and turned towards her,
 Opened his eyes and pretended surprise,
 And crossed himself as if protecting himself by prayer and this sign.
 With lovely chin and cheek
 1205 Of blended color both,
 Charmingly she spoke
 From her small laughing mouth.

“Good morning, Sir Gawain,” said that fair lady,
 “You are an unwary sleeper, that one can steal in here:
 1210 Now you are caught in a moment! Unless we agree on a truce,
 I shall imprison you in your bed, be certain of that!”
 Laughing merrily the lady uttered this jest.
 “Good morning, dear lady,” said Gawain gaily,
 “You shall do with me as you wish, and that pleases me much,
 1215 For I surrender at once, and beg for your mercy,
 And that is best, in my judgment, for I simply must.”
 Thus he joked in return with a burst of laughter.
 “But if, lovely lady, you would grant me leave
 And release your captive, and ask him to rise, 1220 I would get out of this bed and put on proper dress,
 And then take more pleasure in talking with you.”
 “No, indeed not, good sir,” said that sweet one,

¹ and the burne schamed And the knight was embarrassed.

² Now ar ye tan as-tyt! Now are you captured in a moment! There may be a suggestion here of another traditional game, played by women on Hock Monday, the week after Easter. It consisted of seizing and binding men, who were released after paying a small sum of money.

³ that me wel lykez That pleases me very much.

“Ye schal not rise of your bedde, I rych yow better
 I schal happe yow here that other half als, 1225 And sythen karp wyth my knyght that I kaght have;
 For I wene wel, iwysse, Sir Wowen ye are,
 That alle the worlde worchipez quere-so ye ride;
 Your honour, your hendelayk is hendely prayzed
 With lordez, wyth ladyes, with alle that lyf bere.
 1230 And now ye are here, iwysse, and we bot oure one;
 My lorde and his ledez ar on lenthe faren,
 Other burnez in her bedde, and my burdez als,
 The dor drawen and dit with a derf haspe;
 And sythen I have in this hous hym that al lykez, 1235 I schal ware my whyle wel, quyl hit lastez,
 with tale.
 Ye ar welcum to my cors,¹
 Yowre awen won to wale,
 Me behovez of fyne force
 1240 Your servaunt be, and schale.”

“In god fayth,” quoth Gawayn, “gayn hit me thynkkez, Thagh I be not now he that ye of speken;
 To reche to such reverence as ye reherce here
 I am wyghe unworthy, I wot wel myselven.
 1245 Bi God, I were glad, and yow god thocht,
 At saghe other at servyce that I sette myght
 To the plesaunce of your prys²—hit were a pure joye.”
 “In god fayth, Sir Gawayn,” quoth the gay lady,
 “The prys and the proves that plesez al other,
 1250 If I hit lakked other set at lyght, hit were little daynté;
 Bot hit ar ladyes innoghe that lever were nowthe
 Haf the, hende, in hor holde, as I the habbe here,
 To daly with derely your daynté wordez,
 Kever hem comfort and colen her carez,
 1255 Then much of the garysoun other gold that thay haven.
 Bot I louve that ilk lorde that the lyfte haldez
 I have hit holly in my honde that al desyres, thurghe grace.”
 Scho made hym so gret chere,
 1260 That watz so fayr of face,
 The knyght with speches skere
 Answered to uche a case.

¹ Ye ar welcum to my cors A suggestive ambiguity that cannot be translated. My cors may mean “me,” just as “your honor” or “your worship” mean “you.” But the literal sense of the phrase, “my body,” is present.

“You shall not leave your bed, I intend something better.
 I shall tuck you in here on both sides of the bed,
 1225 And then chat with my knight whom I have captured.
 For I know well, in truth, that you are Sir Gawain,
 Whom everyone reveres wherever you go;
 Your good name and courtesy are honorably praised
 By lords and by ladies and all folk alive.
 1230 And now indeed you are here, and we two quite alone,
 My husband and his men have gone far away,
 Other servants are in bed, and my women too,
 The door shut and locked with a powerful hasp;
 And since I have under my roof the man everyone loves, 1235 I shall spend my time well, while it lasts,
 with talk.
 You are welcome to me indeed,
 Take whatever you want;
 Circumstances force me
 1240 To be your true servant.”

“Truly,” replied Gawain, “I am greatly honored, Though I am not in fact such a man as you speak of.
 To deserve such respect as you have just described
 I am completely unworthy, I know very well.
 1245 I should be happy indeed, if you thought it proper,
 That I might devote myself by words or by deed
 To giving you pleasure: it would be a great joy.”
 “In all truth, Sir Gawain,” replied the beautiful lady,
 “If the excellence and gallantry everyone admires
 1250 I were to slight or disparage, that would hardly be courteous;
 But a great many ladies would much rather now
 Hold you, sir, in their power as I have you here,
 To spend time amusingly with your charming talk,
 Delighting themselves and forgetting their cares,
 1255 Than much of the treasure or wealth they possess.
 But I praise that same lord who holds up the heavens,
 I have completely in my grasp the man everyone longs for,
 through God’s grace.”
 Radiant with loveliness
 1260 Great favor she conferred;
 The knight with virtuous speech
 Answered her every word.

² To the plesaunce of your prys To pleasing you, or to carrying out your wishes, your prys meaning your noble self.

1265 “Madame,” quoth the myry mon, “Mary yow yelde,
 For I haf founden, in god fayth, yowre fraunchis nobele,
 And other ful much of other folk fongen bi hor dedez,
 Bot the daynté that thay delen, for my disert nys even,
 Hit is the worchyp of yourself, that noght bot wel connez.”
 “Bi Mary,” quod the menskful, “me thynk hit an other;
 For were I worth al the wone of wymmen alyve, 1270 And al the wele of the worlde were in my honde,
 And I schulde chepen and chose to cheve me a lorde,
 For the costes that I haf knowen upon the, knyght, here,
 Of bewté and deboneté and blythe semblaunt,
 And that I haf er herkkened and halde hit here trwee, 1275 Ther schulde no freke upon folde bfore yow be chosen.”
 “Iwysse, worthy,” quoth the wyghe, “ye haf waled wel better,¹
 Bot I am proude of the prys that ye put on me,
 And soberly your servaunt, my soverayn I holde yow,
 And yowre knyght I becom, and Kryst yow foryelde.”
 1280 Thus thay meled of muchquat til mydmorn paste,
 And ay the lady let lyk as hym loved mych.
 The freke ferde with defence, and feted ful fayre;
 Thagh ho were burde bryghtest the burne in mynde hade,²
 The lasse luf in his lode for lur that he soght
 1285 bout hone—
 The dunte that schulde hym deve,
 And nedez hit most be done.
 The lady thenn spek of leve,
 He granted hir ful sone.

1290 Thenne ho gef hym god day, and wyth a glent laghed,
 And as ho stod, ho stonyed hym wyth ful stor wordez:
 “Now he that spedez uche spech this disport yelde yow!
 Bot that ye be Gawan, hit gotz in mynde.”
 “Querfore?” quoth the freke, and freschly he askez,
 1295 Ferde lest he hade fayled in fourme of his castes;
 Bot the burde hym blessed, and “Bi this skyl” sayde:
 “So god as Gawayn gaynly is halden,
 And cortaysye is closed so clene in hymselfen,
 Couth not lightly haf lenged so long wyth a lady,
 1300 Bot he had craved a cosse, bi his courtaysye,

“Lady,” said the man pleasantly, “may Mary repay you,
 For I have truly made proof of your great generosity,
 1265 And many other folk win credit for their deeds;
 But the respect shown to me is not at all my deserving:
 That honor is due to yourself, who know nothing but good.”
 “By Mary,” said the noble lady, “to me it seems very different;
 For if I were the worthiest of all women alive,
 1270 And held all the riches of the earth in my hand,
 And could bargain and pick a lord for myself,
 For the virtues I have seen in you, sir knight, here,
 Of good looks and courtesy and charming manner—
 All that I have previously heard and now know to be true—
 1275 No man on earth would be picked before you.”
 “Indeed, noble lady,” said the man, “you have chosen much better,
 But I am proud of the esteem that you hold me in,
 And in all gravity your servant, my sovereign I consider you,
 And declare myself your knight, and may Christ reward you.”
 1280 So they chatted of this and that until late morning,
 And always the lady behaved as if loving him much.
 The knight reacted cautiously, in the most courteous of ways, Though she was the loveliest woman he could remember: He felt small interest in love because of the ordeal he must face 1285 very soon—
 To stand a crushing blow,
 In helpless sufferance.
 Of leaving then she spoke,
 The knight agreed at once.

1290 Then she bade him goodbye, glanced at him and laughed,
 And as she stood astonished him with a forceful rebuke:
 “May he who prospers each speech repay you this pleasure!
 But that you should be Gawain I very much doubt.”
 “But why?” said the knight, quick with his question,
 1295 Fearing he had committed some breach of good manners;
 But the lady said “Bless you” and replied, “For this cause:
 So good a knight as Gawain is rightly reputed,
 In whom courtesy is so completely embodied,
 Could not easily have spent so much time with a lady 1300 Without begging a kiss, to comply with politeness,

¹ ye haf waled wel better You have made a much better choice; reminding the lady that she has a husband.

² Thagh ho . . . mynde hade The frightening prospect facing Gawain (the lur that he soght, 1284) does not allow him to become distracted by the lady's beauty, though her loveliness surpasses anything he can remember. The manuscript reading of this line, Thagh I were burde bryghtest the burde in mynde hade, is usually amended as shown.

Bi sum towch of summe tryfle at sum talez ende."
 Then quoth Wowen, "Iwysse, worthe as yow lykez;
 I schal kysse at your comaundement, as a knyght fallez,
 And fire, lest he displese yow, so plede hit no more."
 1305 Ho comes nerre with that and cachez hym in armez,
 Loutez lufflych adoun and the leude kysses.
 Thay comly bykennen to Kryst ayther other;
 Ho dos hir forth at the dore withouten dyn more;
 And he ryches hym to ryse and rapes hym sone,
 1310 Clepes to his chamberlayn, choses his wede,
 Bowez forth, quen he watz boun, blythely to masse;
 And thenne he meded to his mete that menskly hym keped,
 And made myrty al day, til the mone rysed,
 with game.

1315 Watz never freke fayrer fonge
 Bitwene two so dyngne dame,
 The alder and the yonge;
 Much solace set thay same.

And ay the lorde of the londe is lent on his gamnez, 1320 To hunt in holtez and hethe at hyndez barayne;
 Such a sowme he ther slowe bi that the sunne heldet,
 Of dos and of other dere, to deme were wonder.
 Thenne fersly thay flokked in folk at the laste,
 And quykly of the quelled dere a querré thay maked.
 1325 The best bowed therto with burnez innoghe, Gedered the grattest of gres that ther were,
 And didden hem derely undo as the dede askez;
 Serched hem at the assay summe that ther were,
 Two fyngeres thay fonde of the fowlest of alle.
 1330 Sythen thay slyt the slot, sesed the erber,
 Schaved wyth a scharp knyff, and the schyre knitten;
 Sythen rytte thay the four lymmes, and rent of the hyde,
 Then brek thay the balé, the bowelez out token
 Lystily for laucyng the lere of the knot;
 1335 Thay gryped to the gargulun, and graythely departed
 The wesaunt fro the wynt-hole, and walt out the guttez;
 Then scher thay out the schulderez with her scharp knyvez,
 Haled hem by a lyttel hole to have hole sydes.
 Sithen britned thay the brest and brayden hit in twynne, 1340 And eft at the gargulun bigynez on thenne,
 Ryvez hit up radly ryght to the byght,
 Voydez out the avanters, and verayly thereafter
 Alle the rymez by the rybbez radly thay lance;
 So ryde thay of by resoun bi the rygge bonez,

By some hint or suggestion at the end of a remark."
 Then Gawain said, "Indeed, let it be as you wish;
 I will kiss at your bidding, as befits a knight,
 And do more, rather than displease you, so urge it no further."
 1305 With that she approaches him and takes him in her arms,
 Stoops graciously over him and kisses the knight.
 They politely commend each other to Christ's keeping;
 She goes out of the room without one word more.
 And he prepares to get up as quickly as he can,
 1310 Calls for his chamberlain, selects his clothes,
 Makes his way, when he was ready, contentedly to mass;
 And then went to his meal that worthily awaited him,
 And made merry all day until the moon rose with games.

1315 Never knight was entertained
 By such a worthy pair,
 One old, the other young;
 Much pleasure did they share.

And still the lord of that land is absorbed his sport, 1320 Chasing through woodland and heath after barren hinds.
 What a number he killed by the time the day ended
 Of does and other deer would be hard to imagine.
 Then proudly the hunters flocked together at the end,
 And quickly made a quarry of the slaughtered deer.
 1325 The noblest pressed forward with many attendants,
 Gathered together the fattest of the deer,
 And neatly dismembered them as ritual requires.
 Some of those who examined them at the assay
 Found two inches of flesh in the leanest of them.
 1330 Then they slit the base of the throat, took hold of the gullet,
 Scraped it with a sharp knife and knotted it shut;
 Next they cut off the four legs and ripped off the hide,
 Then broke open the belly and took out the entrails
 Carefully to avoid loosening the ligature of the knot.
 1335 They took hold of the throat, and quickly separated
 The gullet from the windpipe, and threw out the guts.
 Then they cut round the shoulders with their keen knives,
 Drawing them through an aperture to keep the sides whole.
 Next they cut open the breast and split it in two,
 1340 And then one of them turns again to the throat
 And swiftly lays open the body right to the fork, Throws out the neck-offal, and expertly then Quickly severs all the membranes on the ribs.
 So correctly they cut off all the offal on the spine

345 Evenden to the haunche, that henged al samen,
And heven it up al hole, and hwen hit of there,
And that thay neme for the noumbles bi nome, as I trowe,
bi kynde;

Bi the byght al of the thyghes
350 The lappez thay lance bihynde;
To hewe hit in two thay hyghes,
Bi the bakbon to unbynde.

Bothe the hede and the hals thay hwen of thenne,
And sythen sunder thay the sydez swyft fro the chyne,
355 And the corbeles fee¹ thay kest in a greve;
Thenn thurled they ayther thik side thurgh bi the rybbe,
And henged thenne ayther bi hoghes of the fourchez, Uche freke for his fee, as fallez for to have.
Upon a felle of the fayre best fede thay thayr houndes
360 Wyth the lyver and the lyghtez, the lether of the paunchez,
And bred bathed in blod blende theramongez.
Baldely thay blw prys,² bayed thayr rachchez,
Sythen fonge thay her flesche, folden to home,
Strakande ful stoutly mony stif motez.
365 Bi that the daylyght watz done the douthe watz al wonen
Into the comly castel, ther the knyght bidez
ful stille,

Wyth blys and bryght fyr bette.
The lorde is comen thertylle;
370 When Gawayn wyth hym mette
Ther watz bot wele at wylle.

Thenne comaunded the lorde in that sale to samen alle the meny,
Bothe the ladyes on lowe to lyght with her burdes
Bifore alle the folk on the flette, frekez he beddez
375 Verayly his venysoun to fech hym byforne,
And al godly in gomen Gawayn he called,
Techez hym to the tayles³ of ful tait bestes,
Schewez hym the schyree grece schorne upon rybbes.
“How payez yow this play? Haf I prys wonnen?
380 Have I thryvandely thonk thurgh my craft served?”
“Ye, iwsyse,” quoth that other wyghe, “here is wayth fayrest
That I sey this seven yere in sesoun of wynter.”
“And al I gif yow, Gawayn,” quoth the gome thenne,

1345 Right down to the haunches, in one unbroken piece,
And lifted it up whole, and cut it off there;
And to that they give the name of numbles, I believe,
as is right.

Then where the hind legs fork
1350 At the back they cut the skin,
Then hacked the carcass in two,
Swiftly along the spine.

Both the head and the neck they cut off next,
And then rapidly separate the sides from the chine;
1355 And the raven's fee in a thicket they threw.
Then they pierced both thick sides through the ribs,
Hanging each of them by the hocks of their legs,
For each man's payment, as his proper reward.
They put food for their hounds on a fine beast's skin—
1360 The liver and lights, the lining of the stomach,
And bread soaked in blood, mixed up together.
Noisily they blew capture, their hounds barking,
Then shouldering their venison they started for home,
Vigorously sounding many loud single notes.
1365 By the time daylight failed they had ridden back To the splendid castle, where the knight waits undisturbed,
With joy and bright fire warm.
Then into hall the lord
1370 Came, and the two men met
In joyfulest accord.

Then the lord commanded the household to assemble in hall,
And both ladies to come downstairs with their maids.
In front of the gathering he orders his men
1375 To lay out his venison truly before him;
And with playful courtesy he called Gawain to him,
Reckons up the tally of well-grown beasts,
Points out the splendid flesh cut from the ribs.
“Does this game please you? Have I won your praise?
1380 Do I deserve hearty thanks for my hunting skill?”
“Yes indeed,” said the other, “this is the finest venison
That I have seen for many years in the winter season.”
“And I give it all to you, Gawain,” said the man then,

¹ the corbeles fee A piece of gristle thrown to the birds as part of the ritual.

² blw prys A blast on the horn when the quarry is taken.

³ the tayles Left on the carcasses to facilitate the tally, or count.

"For by acorde of covenaut ye crave hit as your awen."

1385 "This is soth," quoth the segge, "I say yow that ilke:
That I haf worthly wonnen this wonez wythinne,
Iwysse with as god wylle hit worthez to yourez."
He haspez his fayre hals his armez wythinne,
And kysses hym as comlyly as he couthe awyse:
1390 "Tas yow there my chevicaunce, I cheved no more;
I wowche hit saf fynly, thagh feler hit were."
"Hit is god," quoth the godmon, "grant mercy therfore.
Hit may be such hit is the better, and ye me breve wolde
Where ye wan this ilk wele bi wytte of yorselven."
1395 "That watz not forward," quoth he, "frayst me no more.
For ye haf tan that yow tydez, trawe non other ye mowe."

Thay laghed, and made hem blythe
Wyth lotez that were to lowe;
1400 To soper thay yede as-swythe,
Wyth dayntés nwe innowe.

And sythen by the chymné in chamber thay seten,
Wyghez the walle wyn wegged to hem oft,
And efte in her bourdyng thay baythen in the morn
1405 To fylle the same forwarder that thay byfore maden:
Wat chaunce so bytydez hor chevysaunce to chaunge,
What nwez so thay nome, at naght quen thay metten.
Thay acorded of the covenantez byfore the court alle;
The beverage watz brought forth in bourde at that tyme, 1410 Thenne thay lovelych leghten leve at the last,
Uche burne to his bedde busked bylyve.
Bi that the coke hade crowen and cakled bot thryse¹
The lorde watz lopen of his bedde, the leudez uchone;
So that the mete and the masse watz metely delyvered, 1415 The douthe dressed to the wod er any day sprended,
to chace;
Hegh with hunte and hornez
Thurgh playnez thay passe in space,
Uncoupled among tho thornez
1420 Rachez that ran on race.

Sone thay calle of a quest in a ker syde,
The hunt rehayted the houndez that hit fyrst mynged,
Wylde wordez hym warp wyth a wrast noyce;
The howndez that hit herde hastid thider swythe,

"For by the terms of our compact you may claim it as yours."

1385 "That is true," said the knight, "and I say the same to you:
What I have honorably won inside this castle,
With as much good will truly shall be yours."
He takes the other's strong neck in his arms,
And kisses him as pleasantly as he could devise.
1390 "Take here my winnings, I obtained nothing else;
I bestow it on you freely, and would do so were it more."
"It is excellent," said the lord, "many thanks indeed.
It could be even better if you would inform me
Where you won this same prize by your cleverness."
1395 "That was not in our agreement," said he, "ask nothing else;
For you have had what is due to you, expect to receive nothing more."

They laughed and joked awhile
In speech deserving praise;
1400 Then quickly went to sup
On new delicacies.

Afterwards they sat by the fire in the lord's chamber,
And servants many times brought in marvelous wine;
And once again in their jesting they agreed the next day 1405 To observe the same covenant as they had made before:
Whatever fortune befell them, to exchange what they won,
Whatever new things they were, at night when they met.
They renewed the agreement before the whole court—
The pledge-drink was brought in with jokes at that time—
1410 Then they graciously took leave of each other at last,
Every man hastening quickly to bed.
By the time cock-crow had sounded three times
The lord had leapt out of bed and each of his men,
So that breakfast and mass were duly done,
1415 And long before daybreak they were all on their way to the chase.
Through fields they canter soon,
Loud with hunting-horns;
Headlong the hounds run
1420 Uncoupled among the thorns.

Soon they give tongue at the edge of a marsh;
The huntsman urged on the hounds that found the scent first,
Shouting at them wildly in a loud voice.
The hounds who heard him raced there in haste

¹ crowen ... bot thryse Cocks supposedly crowed at midnight, 3 a.m., and 6 a.m.

1425 And fellen as fast to the fuyt, fourty at ones;
 Thenne such a glaver ande glam of gedered rachchez
 Ros that the rocherez rungen aboute;
 Hunterez hem hardened with horne and wyth muthe.
 Then al in a semblé sweyed togeder
 1430 Bitwene a flosche in that fryth and a foo cragge;
 In a knot bi a clyffe, at the kerre syde,
 Ther as the rogh rocher unrydely was fallen,
 Thay ferden to the fyndyng, and frekez hem after;
 Thay umbekesten the knarre and the knot bothe,
 1435 Wyghez, whyl thay wysten wel wythinne hem it were,
 The best that ther breved watz wyth the blodhoundez.
 Thenne thay beten on the buskez, and bede hym upryse,
 And he unsoundly out soght seggez overthwert;
 On the sellokest swyn swenged out there,
 1440 Long sythen fro the sounder that sighed for olde,
 For he watz borelych and brode, bor alther-grattest,
 Ful grymme quen he gronyed; thenne greved mony,
 For thre at the fyrst thrast he thryght to the erthe,
 And sparred forth good sped boutte spyt more.
 1445 Thise other halowed hyghe! ful hyghe, and hay! hay!
 cryed,
 Haden hornez to mouthe, heterly rechated;
 Mony watz the myry mouthe of men and of houndez
 That buskkez after this bor with bost and wyth noyse to quelle.
 1450 Ful ofte he bydez the baye,
 And maymez the mute inn melle;
 He hurtez of the houndez, and thay
 Ful yomerly yaule and yelle.

Schalkez to shote at hym schowen to thenne, 1455 Haled to hym of her arewez, hitten hym oft;
 Bot the poyntez payred at the pyth that pyght in his scheldeze, And the barbez of his browe bite non wolde;
 Thagh the schaven schafte schyndered in pieces,
 The hede hypped agayn were-so-ever hit hitte.
 1460 Bot quen the dyntez hym dered of her dryghe strokez,
 Then, braynwod for bate, on burnez he rasez,
 Hurtz hem ful heterly ther he forth hyghez,
 And mony arghed therat, and on lyte droghen.
 Bot the lorde on a lyght horce launces hym after,
 1465 As burne bolde upon bent his bugle he blowez,
 He rechated, and rode thurgh ronez ful thyk,
 Suande this wylde swyn til the sunne schafted.

1425 And rushed towards the trail, forty of them together.
 Then such a deafening babel from gathered hounds rose
 That the rocky bank echoed from end to end.
 Huntsmen encouraged them with horn-blasts and shouts;
 And then all in a throng they rushed together
 1430 Between a pool in that thicket and a towering crag.
 On a wooded knoll near a cliff at the edge of the marsh
 Where fallen rocks were untidily scattered,
 They ran to the dislodging, with men at their heels.
 The hunters surrounded both the crag and the knoll 1435 Until they were certain that inside their circle
 Was the beast which had made the bloodhounds give tongue.
 Then they beat on the bushes and called him to come out;
 And he broke cover ferociously through a line of men.
 An incredible wild boar charged out there,
 1440 Which long since had left the herd through his age,
 For he was massive and broad, greatest of all boars,
 Terrible when he snorted. Then many were dismayed,
 For three men in one rush he threw on their backs,
 And made away fast without doing more harm.
 1445 The others shouted "hi!" and "hay, hay!" at the tops of their voices,
 Put horns to mouth and loudly sounded recall.
 Many hunters and hounds joyfully gave tongue,
 Hurrying after this boar with outcry and clamor to kill.
 1450 Often he stands at bay,
 And maims the circling pack,
 Wounding many hounds
 That piteously yelp and bark.

Men press forward to shoot at him then,
 1455 Loosed their arrows at him, hit him many times;
 But those that struck his shoulders were foiled by their toughness,
 And none of them could pierce through the bristles on his brow.
 Although the polished shaft shattered into pieces,
 The head rebounded away wherever it struck.
 1460 But when the hits hurt him with their constant blows,
 Frenzied with fighting he turns headlong on the men,
 And injures them savagely when he charges out,
 So that many grew fearful and drew back further.
 But the lord on a lively horse races after him,
 1465 Like a valiant hunter, blowing his horn.
 He urged the hounds on, and through dense thickets rode Following this wild boar until the sun went down.

This day wyth this ilk dede thay dryven on this wyse,
 Whyle oure luflych lede lys in his bedde,

1470 Gawayn graythely at home, in gerez ful ryche of hewe.

The lady noght forgate
 Com to hym to salue;
 Ful erly ho watz hym ate¹
 1475 His mode for to remwe.

Ho commes to the cortyn, and at the knyght totes.
 Sir Wawen her welcumed worthy on fyrst,
 And ho hym yeldez agayn ful yerne of hir wordez,
 Settez hir softly by his syde, and swythely ho laghez, 1480 And wyth a luflych loke ho layde hym thyse wordez:
 "Sir, yif ye be Wawen, wonder me thynkkez,
 Wyghe that is so wel wrast alway to god,
 And connez not of compaynye² the costez undertake;
 And if mon kennes yow hom to knowe, ye kest hom of our mynde;

1485 Thou hatz foryeten yederly that yisterday I taght te Bi alder-trest token of talk that I cowthe."
 "What is that?" quoth the wyghe, "Iwysse I wot never;
 If hit be sothe that ye breve, the blame is myn awen."
 "Yet I kende yow of kyssyng," quoth the clere thenne, 1490 "Quere-so countenaunce is couthe³ quikly to clayme;
 That bicumes uche a knyght that cortaysy uses."
 "Do way," quoth that derf mon, "my dere, that speche;
 For that durst I not do, lest I devayed⁴ were.
 If I were werned, I were wrang, iwysse, yif I profered."
 1495 "Ma fay,"⁵ quoth the meré wyf, "ye may not be werned,
 Ye ar stif innoghe to constrayne wyth strenkthe, yif yow lykez,
 Yif any were so vilanous that yow devaye wolde."
 "Ye, be God," quoth Gawayn, "good is your speche;
 Bot threte is unthryvande in thede ther I lende, 1500 And uche gift that is geven not with goud wylle.
 I am at your comaundement, to kysse quen yow lykez,
 Ye may lach quen yow lyst, and leve quen yow thynkkez,
 in space."

The lady loutez adoun
 1505 And comlyly kysses his face;

So they spent the day in this manner, in this wild chase,
 While our gracious knight lies in his bed:

1470 Gawain, happily at home amid bright-colored bedding
 so rich.

Nor did the lady fail
 To wish her guest good day;
 Early she was there
 1475 His mood to mollify.

She comes to the curtain and peeps in at the knight.
 Sir Gawain welcomes her politely at once,
 And she returns his greeting with eager speech,
 Seats herself gently at his side and quickly laughs,
 1480 And with a charming glance at him uttered these words:
 "Sir, if you are Gawain, it astonishes me
 That a man always so strongly inclined to good,
 Cannot grasp the rules of polite behavior,
 And if someone instructs him, lets them drop out of mind.

1485 You have quickly forgotten what I taught you yesterday,
 By the very truest lesson I could put into words."
 "What was that?" said the knight, "Indeed, I don't know at all.
 If what you say is true, the blame is all mine."
 "Yet I told you about kissing," the fair lady replied, 1490 "To act quickly wherever a glance of favor is seen;
 That befits every knight who practises courtesy."
 "Dear lady, enough of such talk," said that brave man,
 "For I dare not do that, lest I were refused.
 If repulsed, I should be at fault for having presumed."
 1495 "Ma foi," said the gay lady, "you could not be refused;
 You are strong enough to force your will if you wish,
 If any woman were so ill-mannered as to reject you."
 "Yes, indeed," said Gawain, "what you say is quite true;
 But in my country force is considered ignoble,
 1500 And so is each gift that is not freely given.
 I am at your disposal, to kiss when it pleases you,
 You may take one when you like, and stop as seems good,
 in a while."

She bends down over him
 1505 And gives the knight a kiss;

¹ watz hym ate At him in one of two senses or both: in his bedchamber, and bothering him.

² compaynye Critics have suggested that the term may have amorous connotations.

³ Quere-so countenaunce is couthe Wherever looks of favor are shown.

⁴ devayed Denied, refused: a neologism from Old French, repeated by the lady at 1497.

⁵ Ma fay I.e., ma foi, French: "By my faith," as asseveration.

Much speche thay ther expoun
Of druyes greme and grace.

"I woled wyt at yow, wyghe," that worthy then sayde,
"And yow wrathed not therwyth, what were the skylle
That so yong and so yepe as ye at this tyme,
So cortayse, so knyghtly, as ye ar knowen oute—
And of alle chevalry to chose, the chef thyng alosed
Is the lel layk of luf, the lettrure of armes;
For to telle of this tevelyng of this trwe knyghtez,
Hit is the tytelet token and tyxt of her werkkez;
How ledes for her lel lufe hor lyvez han auntered,
Endured for her drury dulful stoundez,
And after wenged with her walour and voyded her care,
And broght blysse into boure¹ with bountees hor awen—
And ye ar knyght comlokest kynd of your elde,
Your worde and your worchip walkez ayquere,
And I haf seten by yourself here sere twyes,
Yet herde I never of your hed helde no wordez
That ever longed to luf, lasse ne more;
And ye, that are so cortays and coynt of your hetes,²
Oghe to a yonke thynk yern to schewe
And teche sum tokenez of trweluf craftes.
Why, ar ye lewed, that alle the los weldez?
Other elles ye demen me to dille your dalyaunce to herken?

For schame!

I com hider sengel, and sitte
To lerne at yow sum game;
Dos, techez me of your wytte
Whil my lorde is fro hame."

"In goud faythe," quoth Gawain, "God yow foryelde!
Gret is the gode gle, and gomen to me huge,
That so worthy as ye wolde wynne hidere,
And pyne yow with so pouer a man, as play wyth your
knyght
With anys kynnez countenaunce, hit keverez me ese;
Bot to take the torvayle to myself to trwluf expoun,
And towche the temez of tyxt and talez of armez
To yow that, I wot wel, weldez more slyght
Of that art, bi the half, or a hundreth of seche
As I am, other ever schal, in erde ther I leve, Hit were a folé felefolde, my fre, by my trawthe.

For long they then discuss Love's misery and bliss.

"I would learn from you, sir," said that gentle lady,
"If the question was not irksome, what the reason was
That someone as young and valiant as yourself,
So courteous and chivalrous as you are known far and wide—
And of all the aspects of chivalry, the thing most praised
Is the true practice of love, knighthood's very lore;
For to speak of the endeavors of true knights,
The written heading and text of their deeds is that:
How knights have ventured their lives for true love,
Suffered for their love-longings dismal times,
And later taken revenge on their misery through valor,
Bringing joy to their ladies through their personal merits—
And you are the outstanding knight of your time,
Your fame and your honor are known everywhere,
And I have sat by you here on two separate occasions
Yet never heard from your mouth a solitary word
Referring to love, of any kind at all.
And you, who make such courteous and elegant vows,
Should be eager to instruct a youthful creature,
And teach her some elements of skill in true love.
What, are you ignorant, who enjoy such great fame?
Or do you think me too silly to take in courtly chat?

For shame!

I come here alone, and sit
To learn your special play;
Show me your expertise
While my husband is away."

"In good faith," said Gawain, "may God reward you!
It gives me great gladness and pleases me hugely
That one as noble as yourself should make your way here,
And trouble yourself with a nobody, trifling with your knight
With any kind of favor: it gives me delight.
But to take the task on myself of explaining true love,
And treat the matter of romance and chivalric tales
To you whom—I know well—have more expertise
In that subject by half than a hundred such men
As myself ever can, however long I may live,
Would be absolute folly, noble lady, on my word.

¹ into boure Into the lady's bower.

² coynt of your hetes Gracious in your promises of knightly service.

I wolde yowre wylnyng worche at my myght,
 As I am hyghly bihalden, and evermore wylle
 Be servaunt to yourselven, so save me Dryghtyn!"
 Thus hym frayned that fre, and fondet hym ofte, 1550 For to haf wonnen hym to woghe,¹ what-so scho thocht ellez;
 Bot he defended hym so fayr that no faut semed,
 Ne non evel on nawther halve, nawther thay wysten
 bot blyse.

Thay laghed and layked long;
 1555 At the last scho con hym kysse,
 Hir leve fayre con scho fonge,
 And went hir waye, iwysse.

Then ruthes hym the renk and ryses to the masse,
 And sithen hor diner watz dyght and derely served.
 1560 The lede with the ladyez layked alle day,
 Bot the lorde over the londez launced ful ofte,
 Swez his uncely swyn, that swynges bi the bonkkez
 And bote the best of his braches the bakkez in sunder
 Ther he bode in his bay, tel bawemen hit breken, 1565 And madee hym mawgref his hed² for to mwe utter,
 So felle flonez ther flete when the folk gedered.
 Bot yet the styffest to start bi stoundez he made,
 Til at the last he watz so mat he myght no more renne,
 Bot in the hast that he myght he to a hole wynnez
 1570 Of a rasse bi a rokk ther rennez the boerne.
 He gete the bonk at his bak, bigynez to scrape,³
 The frothe femed at his mouth unfayre bi the wykez,
 Whettez his whyte tuschez; with hym then irked
 Alle the burnez so bolde that hym by stoden 1575 To nye hym on-ferum, bot neghe hym non durst for wothe;
 He hade hurt so mony byforne
 That al thught thenne ful lothe
 Be more wyth his tusches torne
 1580 That breme watz and braynwode bothe.

Til the knyght com hymself, kachande his blonk,
 Sygh hym byde at the bay, his burnez bysyde;
 He lyghtes luflych adoun, levez his corsour,
 Braydez out a bryght bront and bigly forth strydez, 1585 Foundez fast thurgh the forth ther the felle bydez.

I will carry out your desires with all my power,
 As I am in all duty bound, and always will be
 The servant of your wishes, may God preserve me!"
 Thus that lady made trial of him, tempting him many times 1550 To have led him into mischief, whatever her purpose;
 But he defended himself so skillfully that no fault appeared,
 Nor evil on either side, nor anything did they feel but delight.
 They laughed and bantered long;
 1555 Then she kissed her guest;
 Charmingly took her leave,
 And went her way at last.

Then Gawain rouses himself and dresses for mass,
 And afterwards dinner was cooked and splendidly served.
 1560 The knight diverted himself with the ladies all day,
 But the lord raced ceaselessly over the countryside,
 After his menacing boar, that scurries over the hills,
 And bit the backs of his bravest hounds asunder
 Where he stood at bay, until archers broke it, 1565 And forced him unwillingly to move into the open;
 So thickly the arrows flew when the hunters gathered.
 But yet he made the bravest of them flinch at times,
 Until at last he was so tired that he could run no more,
 And as fast as he can he makes his way to a hole
 1570 By a rocky ledge overlooking the stream.
 He gets the river-bank at his back, begins to scrape—
 The froth foamed hideously at the corners of his mouth—
 And whets his white tusks. Then it grew irksome
 For all the bold men who surrounded him trying 1575 To wound him from afar, but for the danger none dared to get close;
 So many had been hurt
 That no one wished to risk
 To be more savaged by 1580 A maddened boar's tusk.

Until the lord himself came, spurring his horse,
 Saw the boar standing at bay, ringed by his men;
 He nimbly dismounts, leaving his courser,
 Unsheathes a bright sword and mightily strides,
 1585 Hastens quickly through the stream towards the waiting boar.

¹ to haf wonnen hym to woghe It is uncertain whether woghe means "wrong" or "woo."

² mawgref his hed In spite of himself.

³ bigynez to scrape Angrily scrapes (the earth with his feet).

The wylde watz war of the wyghe with weppen in honde,
 Hef heghly the here, so hetterly he fnast
 That fele ferde for the freke, lest felle hym the worre.
 The swyn settez hym out on the segge even,
 1590 That the burne and the bor were both upon hepez
 In the wyghtest of the water: the worre hade that other,
 For the mon merkkez hym wel, as thay mette fyrst,
 Set sadly the scharp in the slot even,
 Hit hym up to the hult, that the hert schyndered, 1595 And he yarrande hym yelde, and yedoun the water ful tyt.

A hundreth houndez hym hent,
 That bremely con hym bite,
 Burnez him broght to bent,
 1600 And doggez to dethe endite.

There watz blawying of prys in mony breme horne,
 Heghe halowing on highe with hathelz that myght;
 Brachetes bayed that best, as bidden the maysterez
 Of that chargeaunt chace that were chef huntres.
 1605 Thenne a wyghe that watz wys upon wodcraftez
 To unlace this bor lufly bigynnez.
 Fyrst he hewes of his hed and on highe settez,
 And sythen rendez him al roge bi the rygge after,
 Braydez out the boweles, brennez hom on gleder,
 1610 With bred blent therwith his braches rewardez.
 Sythen he britnez out the brawn in bryght brode cheldez,
 And hatz out the hastlettez, as highly bisemez;
 And yet hem halchez al hole the halvez togeder,
 And sythen on a stif stange stoudly hem henges.
 1615 Now with this ilk swyn thay swengen to home;
 The bores hed watz borne bfore the burnes selven
 That him forferde in the forthe thurgh forse of his honde so stronge.

Til he seye Sir Gawayne
 1620 In halle hym thoght ful longe;
 He calde, and he com gayn
 His feez ther for to fonge.

The lorde ful lowde with lote and laghter myry,
 When he seye Sir Gawayn, with solace he spekez; 1625 The goude ladyez were geten, and gedered the meyny,
 He schewez hem the scheldez, and schapes hem the tale
 Of the largesse and the lenthe, the lithemez also

The beast saw the man with his weapon in hand,
 Raised his bristles erect, and so fiercely snorted
 That many feared for the man, lest he got the worst of it.
 The boar charged out, straight at the man,
 1590 So that he and the beast were both in a heap
 Where the water was swiftest. The other had the worse;
 For the man takes aim carefully as the two met,
 And thrust the sword firmly straight into his throat,
 Drove it up to the hilt, so that the heart burst open, 1595 And squalling he gave up, and was swept through the water downstream.
 Seized by a hundred hounds
 Fierce and sharp of tooth,
 Men dragged him to the bank,
 1600 And dogs do him to death.

There was sounding of capture from many brave horns,
 Proud shouting by knights as loud as they could,
 Hounds bayed at that beast, as bidden by the masters
 Who were the chief huntsmen of that wearisome chase.
 1605 Then a man who was expert in hunting practice
 Skilfully begins to dismember this boar.
 First he cuts off the head and sets it on high,
 And then roughly opens him along the spine,
 Throws out the entrails, grills them over embers,
 1610 And rewards his hounds with them, mixed with bread.
 Next he cuts out the boar's-meat in broad glistening slabs,
 And takes out the innards, as properly follows;
 Yet he fastens the two sides together unbroken,
 And then proudly hangs them on a strong pole.
 1615 Now with this very boar they gallop towards home;
 Carrying the boar's head before the same man
 Who had killed it in the stream by force of his own strong hand.
 Until he saw Gawain
 1620 It seemed a tedious time,
 He gladly came when called,
 His due reward to claim.

The lord, noisy with speech and merry laughter,
 Joyfully exclaims at the sight of Sir Gawain.
 1625 The good ladies were brought down and the household assembled;
 He shows them the sides of meat, and gives an account
 Of the boar's huge size and the ferocity

Of the were of the wylde swyn in wod ther he fled.
 That other knyght ful comly comended his dedez,
 1630 And praysed hit as a gret prys that he proved hade,
 For suche a browne of a best, the bolde burne sayde,
 Ne such sydes of a swyn segh he never are.
 Thenne hondeled thay the hoge hed, the hende mon hit prayed,
 And let lodly therat the lorde for to here.
 1635 "Now, Gawayn," quoth the godmon, "this gomen is your awen
 By fyn forward and faste, faythely ye knowe."
 "Hit is sothe," quoth the segge, "and as siker trwe Alle my get I schal yow gif agayn, bi my trawthe."
 He hent the hathel aboute the halse, and hendely hym
 kysses,
 1640 And eftersones of the same he served hym there.
 "Now ar we even," quoth the hathel, "in this eventide,
 Of alle the covauntes that we knyrt, sythen I com hider,
 bi lawe."
 The lorde sayde, "Bi saynt Gile,
 1645 Ye ar the best that I knowe!
 Ye ben ryche in a whyle,
 Such chaffer and ye drowe."¹

Thenne thay teldet tablez trestes alofte,
 Kesten clothez upon; clere lyght thenne 1650 Wakned by woves, waxen torches;
 Segges sette and served in sale al aboute;
 Much glam and gle glent up therinne
 Aboute the fyre upon flet, and on fele wyse
 At the soper and after, mony athel songez, 1655 As coundutes of Krystmasse and carolez newe,
 With al the manerly merthe that mon may of telle.
 And ever oure luflych knyght the lady bisyde,
 Such semblaunt to that segge semly ho made
 Wyth stille stollen countenance, that stalworth to plese, 1660 That al forwondered watz the wyghe, and wroth with hymselfen,
 Bot he nolde not for his nurture nurne hir agaynez, Bot dalt with hir al in daynté, how-se-ever the dede turned towrast.
 Quen thay hade played in halle
 1665 As longe as hor wylle hom last,

Of the fight with the beast in the wood where he fled.
 The other knight warmly commended his deeds,
 1630 And praised his action as proof of his excellence,
 For such boar's-meat, the brave knight declared,
 And such sides of wild boar he had never seen before.
 Then they picked up the huge head, the polite man praised it
 And pretended to feel horror, to honor the lord.
 1635 "Now, Gawain," said his host, "this quarry is all yours,
 By fully ratified covenant, as you well know."
 "That is so," said the knight, "and just as truly indeed
 I shall give you all I gained in return, by my pledged word."
 He grasped the lord round the neck and graciously kisses him, 1640 And then a second time treated him in the same way.
 "Now we are quit," said Gawain, "at the end of the day,
 Of all the agreements we have made since I came here, in due form."
 The lord said, "By St. Giles, 1645 You're the best man I know!
 You'll be a rich one soon
 If you keep on trading so."

Then tables were set up on top of trestles,
 And tablecloths spread on them: bright light then 1650 Glittered on the walls from waxen torches.
 Attendants laid table and served throughout hall.
 A great noise of merry-making and joking arose
 Round the fire in the center; and of many kinds,
 At supper and afterwards, noble songs were sung,
 1655 Such as Christmas carols and the newest dances,
 With all the fitting amusement that could be thought;
 Our courteous knight sitting with the lady throughout.
 Such a loving demeanor she displayed to that man,
 Through furtive looks of affection to give him delight,
 1660 That he was utterly astonished and angry inside;
 But he could not in courtesy rebuff her advances,
 But treated her politely, even though his actions might be misconstrued.
 When the revelry in hall
 1665 Had lasted long enough,

¹ Such chaffer and ye drowe If you carry on such a trade (since on the second day Gawain has doubled his takings). Bertilak makes another joking allusion to marketing at the third exchange: see 1938–39.

To chambre he con hym calle,
And to the chemné thay past.

Ande ther thay dronken, and dalten, and demed eft nwe
To norne on the same note on Nwe Yerez even;
670 Bot the knyght craved leue to kayre on the morn,
For hit watz neghe at the terme that he to schulde.
The lorde hym letted of that, to lenge hym resteyed,
And sayde, "As I am trwe segge, I siker my trawthe
Thou schal cheve to the grene chapel thy charres to make,
1675 Leude, on Nw Yeres lyght, longe bifore pryme.¹
Forthy thou lye in thy loft and lach thyn ese,
And I schal hunt in this holt, and halde the towchez,² Chaunge wyth the chevisaunce, bi that I charre hider;
For I haf fraysted the twys, and faythful I fynde the.
1680 Now 'thrid tyme throwe best' thenk on the morne,
Make we mery quyl we may and mynne upon joye,
For the lur may lach when-so mon lykez."
This watz graythely graunted, and Gawayn is lenged, Bliche broght watz hym drynk, and thay to bedde yeden 1685 with light.
Sir Gawayn lis and slepes
Ful stille and softe al night;
The lorde that his craftz kepes,³
Ful erly he watz dight.

1690 After messe a morsel he and his men token;
Miry watz the mornyng, his mounture he askes.
Alle the hatheles that on horse schulde helden hym after
Were boun busked on hor blonkkez bifore the halle gategz.
Ferly fayre watz the folde, for the forst clenged;
1695 In red rudede upon rak rises the sunne,
And ful clere castez the clowdes of the welkyn.
Hunteres unhardeled bi a holt syde,
Rocheres rounge bi rys for rurde of her hornes;
Summe fel in the fute ther the fox bade,
1700 Traylez ofte a traveres⁴ bi traunt of her wyles;
A kenet kryes therof, a hunt on hym calles;
His felawes fallen hym to, that fnaasted ful thiike,
Runnen forth in a rabel in his ryght fare,

To the fireside in his room
The lord took Gawain off.

And there they drank and chatted, and spoke once again
To repeat the arrangement on New Year's Eve;
1670 But the knight begged leave to depart the next day,
For it was near time for the appointment that he had to keep.
The lord held him back, begging him to remain,
And said, "As I am an honest man, I give you my word
That you shall reach the Green Chapel to settle your affairs, 1675 Dear sir, on New Year's Day, well before nine.
Therefore lie in your bed enjoying your ease,
And I shall hunt in the woods, and keep the compact,
Exchange winnings with you when I return here;
For I have tested you twice, and find you trustworthy.
1680 Now tomorrow remember, 'Best throw third time';
Let us make merry while we can and think only of joy,
For misery can be found whenever a man wants it."
This was readily agreed, and Gawain is stayed;
Drink was gladly brought to him, and with torches they went 1685 to their beds.
Sir Gawain lies and sleeps
All night taking his rest;
While eager for his sport
By dawn the lord was dressed.

1690 After mass he and his men snatched a mouthful of food:
The morning was cheerful, he calls for his horse.
All the knights who would ride after him on horses
Were ready arrayed in the saddle outside the hall doors.
The countryside looked splendid, gripped by the frost;
1695 The sun rises fiery through drifting clouds,
And then dazzling bright drives the rack from the sky.
At the edge of a wood hunters unleashed the hounds;
Among the trees rocks resounded with the noise of their horns.
Some picked up the scent where a fox was lurking,
1700 Search back and forwards in their cunning practice.
A small hound gives tongue, the huntsman calls to him,
His fellows rally around, panting loudly,
And dash forward in a rabble right on the fox's track.

Thou schal cheve ... bifore pryme Prime begins either at 6 a.m. or at sunrise. At 1073 Bertilak promises that Gawain will cum to that merk at mydmorn, meaning at 9 a.m. In fact the sun rises when he is on the way to the Green Chapel, 2085–86. In northwest England midwinter sunrise would not occur before 8 a.m. Two hours earlier it would be completely dark.

² halde the towchez Keep the terms of the agreement.

³ that his craftz kepes Who attends to his pursuits.

⁴ Traylez ofte a traveres Track the scent by working back and forth across the line.

And he fyskez hem byfore; thay founden hym sone,
 1705 And quen thay seghe hym with syght thay sued hym fast,
 Wreghande hym ful weterly with a wroth noyse;
 And he trantes and tornayeez thurgh mony tene greve,
 Havilounes, and herkenes bi hegges ful ofte.
 At the last bi a littel dich he lepez over a spenne, 1710 Stelez out ful stilly bi a strothe rande,
 Went half wylt of the wode¹ with wylez fro the houndes;
 Thenne watz he went, er he wyst, to a wale tryster,
 Ther thre thro at a thrich thrat hym at ones,
 al graye.
 1715 He blenched agayn bilyve,
 And stifly start on-stray,²
 With alle the wo on lyve
 To the wod he went away.

Thenne watz hit list upon lif to lythen the houndez,
 1720 When alle the mute hade hym met, menged togeder:
 Such a sorwe at that syght thay sette on his hede
 As alle the clamberande clyffes hade clatered on hepes;
 Here he watz halawed, when hatelez hym metten,
 Loude he watz yained with yarande speche;
 1725 Ther he watz threted and ofte thef called,
 And ay the titleres at his tayl, that tary he ne myght.
 Ofte he watz runnen at, when he out rayked,
 And ofte reled in agayn, so Reniarde³ watz wylé.
 And ye, he lad hem bi lagmon,⁴ the lorde and his meyny,
 1730 On this maner bi the mountes quyle myd-over-under,⁵ Whyle the hende knyght at hom holsumly slepes
 Withinne the comly cortynes, on the colde morne.
 Bot the lady for luf let not to slepe,
 Ne the purpose to payre that pyght in hir hert,
 1735 Bot ros hir up radly, rayked hir theder,
 In a mery mantyle, mete to the erthe,
 That watz furred ful fyne with fellez wel pured;
 No hwez⁶ goud on hir hede bot the hagher stones
 Trased aboute hir tressour by twenty in clusteres;
 1740 Hir thryven face and hir throte throwen al naked,

He scampers ahead of them, they soon found his trail,
 1705 And when they caught sight of him followed fast,
 Abusing him furiously with an angry noise.
 He twists and dodges through many a dense copse,
 Often doubling back and listening at the hedges.
 At last he jumps over a fence by a little ditch,
 1710 Creeps stealthily by the edge of a bush-covered marsh,
 Thinking to escape from the wood and the hounds by his wiles.
 Then he came, before he knew it, to a well-placed station,
 Where three fierce greyhounds flew at him at once in a rush.
 1715 Undaunted changing course
 He quickly swerved away,
 Pursued into the woods
 With hideous outcry.

Then it was joy upon earth to hear the hounds giving tongue
 1720 When all the pack had come upon him, mingled together:
 Such a cursing at that sight they called down on his head
 As if all the clustering cliffs had crashed down in a mass.
 Here he was yelled at when hunters happened upon him,
 Loudly he was greeted with chiding speech;
 1725 There he was reviled and often called thief,
 And always the hounds at his tail, that he could not pause.
 Many times he was run at when he made for the open,
 And many times doubled back, so cunning was Reynard.
 And yes! strung out he led them, the lord and his followers,
 1730 Across the hills in this manner until mid-afternoon,
 While the knight in the castle takes his health-giving sleep
 Behind splendid bed-curtains on the cold morn.
 But out of love the lady did not let herself sleep,
 Nor the purpose to weaken that was fixed in her heart;
 1735 But rose from her bed quickly and hastened there
 In a charming mantle reaching to the ground,
 That was richly lined with well-trimmed furs:
 No modest coif on her head, but skillfully cut gems
 Arranged about her hair-fret in clusters of twenty;
 1740 Her lovely face and throat displayed uncovered,

¹ Went half wylt of the wode Thought to have escaped out of the wood.

² on-stray In a different direction.

³ Reniarde Renard was the crafty fox hero of a series of old French poems.

⁴ he lad hem bi lagmon The critic Norman Davis explains lagmon as "the last man in a line of reapers," who would advance diagonally across a field; hence "strung out."

⁵ quyle myd-over-under Various explained as mid-morning, mid-day, or afternoon. When the fox is killed it is niegh nyght (1922).

⁶ hwez So the manuscript; some critics prefer hwef. The sense of the passage is that the lady is not wearing the headdress of a married woman.

Hir brest bare bifore, and bihinde eke.
 Ho comez withinne the chambre dore, and closes hit hir after,
 Wayvez up a wyndow, and on the wyghe callez,
 And radly thus rehayted hym with hir riche wordes, 45 with chere:
 "A, mon, how may thou slepe,
 This morning is so clere?"
 He watz in drowping depe,
 Bot thenne he con hir here.

750 In dreggh droupyng of dreame draveled that noble,¹
 As mon that watz in mornyng of mony thro thoghtes,
 How that destiné schulde that day dele hym his wyrde
 At the grene chapel, when he the gome metes,
 And bihoves his buffet abide withoute debate more;
 755 Bot quen that comly com he kevered his wyttes,
 Swenges out of the swevenes, and swarez with hast.
 The lady luflych com laghande swete,
 Felle over his fayre face, and fetly hym kyssed;
 He welcumez hir worthily with a wale chere.
 760 He sey hir so glorious and gayly atyred,
 So fautles of hir fetures and of so fyne hewes,
 Wight wallande joye warmed his hert.
 With smothe smylyng and smolt thay smeten into merthe,
 That al watz blis and bonchef that breke hem bitwene, 765 and wyenne.
 Thay lanced wordes gode,
 Much wele then watz therinne;
 Gret perile bitwene hem stod,
 Nif Maré of hir knyght mynne.

770 Fo that prynces of pris depresed hym so thikke,
 Nurned hym so neghe the thred, that nede hym bihoved
 Other lach ther hir luf other lodly refuse.
 He cared for his cortaysye, lest crathayn he were,
 And more for his meschef yif he schulde make synne,
 775 And be traytor to that tolke that that telde aght.
 "God schylde," quoth the schalk, "that schal not befall!"
 With luf-laghyng a lyt he layd hym bysyde
 Alle the spechez of specialté that sprange of her mouthe.
 Quoth that burde to the burne, "Blame ye disserve
 780 Yif ye luf not that lyf that ye lye nexte,

Her breast was exposed, and her shoulders bare.
 She enters the chamber and shuts the door after her,
 Throws open a window and calls to the knight,
 Rebuking him at once with merry words 1745 in play:
 "Ah, sir, how can you sleep?
 The morning is so clear!"
 Deep in his drowsiness
 Her voice broke in his ear.

1750 In the stupor of a dream that nobleman muttered,
 Like a man overburdened with troublesome thoughts;
 How destiny would deal him his fate on the day
 When he meets the man at the Green Chapel,
 And must stand the return blow without any more talk:
 1755 But when that lovely one spoke he recovered his wits,
 Broke out of his dreaming and hastily replied.
 The gracious lady approached him, laughing sweetly,
 Bent over his handsome face and daintily kissed him.
 He welcomes her politely with charming demeanor;
 1760 Seeing her so radiant and attractively dressed,
 Every part of her so perfect, and in color so fine,
 Hot passionate feeling welled up in his heart.
 Smiling gently and courteously they made playful speech,
 So that all that passed between them was happiness, joy 1765 and delight.
 Gracious words they spoke,
 And pleasure reached its height.
 Great peril threatened, should
 Mary not mind her knight.

1770 For that noble lady so constantly pressed, Pushed him so close to the verge, that either he must Take her love there and then or churlishly reject it.
 He felt concerned for good manners, lest he behaved like a boor,
 And still more lest he shame himself by an act of sin, 1775 And treacherously betray the lord of the castle.
 "God forbid!" said the knight, "That shall not come about!"
 With affectionate laughter he put to one side
 All the loving inducements that fell from her mouth.
 Said that lady to the knight, "You deserve rebuke 1780 If you feel no love for the person you are lying beside,

¹ In dreggh . . . that noble A literal translation—"In a heavy troubled sleep that nobleman muttered"—misses the grinding effect of the alliterated words.

Bifore alle the wyghez in the worlde wounded in hert,
 Bot if ye haf a lemman, a lever, that yow lykez better,
 And folden fayth to that fre, festned so harde
 That yow lausen ne lyst—and that I leve nouthe;
 1785 And that ye telle me that now trwly I pray yow,
 For alle the lufez upon lyve layne not the sothe for gile.”

The knyght sayde, “Be sayn Jon,”
 And smethely con he smyle, 1790 “In fayth I welde right non,
 Ne non wil welde the quile.”

“That is a worde,” quoth that wyght, “that worst is of alle,
 Bot I am swared for sothe, that sore me thinkkez.
 Kysse me now comly, and I schal cach hethen,
 1795 I may bot mourne upon molde, as may that much lovyes.”
 Sykande ho sweghe doun and semly hym kyssed,
 And sithen ho severes hym fro, and says as ho stondes,
 “Now, dere, at this departyng do me this ese,
 Gif me sumquat of thy gifte, thi glove if hit were,
 1800 That I may mynne on the, mon, my mournyng to lassen.”
 “Now iwysse,” quoth that wyghe, “I wolde I hade here
 The levest thing for thy luf that I in londe welde,
 For ye haf deserved, for sothe, sellyly ofte
 More rewarde bi resoun then I reche myght;
 1805 Bot to dele yow for drurye that dawed bot naked,
 Hit is not your honour to haf at this tyme
 A glove for a garysoun of Gawaynez giftez;
 And I am here an erande in erdez uncouthen,
 And have no men wyth no males with menskful thingez;
 1810 That mislykez me, ladé, for luf at this tyme, Iche tolke mon do as he is tan, tas to non ille ne pine.”

“Nay, hende of hyghe honours,”
 Quoth that lufsum under lyne,
 1815 “Thagh I hade noght of yourez,
 Yet schulde ye have of myne.”

Ho raght hym a riche rynk of red golde werkez,
 With a starande ston stondande alofte
 That bere blusshande bemez as the bryght sunne—1820 Wyt ye wel, hit watz worth wele ful hoge.
 Bot the renk hit renayed, and redyly he sayde,
 “I wil no giftez, for God, my gay, at this tyme;
 I haf none yow to norne, ne noght wyl I take.”

More than anyone on earth wounded in her heart;
 Unless you have a mistress, someone you prefer,
 And have plighted troth with that lady, so strongly tied
 That you wish not to break it—which now I believe;
 1785 And I beg you now to confess that honestly:
 For all the loves in the world hide not the truth in guile.”

The knight said, “By St. John,”
 And gave a pleasant smile, 1790 “In truth I have no one,
 Nor seek one for this while.”

“That remark,” said the lady, “is the worst you could make,
 But I am answered indeed, and painfully, I feel.
 Kiss me now lovingly, and I will hasten from here,
 1795 I must spend my life grieving, as a woman deeply in love.”
 Sighing she stooped down and kissed him sweetly,
 And then moves away from him and says, standing there,
 “Now, dear sir, do me this kindness at parting,
 Give me something as a present, for instance your glove,
 1800 That I may remember you by, to lessen my sorrow.”
 “Now truly,” said that man, “I wish I had here
 The dearest thing in the world I possess for your love,
 For you have truly deserved, wonderfully often,
 More recompense by right than I could repay.
 1805 But to give you as love-token something worth little Would do you no honor, or to have at this time
 A glove for a keepsake, as Gawain’s gift.
 I am here on a mission in unknown country,
 And have no servants with bags full of precious things;
 1810 That grieves me, lady, for your sake at this time,
 But each man must do as conditions allow; take no offense or pain.”

“No, most honored sir,”
 Then said that lady free, 1815 “Though I get no gift from you,
 You shall have one from me.”

She held out a precious ring of finely worked gold
 With a sparkling jewel standing up high,
 Its facets flashing as bright as the sun:
 1820 Take my word, it was worth an enormous sum.
 But the knight would not accept it, and straightaway said,
 “I want no gifts, I swear, dear lady, at this time;
 I have nothing to offer you, and nothing will I take.”

825 Ho bede hit hym ful bysily, and he hir bode wernes,
 And swere swyfte by his sothe that he hit sese nolde,
 And ho soré that he forsoke, and sayde thereafter,
 "If ye renay my rynk, to ryche for hit semez,
 Ye wolde not so hyghly halden be to me,
 I schal gif yow my girdel, that gaynes yow lasse."
 830 Ho lacht a lace lyghtly that leke umbe hir sydez,
 Knit upon hir kyrtel under the clere mantyle;
 Gered hit watz with grene sylke and with golde schaped,
 Noght bot arounde brayden,¹ beten with fyngez;
 And that ho bede to the burne, and blythely bisoght,
 835 Thagh hit unworthi were, that he hit take wolde.
 And he nay that he nolde neghe in no wyse
 Nauther golde ne garysoun, er God hym grace sende
 To acheve to the chaunce that he hade chosen there.
 "And therfore, I pray yow, displese yow noght, 840 And lettez be your businesse, for I baythe hit yow never to graunte.

I am derely to yow biholde
 Bicause of your sembelaunt,
 And ever in hot and colde
 845 To be your trwe servaunt."

"Now forsake ye this silke," sayde the burde thenne,
 "For hit is symple in hitself? and so wel hit semez.
 Lo, so hit is littel, and lasse hit is worthy;
 But who-so knew the costes that knit ar therinne,
 850 He wolde hit prayse at more prys, paraventure.
 For quat gome so is gorde with this grene lace,
 While he hit hade hemely halched aboute,
 Ther is no hathel under heven tohewe hym that myght,
 For he myght not be slayn for slyght upon erthe."
 855 Then kest the knyght, and hit come to his hert
 Hit were a juel for the jopardé that hym jugged were:
 When he acheved to the chapel his chek for to fech,
 Myght he haf slypped to be unslynn, the sleght were noble.
 Thenne he thulged with hir threpe and tholed hir to speke, 860 And ho bere on hym the belt and bede hit hym swythe—
 And he granted and hym gaf with a goud wylle—
 And bisoght hym, for hir sake, discever hit never,
 Bot to lelly layne fro hir lorde; the leude hym acordez
 That never wyghe schulde hit wyt, iwyssse, bot thay twayne 865 for noghte.

She pressed him insistenty, and he declines her request, 1825 Swearing quickly on his word that he would never touch it,
 And she was grieved that he refused it, and said to him then,
 "If you reject my ring because you think it too precious,
 And wish not to be so deeply indebted to me,
 I shall give you my girdle, that profits you less."
 1830 Quickly she unbuckled a belt clipped round her waist,
 Fastened over her kirtle beneath the fine mantle;
 It was woven of green silk and trimmed with gold,
 Embroidered at the edges and decorated by hand;
 And this she offered to the knight, and sweetly implored him 1835 That despite its slight value he would accept it.
 And he declared absolutely that he would never agree
 To take either gold or keepsake before God gave him grace
 To finish the task he had undertaken.
 "And therefore I beg you, do not be displeased, 1840 And cease your insisting, for I shall never be brought to consent.

I am deeply in your debt
 Because of your kind favor,
 And will through thick and thin
 1845 Remain your servant ever."

"Now, do you refuse this belt," the lady said then,
 "Because it is worth little? and so truly it appears.
 See, it is indeed a trifle, and its worth even less;
 But anyone who knew the power woven into it 1850 Would put a much higher price on it, perhaps.
 For whoever is buckled into this green belt,
 As long as it is tightly fastened about him
 There is no man on earth who can strike him down,
 For he cannot be killed by any trick in the world."
 1855 Then the knight reflected, and it flashed into his mind
 This would be a godsend for the hazard he must face
 When he reached the chapel to receive his deserts;
 Could he escape being killed, the trick would be splendid.
 Then he suffered her pleading and allowed her to speak,
 1860 And she pressed the belt on him, offering it at once—
 And he consented and gave way with good grace—
 And she begged him for her sake never to reveal it,
 But loyally hide it from her husband. Gawain gives his word
 That no one should ever know of it, not for anything, 1865 but themselves.

¹ Noght bot arounde brayden No part of which was not embroidered at the edges.

He thonkked hir oft ful swythe,
 Ful thro with hert and thoght.
 Bi that on thrynne sythe
 Ho hatz kyst the knyght so toght.

1870 Thenne lachchez ho hir leve, and levez hym there,
 For more myrthe of that mon moght ho not gete,
 When ho watz gon, Sir Gawayn gerez hym sone,
 Rises and riches him in araye noble,
 Lays up the luf-lace the lady hym raghte,
 1875 Hid hit ful holdely, ther he hit eft fonde.
 Sythen chevely to the chapel choses he the waye,
 Prevély aproched to a prest, and prayed hym there
 That he wolde lyste his lyf¹ and lern hym better
 How his sawle schulde be saved when he schuld seye hethen.
 1880 There he schrof hym schyrly and schewed his mysdedez,
 Of the more and the mynne, and merci besechez,
 And of absolucioun he on the segge calles;
 And he asoyled hym surely and sette hym so clene
 As domezday schulde haf ben dight on the morn.
 1885 And sythen he mace hym as mery among the fre ladyes,
 With comelych caroles and alle kynnes joye,
 As never he did bot that daye, to the derk nyght,
 with blys.
 Uche mon hade daynté thare
 1890 Of hym, and sayde, "Iwysse,
 Thus mery he watz never are,
 Syn he com hider, er this."

Now hym lenge in that lee, ther luf hym bityde!
 Yet is the lorde on the launde ledande his gomnes.
 1895 He hatz forfaren this fox that he folwed longe;
 As he sprent over a spenne to spy the schrewe,
 Ther as he herd the howndes that hasted hym swythe,
 Renaud com richchande thurgh a roghe greve,
 And alle the rabel in a res ryght at his helez.
 1900 The wyghe watz war of the wylde, and warly abides,
 And braydez out the bryght bronde, and at the best castez.
 And he schunt for the scharp, and schulde haf
 arered;

He gave her heartfelt thanks
 With earnest mind and sense;
 By then she has three times
 Kissed that valiant prince.

1870 Then she takes her departure, leaving him there,
 For more pleasure from that man was not to be had.
 When she had gone, Gawain quickly makes himself ready,
 Gets up and dresses himself in splendid array,
 Puts away the love-token the lady gave him,
 1875 Hid it carefully where he could find it again.
 Then quickly to the chapel he makes his way,
 Approached a priest privately, and besought him there
 To hear his confession and instruct him more clearly
 How his soul could be saved when he leaves this world.
 1880 There he confessed himself honestly and admitted his sins,
 Both the great and the small, and forgiveness begs,
 And calls on the priest for absolution.
 And the priest absolved him completely, and made him as clean
 As if the Judgment were appointed for the next day.
 1885 And then Gawain makes merry with the noble ladies,
 With charming dance-songs and gaiety of all kinds,
 As he never did before that day, until darkness fell,
 with joy.
 Each man had courtesy
 1890 From him, and said, "Sure,
 So merry since he came
 He never was before."

Let him stay in that shelter, and love come his way!
 But still the lord is afiel, enjoying his sport.
 1895 He has headed off the fox that he pursued so long;
 As he leapt over a hedge to look for the villain,
 Where he heard the hounds barking as they chased him fast,
 Reynard came running through a rough thicket
 With the pack howling behind him, right at his heels.
 1900 The man caught sight of the fox, and warily waits,
 Unsheathes his bright sword and slashes at the beast;
 And he swerved away from the blade and would have turned back.

¹ lyste his lyf Hear his confession. Much ink has been spilt over the passage. If Gawain tells the priest about his love-token he would be obliged to return it; if he does not reveal the liaison he cannot be schrof/schyrly or given absolution.

A rach rapes hym to, ryght er he myght,
 And ryght bfore the hors fete thay fel on hym alle,
 905 And worried me this wyly¹ wyth a wroth noyse.
 The lorde lyghtez bilyve, and lachez hym sone,
 Rased hym ful radly out of the rach mouthes,
 Haldez heghe over his hede, halowez faste,
 And ther bayen aboute hym mony brath houndez.
 910 Huntres hyghed hem theder with hornez ful mony,
 Ay rechatande aryght til thay the renk seyen.
 Bi that watz comen his compeyny noble
 Alle that ever ber bugle blowed at ones,
 And alle thise other halowed that had no hornes;
 915 Hit watz the myriest mute that ever men herde,
 The rich rurd that ther watz rayzed for Renaude saule with lote.
 Hor houndez thay ther rewarde,
 Her hedez thay fawne and frote,
 1920 And sythen thay tan Reynarde
 And tyrven of his cote.

And thenne thay helden to home, for hit watz niegh nyght,
 Strakande ful stoutly in hor store hornez.
 The lorde is lyght at last at hys lef home,
 1925 Fyndeze fire upon flet, the freke ther-byside,
 Sir Gawayn the gode, that glad watz withalle,
 Among the ladies for luf he ladde much joye.
 He were a bleaunt of blwe that bradde to the erthe,
 His surkot semed hym wel that softe watz forred, 1930 And his hode of that ilke hinged on his schulder,
 Blande al of blaunner were bothe al aboute.
 He metez me this godmon inmyddez the flore,
 And al with gomen he hym gret, and goudly he sayde,
 "I schal fylle upon fyrst oure forwardez nouthe, 1935 That we spedly han spoken, ther spared watz no drynk."
 Then acoles he the knyght and kysses hym thryes,
 As saverly and sadly as he hem sette couthe.
 "Bi Kryst," quoth that other knyght, "ye cach much sele
 In chevisaunce of this chaffer, yif ye hade goud chepez."²

A hound rushed at him before he could turn,
 And right at the horse's feet the pack fell on him all,
 1905 Tearing at the wily one with an enraged noise.
 The lord swiftly dismounts, grabs the fox at once,
 Lifted it quickly out of the hounds' mouths,
 Holds it high over his head, halloos loudly,
 And many fierce hounds surround him there, baying.
 1910 Hunters hurried towards him with many horns blowing,
 Sounding rally in proper fashion until they saw the lord.
 When his noble company was all assembled,
 Everyone carrying a bugle blew it at once,
 And the others, without horns, raised a great shout.
 1915 It was the most glorious baying that man ever heard,
 The noble clamor set up there for Reynard's soul with din.
 Hunters reward their hounds,
 Heads they rub and pat;
 1920 And then they took Reynard
 And stripped him of his coat.

And then they set off for home, for it was nearly night,
 Stridently sounding their mighty horns.
 At last the lord dismounts at his well-loved home, 1925 Finds a fire burning in hall, the knight waiting beside,
 Sir Gawain the good, completely content,
 Taking great pleasure from the ladies' affection.
 He wore a blue mantle of rich stuff reaching the ground;
 His softly furred surcoat suited him well,
 1930 And his hood of the same stuff hung on his shoulder,
 Both trimmed with ermine along the edges.
 He meets his host in the middle of the hall,
 Laughingly greeted him, and courteously said,
 "Now I shall first carry out the terms of our covenant, 1935 Which we readily agreed on when wine was not spared."
 Then he embraces the lord and gives him three kisses,
 With as much relish and gravity as he could contrive.
 "By God," said that other knight, "you had much luck
 In winning this merchandise, if the price was right."

¹ worried me this wyly Tore at the fox. The ethic dative me is colloquial. Other examples occur at 2014 and 2144.

² yif ye hade goud chepez If you struck a good bargain.

- 1940 "Ye, of the chepe no charg," quoth cheffly that other,
 "As is pertly payed the porchaz that I aghte."
 "Mary," quoth that other man, "myn is bihynde,
 For I haf hunted al this day, and noght haf I geten
 Bot this foule fox felle—the fende haf the godez!
 1945 And that is ful pore for to pay for suche prys thinges
 As ye haf thryght me here thro, suche thre cosses so gode."
 "Inogh," quoth Sir Gawayn,
 "I thonk yow, bi the rode";¹
 1950 And how the fox watz slayn
 He tolde hym as thay stode.

- With merthe and mynstralsye, wyth metez at hor wylle,
 Thay maden as mery as any men moghten
 With laghyng of ladies, with lotez of bordez.
 1955 Gawayn and the godemon so glad were thay bothe
 Bot if the douthe had doted, other dronken ben other.²
 Both the mon and the meyny maden mony japez
 Til the sesoun watz seggen that thay sever moste;
 Burnez to hor bedde behoved at the laste.
 1960 Thenne lowly his leve at the lorde fyrst
 Fochchez this fre mon, and fayre he hym thonkkez:
 "Of such a selly sojorne as I haf hade here,
 Your honour at this hyghe fest, the hyghe kyng yow yelde!
 I gef yow me for on of youre, if yowreself lykez,
 1965 For I mot nedes, as ye wot, meve to-morne,
 And ye me take sum tolke to teche, as ye hyght,
 The gate to the grene chapel,³ as God wyl me suffer
 To dele on Nw Yerez day the dome of my wyrdes."⁴
 "In god faythe," quoth the godmon, "wyth a goud wylle 1970 Al that ever I yow hyght halde schal I redé."
 Ther asyngnes he a servaunt to sette hym in the waye,
 And coundue hym by the downez, that he no drechch had,
 For to ferk thurgh the fryth⁵ and fare at the gaynest bi greve.

- 1940 "Oh, never mind the price," replied the other quickly,
 "So long as the goods I got have been honestly paid."
 "Marry," said the other man, "mine don't compare,
 For I have hunted all day, and yet have caught nothing
 But this stinking fox pelt—the devil take the goods!
 1945 And that is a meager return for such precious things
 As you have warmly pressed on me, three such kisses so good."
 "Enough," said Gawain,
 "I thank you, by the Rood";
 1950 And how the fox was killed
 He heard as there they stood.

- With mirth and minstrelsy, and all the food they would wish,
 They made as much merriment as any men could
 With laughter of ladies and jesting remarks.
 1955 Both Gawain and the lord were ravished with joy
 As if the company had gone crazy or taken much drink.
 Both the lord and his retainers played many tricks
 Until the time came round when they must separate:
 Folk to their beds must betake them at last.
 1960 Then humbly this noble knight first takes leave
 Of the lord, and graciously gives him thanks:
 "For such a wonderful stay as I have had here,
 Honored by you at this holy feast, may God repay you!
 I offer myself as your servant, if you agree,
 1965 For I am compelled, as you know, to leave tomorrow,
 If you will assign someone to show me, as you promised,
 The road to the Green Chapel, as God will allow me,
 To get what fate ordains for me on New Year's Day."
 "In good faith," said the lord, "very willingly, 1970 Everything I ever promised you I shall readily give."
 There he appoints a servant to put Gawain on the road
 And guide him over the fells, so that he would not be delayed,
 To ride through the woods and take the shortest path
 in the trees.

¹ bi the rode I.e., by the Cross (on which Christ was crucified).

² Gawayn ... other The syntax of these two lines seems erratic. Instead of following so glad with a comparison "as if" the poet continues Bot if, meaning unless. The intended sense of the passage seems to be, "They could only have been more deliriously happy if the whole company had gone crazy or got drunk."

³ I gef yow ... grene chapel Gawain politely offers to become Bertilak's servant (on of youre) if he will give him a man (take sum tolke) to guide him to the Green Chapel.

⁴ the dome of my wyrdes The judgment of my fate.

⁵ to ferk thurgh the fryth To ride through the wood, as Gawain does at 2084. Bi greve refers to it again.

75 The lorde Gawayn con thonk,
Such worchip he wolde hym weve.
Then at tho ladyez wlonk
The knyght hatz tan his leve.

With care and wyth kyssyng he carppez hem tille,
And fele thryvande thonkkez he thrat hom to have,
And thay yelden hym agayn yeply that ilk.
Thay bikende hym to Kryst with ful colde sykynggez.
Sythen fro the meyny he menskly departes;
Uche mon that he mette, he made hem a thonke
For his servyse and his solace and his sere pyne,
That thay wyth busynes had ben aboute hym to serve;
And uche segge as soré to sever with hym there
As thay hade wonde worthyly with that wlonk ever.
Then with ledes and lyght he watz ladde to his chambre,
And blythely brought to his bedde to be at his rest.
Yif he ne slepe soundly say ne dar I,
For he hade muche on the morn to mynne, yif he wolde,
in thoght.

Let hym lyghe there stille,
He hatz nere that he soght;
And ye wyl a whyle be style¹
I schal telle yow how thay wroght.

FITT 4

Now neghez the Nw Yere, and the nyght passez,
The day dryvez to the derk, as Dryghtyn biddez;
Bot wyld wederez of the worlde wakned theroute,
Clowdes kesten kenly the colde to the erthe,
Wyth nyghe innoghe of the northe the naked to tene.
The snawe snitered ful snart, that snapped the wyld;
The werbelande wynde wapped fro the hyghe,
And drof uche dale ful of dryftes ful grete.
The leude lystened ful wel that ley in his bedde,
Thagh he lowkez his liddez, ful lyttel he slepes;
Bi uch kok that crue he knwe wel the steven.
Deliverly he dressed up, er the day sprenged,
For there watz lyght of a laumpe that lemed in his chambre;
He called to his chamberlayn, that cofly hym swared,

1975 Gawain thanked the lord,
Paying him great respect;
Then from those noble ladies
Took leave, as was correct.

With tears and with kisses he addresses them both,
1980 And begged them to accept many profuse thanks,
And they immediately returned the same words to him.
They commended him to Christ with many deep sighs.
Then from the household he takes courteous leave;
To each man whom he met he expressed his thanks
1985 For his service and kindness and the personal pains
They had taken in busying themselves for his sake;
And each man was as sorry to part from him there
As if they had honorably lived with that nobleman ever.
Then with attendants and torches he was led to his room, 1990 And cheerfully brought to his bed and his rest.
Whether or not he slept soundly I dare not say,
For he had much about the next day to turn over, if he wished,
in his mind.

Let him lie there undisturbed,
1995 He is close to what he sought;
Be quiet a short while,
And I'll tell how things turned out.

PART 4

Now the New Year approaches and the night wears away,
The dawn presses against the darkness, as the Creator bids, 2000 But rough weather blows up in the country outside,
Clouds empty their bitter cold contents on the earth,
With enough malice from the north to torment the ill-clad.
Snow pelted down spitefully, stinging the wild creatures;
The wind shrilly whistled down from the fells,
2005 Choking the valleys with enormous drifts.
The knight lay in bed listening intently,
Although his eyelids are shut very little he sleeps;
Each cock-crow reminded him of his undertaking.
He got up quickly before the day dawned,
2010 For there was light from a lamp burning in his room;
He called to his chamberlain, who answered him promptly,

¹ stille . . . style Literary convention of the time allowed homonyms to be used as rhyme-words different in sense; here "without moving," 1994, and "without noise," 1996.

And bede hym bryng hym his bruny and his blonk sadel;
 That other ferkez hym up and fechez hym his wedez,
 And graythez me Sir Gawayn upon a grett wyse.
 2015 Fyrst he clad hym in his clothez the colde for to were,
 And sythen his other harnays, that holdely watz keped,
 Bothe his paunce and his platez, piked ful clene,
 The rynges rokked of the roust of his riche bruny;
 And al watz fresch as upon fyrst, and he watz fayn thenne 2020 to thonk.

He hade upon uche pece,
 Wypped ful wel and wlonk;
 The gayest unto Grece
 The burne bede bryng his blonk.

2025 Why the wlonkest wedes he warp on hymselfen—
 His cote wyth the conysaunce of the clere werkez
 Ennurned upon velvet, vertuus stonez
 Aboute beten and bounden, enbrauded semez,
 And fayre furred withinne wyth fayre pelures—
 2030 Yet laft he not the lace, the ladies gifte,
 That forgat not Gawayn for gode of hymselfen.
 Bi he hade belted the bronde upon his balghe haunchez,
 Thenn dressed he his drurye double hym aboute,
 Swythe swethled umbe his swange swetely that knyght
 2035 The gordel of the grene silk, that gay wel bisemed,
 Upon that ryol red clothe that ryche watz to schewe.
 Bot wered not this ilk wyghe for wele this gordel,
 For pryde of the pendauntez, thagh polyst thay were,
 And thagh the glyterande golde glent upon endez,
 2040 Bot for to saven hymself, when suffer hym byhoved,
 To byde bale withoute dabate of bronde hym to were other knyffe.

Bi that the bolde mon boun
 Wynnez theroute bilyve,
 2045 Alle the meyny of renoun
 He thonkkez ofte ful ryve.

Thenne watz Gryngolet graythe, that gret watz and huge,
 And hade ben sojourned saverly and in a siker wyse,
 Hym lyst prik for poynt, that proude hors thenne.
 2050 The wyghe wynnez hym to and wytez on his lyre,
 And sayde soberly hymself and by his soth swerez:
 “Here is a meyny in this mote that on menske thenkkez,
 The mon hem maynteines, joy mot thay have;
 The leve lady on lyve luf hir bityde;

Bade him bring his mail-shirt and saddle his horse.
 The man leaps out of bed and fetches him his clothes,
 And gets Gawain ready in splendid attire.
 2015 First he puts clothing on him to keep out the cold,
 And then the rest of his gear, that had been well looked after,
 His body-armor and his plate, all polished clean,
 The rings of his fine mail-shirt rocked free of rust;
 Everything unstained as at first, for which he gladly 2020 gave thanks.

Wearing each metal piece
 Rubbed clean of stain and spot,
 The best-dressed man on earth
 Ordered his horse be brought.

2025 While he dressed himself in his noblest clothes—
 His coat with its finely embroidered badge
 Set upon velvet, with stones of magical power
 Inlaid and clasped round it, with embroidered seams,
 And richly lined on the inside with beautiful furs—
 2030 He did not leave out the belt, the lady’s present:
 For his own good Gawain did not forget that.
 When he had buckled his sword on his curving hips,
 That noble knight bound his love-token twice
 Closely wrapped round his middle, with delight;
 2035 The girdle of green silk, whose color went well
 Against that splendid red surcoat that showed so fine.
 But the knight did not wear the belt for its costliness,
 Or for pride in its pendants, however they shone,
 Or because its edges gleamed with glittering gold, 2040 But to safeguard himself when he had to submit,
 To await death without sword to defend himself or blade.

When he was fully dressed
 The knight hurries outside,
 2045 And pays that noble household
 His debt of gratitude.

Then Gringolet was ready, that great horse and huge,
 Who had been stabled securely, keeping him safe;
 In such fine condition that he was eager to gallop.
 2050 The knight walks up to him and examines his coat,
 And said gravely to himself, swearing by his true word,
 “There is a company in the castle that keeps courtesy in mind;
 And a lord who supports them, may he have joy,
 And may the dear lady be loved all her life!

155 Yif thay for charyté cherysen a gest,
 And halden honour in her honde, the hathel hem yelde
 That haldez the heven upon hyghe, and also yow alle!
 And yif I myght lyf upon londe lede any quyle,
 I schuld rech yow sum rewarde redyly, if I myght."
 160 Thenn steppez he into stirop and strydez alofte;
 His schalk schewed hym his schelde, on schulder he hit laght,
 Gordez to Gryngolet with his gilt helez,
 And he startez on the ston, stod he no lenger
 to prauce.
 165 His hathel on hors watz thenne,
 That bere his spere and launce.
 "This kastel to Kryst I kenne":
 He gef hit ay god chaunce.¹

The brygge watz brayed down, and the brode gateg
 170 Unbarred and born open upon bothe halve.
 The burne blessed hym bilyve, and the brede passed—
 Prayses the porter bfore the prynce kneled,
 Gef hym God and goud day, that Gawain he save—
 And went on his way with his wyghe one,
 175 That schulde teche hym to tourne to that tene place
 Ther the ruful race he schulde resayve.
 Thay bowen bi bonkkez ther boghez ar bare,
 Thay clomben bi clyffez ther clengez the colde.
 The heven watz uphalt, bot ugly ther-under;
 180 Mist mugged on the mor, malt on the mountez,
 Uche hille hade a hatte, a myst-hakel huge.
 Brokez byled and breke bi bonkkez about,
 Schyre schaterande on schorez ther thay down showed.
 Wela wylle watz the way ther thay bi wod schulden, 185 Til hit watz sone sesoun that the sunne ryses
 that tyde.
 Thay were on a hille ful hyghe,
 The quyte snaw lay bisyde;
 The burne that rod hym by 190 Bede his mayster abide.

"For I haf wonnen yow hider, wyghe, at this tyme,
 And now nar ye not fer fro that note place
 That ye han spied and spured so specially after;
 Bot I schal say yow for sothe, sythen I yow knowe,

2055 If out of kindliness they cherish a guest
 And dispense hospitality, may the noble lord
 Who holds up heaven repay them, and reward you all!
 And were I to live any long time on earth
 I would gladly recompense you, if I could."
 2060 Then he sets foot in stirrup and vaults on to his horse;
 His servant gave him his shield, he slung it on his shoulder,
 Strikes spurs into Gringolet with his gilt heels,
 And he leaps forward on the paving, he waited no longer to prance.
 2065 His man was mounted then,
 Carrying his spear and lance.
 "I commend this house to God,
 May it never meet mischance."

The drawbridge was lowered, and the broad gates 2070 Unbarred and pushed open upon both sides.
 The knight blessed himself quickly and rode over the planks,
 Praises the porter who knelt before him
 Commending Gawain to God, that he should the knight save,
 And went on his way with his single guide,
 2075 Who would show him the way to that perilous place
 Where he must submit to a fearful stroke.
 They struggled up hillsides where branches are bare,
 They climbed up past rock-faces gripped by the cold.
 The clouds were high up, but murky beneath them,
 2080 Mist shrouded the moors, melted on the hills.
 Each summit wore a hat, a huge cloak of mist.
 Streams foamed and splashed down the slopes around them,
 Breaking white against the banks as they rushed downhill.
 Very wandering was the way they must take to the wood, 2085 Until soon it was time for sunrise at that point of the year.
 They were high up in the hills,
 By snow surrounded then;
 The servant at his side
 2090 Bade Gawain draw rein.

"For I have guided you here, sir, on this day,
 And now you are not far from that notorious place
 That you have searched and enquired for so specially.
 But I shall tell you truly—since I know who you are,

¹ He gef hit ay god chaunce Either Gawain wishes the castle lasting good fortune or, continuing his prayer in the previous line, hopes that Christ will do so, He gef then meaning "May he give."

2095 And ye are a lede upon lyve that I wel lovy,
 Wolde ye worch bi my wytte, ye worthed the better.
 The place that ye prece to ful perelous is halden;
 Ther wonez a wyghe in that waste, the worst upon erthe,
 For he is stiffe and sturne, and to strike lovies,
 2100 And more he is then any mon upon myddelerde,
 And his body bigger then the best fowre
 That ar in Arthurez hous, Hestor, other other.
 He chevez that chaunce at the chapel grene,
 Ther passes non bi that place so proude in his armes
 2105 That he ne dynges hym to dethe with dynt of his honde;
 For he is a mon methles, and mercy non uses,
 For be hit chorle other chaplayn that bi the chapel rydes,
 Monk other masseprest, other any mon elles,
 Hym thynk as queme hym to quelle as quyk go hymselfen.
 2110 Forthy I say the, as sothe as ye in sadel sitte,
 Com ye there, ye be kylled, I may the knyght rede;¹
 Trawe ye me that trwely, thagh ye had twenty lyves to spende.
 He hatz wonyd here ful yore,
 2115 On bent much baret bende,
 Agayn his dyntez sore
 Ye may not yow defende.

“Forthy, goude Sir Gawayn, let the gome one,
 And gotz away sum other gate, upon Goddez halve!
 2120 Cayrez bi sum other kyth, ther Kryst mot yow spede,
 And I schal hygh me hom agayn, and hete yow fyrrer
 That I schal swere bi God and alle his gode halwez,
 As help me God and the halydam, and othez innoghe,
 That I schal lelly yow layne,² and lance never tale
 2125 That ever ye fondet to fle for freke that I wyst.”
 “Grant merci,” quoth Gawayn, and gruchyng he sayde, “Wel worth the, wyghe, that woldez my gode,
 And that lelly me layne I leve wel thou woldez.
 Bot helde thou hit never so holde, and I here passed, 2130 Founded for ferde for to fle, in fourme that thou tellez,
 I were a knyght kowarde, I myght not be excused.
 Bot I wyl to the chapel, for chaunce that may falle,
 And talk wyth that ilk tulk the tale that me lyste,

2095 And you are a man whom I love dearly—
 If you would follow my advice, it would be better for you.
 The place you are going to is extremely dangerous;
 There lives a man in that wilderness, the worst in the world,
 For he is powerful and grim, and loves dealing blows,
 2100 And is bigger than any other man upon earth:
 His body is mightier than the four strongest men
 In Arthur’s household, Hector or any other.
 He so brings it about at the Green Chapel
 That no one passes that place, however valiant in arms, 2105 Who is not battered to death by force of his hand;
 For he is a pitiless man who never shows mercy.
 For whether peasant or churchman passes his chapel,
 Monk or mass-priest, or whatever man else,
 To him killing seems as pleasant as enjoying his own life.
 2110 Therefore I tell you, as sure as you sit in your saddle,
 If you go there you’ll be killed, I warn you, sir knight,
 Believe that for certain, though you had twenty lives
 to lose.
 He has dwelt there long,
 2115 And brought about much strife;
 Against his brutal blows
 Nothing can save your life.

“Therefore, good Sir Gawain, let the man be,
 And for God’s sake get away from here by some other road!
 2120 Ride through some other country, where Christ be your help,
 And I will make my way home again, and further I vow
 That I shall swear by God and all his virtuous saints—
 As help me God and the holy thing, and many more oaths—
 That I shall keep your secret truly, and never reveal 2125 That ever you took flight from a man that I knew.”
 “Many thanks,” replied Gawain, and grudgingly he spoke,
 “Good luck to you, man, who wishes my good,
 And that you would loyally keep my secret I truly believe.
 But however closely you kept it, if I avoided this place, 2130 Took to my heels in fright, in the way you propose,
 I should be a cowardly knight, and could not be excused.
 But I will go to the chapel, whatever may chance,
 And discuss with that man whatever matter I please,

I may the knyght rede I can tell you, knight. The original text does not include the first personal pronoun.

¹ I schal lelly yow layne The guide repeats Gawain’s promise to the lady at 1863.

Worthe hit wele other wo, as the wyrde lykez hit hafe.

Thaghe he be a sturn knape
To stightel, and stad with stave,
Ful wel con Dryghtyn schape
His servauntez for to save."

"Mary!" quoth that other man, "now thou so much spellez
That thou wylt thyn awen nye nyme to thyselfen,
And the lyste lese thy lyf, the lette I ne kepe.

Haf here thi helme on thy hede, thi spere in thi honde,
And ryde me doun this ilke rake bi yon rokke syde,

Til thou be broght to the bothem of the brem valay;

Thenne loke a littel on the launde, on thy lyfte honde,

And thou schal se in that slade the self chapel,

And the borelych burne on bent that hit kepez.

Now farez wel, on Godez half, Gawayn the noble!

For alle the golde upon grounde I nolde go wyth the,
Ne bere the felaghschip thurgh this fryth on fote fyrrre."

Bi that the wyghe in the wod wendez his brydel,

Hit the hors with the helez as harde as he myght,

Lepez hym over the launde, and levez the knyght there

al one.

"Bi Goddez self," quoth Gawayn,

"I wyl nauther grete ne grone;

To Goddez wylle I am ful bayn,

And to hym I haf me tone."

Thenne gyrdez he to Gryngolet, and gederez the rake,
Schowvez in bi a schore at a schawe syde,

Ridez thurgh the roghe bonk ryght to the dale;

And thenne he wayted hym aboute, and wylde hit hym thocht,

And seye no syngne of resette bisydez nowhere,

Bot hyghe bonkkez and brent upon bothe halve,

And rughe knokled knarrez with knorned stoncz;

The skwez of the scowtes skayned hym thocht.

Thenne he hoved, and wythhylde his hors at that tyde,

And ofte chaunged his cher the chapel to seche:

He seye non suche in no syde, and selly hym
thocht,

Save, a lyttle on a launde, a lawe as hit were;

A balgh berw bi a bonke the brymme bysyde,

Bi a forgh of a flode that ferked thare;

The borne blubred therinne as hit boyled hade.

The knyght kachez his caple and com to the lawe,

Whether good or ill come of it, as destiny decides.

Though an opponent grim
To deal with, club in hand,
His faithful servants God Knows well how to defend."

"Marry!" said the other man, "since your words make it clear
That you will deliberately bring harm on yourself,

And lose your life by your own wish, I won't hinder you.

Put your helmet on your head, take your spear in your hand,

And ride down this track beside the rock over there

Until it brings you to the bottom of the wild valley;

Then look to your left, some way off in the glade,

And you will see in that dale the chapel itself,

And the giant of a man who inhabits the place.

Now in God's name, noble Gawain, farewell!

For all the wealth in the world I would not go with you,
Nor keep you company through this wood one further step."

With that the man at his side tugs at his bridle,

Struck his horse with his heels as hard as he could,

Gallops over the hillside and leaves the knight there

alone.

Said Gawain, "By God himself,

I shall not moan or cry;

My life is in his hands,

His will I shall obey."

Then he sets spurs to Gringolet and picks up the path,
Makes his way down a slope at the edge of a wood,

Rides down the rugged hillside right to the valley;

And then looked about him, and it seemed a wild place,

And saw no sign of a building anywhere near,

But high and steep hillsides upon both sides,

And rough rocky crags of jagged stones:

The clouds grazing the jutting rocks, as it seemed.

Then he halted, and checked his horse for a while,

Often turning his face to look for the chapel.

He saw nothing of the kind anywhere, which he thought strange,

Except a way off in a glade, something like a mound;

A rounded hillock on the bank of a stream,

Near the bed of a torrent that tumbled there;

The water foamed in its course as though it had boiled.

The knight urges his horse and comes to the mound,

Lightez doun luflyly, and at a lynde tachez
 The rayne and his riche with a roghe braunche.
 Thenne he bowez to the berwe, aboute hit he walkez,
 Debatande with hymself quat hit be myght.
 2180 Hit hade a hole on the ende and on ayther syde,
 And overgrown with gresse in glodes aywhere,
 And al watz holw inwith, nobot an olde cave,¹
 Or a crevisse of an olde cragge, he couthe hit noght deme with spelle.

2185 “We, lorde!” quoth the gentyle knyght,
 “Whether this be the grene chapel?
 Here myght aboute mydnyght
 The dele his matynnes telle!

“Now iwysse,” quoth Wowayn, “wysty is here;
 2190 This oritore is ugly, with erbez overgrown;
 Wel bisemez the wyghe wruxled in grene
 Dele here his devocioun on the develez wyse.
 Now I fele hit is the fende, in my fyve wyttez,
 That hatz stoken me this steven to strye me here.
 2195 This is a chapel of meschaunce, that chekke hit bytyde!
 Hit is the corsdest kyrk that ever I com inne!”
 With hegh helme on his hede, his launce in his honde,
 He romez up to the roffe of the rogh wonez.
 Thene herde he of that hyghe hil, in a harde roche
 2200 Biyonde the broke, in a bonk, a wonder breme noyse:
 Quat! hit clatered in the clyff, as hit cleve schulde,
 As one upon a gryndelston hade grounden a sythe.
 What! hit wharred and whette, as water at a mulne;
 What! hit rusched and ronge, rawthe to here.
 2205 Thenne “Bi Godde,” quoth Gawayn, “that gere, as I trowe, Is ryched at the reverence me, renk, to mete bi rote.²
 Let God worche! ‘We loo’
 Hit helpez me not a mote.
 2210 My lif thagh I forgo,
 Drede dotz me no lote.”

Thenne the knyght con calle ful hyghe,
 “Who stighdez in this sted me steven to holde?

Alights nimbly, and makes fast to a tree
 The reins and his noble steed with a rough branch.
 Then he goes to the mound and walks around it,
 Wondering to himself what it could be.

2180 It had a hole at the end and on either side,
 And was covered all over with patches of grass,
 And was all hollow inside; nothing but an old cave,
 Or a fissure in an old rock: what to call it he hardly could tell.

2185 “Good lord!” said the noble knight,
 “Can the Green Chapel be this place?
 Here probably at midnight
 The devil his matins says!

“Now truly,” said Gawain, “this is a desolate place;
 2190 This chapel looks evil, with grass overgrown;
 Here fittingly might the man dressed in green
 Perform his devotions, in devilish ways.
 Now all my senses tell me that the devil himself
 Has forced this agreement on me, to destroy me here!
 2195 This is a chapel of disaster, may ill-luck befall it!
 It is the most damnable church I was ever inside.”
 With tall helmet on head, his lance in his hand,
 He climbs to the top of that primitive dwelling.
 Then he heard up the hillside, from behind a great rock, 2200 On the slope across the stream, a deafening noise:
 What! it echoed in the cliffs, as though they would split,
 As if someone with a grindstone were sharpening a scythe.
 What! it whirred and sang, like water at a mill;
 What! it rasped and it rang, terrible to hear.
 2205 Then said Gawain, “By God, these doings, I suppose,
 Are a welcoming ceremony, arranged in my honor
 as a knight.
 God’s will be done: ‘Alas’
 Helps me no whit here.
 2210 Although my life be lost,
 Noise cannot make me fear.”

Then the knight shouted at the top of his voice,
 “Who is master of this place, to keep tryst with me?

¹ nobot an olde cave An unlikely guess. The hollow mound half-covered with grass, with a hole on the ende and on ayther syde, has the characteristic form of a prehistoric burial chamber.

² Is ryched ... bi rote Is intended in honor of me, in order to meet a knight with due ceremony; or, if renk means a field of combat or a dueling-place, the noise is intended to mark (mete) it out ceremoniously.

For now is gode Gawayn goande ryght here.¹
 If any wyghe oght wyl, wynne hider fast,
 Other now other never, his nede to spede."
 "Abyde," quoth on on the bonke aboven his hede,
 "And thou schal haf al in hast that I the hyght ones."
 Yet he rusched on that rurde rapely a throwe,
 And wyth quetting awharf, er he wolde lyght;
 And sythen he keverez bi a cragge, and comez of a hole,
 Whyrlande out of a wro wyth a felle weppen,
 A denez ax nwe dyght, the dynt with to yelde,
 With a borelych bytte bende bi the halme,
 Fyled in a fylor, fowre foot large—
 Hit watz no lasse bi the lace that lemed ful bryght²—
 And the gome in the grene gered as fyrst,
 Bothe the lyre and the leggez, lokkez and berde,
 Save that fayre on his fote he foundez on erthe,
 Sette the stele to the stone, and stalked bysyde.
 When he wan to the watter, ther he wade nolde,
 He hypped over on hys ax, and orpedly strydez, Bremly brothe on a bent that brode watz aboute,
 on snawe.

Sir Gawayn the knyght con mete,
 He ne lutte hym nothyng lowe;
 That other sayde, "Now, sir swete,
 Of steven mon may the trowe.

"Gawayn," quoth that grene gome, "God the mot loke!
 Iwysse thou art welcom, wyghe, to my place,
 And thou hatz tyled thi travayl as truee mon schulde,
 And thou knowez the covenantez kest uus bytwene:
 At this tyme twelmonyth thou toke that the falled,
 And I schulde at this Nwe Yere yeply the quyte.
 And we ar in this valay verayly oure one;
 Here are no renkes us to rydde, rele as uus lykez.
 Haf thy helme of thy hede, and haf here thy pay.
 Busk no more debate then I the bede thenne
 When thou wypped of my hede at a wap one."
 "Nay, bi God," quoth Gawayn, "that me gost lante,

For now is good Gawain waiting right here.
 2215 If anyone wants something, let him hurry here fast, Either now or never, to settle his affairs."
 "Wait," said someone on the hillside above,
 "And you shall quickly have all that I promised you once."
 Yet he kept making that whirring noise for a while,
 2220 And turned back to his whetting before he would come down;
 And then makes his way among the rocks, bursting out of a hole,
 Whirling out of a nook with a fearsome weapon—
 A Danish axe newly made—for dealing the blow,
 With a massive blade curving back on the shaft,
 2225 Honed with a whetstone, four feet across—
 No less than that, despite the gleaming green girdle—
 And the man in the green, dressed as at first,
 Both his flesh and his legs, hair and beard,
 Except that grandly on foot he stalked on the earth,
 2230 Set the handle to the ground and walked beside it.
 When he came to the stream he refused to wade:
 He hopped over on his axe and forcefully strides, Fiercely grim on a clearing that stretched wide about,
 under snow.
 2235 Sir Gawain met the knight,
 Made him a frosty bow;
 The other said, "Good sir,
 A man may trust your vow.

"Gawain," said that green man, "may God protect you!
 2240 You are indeed welcome, sir, to my place;
 You have timed your journey as a true man should,
 And you know the agreement settled between us:
 A twelvemonth ago you took what fell to your lot,
 And I was to repay you promptly at this New Year.
 2245 And we are in this valley truly by ourselves,
 With no knights to separate us, so we can fight as we please.
 Take your helmet off your head, and here get your pay.
 Make no more argument than I offered you then,
 When you slashed off my head with a single stroke."
 2250 "No, by God," said Gawain, "who gave me a soul, umbe hir sydez, and 2030, the lace, the ladyez gifte. The belt is so designated at least eight times between 1830 and 2505, while lace in the first sense is not clearly mentioned again after 217. The more likely reading of the line is that the axe seemed enormous to Gawain, despite the assurance of the green belt, whose glyterande golde decoration explains lemed ful bryght.

¹ goande ryght here Walking right here, with a suggestion of being ready to leave immediately if no one answers.

² Hit watz... lemed ful bryght Commentators disagree about which lace the poet is referring to. The axe used by Gawain has a lace lapped aboute, that louked at the hede, 217 as part of its decoration. But the axe which the Green Knight has just finished sharpening is a different weapon, newly made and not apparently decorated. The other lace is the green girdle or luf-lace; see 1831, a lace ... that leke

I schal gruch the no grwe for grem that fallez.
 Bot styghtel the upon on strok, and I schal stonde style
 And warp the no wernyng to worch as the lykez, nowhere."¹

2255 He lened with the nek, and lutte,
 And schewed that schyre al bare,
 And lette as he noght dutte;
 For drede he wolde not dare.

2260 Then the gome in the grene graythed hym swythe,
 Gederez up hys grymme tole Gawain to smyte;
 With alle the bur in his body he ber hit on lofte,
 Munt as maghtyly as marre hym he wolde;
 Hade hym dryven adoun as dreghe as he atled,
 Ther hade ben ded of his dynt that doghty watz ever.²
 2265 Bot Gawayn on that giserne glyfte hym bysyde,
 As hit com glydande adoun on glode hym to schende,
 And schranke a lytel with the schulders for the scharp yme.
 That other schalk wyth a schunt the schene wyththaldez,
 And thenne reprevd he the prynce with mony prowde wordes:
 2270 "Thou art not Gawayn," quoth the gome, "that is so goud halden,

That never arghed for no here by hylle ne be vale,
 And now thou fles for ferde er thou fele harmez!
 Such cowardise of that knyght cowthe I never here.
 Nawther fyked I ne flaghe, freke, quen thou myntest, 2275 Ne kest no cavelacioun in kynges hous Arthor.
 My hede flagh to my fote, and yet flagh I never;
 And thou, er any harme hent, arghez in hert.
 Wherefore the better burne me burde be called therfore."

2280 Quoth Gawayn, "I schunt onez,
 And so wyl I no more;
 Bot thagh my hede falle on the stonez,
 I con not hit restore.

2285 "But busk, burne, bi thi fayth, and bryng me to the poynt.
 Dele to me my destiné, and do hit out of honde,³
 For I schal stonde the a strok, and start no more Til thy ax have me hitte: haf here my trawthe."
 "Haf at the thenne!" quoth that other, and hevez hit alofte,
 And waytez as wrothely as he wode were.

I shall bear you no grudge at all, whatever hurt comes about.
 Just limit yourself to one blow, and I will stand still
 And not resist whatever it pleases you to do
 at all."

2255 He bent his neck and bowed,
 Showing the flesh all bare,
 And seeming unafraid;
 He would not shrink in fear.

2260 Then the man dressed in green quickly got ready,
 Raised his terrible axe to give Gawain the blow;
 With all the strength in his body he heaved it in the air,
 Swung it as fiercely as if meaning to mangle him.
 Had he brought the axe down as forcibly as he acted,
 That courageous knight would have been killed by the blow;
 2265 But Gawain glanced sideways at that battle-axe
 As it came sweeping down to destroy him there,
 And hunched his shoulders a little to resist the sharp blade.
 The other man checked the bright steel with a jerk,
 And then rebuked the prince with arrogant words:
 2270 "You're not Gawain," said the man, "who is reputed so good,

Who never quailed from an army, on valley or on hill,
 And now flinches for fear before he feels any hurt!
 I never heard of such cowardice shown by that knight.
 I neither flinched nor fled, sir, when you aimed one at me,
 2275 Nor raised any objections in King Arthur's house.
 My head fell to the floor, yet I gave no ground;
 But you, though not wounded, are trembling at heart,
 So I deserve to be reckoned the better man for that."

2280 Gawain said, "I flinched once,
 But won't twice hunch my neck,
 Though if my head should fall
 I cannot put it back.

"But hurry up, man, by your faith, and come to the point.
 2285 Deal out my fate to me, and do it out of hand,
 For I shall let you strike a blow, and not move again Until your axe has hit me, take my true word."
 "Have at you then!" said the other, and raises it up,
 Contorting his face as though he were enraged.

¹ nowhere Anywhere you like. Gawain is only concerned that the Green Knight shall restrict himself to one stroke (2253).

² that doghty watz ever The man who was always brave.

out of honde I.e., out of hand: at once. The first recorded use of the phrase.

90 He myntez at hym maghtyly, bot not the mon rynez,
 Withhelde heterly his honde er hit hurt myght.
 Gawayn graythely hit bydez, and glent with no membre,
 Bot stode stytle as the ston, other a stubbe auther
 That ratheled is in roché grounde with rotez a hundreth.
 95 Then muryly efte con he mele, the mon in the grene,
 "So, now thou hatz thi hert holle, hitte me bihovs.
 Halde the now the hyghe hode that Arthur the raght,
 And kepe thy kanel at this kest, yif hit kever may."
 Gawayn ful gryndelly with greme thenne sayde:
 100 "Wy! thresch on, thou thro mon, thou thretez to longe;
 I hope that thi hert arghe wyth thyn awen selven."
 "For sothe," quoth that other freke, "so felly thou spekez,
 I wyl no lenger on lyte lette thin ernde¹ right nowe."

305 Thenne tas he hym strythe to stryke,
 And frounsez bothe lyppe and browe,
 No mervayle thagh hym myslyke
 That hoped of no rescowe.

He lyftes lyghtly his lome, and let hit doun fayre
 310 With the barbe of the bitte bi the bare nek;
 Thagh he homered heterly, hurt hym no more
 Bot snyrt hym on that on syde, that severed the hyde.
 The scharp schrank to the flesche thurgh the schyre grece,
 That the schene blod over his schulderes schot to the erthe;
 315 And quen the burne sey the blode blenk on the snawe,
 He sprit forth a spenne-fote² more then a spere lenthe,
 Hent heterly his helme, and his hed cast,
 Schot with his schulderes his fayre schelde under,
 Braydez out a bryght sworde, and bremly he spekez—
 320 Never syn that he watz burne borne of his moder
 Watz he never in this worlde wyghe half so blythe—
 "Blynne, burne, of thy bur, bede me no mo!
 I haf a stroke in this sted withoute stryf hent,
 And if thow rechez me any mo, I redyly schal quyte, 325 And yelde yederly agayn—and therto ye tryst—
 and foo.

Bot on stroke here me fallez—
 The covaunant ryght schop so,
 Fermed in Arthurez hallez—
 330 And therfore, hende, now hoo!"

2290 He swings the axe at him savagely, without harming the man,
 Checked his blow suddenly before it could inflict hurt.
 Gawain awaits it submissively, not moving a limb,
 But stood as still as a stone, or the stump of a tree
 Anchored in rocky ground by hundreds of roots.
 2295 Then the man in green spoke mockingly again,
 "So, now you have found courage it is time for the blow.
 Now may the order of knighthood given you by Arthur Preserve you and your neck this time, if it has power!"
 Then Gawain replied angrily, mortified deeply, 2300 "Why, strike away, you fierce man, you waste time in threats;
 I think you have frightened yourself with your words."
 "Indeed," said that other man, "you speak so aggressively
 That I will no longer delay or hinder your business
 at all."

2305 He takes his stance to strike,
 Puckering mouth and brow;
 No wonder if Gawain feels
 No hope of rescue now.

He swiftly raises his weapon, and brings it down straight 2310 With the cutting edge of the blade over Gawain's bare neck;
 Although he struck fiercely, he hurt him no more Than to slash the back of his neck, laying open the skin.
 The blade cut into the body through the fair flesh
 So that bright blood shot over his shoulders to the ground.
 2315 And when the knight saw his blood spatter the snow
 He leapt forward with both feet more than a spear's length,
 Snatched up his helmet and crammed it on his head,
 Jerked his shoulders to bring his splendid shield down,
 Drew out a gleaming sword and fiercely he speaks—
 2320 Never since that man was born of his mother
 Had he ever in the world felt half so relieved—
 "Hold your attack, sir, don't try it again!
 I have passively taken a blow in this place,
 And if you offer me another I shall repay it promptly 2325 And return it at once—be certain of that—with force.

One single blow is due;
 The contract is my proof,
 Witnessed in Arthur's hall;
 2330 And therefore, sir, enough!"

¹ I wyl no lenger on lyte lette thin ernde Literally, I will no longer in delay hinder your mission.

² spenne-fote With feet together.

The hathel heldet hym fro, and on his ax rested,
 Sette the schaft upon schore, and to the scharp lened,
 And loked to the leude that on the launde yede,
 How that doghty, dredles, dervely ther stondez
 2335 Armed, ful aghles: in hert hit hym lykez.
 Thenn he melez muryly wyth a much steven,
 And with a rynkande rurde he to the renk sayde:
 "Bolde burne, on this bent be not so gryndel.
 No mon here unmanerly the mysboden habbez, 2340 Ne kyd bot as covenaunde at kyngez kort schaped.
 I hyght the a strok and thou hit hatz, halde the wel payed;
 I relece the of the remnaunt of ryghtes alle other.
 Iif I deliver had bene, a boffet paraunter
 I couthe wrotheloker haf waret, to the haf wrought anger.
 2345 Fyrst I mansed the muryly with a mynt one,
 And rove the wyth no rofe-sore, with ryght I the profered
 For the forwarde that we fest in the fyrst nyght,¹
 And thou trystly the trawthe and trwly me haldez,
 Al the gayne thow me gef, as god mon schulde.
 2350 That other munt for the morne, mon, I the profered,
 Thou kyssedes my clere wyf—the cosses me raghtez.
 For bothe two here I the bede bot two bare myntes
 boute scathe.²
 Trwe mon trwe restore,
 2355 Thenne thar mon drede no wathe.
 At the thrid thou fayled thore,
 And therfore that tappe ta the.

"For hit is my wede that thou werez, that ilke woven girdel,
 Myn owen wyf hit the weved, I wot wel for sothe.
 2360 Now know I wel thy cosses, and thy costes als,
 And the wowyng of my wyf: I wrought it myselven.
 I sende hir to asay the, and sothly me thynkkez
 On the fautlest freke that ever on fote yede;
 As perle bi the quite pese is of prys more,
 2365 So is Gawain, in god fayth, bi other gay knyghtez.
 Bot here yow lakked a lyttel, sir, and lewté yow wonted;
 Bot that watz for no wylyde werke,³ ne wowyng nauther,
 Bot for ye lufed your lyf; the lasse I yow blame."
 That other stif mon in study⁴ stod a gret whyle,
 So agreved for greme he gryed withinne;
 Alle the blod of his brest blende in his face,

The knight kept his distance, and rested on his axe,
 Set the shaft on the ground and leaned on the blade,
 Contemplating the man before him in the glade;
 Seeing how valiant, fearlessly bold he stood there 2335 Armed and undaunted, he admired him much.
 Then he spoke to him pleasantly in a loud voice,
 And said to the knight in a resounding tone,
 "Brave sir, don't act so wrathfully in this place.
 No one has discourteously mistreated you here,
 2340 Or acted contrary to the covenant sworn at the king's court.
 I promised you a blow and you have it; think yourself well paid;
 I free you from the rest of all other obligations.
 Had I been more dextrous, maybe I could Have dealt you a more spiteful blow, to have roused your anger.
 2345 First I threatened you playfully with a pretence,
 And avoided giving you a gash, doing so rightly
 Because of the agreement we made on the first night,
 When you faithfully and truly kept your pledged word,
 Gave me all your winnings, as an honest man should.
 2350 That other feint, sir, I gave you for the next day,
 When you kissed my lovely wife and gave me those kisses.
 For both occasions I aimed at you two mere mock blows without harm.
 True man must pay back truly,
 2355 Then he need nothing fear;
 You failed me the third time
 And took that blow therefore.

"For it is my belt you are wearing, that same woven girdle,
 My own wife gave it to you, I know well in truth.
 2360 I know all about your kisses, and your courteous manners,
 And my wife's wooing of you: I arranged it myself.
 I sent her to test you, and to me truly you seem
 One of the most perfect men who ever walked on the earth.
 As pearls are more valuable than the white peas,
 2365 So is Gawain, in all truth, before other fair knights.
 Only here you fell short a little, sir, and lacked fidelity,
 But that was not for fine craftsmanship, nor wooing either,
 But because you wanted to live: so I blame you the less."
 That other brave man stood speechless a long while,
 2370 So mortified and crushed that he inwardly squirmed;
 All the blood in his body burned in his face,

¹ fyrst nyght The night before the first hunt.

boute scathe Without injury, unscathed.

³ wylyde werke Intricate workmanship (of the belt).

⁴ in study Lost in thought, speechless.

That al he schranke for schome that the schalk talked.
The forme worde upon folde that the freke meled:

"Corsed worth cowarddise and covetise both!

2375 In yow is vylany and vyse that vertue disstryez."

Thenne he kaght to the knot, and the kest lawsez,
Brayde brothely the belt to the burne selven:

"Lo, ther the falssyng, foule mot hit falle!

For care of thy knokke cowardise me taght

2380 To acorde me with covetise, my kynde to forsake,

That is larges and lewté that longez to knyghtez.

Now am I fawty and falce, and ferde haf ben ever

Of trecherye and untrawthe: bothe bityde sorwe and care!

2385 I biknowe yow, knyght, here stytle,

Al fawty is my fare;

Letez me overtake your wyll

And efte I schal be ware."

The loghe that other leude and luflyly sayde,

2390 "I halde hit hardily hole, the harme that I hade.¹

Thou art confessed so clene, beknowen of thy mysses,

And hatz the penaunce apert of the poynt of myn egge,

I halde the polysed of that plyght, and pured as clene

As thou hadez never forfeled sythen thou watz fyrst borne;

2395 And I gif the, sir, the gurdel that is golde-hemmed;

For hit is grene as my gowne, Sir Gawain, ye maye

Thenk upon this ilke threpe, ther thou forth thryngez

Among prynces of prys, and this a pure token

Of the chaunce of the grene chapel at chevalrous knyghtez.

2400 And ye schal in this Nwe Yer agayn to my wonez,

And we schyn revel the remnaunt of this ryche fest
ful bene."

Ther lathed hym fast the lorde

And sayde, "Wyth my wyf, I wene,

2405 We schal yow wel acorde,

That watz your enmy kene."

"Nay, for sothe," quoth the segge, and sesed hys helme,

And hatz hit of hendely, and the hathel thonkkez,

"I haf sojomed sadly; sele yow bytyde

2410 And he yelde hit yow yare that yarkkez al menskes!

And comaundez me to that cortays, your comlych fere,

Bothe that on and that other, myn honoured ladyez,

So that he winced with shame at what the man said.

The first words that the knight uttered there

Were, "A curse upon cowardice and covetousness!

2375 You breed boorishness and vice that ruin virtue."

Then he took hold of the knot and looses the buckle,

Flung the belt violently towards that man:

"There it is, the false thing, may the devil take it!

For fear of your blow taught me cowardice,

2380 To give way to covetousness; be false to my nature,

The generosity and fidelity expected of knights.

Now I am false and unworthy, and have always dreaded

Treachery and deceit: may misfortune and grief befall both!

2385 Sir, humbly I confess

My good name is marred.

Let me regain your trust,

Next time I'll be on guard."

Then the other man laughed, and graciously said,

2390 "The wrong you did me I consider wiped out.

You have so cleanly confessed yourself, admitted your fault,
And done honest penance on the edge of my blade.

I declare you absolved of that offence, and washed as clean
As if you had never transgressed since the day you were born.

2395 And I make you a gift, sir, of my gold-bordered belt;

Since it is green like my gown, Sir Gawain, you may Remember this meeting in the world where you mingle

With princes of rank: it will be a true token

Of the exploit of the Green Chapel among chivalrous knights.

2400 And you shall come back to my castle at this New Year,

And we will see out the revelry of this high feast
with joy."

He pressed him earnestly

And said, "We shall, I know,

2405 Reconcile you with my wife,

Who was your cunning foe."

"No, indeed," said the knight, and seizing his helmet

Takes it off politely and gives the lord thanks;

"I have stayed long enough: good fortune attend you,

2410 And may he who gives all honors soon send you reward!

And commend me to that gracious one, your lovely wife,

Both the one and the other of those honorable ladies

¹ the harme that I hade I.e., being cheated of his winnings.

That thus hor knyght wyth hor kest han koyntly bigyled.
Bot hit is no ferly thagh a fole madde,

2415 And thurgh wyles of wymmen be wonen to sorwe,
For so watz Adam in erde with one bygyled,
And Salamon with fele sere, and Samson eftsonez—
Dalyda dalt hym hys wyrde—and Davyth thereafter
Watz blended with Barsabe, that much bale tholed.¹

2420 Now these were wrathed wyth her wyles, hit were a wynne huge
To luf hom wel and leve hem not, a leude that couthe.
For thes wer forne the freest, that folwed alle the sele Exellently of alle thyse other, under hevenryche that mused;

2425 And alle thay were biwyled
With wymmen that thay used.
Thagh I be now bigyled
Me think me burde be excused.

“Bot your gordel,” quoth Gawayn, “God yow foryelde!
2430 That wyl I welde wyth goud wylle, not for the wynne golde,
Ne the saynt, ne the sylk, ne for syde pendaundes,
For wele ne for worchyp, ne for the wlonk werkkez,
Bot in synne of my surfet I schal se hit ofte,
When I ride in renoun, remorde to myselven
2435 The faut and the fayntyse of the flesche crabbed,
How tender hit is to entyse teches of fylthe;
And thus, quen pryde schal me pryk for prowes of armes,
The loke to this luf-lace schal lethe my hert.
Bot on I wolde yow pray, displese yow never:
2440 Syn ye be lorde of the yonder londe her I haf lent inne
Wyth yow wyth worschyp—the wyghe hit yow yelde
That uphaldez the heven and on hygh sittez—
How norne ye yowre ryght nome, and thenne no more?”
“That schal I telle the trwly,” quoth that other thenne, 2445 “Bertilak de Hautdesert I hat in this londe.
Thurgh myght of Morgne la Faye, that in my hous lenges,
And koyntyse of clergie, bi craftes wel lerned,
The maystrés of Merlyn mony hatz taken—
For ho hatz dalt drwry ful dere sumtyme 2450 With that conable klerk, that knowes alle your knyghtez at hame.

Morgne the goddes
Therefore hit is hir name:
Weldez non so hyghe hawtesse
2455 That ho ne con make ful tame—

Who have so cleverly deluded their knight with their game.
But it is no wonder if a fool acts insanely

2415 And is brought to grief through womanly wiles;
For so was Adam beguiled by one, here on earth,
Solomon by several women, and Samson was another—Delilah was cause of his fate—and afterwards David
Was deluded by Bathsheba, and suffered much grief.
2420 Since these were ruined by their wiles, it would be a great gain
To love women and not trust them, if a man knew how.
For these were the noblest of old, whom fortune favored Above all others on earth, or who dwelt under heaven.

2425 Beguiled were they all
By women they thought kind.
Since I too have been tricked
Then I should pardon find.

“But for your belt,” said Gawayn, “God repay you for that!
2430 I accept it gratefully, not for its wonderful gold,
Nor for the girdle itself nor its silk, nor its long pendants,
Nor its value nor the honor it confers, nor its fine workmanship,
But I shall look at it often as a sign of my failing,
And when I ride in triumph, recall with remorse
2435 The corruption and frailty of the perverse flesh,
How quick it is to pick up blotches of sin.
And so, when pride in my knightly valor stirs me,
A glance at this girdle will humble my heart.
Just one thing I would ask, if it would not offend you, 2440 Since you are the lord of the country that I have dwelt in,
Honorably treated in your house—may he reward you
Who holds up the heavens and sits upon high!—
What do you call yourself rightly, and then no more demands?”
“I will tell you that truthfully,” replied that other man, 2445 “Bertilak of Hautdesert I am called in this land.
Through the power of Morgan le Fay, who lives under my roof,
And her skill in learning, well taught in magic arts,
She has acquired many of Merlin’s occult powers—
For she had love-dealings at an earlier time 2450 With that accomplished scholar, as all your knights know at home.

Morgan the goddess
Therefore is her name;
No one, however haughty
2455 Or proud she cannot tame.

¹ For so watz Adam ... tholed Famous stories of female betrayal from the Old Testament.

“Ho wayned me upon this wyse to your wynne halle
 For to assay the surquidré, yif hit soth were
 That rennes of the grete renoun of the Rounde Table.
 Ho wayned me this wonder your wyttez to reve,
 460 For to have greved Gaynour and gart hir to dyghe
 With glopnyng of that ilke gome that gostlych speked
 With his hede in his honde bfore the hyghe table.
 That is ho that is at home, the auncian lady;
 Ho is even thyn aunt, Arthurez half-suster, 465 The duches doghter of Tyntagelle, that dere Uter after Hade Arthur upon, that athel is nowthe.
 Therefore I ethe the, hathel, to com to thyn aunt,
 Make myry in my hous; my meny the lovies,
 And I wol the as wel, wyghe, bi my faythe,
 470 As any gome under God for thy grete traute.”
 And he nikked hym naye, he nolde bi no wayes.
 Thay acolen and kyssen and kennen ayther other
 To the prynce of paradise, and parten ryght there on coold;

2475 Gawayn on blonk ful bene
 To the kyngez burgh buskez bolde,
 And the knyght in the enker-grene
 Whiderwarde-so-ever he wolde.

Wylde wayez in the worlde Wowen now rydez 2480 On Gryngolet, that the grace hade geten of his lyve;
 Ofte he herbered in house and ofte al theroute,
 And mony aventure in vale, and venquyst ofte,
 That I ne tyght at this tyme in tale to remene.
 The hurt watz hole that he hade hent in his nek,
 2485 And the blykkande belt he bere therabout
 Abelef as a bauderyk bounden by his syde,
 Loken under his lyfte arme, the lace, with a knot,
 In tokenyng he watz tane in tech of a faute.
 And thus he commes to the court, knyght al in sounde.
 2490 Ther wakned wele in that wone when wyst the grete
 That gode Gawayn watz comen; gayn hit hym thoght.
 The kyng kysses the knyght, and the whene alce,
 And sythen mony syker knyght that soght hym to haylce,
 Of his fare that hym frayed; and ferlyly he telles,
 2495 Biknowez alle the costes of care that he hade,
 The chaunce of the chapel, the chere of the knyght,
 The luf of the ladi, the lace at the last.
 The nirt in the neck he naked hem schewed

“She sent me in this shape to your splendid hall
 To make trial of your pride, and to judge the truth
 Of the great reputation attached to the Round Table.
 She sent me to drive you demented with this marvel,
 2460 To have terrified Guenevere and caused her to die
 With horror at that figure who spoke like a specter
 With his head in his hand before the high table.
 That is she who is in my castle, the very old lady,
 Who is actually your aunt, Arthur’s half-sister,
 2465 The duchess of Tintagel’s daughter, whom noble Uther
 Afterwards begot Arthur upon, who now is king.
 So I entreat you, good sir, to visit your aunt
 And make merry in my house: my servants all love you,
 And so will I too, sir, on my honor,
 2470 As much as any man on earth for your great truth.”
 But Gawain told him no, not for any persuasion.
 They embrace and kiss, and commend each other
 To the prince of paradise, and separate there in the cold;
 2475 On his great horse Gawain
 To the king’s court quickly goes,
 And the knight in emerald green
 Went wheresoever he chose.
 Over wild country Gawain now makes his way
 2480 On Gringolet, after his life had been mercifully spared.
 Sometimes he lodged in a house and often out of doors,
 And was vanquisher often in many encounters
 Which at this time I do not intend to relate.
 The injury he had received in his neck was healed,
 2485 And over it he wore the gleaming belt
 Across his body like a baldric, fastened at his side,
 And this girdle tied under his left arm with a knot,
 To signify he had been dishonored by a slip.
 And so safe and sound he arrives at the court.
 2490 Joy spread through the castle when the nobles learnt
 That good Gawain had returned: they thought it a wonder.
 The king kisses the knight, and the queen too,
 And then many true knights who came to embrace him,
 Asking how he had fared; he tells a marvelous story,
 2495 Describes all the hardships he had endured,
 What happened at the chapel, the Green Knight’s behavior,
 The lady’s wooing, and finally the belt.
 He showed them the scar on his bare neck

That he laght for his unleuté at the leudes hondes for blame.

He tened quen he schulde telle,
He groned for gref and grame;
The blod in his face con melle,
When he hit schulde schewe, for schame.

“Lo, lorde,” quoth the leude, and the lace hondeled,
“This is the benede of this blame I bere in my nek,
This is the lathe and the losse that I laght have
Of cowardise and covetyse that I haf caght thare,
This is the token of untrawthe that I am tane inne,
And I mot nede hit were wyle I may last;
For mon may hyden his harme, bot unhap ne may hit,
For ther hit onez is tachched twynne wil hit never.”
The kyng confortez the knyght, and alle the court als
Laghen loude therat, and luflyly acorden
That lordes and ladis that longed to the Table, Uche burne of the brotherhede, a bauderyk schulde have,
A benede abelef hym aboute of a bryght grene,
And that, for sake of that segge, in swete to were.
For that watz acorded the renoun of the Rounde Table,
And he honoured that hit hade evermore after,
As hit is breved in the best boke of romaunce.
Thus in Arthurus day this aunter bitidde,
The Brutus bokez therof beres wyttensse;
Sythen Brutus, the bolde burne, bowed hider fyrst,
After the segge and the asaute watz sesed at Troye,¹ iwysse,
Mony aunterez here-biforne
Haf fallen suche er this.
Now that bere the croun of thorne
He bryng uus to his blysse! AMEN.

*HONY SOYT QUI MAL PENCE.*²

That he received for his dishonesty at the lord's hands in rebuke.

Tormented by his tale
He groaned for grief and hurt;
The blood burned in his face
When he showed the shameful cut.

“See, my lord,” said the man, and held up the girdle,
“This belt caused the scar that I bear on my neck;
This is the injury and damage that I have suffered
For the cowardice and covetousness that seized me there;
This is the token of the dishonesty I was caught committing,
And now I must wear it as long as I live.
For a man may hide his misdeed, but never erase it,
For where once it takes root the stain can never be lifted.”
The king consoles the knight, and the whole court
Laughs loudly about it, and courteously agrees
That lords and ladies who belong to the Table,
Each member of the brotherhood, should wear such a belt,
A baldric of bright green crosswise on the body,
Similar to Sir Gawain's and worn for his sake:
And that became part of the renown of the Round Table,
And whoever afterwards wore it was always honored,
As is set down in the most reputable books of romance.
So in the time of Arthur this adventure happened,
And the chronicles of Britain bear witness to it;
After the brave hero Brutus first arrived here,
When the siege and the assault were ended at Troy,
indeed.
Many exploits before now
Have happened much like this.
Now may the thorn-crowned God
Bring us to his bliss! AMEN.

HONI SOIT QUI MAL Y PENSE.

—14TH CENTURY

¹ After the segge ... at Troye The last long line of the poem repeats the first one, as though bringing the story full circle after its hundred and one stanzas.

² HONY SOYT QUI MAL PENCE Old French: Evil be to him who evil thinks. The motto was embroidered on the blue velvet garter worn by Knights of the Garter, the highest order of English knighthood bestowed by the sovereign. According to Froissart, the order was instituted about 1344. The poet's use of the motto has not been accounted for.

IN CONTEXT

Illustrations from the Original Manuscript

In the manuscript in which Sir Gawain and the Green Knight appears the text is accompanied by four illustrations. Two of these are reproduced below. The first, which appears before the text in the original manuscript, brings together two scenes from the poem in a single illustration. Gawain is shown both taking the axe from King Arthur (who appears with the Queen on his left), and holding the axe (having just decapitated the Green Knight); the Green Knight is shown on horseback, holding his head.

In the second illustration reproduced here, the lady of the castle is shown visiting Gawain. (The two lines appearing above the illustration were written in a hand other than that of the manuscript scribe, and are not connected to the poem.)

The two illustrations not reproduced here are somewhat indistinct in the manuscript; they portray Gawain at the Green Chapel with the Green Knight above, axe in hand, and Gawain kneeling in front of Arthur and Guenevere.

The Thorn and the Yogh

The "original" text of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight as provided above substitutes modern English letters for two letters in Middle English that have now died out. One of these, the letter þ ("thorn"), was sounded very much as we sound the letters "th" today. The other, ȝ ("yogh"), various represented sounds that we represent with "gh," "y," and "z." Following is the first part of the poem with Middle English letters.

Sipþen þe sege and þe assaut watz sesed at Troye,
 Þe borȝ brittened and brent to brondez and askez,
 Þe tulk þat þe trammes of tresoun þer wroȝt
 Watz tried for his tricherie, þe trewest on erþe:
 Hit watz Ennias þe athel, and his highe kynde,
 Pat sipþen depreced prouinces, and patrounes bicomē
 Welneȝe of al þe wele in þe west iles.
 Fro riche Romulus to Rome ricchis hym swyþe,
 With gret bobbaunce þat burȝe he biges vpon fyrst,
 And neuenes hit his aune nome, as hit now hat;
 Tirius to Tuskan and teldes bigynnes,
 Langaberde in Lumbardie lyftes vp homes,
 And fer ouer þe French flod Felix Brutus
 On many bonkkes ful brode Bretayn he settez wyth wynne,
 Where werre and wrake and wonder
 Bi syþez hatz wont þerinne,
 And oft boþe blysse and blunder
 Ful skete hatz skyfted synne.

GEOFFREY CHAUCER

c. 1343 – 1400

Little is known about the private life of the greatest English author of the Middle Ages, but because Geoffrey Chaucer spent most years of his adult life in service to the Crown and the government, medieval records tell us much about his working life. These records, in which Chaucer's name is mentioned some 500 times, document decades of work for various royal households—as a page, a controller of customs, and a justice of the peace, among other positions. What they fail to provide are any details about Chaucer's education, literary life, or personal life.

As the author of the exquisite Troilus and Criseyde and of a variety of shorter poems and prose works, Chaucer would be regarded among the most important medieval English writers. But it is The Canterbury Tales that has secured his place as one of the greatest English authors of any era. From the time of its first appearance in the late fourteenth century, this linked series of stories has remained one of the most popular works of literature of the Middle Ages. The Tales were, in fact, among the first works ever printed in England, after William Caxton introduced the printing press to the country in 1476, some two decades after Gutenberg's invention of moveable type. In his Preface to Fables Ancient and Modern (1700), John Dryden called Chaucer the "father of English poetry," not only for his great influence upon future generations, but also for the fact that he was one of the first poets to compose his works in English, rather than French, Latin, or Anglo-Norman. Indeed, like Dante before him, Chaucer used the everyday language of the common people and proved its poetic capacity.

Chaucer was born at a time that saw the beginnings of a breakdown in strict divisions between the aristocracy, the Church, and the commoners. Although he was not born into the noble class, he was able to transcend the restrictions of the old social order and to procure a variety of high positions. Chaucer was born to Agnes Copton and John Chaucer just a few years before the beginning of the Hundred Years' War between France and England; his childhood also saw the outbreak of the plague in England (which eventually killed between thirty and forty per cent of the population). Both of his parents held court positions at various times, but his father was primarily a prosperous wine merchant in London. With his knowledge of Latin, French, and Italian, the young Chaucer was likely educated in a good London grammar school; later he may have attended university. Court documents show that in his early teens he held a position as page in the household of the Countess of Ulster and Prince Lionel, son of the ruling monarch, Edward III.

In 1359 Chaucer took part in the war in France and was captured and ransomed to the king, who procured his release in 1360. Speculation has it that during this period on the continent Chaucer began his literary career, translating from the French the popular and influential allegorical poem Le Roman de la Rose (The Romance of the Rose), written by Guillaume de Lorris and Jean de Meun. In 1366 Chaucer married Philippa Roet, a lady-in-waiting to the queen. The couple had at least two children; Chaucer addressed A Treatise on Astrolabe (1391) to "little Lewis," and another son, Thomas, was eventually knighted.

The first page of Chaucer's Tale of Melibee, from the Ellesmere manuscript of The Canterbury Tales. The figure on horseback is generally taken to be a representation of Chaucer. The actual size of pages in the Ellesmere manuscript is approximately 15¾" x 11⅛". (Reprinted by permission of The Huntington Library, San Marino, California. EL 26 C9 f. 153v.)

Over the course of the next twenty years, Chaucer continued his work for the royal household, serving in the army in France under John of Gaunt and in 1372 traveling on a diplomatic mission to Italy, where he probably acquired his knowledge of the works of Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio. The Book of the Duchess (1368), written when he was about twenty-five, is already an accomplished work. After his trip to Italy, however, Chaucer's writing began to show a new level of maturity and innovative technique, as well as a vast knowledge of both classical and contemporary literature and the various languages associated with these writings. The House of Fame (c. 1377) owes a debt to Dante, The Parliament of Fowls (1380) to Boccaccio and Cicero, and Troilus and Criseyde (c. 1385) again to Boccaccio; it is a reworking of Boccaccio's Il Filostrato.

Troilus, a long romantic poem recounting the fateful love of the Trojan Prince Troilus for Criseyde, has often been considered the most perfectly realized of all Chaucer's works. Although it exhibits less range than The Canterbury Tales, its elegant and supple verse, sustained narrative accomplishment, and depth of characterization are unsurpassed in medieval poetry in English.

In his next (and unfinished) work, The Legend of Good Women, written as a series of tales, Chaucer parodies his own authorial persona, taking himself to task for the writing of Criseyde's betrayal of Troilus by telling the stories of famous women who were themselves deceived by men.

Although the beginning of the 1380s were difficult times for Chaucer and for the country (he was accused of abduction or rape by a young woman named Cecilia Chaumpaigne, and 1381 saw the uprising against the poll tax), he seemed to regain inspiration in the latter part of the decade, at the same time as he held some important positions in the court. He became Controller of Customs and Justice of the Peace, and in 1386 was elected Member of Parliament for Kent; in 1389 Chaucer was appointed Clerk of the King's Works, a vital and challenging position in which he oversaw repairs and maintenance of government buildings. During these years he began work on The Canterbury Tales, generally considered his masterpiece. Rather than adapting old legends or reworking ancient stories of heroes, as was the norm, Chaucer told the stories of a gallery of English characters, from knight to clerk, parson to cook, nobility and commoners alike. Frequently hilarious, sometimes bawdy, and often revealing, The Canterbury Tales claims to be a series of stories told by a group of pilgrims on their way from London to Canterbury to visit the shrine of the martyr St. Thomas Becket. Similar framing devices had been used by other writers of the Middle Ages, but Chaucer's inclusion of such a wide range of classes and types of people, as well as his tonal range and his melding of diverse styles, were without precedent in English.

Although the work as it stands includes 24 tales and runs to over 17,000 lines, The Canterbury Tales was far from complete at the end of Chaucer's life. The General Prologue, in which the narrator introduces some thirty pilgrims, suggests that Chaucer intended to write more than 100 tales, with each narrator telling two tales on the journey to Canterbury and two on the way back. Chaucer must have known that such a plan was entirely unrealistic, however. Perhaps he allowed it to stand in the General Prologue, which he probably revised on several occasions, to indicate that The Canterbury Tales was a work that could never be finished. The narratives we do have are fleshed out by linking passages recounting exchanges among the pilgrims. Although these characters are fictional, the text provides a wealth of insight into the customs and practices of the time. Many of the pilgrims are medieval "types," but by varying narrative style with each speaker, Chaucer breathes imaginative life into the characters as individuals and into their world as a whole.

Chaucer's moral stance in The Canterbury Tales has been the subject of much discussion. The Retraction that follows The Parson's Tale disavows on moral grounds not only the Tales, but virtually all his more secular writings. Is this "Geoffrey Chaucer" merely another imaginary personage, or did the aging author truly repent of all "worldly vanitees"? At so great a remove as we are from medieval sensibilities, it is impossible to be sure. It can be said, however, that through most of The Canterbury Tales the author refrains from moralizing or casting judgment. The whole notion of a religious pilgrimage is frequently undermined by the actions of the characters, many of whom show themselves to be more interested in carnal than spiritual quests. Other characters, such as the Pardoner, may seem at first to be of high moral character, but deliberately or unwittingly expose their own compromised morality as they tell their stories. More broadly, there is an ongoing and unresolved tension in the tales between the spiritual and the worldly. This tension operates not only within many of the individual tales but also in the work as a whole, with the elevated tone of The Knight's Tale, for example, standing in marked contrast to the bawdiness of The Miller's Tale, the irreverence of the Wife of Bath's fantasy, or the elaborate pretense of artlessness in the fable recounted by the Nun's Priest. There is tension as well between the social classes represented among the pilgrims, between different religious views, between the sexes, and over the extent to which the traditions and conventions of the past should still be respected and adhered to. The Canterbury Tales is of all the classics of English literature one of the most entertaining and also one of the most open: open-minded in its underlying sensibilities, and open to an extraordinary range of interpretation.

The final year of Chaucer's life saw great upheaval in England's monarchy. In 1399, Richard II, who had supported Chaucer, was overthrown by Henry Bolingbroke (Henry IV), the oldest son of Richard's uncle, John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, who had also been one of Chaucer's patrons. It may have been due to his gifts as a poet that Chaucer managed to retain the favor of the new regime, which was anxious for respectability. Chaucer wrote his final poem, "Complaint to His Purse," as a plea to King Henry to pay income owing from Richard II's reign; while the king did promise payment, Chaucer never collected the money. He died in October of 1400 and was buried in the south transept of Westminster Abbey. A century and a half later a monument to Chaucer was erected on the spot; thus began the tradition of the abbey's "Poets' Corner."

To Rosemounde A Balade

Madame, ye ben of al beaute shryne^o shrine
 As fer as cercləd^o is the rounded mapamounde,¹ map of the world
 For as the cristal glorious ye shyne,
 And lyke ruby ben your chekes rounde.
 5 Therwith ye ben so mery and so jocounde^o pleasant, joyful
 That at a revel^o whan that I see you daunce, festival
 It is an oynement^o unto my wounde, ointment
 Thogh ye to me ne do no daliaunce.²
 For thogh I wepe of teres ful a tyne,^o barrel
 10 Yet may that wo myn herte nat confounde;^o destroy

Your semy^o voys that ye so smal out small, high twyne^o twist out
 Maketh my thoght in joy and blis habounde.^o abound, be full of
 So curtaysly I go with love bounde
 That to myself I sey in my penaunce, 15 "Suffyseth me to love you, Rosemounde, Thogh ye to me ne do no daliaunce."³
 Nas never pyk walwed^o in galauntyn^e immersed
 As I in love am walwed and ywounde,^o wound
 For which ful ofte I of myself devyne^o discover, understand 20 That I am trewe Tristam⁵ the secounde.
 My love may not refreyde^o nor grow cold
 affounde,^o founder, grow numb

¹ ye ben of al ... mapamounde You are the shrine of all beauty throughout the world.

² Thogh ... daliaunce Even though you give me no encouragement.

³ daliance Sociable interaction, or more explicitly amorous or sexual exchange.

⁴ Nas ... galauntyn No pike was ever steeped in galantine sauce.
Tristam Tristan, lover of Isolde, often presented as the ideal lover in medieval romance.

I brenne° ay in an amorous plesaunce.° burn / desire
 Do what you lyst,° I wyl your thral be founde,¹ wish Thogh ye to me ne do no daliaunce.

tregentil————//—————chaucer²

—C. 1477

The Canterbury Tales

It is some indication of its popularity that The Canterbury Tales survives in so many manuscripts: fifty-five complete or nearly complete collections and a further twenty-eight manuscripts that contain one or more tales. Of these manuscripts, two of the earliest, the Hengwrt, now in the National Library in Wales, and the Ellesmere, now in the Huntington Library in San Marino, California, have provided the basis for most editions. The two manuscripts were copied by the same scribe, Adam Pynkhurst, in the first few years after Chaucer's death in 1400, or just possibly in the last year or two of Chaucer's life. The differences between the two manuscripts raise one of the great puzzles in Chaucerian scholarship: how close Chaucer came to finishing The Canterbury Tales. Ellesmere, generally agreed to be slightly later, presents the tales in an order that many modern readers have found to make strong artistic sense; Ellesmere also contains material—most notably the Canon's Yeoman's Tale, an account of a fraudulent alchemical workshop—that is missing from Hengwrt. On the other hand, many individual lines in Ellesmere contain small errors or are missing words. Why Pynkhurst, having managed to get an accurate (although incomplete) text from which to copy when he was writing the Hengwrt manuscript, should then have failed to do so when writing Ellesmere remains unclear. This edition reproduces the text of the Ellesmere manuscript, preserving its spellings and modifying only its word division and punctuation. Where the text of the Ellesmere is clearly deficient or does not make sense, the editors have drawn on Hengwrt. In each case, these alterations are noted.

The Ellesmere manuscript includes a considerable number of marginal notes, or glosses. In the tales included in this anthology, these glosses are particularly numerous in The Wife of Bath's Tale. Who first composed these glosses is still an open question, although there are strong grounds for believing that Chaucer himself composed quite a few of them. In these pages the texts of a number of the more interesting marginal glosses have been included in the notes at the bottom of the page.

The Ellesmere manuscript is large, its pages measuring roughly 15 by 11 inches, and elegantly decorated. It is the kind of luxury volume that might have been commissioned by an aristocrat, a prosperous London merchant, or a senior civil servant of the early fifteenth century. Various personal inscriptions in the manuscript indicate that it once belonged to John de Vere, who became the twelfth earl of Oxford in 1417, and whose guardians (possibly the book's first owners) were Thomas Beaufort, Duke of Exeter (one of the sons of John of Gaunt) and Henry IV's third son, John, Duke of Bedford, a great book collector.

The General Prologue

Chaucer's account of meeting a group of twenty-nine pilgrims at the Tabard Inn in Southwark, on the south bank of the Thames, has such an air of verisimilitude that it was once read as an account of an actual pilgrimage, with much attention devoted to determining just when it took place (1387 being the most favored date), how many days it took the pilgrims to get to Canterbury, and who the pilgrims were in real life. In fact, The Canterbury Tales draws on a tradition of medieval estates satire, poems that describe members of the three estates (those who pray, i.e., monks and nuns; those who fight, i.e., knights; and those who work, i.e., peasants) in terms of their characteristic vices. Many of Chaucer's most memorable and vivid characters, including his Friar and the Wife of Bath, are drawn from satirical figures found in such works as Le Roman de la Rose (The Romance of the Rose), in which a lover's quest for his lady (the rose) serves as an occasion for broad social commentary. Chaucer knew the work well, having translated it from French, and also knew the major example of English estates satire, William Langland's Piers Plowman, which Langland composed and then repeatedly reworked in the 1370s and 1380s.

Chaucer includes a Knight and a Plowman among his pilgrims, but for the most part they are drawn from the middle ranks of society, including prosperous members of the clergy, or first estate, such as the Friar, the Monk, and the Prioress, and those of the third estate who no longer

¹ I ... founde I will remain your servant.

² tregentil ... chaucer Although the words appear joined (or separated) by a line or flourish in the manuscript, the status of tregentil is uncertain. It may be an epithet (French: very gentle) or a proper name.

fitted among the peasantry, such as the five prosperous Guildsmen, the Wife of Bath, the Merchant, the Physician, the Sergeant of Law, and the Manciple. Energetic and often clever, or at least sophisticated, the pilgrims are all professionally successful and—with a few exceptions—they thrive in the vibrant money economy of the later fourteenth century. To describe these people, Chaucer employs an affable and naively enthusiastic narrator, who mingles easily with them, admiring and even echoing their speeches, all apparently uncritically. As George Lyman Kittredge has observed, however, Chaucer was a professional tax collector and “a naïf collector of Customs would be a paradoxical monster.” The poet and his narrator must not be confused.

The framing device of the pilgrimage allows Chaucer to explore the social tensions and moral debates of his day more freely than would otherwise be possible, transposing all conflict into an apparently innocent tale-telling competition. The question of who will tell the tale that offers the “best sentence and moost solaas” (line 798), i.e., the best moral meaning and the most enjoyment, is a standing invitation to probe beneath the surface and ask what the meaning of each tale really is. The pilgrimage frame also allows Chaucer to experiment with almost every major literary genre of his day and to assemble an encyclopedic compilation of ancient wisdom, history, and moral lessons. The learned aspect of this compilation is reinforced in the Ellesmere manuscript by the large number of marginal glosses, which identify the source for quotations and draw attention to particularly sententious passages.

Opening page of The General Prologue, Ellesmere manuscript. (Reprinted by permission of the Huntington Library, San Marino, California. EL 26 C9 f. 1r.)

from *The Canterbury Tales*¹

THE GENERAL PROLOGUE

Whan that Aprill with hise shoures° showers
 soote° sweet
 The droghte° of March hath perced° drought | pierced to the roote
 And bathed every veine° in swich° licour° vein | such | liquid
 Of which vertu° engendred is the flour°, power | flower
 5 Whan Zephirus² eek° with his sweete breeth also Inspired hath in every holt° and heeth wood | heath
 The tendre croppes and the yonge sonne
 Hath in the Ram³ his half cours yronne° run
 And smale foweles° maken melodye birds
 10 That slepen al the nyght with open eye,
 So priketh° hem nature in hir corages°, excites | their hearts
 Thanne longen folk to goon° on pilgrimages go
 And palmeres° for to seken° straunge pilgrims | seek strondes° shores
 To ferne halwes° kowthe° in sondry far-off shrines | known londes.
 15 And specially, fram° every shires° ende from | shire's
 Of Engeland to Caunterbury they wende°, travel
 The hooly blisful martir⁴ for to seke
 That hem° hath holpen° whan that them | helped they were seeke°. sick
 Bifil° that in that seson° on a day it happened | season
 20 In Southwerk⁵ at the Tabard⁶ as I lay Redy to wenden° on my pilgrymage travel

To Caunterbury with ful devout corage°, heart
 At nyght were come into that hostelrye° inn
 Wel nyne° and twenty in a compaignye nine 25 Of sondry° folk by aventure yfalle⁷ various
 In felawshipe, and pilgrikes were they alle
 That toward Caunterbury wolden° ryde. would
 The chambres° and the stables weren wyde°, bedrooms | wide
 And wel we weren esed° atte beste. made comfortable
 30 And shortly, whan the sonne was to reste,
 So hadde I spoken with hem° everichon° them | everyone
 That I was of hir° felawshipe anon° their | soon
 And made forward° erly° for to ryse a pact | early
 To take oure wey ther as I yow devyse°. as I will tell you 35 But natheles°, whil I have tyme and space nevertheless
 Er that I ferther° in this tale pace°, further | go
 Me thynketh it° acordaunt° to resoun it seems to me | according
 To telle yow al the condicioun° i.e., character and estate
 Of ech of hem°, so as it semed me, each of them
 40 And whiche they were and of what degree° rank
 And eek° in what array° that they were inne, also | clothing
 And at a knyght than wol I first bigynne.
 A Knyght ther was and that a worthy man,
 That fro the tyme that he first bigan
 45 To riden out, he loved chivalrie,
 Trouthe and honour, fredom and curteisie.⁸
 Ful worthy was he in his lordes werre° war
 And therto hadde he riden, no man ferre°, further
 As wel in Cristendom as in hethenesse° pagan lands
 50 And evere honoured for his worthynesse.
 At Alisaundre he was whan it was wonne.
 Ful ofte tyme he hadde the bord bigonne°
 Aboven alle nacions in Pruce.
 In Lettow hadde he reysed° and in Ruce, raided 55 No Cristen man so ofte of his degree.
 In Gernade at the seege eek° hadde he be also
 Of Algezir, and riden in Belmarye.

¹ The Canterbury Tales The present text of introductions to, and quotations for The Canterbury Tales have been prepared for The Broadview Anthology of British Literature by Robert Boenig and Andrew Taylor from their Broadview edition of the Tales.

² Zephirus The name given to the personified west wind.

³ Ram The sign of the Zodiac for the early spring.

⁴ The hooly blisful martir St. Thomas Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, was killed on 29 December 1170 during a dispute with his King, Henry II, by four knights who thought the king wished his death.

⁵ Southwerk Southwark is the region, now officially part of London but not so during Chaucer's time, on the southern bank of the Thames, directly across from the old city of London.

Tabard This is the name of Harry Bailly's inn. A "tabard" was a type of tunic often worn over chain-mail armor.

⁷ yfalle Encountered by chance.

Trouthe ... curteisie Keeping one's word, preserving one's reputation or honor, generosity, and courtesy or courtly manners are central values in the code of chivalry.

⁸ hadde the bord bigonne Sat at the first table—an honor in victory banquets.

At Lyeys was he and at Satalye
 Whan they were wonne and in the Grete See.
 60 At many a noble armee° hadde he be. expedition
 At mortal batailles hadde he been fiftene
 And foughten for oure feith° at Tramyssene faith
 In lystes° thries—and ay slayn his foo. jousting arenas
 This ilke° worthy knyght hadde been also same
 65 Somtyme with the lord of Palatye
 Agayn another hethen° in Turkye,¹ heathen
 And everemoore he hadde a sovereyn° sovereign
 prys°. reputation
 And though that he were worthy°, he was wys°, brave / prudent
 And of his port° as meeke as is a mayde. behavior
 70 He nevere yet no vileynye ne sayde
 In al his lyf unto no maner wight.²
 He was a verray°, parfit°, gentil° knyght. true / perfect / noble
 But for to tellen yow of his array°, appearance
 His hors° weren goode, but he was nat gay°. horses / finely dressed
 75 Of fustian° he wered a gypon° rough cloth / tunic
 Al bismotered° with his habergeon°, soiled / mail coat
 For he was late ycome° from his viage° arrived / voyage
 And wente for to doon° his pilgrymage. do
 With hym ther was his sone, a yong Squier,³ 80 A lovyere° and a lusty° bachelier lover / vigorous
 With lokkes crulle° as they were leynd in presse. curled locks
 Of twenty yeer of age he was, I gesse°. guess
 Of his stature he was of evene lengthe° moderate height

¹ Alisaundre... Turkye The locations of the Knight's battles are as follows: Alexandria in Egypt (1365), Prussia, Lithuania, Russia (the scenes of much fighting against hold-out pagans in the last decades of the fourteenth century), Grenada (in Spain) whose city Algeir was captured in 1344, Banu Merin (in North Africa), Ayash (Lyeys in Syria, captured in 1367), Antalya (Satalye, in modern Turkey, captured in 1361), Tlemcen (in modern Algeria), Balat (Palatye, in modern Turkey, involved in campaigning in both the 1340s and 1365), and Turkey. The places not identified with a specific date of battle saw protracted hostilities between Christians and non-Christians during the period in question. The "great sea" is the Mediterranean. It would, of course, have been impossible for a knight to have taken part in all these campaigns.

² In... wight He was never rude to anyone. Middle English often uses double or even triple negatives to intensify each other rather than to cancel each other out.

³ yong Squier A squire would serve a knight, especially by helping to arm him, and would fight with him in battle. In some cases, as here, squires were young men training to be knights, but squires could also be older men, such as Chaucer.

And wonderly delyvere° and of greet strengthe. quick 85 And he hadde been somtyme in chyvachie° calvary expedition
 In Flaundres, in Artoys, and Pycardie⁴
 And born hym weel as of so litel space° in so short a time
 In hope to stonden° in his lady grace°. stand / lady's favor
 Embrouded° was he as it were a meede°, embroidered / meadow
 90 Al ful of fresshe floures whyte and reede°. white and red
 Syngynge he was or floytynge° al the day. playing the flute
 He was as fressh as is the monthe of May.
 Short was his gowne with sleeves longe and wyde.
 Wel koude he sitte on hors and faire ryde.
 95 He koude songes make and wel endite°, compose verse
 Juste and eek daunce and weel putreye° and write. draw
 So hoot° he lovede, that by nyghtertale° hotly / nighttime
 He slepte namoore° than dooth a nyghtyngale. no more
 Curteis he was, lowely°, and servysable° humble / helpful
 100 And carf° biforn his fader at the table. carved (meat)
 A Yeman⁵ hadde he and servantz namo° no more
 At that tyme for hym liste° ride so, desired
 And he was clad in cote° and hood of grene. coat
 A sheef of pecok arwes° bright and kene° peacock arrows / sharp
 105 Under his belt he bar ful thriftily°. very carefully
 Wel koude he dresse his takel° yemanly. equipment
 His arwes drouped° noght with fetheres° lowe, drooped / feathers
 And in his hand he baar° a myghty bowe. bore
 A not heed° hadde he, with a broun close-cropped head
 visage°. face
 110 Of wodecraft wel koude° he al the usage°. knew / customs
 Upon his arm he baar° a gay bracer°, bore / leather arm guard
 And by his syde a swerd° and a bokeler° sword / small shield
 And on that oother syde a gay° daggere bright
 Harneised wel° and sharpe as point of spere; well-sheathed 115 A cristophere° on his brest of silver St. Christopher medal sheene°. bright
 An horn he bar;° the bawdryk° was of grene. bore / shoulder-belt
 A forster° was he, soothly° as I gesse°. forester / truly / guess

In... Pycardie These places in Flanders saw military action in 1383, as the English troops fought for Pope Urban VI against his rival, Anti-Pope Clement VII. The campaign, led by the war-loving Bishop of Norwich, was a great disaster for the English.

⁵ A Yeman Yeoman, a small landholder or tenant farmer, often prosperous enough to serve as an infantryman or archer in a knight's retinue.

Ther was also a Nonne,¹ a Prioressse,¹ nun
 That of hir smylyng was ful^o symple and coy.^o very / modest
 Hire gretteste ooth was but "By Seint Loy!"²
 And she was cleped^o Madame Eglentyne.³ called Ful weel she soong^o the service dyvyne,⁴ sung
 Entuned^o in hir nose ful seemly.^o intoned / seemly
 And Frenssh she spak ful faire and fetisly^o elegantly
 125 After the scole^o of Stratford atte Bowe.⁵ school
 For Frenssh of Parys was to hire unknowe.^o unknown
 At mete^o wel ytaught^o was she withalle. dinner / taught
 She leet^o no morsel from hir lippes falle, let Ne wette hir fyngres in hir sauce depe.
 130 Wel koude she carie a morsel and wel kepe,^o take care
 That no drope ne fille upon hire brist.^o breast
 In curteisie^o was set ful muchel^o hir list.^o courtesy / much / pleasure
 Hir over-lippe^o wyped^o she so clene,^o upper lip / wiped / clean
 That in hir coppe^o ther was no ferthyng^o cup / coin-sized spot
 sene
 135 Of grece^o whan she dronken hadde hir draughte.^o grease / draft
 Ful semely after hir mete^o she raughte.^o food / reached
 And sikerly^o she was of greet desport^o surely / geniality
 And ful plesaunt and amyable^o of port^o amiable / bearing
 And peyned^o hire to contrefete cheere^o took pains / manners
 140 Of court and to been estatlich^o of manere stately
 And to ben holden^o digne^o of reverence. held / worthy

¹ Prioressse A prioress is either the second-in-command of an abbey, a large convent governed by an abbess, or is in charge of a priory, a smaller convent.

² Seint Loy St. Eligius, a seventh-century Bishop of Noyon in France. He is patron saint of both goldsmiths and blacksmiths.

³ Eglentyne Eglantine, also known as sweet briar, is an early species of rose. It is known for its sweet, apple-like smell (which even the leaves emit if crushed) and five-petaled coral flowers, which appear once a year, in spring. Eglantine was not a common name in the Middle Ages.

⁴ service dyvyne Divine service; the phrase refers to the Office (or Canonical Hours)—the round of services dominated by psalm-singing that monks and nuns perform on a daily basis. The names of the individual services are Matins, Lauds, Prime, Terce, Sext, None, Vespers, and Compline.

⁵ Stratford atte Bowe Stratford-at-Bow is in Middlesex, just to the east of London. Chaucer's point, elaborated in the next line, is that the Prioress does not speak French properly but with a provincial accent. The Benedictine Priory of St. Leonard's was at Stratford-at-Bow and in Chaucer's day it had nine nuns, one of them named Argentine. The similarity of the names is suggestive, but Argentine was not the prioress there.

But for to spoken^o of hire speak conscience,^o tenderness of conscience
 She was so charitable and so pitous,^o compassionate
 She wolde wepe^o if that she saugh^o a mous^o weep / saw / mouse
 145 Kaught in a trappe if it were deed^o or bledde.^o dead / bleeding
 Of smale houndes hadde she that she fedde
 With rosted flessch or milk and wastel breed.⁶
 But soore wepte she if any of hem were deed^o dead
 Or if men smoot it with a yerde^o smerte.^o yardstick / smartly
 150 And al was conscience and tendre herte.^o tender heart
 Ful semyly hir wympul⁷ pynched was;
 Hir nose tretys,^o hir eyen^o greye as glas, shapely / eyes
 Hir mouth ful smal, and therto softe and reed.^o red
 But sikerly, she hadde a fair forheed.
 155 It was almoost a spanne brood,^o I a hand's span across trowe,^o believe
 For hardily^o she was nat undergrowe.^o certainly / not undergrown
 Full fetys^o was hir cloke, as I was war.^o elegant / aware
 Of smal coral aboute hire arm she bar
 A peire^o of bedes, gauded^o al with grene,⁸ pair / divided 160 And theron heng a brooch of gold ful sheene,^o very shiny
 On which ther was first write^o a crowned "A" written
 And after, "Amor vincit omnia."⁹
 Another Nonne with hire hadde she
 That was hir chapeleyne,^o and Preestes^o thre. chaplain / priests
 165 A Monk ther was, a fair for the maistrie,^o i.e., better than all
 An outridere¹⁰ that lovede venerie,^o hunting
 A manly man, to been an abbot able.
 Ful many a deyntee^o hors hadde he in stable. fine
 And whan he rood, men myghte his brydel heere^o hear 170 Gynglen^o in a whistlynge wynd als cleere^o jingling / as clear

⁶ wastel breed White bread (which, in the Middle Ages, was a delicacy reserved for the nobility).

⁷ wympul Cloth folded cover the neck sides of the head, leaving only the face exposed. It was worn by both nuns and lay women.

⁸ A ... grene She carries a set of coral rosary beads, a chain of prayer-beads. These are divided at intervals by green beads. The green beads indicated the end of the "decade," one set of prayers, and the beginning of the next.

⁹ Amor vincit omnia Latin: Love conquers all.

¹⁰ An outridere An outrider was a monk whose job was to leave the cloister (which, as Chaucer makes clear below, was not the ideal thing for a monk to do) to take care of his monastery's business in the world at large. One of the common accusations made against monks was that they loved the secular world more than the cloister.

- And eek as loude as dooth the chapel belle Theras° this lord was kepere of the celle.¹ since
 The Reule° of Seint Maure or of Seint Beneit,² rule
 Bycause that it was old and somdel streit,³ somewhat restrictive
 175 This ilke monk leet olde thynges pace° pass
 And heeld after the newe world the space° course
 He yaf nat° of that text a pulled° hen gave not / plucked
 That seith that hunters beth nat hooly° men, not holy Ne thar° a monk whan he is recchelees° nor when / negligent 180 Is likned til° a fissh that is waterlees. likened to
 This is to seyn°, a monk out of his cloystre° say / cloister
 But thilke° text heeld he nat worth an oystre. that same
 And I seyde his opinioun was good.
 What° sholde he studie and make hymselfen wood° why
 185 Upon a book in cloystre° alwey to poure° cloister / pore
 Or swynken° with his handes and labour° work / labor
 As Austyn³ bit° How shal the world be served? commanded
 Lat Austyn have his owene swynk° to hym reserved! work
 Therfore he was a prikasour aright° hard rider
 190 Grehoundes he hadde as swift as fowel° in flight. bird
 Of prikyng° and of huntyng for the hare riding
 Was al his lust°. For no cost wolde he spare. pleasure
 I seigh his sleeves° ypurfiled° at the hond° sleeves / lined / hand
 With grys°—and that the fyneste° of a expensive gray fur / finest
 lond°. the land
 195 And for to festne° his hood under his chyn° fasten / chin
 He hadde of gold ywroght° a ful° curious pyn° made / very / pin
 A love knotte in the gretter° ende ther was. bigger
 His heed was balled,⁴ that shoon as any glas,
 And eek his face as it hadde been enoynt°. anointed
- 200 He was a lord ful fat and in good poynt,⁵ Hise eyen° stepe° and rollynge in his heed, eyes / bright
 That stemed as a forneys° of a leed°, furnace / lead
 His bootes souple°, his hors in greet estaat°. supple / in best shape
 Now certainly he was a fair prelaat°. prelate
 205 He nas nat° pale as a forpynded goost°. was not / distressed ghost
 A fat swan loved he best of any roost°. roast
 His palfrey⁶ was as broun as is a berye°. berry
 A Frere° ther was, a wantowne° and a friar / pleasure-seeking merye°, merry
 A lymytour,⁷ a ful solempne° man. imposing 210 In alle the ordres foure⁸ is noon° that kan° no one / knows
 So muchel° of daliaunce° and fair langage. much / flirtation
 He hadde maad° ful many a mariage made
 Of yonge wommen at his owene cost.
 Unto his ordre he was a noble post° pillar 215 And wel biloved and famulier was he
 With frankeleyns° ever al in his contree franklins (gentry)
 And with worthy wommen of the toun,
 For he hadde power of confessioun,
 As seyde hymself, moore than a curat°, curate (local priest)
 220 For of his ordre he was licenciat°. licensed
 Ful swetely° herde he confessioun, sweetly
 And plesaunt was his absolucioun.
 He was an esy° man to yeve° penaunce, easy / give Theras° he wiste° to have a good where / thought pitaunce°. donation
 225 For unto a povre° ordre for to yive° poor / give
 Is signe that a man is wel yshryve°. confessed
 For if he yaf°, he dorste° make avaunt°, gave / dared / assert
 He wiste that a man was repentaunt°.⁹

¹ celle Priory or outlying house governed by the central monastery.

² Seint Maure ... Seint Beneit St. Benedict, a sixth-century Italian monk and abbot, compiled the famous Rule that goes by his name. It became normative for most of Western monasticism. St. Maurus, by legend one of his monks, was credited with bringing his Rule to France.

³ Austyn "Austin" is the typical Middle English abbreviation for Augustine, the great Doctor of the Church and Bishop of Hippo in Northern Africa (354–430 CE). He was famous for his theological writings, particularly The City of God and The Confessions, the latter his spiritual autobiography. He is also credited with writing the Rule (followed by Augustinian canons and monks) to which this passage alludes.

⁴ His heed was balled Monks shaved the crowns of their heads in a haircut known as a tonsure.

⁵ in good poynt Idiomatic: in good condition.

⁶ palfrey Everyday horse, as opposed to a destrier (war-horse) or a plowhorse.

⁷ lymytour Friar licensed to preach, minister, and hear confessions in a specified, limited area.

⁸ In ... foure There were four main orders of friars in the later Middle Ages—the Franciscans, the Dominicans, the Carmelites, and the Augustinians. Like monks, the friars took vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, but they were supposed to go out in the world and preach to the laity, whereas monks were supposed to live apart from the world and devote themselves to prayer.

⁹ For ... repentaunt For if a man gave money then he (the Friar) knew that man was repentant. The Friar is imposing a light penance in exchange for a donation to his order.

For many a man so hard is of his herte, 230 He may nat wepe^o althogh hym soore weep
 smerte.^o sorely hurts
 Therfore instede of wepyng^o and preyer^{es},^o weeping / prayers
 Men moote yeve^o silver to the povre freres! should give His typer¹ was ay farsed^o ful of knyves stuffed
 And pynnes^o for to yeven yonge pins
 wyves.^o give to young women
 235 And, certainly, he hadde a murye note;^o merry singing voice
 Wel koude he synge and pleyen on a rote.^o play on a lyre
 Of yeddynges^o he baar outrely^o the songs / completely
 pris.^o prize
 His nekke^o whit^o was as the flour-de-lys.^o neck / white / lily
 Therto he strong was as a champion.
 240 He knew the tavernes wel^o in al the toun well
 And everich hostiler and tappestere^o each innkeeper and barmaid
 Ber^o than a lazar^o or a beggestere.^o better / leper / female beggar
 For unto swich^o a worthy man as he such Acorded nat as by his facultee²
 245 To have with sike lazars aqueyntaunce.^o sick lepers acquaintance
 It is nat honeste.^o It may nat avaunce,^o respectable / advance (one)
 For to deelen^o with no swich poraille^o deal / poor folk
 But al with riche^o and selleres of vitaille.^o rich / sellers of food
 And overal the ras profit sholde arise,
 250 Curteis he was and lowely^o of servyse. humble
 Ther nas no^o man nowher so vertuous; was not
 He was the beste beggere in his hous.^{o3} convent
 For thogh a wydwe^o hadde noght a sho,^o widow / not a shoe
 So plesaunt was his "In principio,"^{o4}
 255 Yet wolde he have a ferthyng^o er he wente. farthing (coin)
 His purchas^o was wel bettre than his rente,^o income / expenses

And rage^o he koude as it were right a whelp.^o cavort / dog
 In love-dayes ther koude he muchel^o help, could he (offer) much
 For ther he was nat lyk a cloystre^o monk 260 With a thredbare cope^o as is a povre scolere,^o cloak / poor student
 But he was lyk a maister or a pope.
 Of double worstede^o was his semycope^o thick cloth / short-cloak
 That rounded as a belle out of the presse.^o mold
 Somwhat he lipped^o for his wantownesse^o lipped / affectation
 265 To make his Englissh sweete upon his tonge.
 And in his harpyng, whan that he hadde songe,
 Hise eyen^o twynkled in his heed aryght^o eyes / aright
 As doon^o the sterres^o in the frosty nyght. do / stars
 This worthy lymytour^o was cleped Huberd. limiter
 270 A Marchant was ther with a forked berd;^o beard
 In motlee^o and hye^o on horse he sat, multi-colored cloth / high
 Upon his heed a Flaundryssh^o bevere^o hat, Flemish / beaver
 His bootes clasped faire and fetisly.
 Hise resons^o he spak ful solempnely, opinions
 275 Sowynyng^o alwey th'encrees^o of his concerning / increase wynnyng.^o profit
 He wolde^o the see^o were kept for anythyng wished / sea
 Bitwixe^o Middelburgh and Orewelle.⁵ between Wel koude he in eschaunge^o sheeldes selle.⁶ exchange
 This worthy man ful wel his wit bisette;^o employed 280 Ther wiste no wight that he was in dette,⁷
 So estatly^o was he of his governaunce,^o dignified / management
 With his bargaynes and with his chevyssaunce.^o commerce for interest
 Forsothe,^o he was a worthy man withalle.^o truly / for all that
 But sooth to seyn, I noot how men hym calle.⁸

¹ typer Long ornamental piece of cloth worn either as a kind of scarf or as part of a hood or as sleeves. It provided a convenient place to put small objects.

² For...facultee It was not appropriate according to his profession.

³ The Hengwrt manuscript at this point includes the following two lines, usually numbered 252b and 252c: "And yafa certeyn ferme for the graunt / Noon of his bretheren cam ther in his haunt" (And he paid a certain annual amount for the rights [to beg] / so that none of his brother friars came into his territory).

⁴ In principio Latin: "In the beginning was the Word," the opening line of the Gospel of John.

⁵ Middelburgh and Orewelle These two ports were in the Netherlands and in England respectively. There was much trade in the late Middle Ages between the two countries, particularly in textiles.

⁶ sheeldes selle A shield, or écu, was a French coin. This kind of trade between national currencies was regarded with suspicion. It was often illegal and could be used as a way of surreptitiously charging interest on a loan (which the Church condemned as usury).

⁷ Ther...dette The syntax is ambiguous. Either "No one knew that he was in debt" (implying he was) or "No one knew him to be in debt" (implying he was not) or, since merchants were normally in debt, "No one knew how much he was in debt."

⁸ sooth...calle To tell the truth, I don't know what he was called.

185 A Clerk¹ ther was of Oxenford^o also Oxford
 That unto logyk hadde longe ygo,^o who had [committed himself] to
 And leene^o was his hors as is a rake. lean
 And he nas nat right^o fat, I undertake,^o was not very / declare
 But looked holwe^o and therto sobrelly.^o hollow / soberly
 290 Ful thredbare was his overeste courtepy,^o overcoat
 For he hadde gotten hym yet no benefice²
 Ne was^o so worldly for to have office. nor was (he)
 For hym was levere^o have at his beddes heed^o would rather
bed's head
 Twenty bookes clad^o in blak or reed^o bound / red
 295 Of Aristotle and his philosophie
 Than robes riche or fithle^o or gay sautrie.^o fiddle / psaltery
 But al be that he was a philosopfre,
 Yet hadde he but litel gold in cofre.³ little gold in a chest
 But al that he myghte of his freendes^o hente,^o friends / obtain 300 On bookes and on lernynge^o he it spente learning
 And bisily^o gan for the soules preye^o busily / prayed
 Of hem^o that yaf^o hym wherwith to them / gave scoleye.^o the means to study
 Of studie took he moost cure^o and moost heede. care
 Noght o^o word spak he moore than was neede, one 305 And that was seyde in forme^o and reverence formally
 And short and quyk and ful of hy sentence.^o meaning Sownynge in^o moral vertu was his speche, tending towards
 And gladly wolde he lerne and gladly teche.

A Sergeant of the Lawe⁴ war^o and wys^o shrewd / wise
 310 That often hadde been at the Parvys⁵
 Ther was also, ful riche of excellence.
 Discreet he was and of greet reverence.
 He semed ^{such} swich, his wordes weren so wise. were
 Justice^o he was ful often in assise^o judge / court
 315 By patente and by pleyn commissioun,⁶
 For his science^o and for his heigh renoun.^o knowledge / renown
 Of fees and robes hadde he many oon;^o many a one
 So greet a purchasour⁷ was nowher noon.^o nowhere at all
 Al was fee symple⁸ to hym in effect.
 320 His purchasyng myghte nat been infect.^o invalidated
 Nowher so bisy^o a man as he ther nas,^o busy / was not
 And yet he semed bisier^o than he was. seemed busier
 In termes^o hadde he caas^o and doomes files / cases
 alle^o judgments
 That from the tyme^o of Kyng William⁹ were time
 yfalle.^o given
 325 Therto he koude endite^o and make a thyng.^o write / brief
 Ther koude no wight^o pynchen^o at his nobody / quibble
 writyng.
 And every statut koude he pleyn by rote.^o recite by heart
 He rood but hoonly^o in a medlee^o cote, simply / multi-colored
 Girt with a ceint^o of silk with barres^o smale. belt / ornaments
 330 Of his arraye tell I no lenger tale.

¹ Clerk The term clerk can mean student or professor, priest or priest's assistant, or learned man or philosopher, depending on the context. University students were supposed to be preparing for the priesthood. Some became priests, which required a vow of celibacy, and could then win promotion in the ranks of the Church. Others only took minor orders (which meant they could marry), and either remained at university or, in many cases, became members of the growing royal, baronial, and civic administration. Chaucer's Clerk, who is studying advanced logic, is roughly the equivalent of a graduate student or junior professor.

² benefice Position as a priest or clergyman. In the Middle Ages there had developed a much-criticized custom of granting the income from some benefices to people who would apportion a small amount of the income to a poorer clergyman to do the work and then live off the rest. This practice made some bishops with multiple benefices very wealthy, and it became a means of supporting a well-connected scholar at one of the universities.

³ But ... cofre Chaucer is punning on the word philosopher, which can also mean alchemist. The search for the Philosopher's Stone, thought to be the key to turning metal to gold, was a particular study of alchemists.

⁴ Sergeant of the Lawe In late fourteenth-century England, a Sergeant of Law was not simply a lawyer; he was one of about twenty or so lawyers who functioned as legal advisors to the king and served as judges.

⁵ Parvys Shortened form of "Paradise," a name given to the porch in front of large churches. Here the reference is to the porch of Saint Paul's Cathedral in London, where lawyers would meet with their clients, the lawyer's office being unknown to late-fourteenth-century England.

⁶ By ... commissioun Letters patent were royal letters of appointment that were open, i.e., public, documents that anyone was allowed to read. The full commission gives the Sergeant the right to hear all legal cases in the Court of Assizes, circuit courts that would move from county to county.

⁷ purchasour I.e., purchaser, someone who acquired feudal property by money rather than feudal service.

⁸ fee symple Ownership without feudal obligations.

⁹ Kyng William William the Conqueror, who ruled England from 1066 to 1087. His reign marked a turning point in English governance.

- A Frankeleyn¹ was in his compaignye.
 Whir° was his heed° as is a dayesye.° white / head / daisy
 Of his complexioun he was sangwyn;²
 Wel loved he by the morwe a sope in wyn.³
 335 To lyven° in delit° was evere his wone,° live / delight / custom
 For he was Epicurus⁴ owene sone° son
 That heeld opinioun that pleyn delit° full delight
 Was verray° felicittee parfit.° true / perfect happiness
 An housholdere and that a greet was he;
 340 Seint Julian⁵ was he in his contree.
 His breed,° his ale was always after oon;⁶ bread
 A bettre envyned man° was nevere noon. man stocked with wine
 Withoute bake mete° was nevere his hous baked food
 Of fissh and flessch, and that so plentevous° plentiful
 345 It snewed° in his hous of mete and drynke, snowed
 Of alle deynteys° that men koude thynke. delicacies
 After the sondry° sesons° of the yeer various / seasons
 So chaunged he his mete° and his soper.° dinner / supper
 Ful° many a fat partrich° hadde he in very / partridge
 muwe° coop
 350 And many a breem° and many a luce° in bream / pike
 stuwe.° pond
 Wo° was his cook but if° his sauce were woe / unless Poynaunt° and sharpe° and redy al his pungent / spicy
 geere.° utensils
 His table dormant⁷ in his halle alway
- Stood redy covered al the longe day.
 355 At sessionis° ther was he lord and sire; court sessions
 Ful ofte tyme he was Knyght of the Shire.⁸
 An anlaas° and a gipser° al of silk dagger / pouch
 Heeng° at his girdel whit° as morne° hung / white / morning milk.
 A shirreve° hadde he been and countour.° sheriff / tax-collector
 360 Was nowher swich a worthy vavasour.° feudal land holder
 An Haberdasshere⁹ and a Carpenter,
 A Webbe,° a Dyere, and a Tapycer,° weaver / tapestry-maker
 And they were clothed alle in o° lyveree¹⁰ one
 Of a solempne and a greet fraternitee.¹¹
 365 Ful fresch and newe hir geere° apiked° was. equipment / polished
 Hir knyves were chaped° noght° with bras° mounted / not / brass
 But al with silver, wrought ful clene° and weel made very elegantly
 Hire girdles° and hir pouches everydeel.° belts / every bit
 Wel semed° ech of hem a fair burgeys° seemed / citizen
 370 To sitten in a yeldehalle° on a deys.° guildhall / raised platform
 Everich° for the wisdom that he kan° everyone / knew
 Was shaply° for to been an alderman.¹² suitable

¹ Frankeleyn From the word franc or free, a wealthy independent landowner and a member of the minor gentry.

² Of ... sangwyn The Franklin's physiological makeup is dominated by blood, one of the four humors, which makes him red-faced and cheerful.

³ Wel ... wyn He greatly loved in the morning bread soaked in wine. Such was the preferred breakfast for those wealthy enough to afford wine, which had to be imported from Gascony, the sole remaining territory England retained in what we now call France.

⁴ Epicurus The Greek philosopher Epicurus (341–270 BCE) maintained that the pursuit of pleasure was the natural state of humankind.

⁵ Seint Julian St. Julian, the patron saint of hospitality in the Middle Ages. Julian set up a way-station for travelers in penance for unwittingly killing his parents, who had unknowingly lodged in his house while journeying.

⁶ after oon Consistent, i.e., consistently good.

⁷ His table dormant Always standing. Most medieval tables on which meals were set were trestle tables, i.e., a long board placed on top of what we would call saw-horses. After the meal was over, the table would normally be taken down. Not so the Franklin's.

⁸ Knyght of the Shire Official designation for people chosen to represent their region in Parliament. Chaucer himself, while he was never knighted and only held the rank of squire, served as Knight of the Shire for Kent in 1386, the year before the fictitious pilgrimage to Canterbury takes place. The Franklin has also presided at the sessions of the Justices of the Peace (line 355) and served as Sheriff, the chief royal officer in a county who was responsible for collecting its taxes, and as the county auditor, who assisted the Sheriff.

⁹ Haberdasshere Seller of ribbons, buttons, hats, gloves, and small articles of clothing.

¹⁰ lyveree Uniform. Members of craft or religious guilds, as well as retainers of various lords, wore liveries. At this time the wearing of liveries encouraged factionalism and attendant violence, and there were some legal attempts to curb abuses.

¹¹ fraternitee Trade guilds or religious guilds. The trade guilds regulated who was allowed to follow a given trade in a given town, and the religious guilds functioned as mutual aid societies, burying their dead and helping members who were sick or had fallen into poverty. These guildsmen, though identified by their trades, are members of a religious guild, since trade guilds admitted only members of a single trade.

¹² alderman In late medieval England, as in some cities today, the board of aldermen governs under the mayor. The five guildsmen have prospered, rising from apprentices to masters. They are successful businessmen who run their own shop or shops, participate in civic government, and aspire, with their wives, to the status of the lesser gentry.

- For catel° hadde they ynogh° and belongings / enough
 rente,° rent
 And eek hir wyves° wolde it wel assente° wives / agree
 75 And elles° certeyn were they to blame. otherwise
 It is ful fair to been ycleped° "Madame" called
 And goon to vigilies¹ al bifore
 And have a mantel roialliche ybore.° cloak royally carried
 A Cook° they hadde with hem° for the cook / them
 nones° occasion
 80 To boille° the chiknes° with the boil / chickens
 marybones° marrowbones
 And poudre-marchant tart and galyngale.²
 Wel koude he knowe a draughte of Londoun ale.
 He koude rooste and sethe° and boille° and frye, simmer / boil
 Maken mortreux° and wel bake a pye. stews
 85 But greet harm° was it as it thoughte me° pity / seemed to me
 That on his shyne° a mormal° hadde he. shin / ulcer
 For blankmanger³ that made he with the beste.
 A Shipman was ther wonynge° fer by living
 weste.° far in the west
 For aught I woot,° he was of Dertemouthe.⁴ all I know 90 He rood° upon a rouncy° as he kouthe° rode / nag / could
 In a gowne of faldyng° to the knee. woolen cloth
 A daggere hangynge on a laas° hadde he lace
 About his nekke under his arm adoun.° downwards
 The hoot° somer hadde maad° his hewe° hot / made / color
 al broun,
 395 And certainly he was a good felawe.
 Ful many a draughte° of wyn° had he draft / wine
 drawe° drawn
 Fro Burdeuxward whil that the chapman° sleepe.⁵ merchant
 Of nyce° conscience took he no keepe.° scrupulous / notice
 If that he faught° and hadde the hyer if he fought
 hond,° upper hand

¹ vigilies Church services held the night before an important holy day. The aldermen and their wives would lead the procession, with their cloaks carried by a servant.

² And ... galyngale And tart ground spice and aromatic roots (such as ginger).

³ blankmanger Stew of milk, rice, almonds, and chicken or fish.

⁴ Dertemouthe I.e., Dartmouth, a port on the English Channel in the southwest of England, near Plymouth.

⁵ Ful ... sleepe Sailing home from Bordeaux with a cargo of wine, the Shipman would secretly steal some while the wine merchant (chapman) was asleep.

- 400 By water he sente hem hoom° to every lond.⁶ home
 But of his craft° to rekene° wel his tydes,° ability / reckon / tides
 His stremes° and his daungers° hym currents / dangers bisides,° all around him
 His herberwe° and his moone,° his harborage / moon
 lodemenage,° piloting
 Ther nas noon swich° from Hull to was not such a one Cartage.⁷
 405 Hardy he was and wys to undertake;° wise in his endeavors
 With many a tempest hadde his berd° been beard
 shake.° W: shaken
 He knew alle the havenes° as they were havens
 Fro Gootlond to the Cape of Fynystere⁸
 And every cryke° in Britaigne° and in inlet / Brittany
 Spayne.° Spain
 410 His barge ycleped was the Maudelayne.
 With us ther was a Doctour of Physik.⁹
 In al this world ne was ther noon hym lik° there was no one like him
 To speke of fisik° and of surgerye, medicine
 For he was grounded in astronomye.¹⁰
 415 He kepte° his pacient a ful greet deel watched over
 In houres by his magyk natureel.¹¹
 Wel koude he fortunen the ascendent° calculate a planet's position
 Of hise ymages¹² for his pacient.
 He knew the cause of everich° maladye, every

⁶ By ... lond I.e., he threw his defeated opponents overboard.

⁷ Hull to Cartage Hull is a port in northern England; Cartage is either Carthage on the Mediterranean coast of North Africa or Cartagena in Spain.

⁸ Fro ... Fynystere Gotland is an island in the Baltic Sea off the coast of southern Sweden; Cape Finisterre is the point of land that juts out into the Atlantic Ocean in northwest Spain.

⁹ Doctour of Physik Physician. The term "doctor" means "teacher," as everyone in the Middle Ages knew, so the type of doctor who taught medicine and sometimes practiced it needed to be distinguished from other types of doctors, who taught academic subjects in the universities.

¹⁰ For ... astronomye In the Middle Ages, physicians often based their schedules of treatment on astrological tables.

¹¹ In ... natureel Hours are the times in the day when the various planetary influences were pronounced, when the Physician watched over (kepte) his patient. Natural magic is opposed to black magic, which involves contact with malicious spirits.

¹² Of hise ymages The practice of astrologically-based medicine involved the use of images of the planets as talismans.

420 Were it of hoot or coold or moyste or drye,¹
 And where they engendred and of what humour.
 He was a verray, parfit praktisour.^o practitioner
 The cause yknowe^o and of his harm the roote,^o known / root
 Anon he yaf^o the sike man his boote.^o gave / remedy
 425 Ful redy hadde he hise apothecaries^o pharmacists
 To sende hym drogges^o and his letuaries,^o drugs / syrups
 For ech^o of hem^o made oother for to wynne.^o each / them / profit
 Hir^o frendshipe nas nat newe^o to their / recently bigynne.^o begun
 Wel knew he the olde Esculapius
 430 And Deyscorides and eek Rufus, Olde Ypocras, Haly, and Galyen,
 Serapion, Razis, and Avycen,
 Averrois, Damascien, and Constantyn,
 Bernard and Gatesden and Gilbertyn.²
 435 Of his diete^o mesurable^o was he, diet / moderate
 For it was of no superfluitee^o excess
 But of greet norissyng^o and digestible. nourishment
 His studie was but litel on the Bible.³

¹ He ... drye Medieval medicine was also based on a theory, traceable back to Greek physicians such as the ones Chaucer mentions below, of the balance of the four bodily humors (blood, phlegm, black bile, and yellow bile) and their qualities of hot, cold, moist, and dry mentioned in this line.

² Wel ... Gilbertyn Aesculapius was a mythological demi-god, son to Apollo. Dioscorides, Rufus of Ephesus, Hippocrates (associated with the Hippocratic Oath physicians still swear), and Galen were famous Greek physicians. Galen (129–199) was particularly influential, since he set out the theory of four humors which was the basis of medieval medicine. “Haly” is probably the Persian physician Ali Ben el-Abbas (d. 994). Rhazes (d. c. 930) was an Arab astronomer and physician. Avicenna, or Ibn Sina (980–1037), and Averroes (1126–98) were Islamic philosophers and physicians. John of Damascus was a Syrian physician of the ninth century. Constantine the African came from Carthage, converted to Christianity, became a Benedictine monk, and taught at Salerno in Italy in the eleventh century. His work on aphrodisiacs earns him the title the “cursed monk” in The Merchant’s Tale, line 1810. Islamic science was widely influential in the Middle Ages; it first brought Greek thought to the Latin West. The last three authorities are British. Bernard Gordon was a Scottish physician who taught at Montpellier in the fourteenth century. John Gaddesden (d. c. 1349) taught at Oxford and served as court doctor to Edward II. Gilbert was an English physician in the thirteenth century and the author of a major medical treatise.

³ His ... Bible In the Middle Ages physicians were often thought to be religious skeptics, partly because of their knowledge of classical astronomy.

In sangwyn^o and in pers^o he clad was al, red / blue
 440 Lyned with taffata and with sendal.⁴
 And yet he was but esy of dispenche.^o moderate in spending
 He kepte that he wan^o in pestilence.^{o5} what he earned / plague
 For gold in phisik^o is a cordial.^o medicine / heart-medicine
 Therfore he lovede gold in special.^o especially 445 A good Wif was ther of biside Bathe,⁶
 But she was somdel deaf^o, and that was somewhat deaf
 scathe.^o a shame
 Of clooth makynge she hadde swich an haunt,^o skill
 She passed hem of Ypres and of Gaunt.⁷
 In al the parisshe^o wif ne was ther noon parish 450 That to the offrynge^{o8} bifore hire sholde goon. offering
 And if ther dide, certeyn so wrooth^o was she, angry
 That she was out of alle charitee.
 Hir coverchiefs^o ful fyne were of ground^o— kerchiefs / texture
 I dorste swere^o they weyeden^o ten dared swear / weighed pound—
 455 That on a Sondag weren upon hir heed.
 Hir hosen weren of fyn^o scarlet reed,^o fine / red Ful streite yteyd^o and shoes ful moyste^o tightly laced / supple and newe.
 Boold^o was hir face and fair and reed of hewe.^o bold / color
 She was a worthy womman al hir lyve.
 460 Housbondes at chirche dore^o she hadde fyve,^{o9} church door / five Withouten^o oother compaignye in youthe. apart from
 But therof nedeth nat to speke as nowthe.^o for now

⁴ Lyned ... sendal Taffeta and sendal are types of silk cloth; silk, imported from Asia, was a mark of status and wealth.

⁵ He ... pestilence Possibly a reference to the Black Death, which killed at least a third of the population of England between 1348 and 1349, although there were later outbreaks of plague in 1362, 1369, and 1376.

⁶ Bathe I.e., Bath, a town in southwest England near Bristol. It is famous for its hot springs (hence its name) and Roman ruins. The parish of St. Michael’s, just north of Bath, was famous for its weavers.

Ypres ... Gaunt Cities in Flanders (now north-western Belgium) known for cloth trading. There were also skilled weavers from these cities working in England.

⁸ offrynge In eucharistic services, gifts are brought to the altar during the Offering, or Offertory.

⁹ Housbondes ... fyve Marriage vows were exchanged on the church steps and were followed by a Mass inside the church.

And thries° hadde she been at Jerusalem.¹ three times
 She hadde passed many a straunge strem.° foreign water
 465 At Rome she hadde been and at Boloigne,
 In Galice at Seint Jame and at Coloigne.
 She koude muchel of wandrynge by the weye.²
 Gat-tothed was she, soothly for to seye.³
 Upon an amblere° esily° she sat, saddle-horse / easily
 470 Ywympled⁴ wel, and on hir heed° an hat head
 As brood° as is a bokeler or a targe,° broad / shields
 A foot mantel° aboute hir hipes large outer skirt
 And on hir feet a paire of spores° sharpe. spurs
 In felaweshipe wel koude she laughe and carpe.° joke
 475 Of remedies of love she knew perchaunce,° as it happened
 For she koude° of that art the olde daunce. knew
 A good man was ther of religioun
 And was a povre Persoun° of a toun, poor parson
 But riche he was of hooly thoght° and werk.° holy thought / work 480 He was also a lerned man, a clerk,
 That Cristes° gospel trewely wolde preche.° Christ's / preach
 Hise parissshens° devoutly wolde he teche. parishioners
 Benygne° he was and wonder diligent benign
 And in adversitee ful pacient,
 485 And swich° he was preved° ofte sithes.° such / proven / many times
 Ful looth° were hym to cursen° for reluctant / excommunicate
 hise tithes,⁵
 But rather wolde he yeven° out of doute° give / without doubt
 Unto his povre parissshens aboute
 Of his offryng and eek of his substaunce.
 490 He koude in litel thyng have suffisaunce.⁶

¹ And ... Jerusalem Jerusalem was the greatest of all pilgrimages. From England, a trip there and back could take a couple of years. The other pilgrimages mentioned below are Rome, where the Apostles Peter and Paul were buried; Boulogne-sur-mer in France, famous for its miraculous image of the Blessed Virgin; Compostella in Galicia, where the relics of St. James were venerated; and Cologne, where the relics of the Three Kings (or Three Magi) were kept.

² She ... weye She knew much about wandering along the road.

³ Gat-tothed ... seye According to medieval physiognomy, a gap between the teeth was a sign that a woman was bold, lecherous, faithless, and suspicious.

⁴ Ywympled Wearing a wimple.

⁵ tithes Periodic assessments made to determine one tenth of a person's goods, harvest, and animals, which would then be claimed by the Church. Parish priests could excommunicate parishioners who would not pay them.

⁶ He ... suffisaunce He was able to have enough in little things.

Wyd° was his parisshe and houses fer asonder,° wide / far apart
 But he ne lefte° nat for reyn° ne thonder did not neglect / rain
 In siknesse nor in meschief° to visite trouble
 The ferreste° in his parisshe muche and farthest lite,° of greater or lesser (rank)
 495 Upon his feet and in his hand a staf.° staff
 This noble ensample° to his sheepe he yaf, example
 That firste he wroghte° and afterward that he taughte. acted
 Out of the gospel he tho° wordes caughte,° those / took
 And this figure° he added eek therto,° figure of speech / to it
 500 "That if gold ruste, what shal iren° do?" iron
 For if a preest be foul on whom we truste,
 No wonder is a lewed man° to ruste, layman
 And shame it is if a preest take keepe°— heed
 A shiten° shepherde and a clene° soiled with excrement / clean sheepe.
 505 Wel oghte° a preest ensample for to yeve ought
 By his clenness how that his sheepe sholde lyve.
 He sette nat° his benefice to hyre did not offer
 And leet° his sheepe encombred° in the myre° left / stuck / mud
 And ran to Londoun unto Seint Poules⁷
 510 To seken hym° a chauntrie° for soules seek for himself / chantry
 Or with a bretherhed° to been withholde,°⁸ guild / hired
 But dwelleth at hoom and kepeth wel his folde° sheepfold (i.e., flock)
 So that the wolf ne made° it nat would not make myscarie.° come to grief
 He was a shepherde and noght° a mercenarie,° not / mercenary 515 And though he hooly were and vertuous,
 He was nat to synful men despitous,° scornful
 Ne of his speche daungerous° ne digne,° proud / haughty
 But in his techyng discreet and benygne,° kind
 To drawn folk to hevene by fairnesse, 520 By good ensample. This was his bisynesse.
 But it were any persone obstinat,⁹
 Whatso° he were of heigh or lough estat,° whether / low class

⁷ Seint Poules St. Paul's Cathedral in London. The custom Chaucer refers to is related to the issue of benefices. A chantry is an endowed position, usually at large churches and cathedrals, in which a priest sings masses for the soul of the person who left money for the endowment. It involved very little work, unlike the Parson's toil described in his section of the General Prologue.

⁸ Or ... withholde The brotherhood here is a guild. Guilds hired priests to serve as their chaplains.

But ... obstinat But if anyone were obstinate.

- Hym wolde he snybben° sharply for the rebuke
 nonys.° occasion
 A better preest I trowe° that nowher noon ys. believe 525 He waiteth after° no pompe and reverence, expected
 Ne maked° hym a spiced° conscience. affected / overly fastidious
 But Cristes loore° and hise apostles twelve teaching
 He taughte, but first he folwed it hymselfe.
 With hym ther was a Plowman, was° his brother, (who) was 530 That hadde ylad° of dong ful many a fother.° hauled / cartload
 A trewe swynkere° and a good was he, true worker
 Lyvyng in pees and parfit charitee.
 God loved he best with al his hoole herte
 At alle tymes, thogh he gamed or smerte,¹ 535 And thanne° his neighebore right° as hymselfe. then / just
 He wolde thresshe° and therto dyke° and thresh / dig delve° shovel
 For Cristes sake for every povre wight° poor person
 Withouten hire° if it lay in his myght. pay
 Hise tithes payde he ful faire and wel,
 540 Bothe of his propre swynk° and his catel.° own work / possessions
 In a tabard° he rood upon a mere.° over-shirt / mare
 Ther was also a Reve° and a Millere, reeve
 A Somnour°² and a Pardoner°³ also, summoner
 A Maunciple°⁴ and myself. Ther were namo.° manciple / no more 545 The Millere was a stout carl° for the nones. sturdy fellow
 Ful byg he was of brawn and eek of bones.
 That proved wel,° for overal ther° he was clear / everywhere
 cam° came
 At wrastlyng° he wolde have alwey the ram.⁵ wrestling
 He was short-sholdred,° brood,° a thikke stocky / broad knarre.° thick fellow
- 550 Ther was no dore that he ne wolde heve of harre°
 Or breke it at a rennyng° with his heed. by running at it
 His berd as any sowe° or fox was reed, sow
 And therto brood as though it were a spade.
 Upon the cope° right of his nose he hade ridge
 555 A werthe° and theron stood a toft of herys,° wart / tuft of hairs
 Reed as the brustles° of a sowes erys.° bristles / sow's ears
 Hise nosethirles° blake were and wyde.° nostrils / wide
 A swerd and a bokeler bar° he by his syde. bore
 His mouth as greet was as a greet forneys.° furnace 560 He was a jangler° and a goliardeys,⁷ joker
 And that was moost of synne° and harlotries.° sin / obscenities
 Wel koude he stelen° corn° and tollen steal / grain
 thries,° take his toll (percentage) thrice
 And yet he hadde a thombe°⁸ of gold, pardee.° by God
 A whit cote° and a blew° hood wered° he. white coat / blue / wore 565 A baggepipe wel koude he blowe and sowne,° sound
 And therwithal he broghte us out of towne.
 A gentil° Maunciple was ther of a temple gracious
 Of which achatours° myghte take exemple buyers
 For to be wise in byyng° of vitaille.° buying / food
 570 For wheither that he payde or took by taile,° credit
 Algate he wayted so in his achaat
 That he was ay biforn and in good staat.⁹
 Now is nat that of God a ful faire grace
 That swich a lewed° mannes wit shal pace° unlearned / surpass 575 The wisdom of an heepe° of lerned men? heap
 Of maistres hadde he mo° than thries ten° more / three times ten
 That weren° of lawe° expert and curious,° were / law / skilled
 Of whiche ther weren a duszeyne° in that hous dozen
 Worthy to been stywardes° of rente and lond stewards
 580 Of any lord that is in Engeland,
 To maken hym lyve by his propre good° own means
 In honour detteeles°—but if he were wood— without debt

¹ At ... smerte At all times, whether he rejoiced or suffered.

² A Somnour Deliverer of legal summonses to either secular or ecclesiastical courts, although more often the latter. The ecclesiastical courts were run by the Church and had jurisdiction over all clerics but also over any lay person charged with a moral offense such as adultery or fornication.

³ Pardoner Seller of indulgences, which were writs authorized by the Church to raise money for charitable causes. Indulgences usually promised reduction of time in penance and, after death, in Purgatory.

⁴ Maunciple Servant at one of the Inns of Court, the legal brotherhoods in London. The Inns of Court were also called temples.

⁵ ram Typical prize for victors at trade fairs.

⁶ Ther ... harre There was not a door that he would not heave off its hinges.

⁷ goliardeys The reference is to Goliards, wandering scholars in the eleventh and twelfth centuries who were known for their rowdy life.

⁸ thombe The reference is either to the proverb "An honest miller has a golden thumb," which implied that there was no such thing as an honest miller, or to the distinctive shape millers' thumbs acquired by continually feeling the grain while it was being ground, so that a "golden thumb" was a sign of a prosperous miller.

⁹ Algate ... staat He was always so watchful in his purchasing (achaat) / That he always came out ahead (biforn) and did well.

Or lyve as scarsly° as hym list desire,° frugally / as he wanted
 And able for to helpen al a shire° an entire county
 In na caas° that myghte falle or happe,° situation / happen
 And yet this Manciple sette hir aller cappe.° cheated them all
 The Reve was a sclendre,° colerik° man.¹ slender / angry
 His berd was shave° as ny° as ever he kan, shaven / closely
 His heer° was by his erys° ful round yshorn.° hair / ears / cut
 His tope was dokked° lyk a preest biforn.² clipped
 Ful longe were his legges and ful lene°— lean
 Ylyk° a staf° ther was no calf ysene.° like / staff / seen
 Wel koude he kepe a gerner° and a bynne;° granary / bin
 Ther was noon auditour koude of hym wynne.° get the better of Wel wiste° he by the droghte° and by the reyn° knew / drought rain
 The yeldyng° of his seed and of his greyn.° yield / grain
 His lordes sheepe, his neet,° his dayerye,° cattle / dairy cows
 His swyn,° his hors, his stoor,° and his pultrye° poultry
 Was hoolly° in this Reves governyng, wholly
 And by his covenant° yaf the rekenyng° contract / reckoning
 Syn° that his lord was twenty yeer of age. since
 Ther koude no man brynge hym in arrerage.° arrears
 Ther nas baillif ne hierde nor oother hyne,
 That he ne knew his sleighte and his covyne.³
 They were adrad° of hym as of the deeth.⁴ afraid / death
 His wonyng° was ful faire upon an heeth;° dwelling / heath
 With grene trees shadwed was his place.
 He koude bettre than his lord purchase.° buy land
 Full riche he was, astored pryvely.° privately stocked
 His lord wel koude he plesen subtilly,° please subtly
 To yeve and lene° hym of his owene good° loan / goods

¹ The ... man A reeve was someone, often originally a peasant, who served as a supervisor on a lord's estate. Among other things, reeves collected the portion of the harvest due to the lords and made sure peasants performed their customary labor for the lords. They were much resented. Chaucer's Reeve is dominated by choler, or yellow bile, which makes him suspicious and irritable

² His ... biforn The top of his head was cut short in the front like a priest's haircut. This would have been an unfashionable cut for a layman, and suitable to a man who was poor, or miserly, or austere.

Ther nas ... covyne There was not a bailiff (foreman), herdsman, or other worker whose tricks and deception he did not know.

⁴ adrad ... deeth Death in general, or possibly the plague.

And have a thank and yet a gowne and hood.⁵
 In youthe he hadde lerned° a good myster:° learned / craft
 He was a wel good wrighte,° a carpenter. craftsman
 This Reve sat upon a ful good stot° farm horse
 That was al pomely° grey and highte° Scot. dappled / named
 A long surcote° of pers upon he hade, overcoat
 And by his syde he baar a rusty blade.
 Of Northfolk° was this Reve of which I telle, Norfolk
 Biside a toun men clepen Baldeswelle.⁶
 Tukked° he was as is a frere° aboute,⁷ belted / friar
 And ever he rood the hyndreste° of oure route.° last / company
 A Somonour was ther with us in that place
 That hadde a fyr reed,° cherubynnes° face,⁸ fire red / cherub-like
 For saucefleem° he was with eyen narwe.° blotchy / narrow eyes
 As hoot he was and lecherous as a sparwe,⁹ sparrow
 With scaled browes blake and piled berd.¹⁰
 Of his visage° children were aferd.° face / afraid
 Ther nas quyksilver, lytarge, ne brymstoon,
 Boras, cerice, ne oille of Tartre noon,¹¹
 Ne oynement° that wolde clense° and ointment / cleanse
 byte° bite
 That hym myghte helpen of the whelkes° white blemishes
 Nor of the knobbes sittyng° on his chekes.° sitting / cheeks
 Wel loved he garleek, oynons, and eek lekes° leeks
 And for to drynken strong wyn reed as blood.
 Thanne wolde he speke and crie° as he were wood. yell

⁵ His lord ... hood This reeve cheats his lord by storing away the lord's goods as his own and then using them to provide loans to the lord, receiving payment and thanks. Payment in the Middle Ages was most often in tangible goods, like the clothing mentioned here, rather than in money.

⁶ Baldeswelle I.e., Bawdeswell, a town in the northern part of Norfolk, the northernmost county in East Anglia on the east coast of England.

⁷ Tukked ... aboute Franciscan friars wore habits tied about the waist with ropes.

⁸ That ... face Cherubim, the second highest order of angels, were bright red. See Ezekiel 1.13.

⁹ sparwe Since sparrows travel in flocks, they had a reputation in the Middle Ages for being lecherous, similar to the more modern reputation of rabbits.

¹⁰ With ... berd The Summoner's eyebrows have a disease called the scall, and his beard has been losing tufts of hair.

¹¹ Ther ... noon The unsuccessful remedies are mercury (sometimes known as quicksilver), lead monoxide (lytarge), sulfur (sometimes known as brimstone), borax, white lead (cerice), and cream of tartar.

And whan that he wel dronken hadde the wyn,
 Thanne wolde he speke no word but Latyn.
 A fewe termes hadde he, two or thre,
 640 That he had lerned out of som decree.^o legal document
 No wonder is, he herde it al the day,
 And eek ye knowen wel how that a jay^o chattering bird
 Kan clepen "Watte"^o as wel as kan the Pope. Walter
 But whoso koude in oother thyng him grope,^o examine 645 Thanne hadde he spent al his philosophie.
 Ay^o "Questio quid iuris!"¹ wold he crie. always
 He was a gentil harlot and a kynde;^o noble and kindly scoundrel
 A better felawe^o sholde men noght^o fynde. fellow / not
 He wolde suffre for a quart of wyn
 650 A good felawe to have his concubyn^o mistress
 A twelf monthe^o and excuse hym atte fulle.^o a year / fully Ful prively^o a fynch^o eek koude he pulle.² secretly / finch
 And if he foond^o owher^o a good felawe, found / anywhere
 He wolde techen^o hym to have noon awe^o teach / no respect
 655 In swich caas of the Ercedekenes curs³—
 But if^a mannes^o soule were in his purs.^o unless / man's / purse
 For in his purs he sholde ypunysshed be:^o be punished
 Purs is the Ercedekenes Helle, seyde he.
 But wel I woot^o he lyed^o right in dede.^o know / lied / indeed 660 Of cursyng^o oghte ech gilty man him drede; excommunication
 For curs wol slee^o right as^o assoillyng^o kill / just as / absolution savith.
 And also war^o him of a "Significavit"⁴ beware
 In daunger^o hadde he at his owene gise^o power / pleasure
 The yonge girles⁵ of the diocese^o diocese
 665 And knew hir conseil^o and was al hir reed.⁶ their adviser
 A gerland^o hadde he set upon his heed garland

Questio quid iuris Latin: Question: what point of the law? The expression was often used in the ecclesiastical courts.

² Ful... pulle Obscene expression that meant, literally, "to pluck a bird."

³ In... curs In such a case of the excommunication (curse) of the archdeacon. An archdeacon was the ecclesiastical official in charge of the ecclesiastical court of a diocese.

⁴ Significavit Latin: It signified. It is the first word in a writ authorizing the civil court to imprison someone who had been excommunicated.

⁵ yonge girles In Middle English, girls can mean young people of both sexes, but here it may just mean young women.

⁶ was al hir reed Was all their advice. Idiomatic: the Summoner was in their confidence.

As greet as it were for an ale stake.⁷
 A bokeleer hadde he, maad^o hym of a cake.^o made / loaf of bread
 With hym ther was a gentil^o Pardoner noble
 670 Of Rouncivale,⁸ his freend and his compeer,^o companion
 That streight^o was comen fro the court of Rome. straight
 Ful loude he soong "Com Hider, Love, to Me;"⁹
 This Somonour bar to hym a stif burdoun.¹⁰
 Was nevere trompe^o of half so greet a soun! trumpet
 675 'This Pardoner hadde heer as yelow as wex,^o wax
 But smothe it heeng as dooth a strike^o of flex.^o bunch / flux
 By ounces^o henge hise lokkes that he hadde, strands
 And therwith he hise shuldres^o shoulders overspradde,^o spread over
 But thynne^o it lay by colpons^o oon^o thin / strands / one and oon.
 680 But hood for jolitee^o wered^o he noon, fun / wore
 For it was trussed^o up in his walet.^o packed / bag
 Hym thoughte^o he rood al of the newe it seemed to him
 jet.^o fashion
 Dischevelee^o save^o his cappe^o he with his hair loose / except / cap rood^o al bare. rode Swiche glarynge^o eyen hadde he as an hare.¹¹ bulging
 685 A vernycle¹² hadde he sowed^o upon his cappe; sewn
 His walet^o biforn^o hym in his lappe,^o wallet / before / lap
 Bretful^o of pardoun, comen from Rome al hoot. brimful

⁷ ale stake Ale-sign; a long pole hung with a garland that stuck out into the street and showed that ale was being sold on the premises.

⁸ Of Rouncivale The Pardoner belongs to the Hospital of the Blessed Mary of Roncesvalles in London, a dependent house of the larger one at Roncesvalles, the mountain pass between Spain and France which many pilgrims used when they traveled to St. James of Compostela. Hospitals in the Middle Ages were not purely medical facilities; they also served as inns and poor houses.

⁹ Com Hider, Love, to Me This song, "Come Here, Love, to Me," does not survive.

¹⁰ This... burdoun The Summoner accompanied him with a strong bass. In medieval carols, each sung verse was separated by a burden, a kind of refrain. Carols originally had many subjects, not just the joys of Christmas.

¹¹ hare According to medieval lore, hares were hermaphroditic, becoming both male and female in order to reproduce. Bulging eyes were thought to be a sign of lust and folly.

¹² vernycle Badge depicting St. Veronica's veil, a relic at Rome. St. Veronica wiped Jesus' face with her veil as he carried the cross, and by miracle his image was imprinted upon it. Pilgrims collected such badges.

	A voys° he hadde as smal° as hath a	voice / high-pitched	In Southwerk at this gentil hostelry
	goot.°	goat	That highte the Tabard, faste by the Belle. ⁶
	No berd hadde he, ne never sholde° have:	would	720 But now is tyme to yow° for to telle	you
90	As smothe° it was as° it were late yshave.°	smooth / as if / shaven	How that we baren° us that ilke nyght	behaved
	I trowe° he were a geldyng° or a mare. ¹	believe / gelding	Whan we were in that hostelrie alyght,°	arrived
	But of his craft fro° Berwyk into Ware ²	from	And after wol I tell of oure viage
	Ne was ther swich° another pardonere.	there was not such	And al the remenaunt of oure pilgrimage.
	For in his male° he hadde a pilwe beer,°	bag / pillow-case	725 But first I pray yow of youre curteisye
55	Which that he seyde was oure Lady veyl,° ³	Virgin Mary's veil	That ye n'arete it nat my vileynye, ⁷
	He seyde he hadde a gobet° of the seyl°	piece / sail	Thogh that I pleylny° speke in this mateere	plainly
	That Seint Peter hadde when that he wente		To telle yow hir wordes and hir cheere,°	comportment
	Upon the see til Jhesu Crist hym hente. ⁴	grabbed him	Ne thogh I speke hir wordes proprely.°	exactly
	He hadde a croys° of latoun° ful of stones,	cross / brass	730 For this ye knowen also wel as I:
700	And in a glas° he hadde pigges bones.	glass	Whoso° shal telle a tale after a man,	whoever
	But with thise relikes whan that he fond		He moot° reherce as ny° as ever he kan	should / closely
	A povre person dwellynge upon lond,		Everich a word° if it be in his charge,	every word
	Upon a day he gat hym° moore moneye	got himself	Al° speke he never so rudeliche° or	although / crudely
	Than that the person gat in monthes tweye.		large,°	freely
705	And thus with feyned° flaterye and japes°	pretended / jokes	735 Or ellis° he moot° telle his tale untrewé,	else / must
	He made the person and the peple his apes.°	dupes	Or feyne thyng,° or fynde wordes newe.	falsify something
	But trewely, to tellen atte laste,		He may nat spare although he were his brother;
	He was in chirche a noble ecclesiaste.°	churchman	He moot as wel seye o word as another.
	Wel koude he rede a lessoun° or a	lesson	Crist spak hymself ful brode° in Hooly	freely
	storie,°	story (from the Bible)	Writ,°	holy scripture
710	But alderbest° he song° an offertorie, ⁵	best of all / sang	740 And wel ye woot no vileynye is it.
	For wel he wiste whan that song was songe		Eek Plato seith, whoso kan hym rede,
	He moste preche° and wel affile° his	must preach / sharpen	The wordes moote be cosyn° to the dede. ⁸	cousin / deed
	tonge°	tongue	Also I prey yow to foryeve° it me	forgive
	To wynne° silver as he ful wel koude.	acquire	Al° have I nat set folk in hir degree°	although / according to rank
	Therefore he song the murierly° and loude.	more merrily	745 Heere in this tale as that they sholde stonde.
715	Now have I toold yow shortly° in a clause	briefly	My wit° is short, ye may wel understonde.	intelligence
	Th'estaat,° th'array,° the nombre,	social position / appearance	Greet chiere° made oure Hoost us everichon,°	cheer / everyone
	and eek the cause
	Why that assembled was this compaignye

¹ I ... mare I believe he was either a gelding (a castrated horse) or a mare.

² Berwyk into Ware Berwick is in the extreme north of England near the border with Scotland; Ware is near London.

³ For ... veyl Chaucer's point is that the Pardoner sells fraudulent relics (sacred objects associated with Jesus or the saints).

⁴ That ... hente The reference is to Peter's unsuccessful attempt to imitate Christ by walking on the water. Christ had to rescue him. See Matthew 14.22–33.

⁵ offertorie The Offertory was chanted when the congregation was bringing gifts to the altar.

⁶ Belle Previous editors have capitalized this word, guessing that it was the name of another inn—there were several called the Bell in that area—or perhaps a house of prostitution. Perhaps the word should not be capitalized, as it may imply a notable bell in the neighborhood.

⁷ That ... vileynye That you not attribute it to my lack of manners. Vileynye does not mean villainy in the modern sense. A villein was originally an inhabitant of a rural village; thus the word signifies the state of being rustic rather than civilized.

⁸ Eek ... dede The reference is to Plato's Timaeus, the only one of his dialogues available in translation to the Latin West in the Middle Ages. The quotation is found in section 29. The passage is also discussed by Boethius in his Consolation of Philosophy (3, prose 12), a work that Chaucer had translated and drew upon frequently.

And to the soper sette he us anon.
 He served us with vitaille at the beste;
 750 Strong was the wyn, and wel to drynke us leste.^o it pleased us
 A semely^o man oure Hoost was withalle suitable
 For to been a marchal^o in an halle.¹ marshal
 A large man he was, with eyen stepe.^o bright
 A fairer burgeys^o was ther noon in Chepe,² citizen 755 Boold of his speche and wys and wel ytaught,^o learned
 And of manhod hym lakked^o right naught.^o lacked / nothing
 Eek therto^o he was right a myrie man, in addition
 And after soper pleyen^o he bigan^o play / began
 And spak of myrthe amonges othere thynges
 760 Whan that we hadde maad oure rekenynges³
 And seyde thus, "Now lordynges, trewely,
 Ye been^o to me right welcome hertely.^o are / heartily
 For by my trouthe, if that I shal nat lye,
 I saugh nat this yeer so myrie a compaignye
 765 Atones^o in this herberwe^o as is now. at once / inn
 Fayn^o wolde I doon yow myrthe, wiste I^o gladly / if I knew how.
 And of a myrthe I am right now bythoght^o in mind
 To doon yow ese,^o and it shal coste do you ease
 noght.^o nothing
 Ye goon to Caunterbury: God yow speede!^o God bring you success!
 770 The blissful martir quite^o yow youre meede!^o pay / reward
 And wel I woot as ye goon by the weye,
 Ye shapen yow^o to talen^o and to pleye.^o intend / tell tales / play
 For trewely,^o confort^o ne myrthe is noon truly / comfort
 To ride by the weye dounb as the stoon.⁴
 775 And therfore wol I maken yow disport,^o entertainment
 As I seyde erst,^o and doon yow som first confort.^o bring you some comfort
 And if yow liketh^o alle by oon assent^o pleases you / unanimously
 For to stonden at^o my juggement^o abide by / judgment
 And for to werken^o as I shal yow seye, proceed
 780 Tomorwe, whan ye riden by the weye,
 Now by my fader soule^o that is deed,^o father's soul / dead

¹ For ... halle A marshal is a steward or chief butler; a hall is a manor house or town house of a lord.

² Chepe Cheapside was the merchants' district in London.

³ Whan ... rekenynges When we had paid our bills.

⁴ For ... ston For truly there is neither comfort nor mirth in riding along as silent as a stone.

But if ye be myrie, I wol yeve yow myn heed!
 Hoold up youre hondes withouten moore speche."

Oure conseil^o was nat^o longe for to seche.^o counsel / not / seek 785 Us thoughte^o it was noght worth to make it wys,⁵ we thought
 And graunted hym withouten moore avys^o more debate
 And bad^o hym seye his voirdir^o as hym asked / verdict
 leste.^o as he wanted
 "Lordynges," quod he, "now herkneth for the beste,
 But taak it nought, I prey^o yow, in desdeyn.^o beg / disdain
 790 This is the poynt, to speken short and pleyne,
 That ech of yow to shorte^o with oure weye shorten
 In this viage shal telle tales tweye^o two
 To Caunterburyward,^o I mene^o it so, towards Canterbury / mean
 And homward he shal tellen othere two 795 Of aventures that whilom^o han bifalle.^o once / have happened
 And which of yow that bereth hym^o best of conducts himself
 alle,
 That is to seyn, that telleth in this caas^o occasion
 Tales of best sentence^o and moost solaa^o, meaning / enjoyment
 Shal have a soper at oure aller cost^o at all our cost 800 Heere in this place, sittynge by this post,
 Whan that we come agayn fro Caunterbury.
 As for to make yow the moore mury^o, merry
 I wol myself goodly^o with yow ryde, gladly
 Right at myn owene cost, and be youre gyde.
 805 And whoso wole my juggement withseye^o resist
 Shal paye al that we spenden by the weye.^o along the way
 And if ye vouchesauf^o that it be so, grant
 Tel me anon withouten wordes mo,
 And I wol erly^o shape me^o therfore."^o early / get ready / for it 810 This thyng was graunted and oure othes^o swore^o oaths / sworn
 With ful glad herte, and preyden^o hym also asked
 That he wolde vouchesauf for to do so
 And that he wolde been oure governour
 And of oure tales juge^o and reportour^o judge / referee
 815 And sette a soper at a certeyn pris^o price
 And we wol reuled been at his devys^o wish
 In heigh and lough.^o And thus by oon^o all matters / one assent
 We been acorded^o to his juggement, agreed
 And therupon the wyn was fet^o anon.^o fetchd / immediately
 820 We dronken and to reste wente echon^o each one Withouten any lenger tarynge.^o longer delaying

⁵ to make it wys Idiomatic: to make a big deal of it.

Amorwe,° whan that day gan° for to the next day / began
 sprynge,° dawn
 Up roos° oure Hoost and was oure aller cok° rose / rooster for us all
 And gadrede° us togidre° all in a flok.° gathered / together / flock
 And forth we ridden,° a litel moore than rode paas,° a horse's walking pace
 Unto the Wateryng of Seint Thomas.¹
 And there oure Hoost bigan his hors areste° rein in And seyde, "Lordynges, herkneth if yow leste!" please
 Ye woot youre foreward° and it yow recorde;° contract / recall
 If evensong° and morwesong° accorde,² evensong / matins
 Lat se° now who shal telle the firste tale. let us see
 As evere mote° I drynke wyn or ale, might Whoso be rebel to my juggement
 Shal paye for al that by the wey is spent.
 Now draweth cut er that we ferrer twynne;³
 He which that hath the shorteste shal bigynne.
 Sire Knyght," quod he, "my mayster and my lord,
 Now draweth cut,° for that is myn a straw
 accord.° decision
 Cometh neer," quod he, "my lady Prioress,
 And ye, sire Clerk, lat be youre shamefastnesse,° shyness
 Ne studieth noght.° Ley° hond° to every stop stop studying / lay / hand
 man."

Anon to drawen every wight° bigan, person
 And shortly for to tellen as it was,
 Were it by aventure or sort or cas,⁴ 845 The sothe° is this: the cut° fil° to the knyght, truth / straw / fell
 Of which ful blithe° and glad was every wyght. very happy
 And telle he moste his tale as was reso un,° reasonable
 By foreward° and by composicioun,° agreement / arrangement
 As ye han herd. What nedeth wordes mo?
 850 And whan this goode man saugh° that it was so, saw
 As he that wys was and obedient
 To kepe his foreward by his free assent,
 He seyde, "Syn° I shal bigynne the game, since
 What, welcome be the cut, a Goddes° name! in God's 855 Now lat us ryde and herkneth what I seye."
 And with that word we ryden forth oure weye.
 And he bigan with right a myrie cheere° cheerful expression
 His tale anon, and seyde in this manere.⁵

¹ Wateryng of Seint Thomas The Watering of St. Thomas was the name given to a brook just outside London on the way to Canterbury.

² If... accorde I.e., if you still say in the morning what you said last evening.

³ Now... twynne "Now draw a straw before we depart further."

⁴ Were... cas Adventure, sort, and case mean roughly the same thing: chance.

⁵ His... manere Hengwrt and some other manuscripts read "and seyde as ye may heere," not "and seyde in this manere," a suggestion that The Canterbury Tales were to be read aloud as well as silently.

The Miller's Prologue and Tale

When the Knight has finished his tale, much applauded by the “gentles,” the Host turns to the pilgrim who, after the Prioress, ranks next in the social hierarchy: the Monk, a senior brother from a wealthy monastery. But the Miller, who has already placed himself at the head of the pilgrims to lead them out of town with his discordant bagpipes, has no respect for social hierarchy. He insists that he will “quyte” the Knight, that is, repay him or match him, and his tale does just that. With the insertion of The Miller's Tale, Chaucer breaks decisively from less dynamic frame narratives such as Boccaccio's Decameron, in which the stories are told by a homogeneous and harmonious group of aristocrats, and launches a social comedy in which the various tellers will contest each other's authority and values.

The Miller's Tale belongs to the medieval genre of the fabliau, a short tale of trickery often set among lower-class or bourgeois characters. These tales may have circulated orally, but they were also written down, and the written versions were enjoyed by aristocratic, not peasant, readers. Chaucer draws on two well-established fabliau plots. In the first, a young scholar cuckolds an old husband by making him believe that a second flood is coming; in the second, a young lover humiliates a rival by tricking him into a misdirected kiss. Chaucer may have drawn on a source that had already combined these two plots or may have combined them himself. Early critics, embarrassed by the tale's vulgarity, tended to regard it as a regrettable lapse and take Chaucer at his word when he apologizes in The General Prologue for his boorish lower-class characters, whom he designates as “churls” who insist on telling churlish stories. But Chaucer devoted all his powers of comic timing, sensual description, and social satire to expanding the basic story line into a comic masterpiece, in which the two plots come together when Nicholas calls for water.

The Miller tells his tale, a “legend or a life” (which would normally mean a saint's life) of the cuckolding of an old carpenter, in part to attack the Reeve, who is also a carpenter—and a professional rival, since reeves were expected to catch dishonest millers. The Miller's rivalry with the Knight, however, and his claim that he will “quyte” him, invite readers to observe how extensively his tale parallels that of the Knight. These parallels all serve to subvert the values of The Knight's Tale, calling into question its lengthy tribute to cosmic order, its chivalric dignity, and its depiction of refined love from afar. Whereas Palamon and Arcite are almost interchangeable, Nicholas, who is “hende” or handy in so many ways, is completely unlike the squeamish Absolon; and Alison, in complete contrast to the passive Emelye, is an energetic schemer, who participates gleefully in Absolon's humiliation.

Set in Oxford, The Miller's Tale gives a vivid sense of medieval student life and reveals the tensions between the more prosperous members of the peasantry and cunning clerics. Most unusually, the butt of the story, the old cuckolded husband, becomes a complex and often sympathetic character. John the carpenter is allowed to expand upon his philosophy of life, warning against prying into God's secrets, just as the Miller warns the Reeve not to pry into his wife's secrets. With the fast pace of burlesque or a modern situation comedy, The Miller's Tale is filled with vivid details of domestic life; it could not be more different from the Knight's, and its insistence that cleverness or proximity will triumph over high ideals is one of its many possible morals. The tale offers solace and sentens, but exactly what this sentens is remains the source of continual debate.

Opening page to The Miller's Tale, Ellesmere manuscript. (Reprinted by permission of The Huntington Library, San Marino, California. EL 26 C9 f. 34v.)

THE MILLER'S PROLOGUE

HERE FOLWEN THE WORDES BITWENE
THE HOOST AND THE MILLERE

W^han that the Knyght hath thus his tale ytoold,^o told
In al the route^o ne was ther^o yong company / there was not ne^o oold nor
That he ne seyde^o it was a noble storie did not say
And worthy for to drawen to memorie,^o learn by heart
5 And namely^o the gentils^o especially / gentlefolk everichon.^o every one Oure Hoost lough^o and swoor,^o "So laughed / swore moot I gon,¹
This gooth aright!^o Unbokeled^o is the goes well / unbuckled
male.^o purse
Lat se,^o now, who shal telle another tale? let's see
For trewely, the game is wel bigonne.
10 Now telleth on, Sire Monk, if that ye konne,^o if you can Somwhat to quite with^o the knyghtes tale." match
The Millere, that for dronken^o was al pale being drunk
So that unnethe^o upon his hors he sat, scarcely
He nolde^o avalen^o neither hood ne hat would not / take off
15 Ne abyde^o no man for his curteisie,^o wait for / courtesy
But in Pilates² voys^o he gan^o to crie voice / began
And swoor, "By armes and by blood and bones,³
I kan^o a noble tale for the nones^o know / occasion
With which I wol now quite^o the Knyghtes tale!" match
20 Oure Hoost saugh^o that he was dronke of ale saw
And seyde, "Abyd,^o Robyn, my leeve^o brother, wait / dear
Som bettre man shal telle us first another.
Abyde, and lat^o us werken^o thriftily."^o let / work / respectably
"By Goddes soule," quod^o he, "that wol^o nat I. said / will 25 For I wol speke or elles^o go my wey."^o else / way
Oure Hoost answerde, "Tel on a devele wey!^o in the devil's name Thou art a fool! Thy wit is overcome!"
"Now herkneth,"^o quod the Millere, listen
"alle and some.^o one and all

But first I make a protestacioun^o protest
30 That I am dronke; I knowe it by my soun.^o sound
And therfore if that I mysspeke or seye,^o say something wrong
Wyte it^o the ale of Southwerk, I preye.^o blame it on / pray
For I wol tell a legende and a lyf⁴
Bothe of a carpenter and of his wyf,
35 How that a clerk^o hath set the wrightes cappe."⁵ student
The Reve answerde and seyde, "Stynt thy clappe!^o shut your mouth
Lat be thy lewed,^o dronken^o ignorant / drunken harlotrye!^o bawdiness
It is a synne^o and eek^o a greet^o folye^o sin / also / great / folly
To apeyren^o any man or hym^o defame^o harm / him / slander
40 And eek to bryngen wyves in swich^o fame.^o such / dishonor
Thou mayst ynogh^o of othere thynges seyn."^o enough / speak
This dronke^o Millere spak^o ful^o soone drunken / spoke / very agayn^o again
And seyde, "Leve brother Osewold,
Who hath no wyf, he is no cokewold.⁶
45 But I sey nat therfore that thou art oon.^o one Ther been ful goode wyves many oon,^o a one
And evere a thousand goode ayeyns^o oon badde.^o against / bad
That knowestow wel^o thyself, but if^o you know well / unless thou madde.^o are mad
Why artow^o angry with my tale now? are you
50 I have a wyf, Per Die,^o as wel as thow, by God
Yet nolde^o I for the oxen in my plogh^o would not / plow
Take upon me moore than ynogh,^o enough
As demen^o of myself that I were oon.^o judge / one (i.e., a cuckold)
I wol bileve^o wel that I am noon.^o believe / none
55 An housbonde shal nat been inquisityf^o inquisitive
Of Goddes pryvetee^o nor of his wyf. secrets
So he may fynde^o Goddes foyson^o there, find / abundance
Of the remenant nedeth nat enquire!"^o he need not inquire
What sholde I moore seyn, but this Millere, 60 He nolde^o his wordes for no man would not forbere,^o forego
But tolde his cherles^o tale in his manere.^o boor's / manner
M'athynketh^o that I shal reherce^o it heere, I regret / repeat

¹ So ... gon I.e., as I hope to live.

² But in Pilates I.e., Pontius Pilate, the Roman governor who condemned Jesus to be crucified. In medieval religious plays he was depicted as a loud, rampaging villain.

³ By ... bones Swearing during the Middle Ages and Renaissance often involved taking oaths on various parts of God's body—here God's arms, blood, and bones.

⁴ legende and a lyf Normally a "saint's life," or biography of a Christian saint.

⁵ set the wrightes cappe Made a fool of the carpenter.

⁶ cokewold I.e., cuckold: a husband whose wife has sex with another man.

And therfore every gentil° wight° I preye,° noble / person / pray
 For Goddes love demeth° nat° that I seye° judge / not / speak
 Of yvel entente,° but that I moot reherce° evil intent / repeat
 Hir° tales, all be they° bettre or werse, their / although they be
 Or elles° falsen° som of my mateere.° else / falsify / matter
 And therfore, whoso° list° it nat whoever / wishes
 yheere,° not to hear
 Turne over the leef,° and chese° another tale. page / choose
 For he shal fynde° ynowe,° grete° and find / enough / great smale,° small
 Of storial° thyng that toucheth gentillesse° historical / nobility
 And eek moralitee° and hoolynesse.° morality / holiness
 Blameth nat me if that ye chese amys.° choose wrongly
 The millere is a cherl.° Ye knowe wel this. boor
 So was the Reve, and othere manye mo,° more
 And harlotrie° they tolden bothe two. baudiness
 Avyseth yow;° putteth me out of blame, be advised
 And eek men shal nat maken ernest° of game.° seriousness / joke

THE MILLER'S TALE

HEERE BIGYNNETH THE MILLERE HIS TALE

Whilom° ther was dwellynge° at once / living
 Oxenford° Oxford
 A riche gnof° that gastes° heeld to bord,¹ fellow / guests
 And of his craft° he was a carpenter. profession
 With hym ther was dwellynge a povre° scoler° poor / student
 Hadde lerned° art, but al his fantasye° learned / interest
 Was turned for to lerne astrologye,
 And koude a certeyn of condusiouns²
 To demen° by interrogaciouns° judge / questions
 If that men asked hym in certein houres³
 Whan that men sholde have droghte° or elles drought
 shoures,° rain
 Or if men asked hym what sholde bifalle° happen
 Of every thyng—I may nat rekene° hem° all. count up / them
 This clerk was cleped° hende° Nicholas. named / handy
 Of deerne° love he koude° and of solas,° secret / knew / pleasure

¹ heeld to bord Rented out rooms.² koude a certeyn of conclusiouns Knew some (astrological) calculations.³ houres I.e., astrological hours—times when certain planets exerted a certain influence.

And therto he was sleigh° and ful privee° sly / very secretive
 And lyk° a mayden meke° for to see. like / meek
 A chambre° hadde he in that hostelrye,° room / lodging
 Allone° withouten any compaignye. alone
 Ful fetisly° ydight° with herbes⁴ fashionably / decorated swoote,° sweet
 And he hymself as swete as is the roote° root
 Of lycorys° or any cetewale.⁵ licorice
 His *Almageste*⁶ and bookes grete and smale,
 His astrelabie⁷ longynge for° his art, pertaining to Hise augrym stones⁸ layen° faire apart° lay / somewhat away
 On shelves couched° at his beddes heed,° arranged / bed's head
 His presse° ycovered° with a faldyng° cupboard / covered / cloth
 reed,° red
 And al above ther lay a gay sautrie⁹
 On which he made a nyghtes° melodie° nightly / melody
 So swetely that al the chambre rong.° rang
 And *Angelus ad virginem*¹⁰ he song,
 And after that he song The Kynges Noote;¹¹
 Full often blessed was his myrie° throte!° merry / throat
 And thus this sweete clerk his tyme spente
 After his freendes fyndyng¹² and his rente.° income
 This carpenter hadde wedded newe° a wyf newly married
 Which that he lovede moore than his lyf.

⁴ ydight with herbes Spread with dried and sweet smelling herbs.⁵ cetewale The spice zedoary, similar to ginger.⁶ Almageste I.e., Almagest, the basic textbook for medieval astronomy. It was the work of Claudius Ptolemy (second century CE), who gives his name to the Ptolemaic system, in which the sun revolves around the earth. According to Ptolemy, the heavens comprised nine concentric crystal spheres that revolved and on which the planets and stars were affixed.⁷ astrelabie I.e., astrolabe, a scientific instrument used to measure angles of heavenly bodies. Chaucer wrote The Treatise on the Astrolabe, a prose work that is one of the first pieces of technical writing in the English language.⁸ augrym stones I.e., Augrim stones; they were marked with numbers and were used for making mathematical calculations.⁹ sautrie I.e., psaltery, a stringed musical instrument.¹⁰ Angelus ad virginem Latin: The Angel to the Virgin. The song, an antiphon used in liturgical service, depicts the conversation between the angel Gabriel and the Virgin Mary about the coming birth of Jesus.¹¹ The Kynges Noote This song has not survived.¹² After his freendes fyndyng According to what his friends gave him.

- 115 Of eighteteene yeer she was of age.
 Jalous° he was and heeld hire narwe° in cage,¹ jealous / closely
 For she was yong and wylde and he was old,
 And demed° hymself been° lik° a guessed / to be / likely cokewold.° cuckold
 He knew nat Catoun,² for his wit° was intelligence rude,° unformed
 120 That bad° man sholde wedde his who advised simylitude.° equal
 Men sholde wedden after hire° estaat,° their / condition
 For youthe and elde° is often at debaat,° age / in dispute
 But sith° that he was fallen in the snare,° since / trap
 He moste endure as oother folk his care.° sorrow
 125 Fair was this yonge wyf and therewithal
 As any wezele° hir body gent° and smal. weasel / delicate
 A ceynt° she werede° ybarred° al of silk, girdle / wore / striped
 A barmclooth° as whit° as morne° milk apron / white / morning
 Upon hir lendes,° ful of many a goore.° hips / pleat
 130 Whit° was hir smok° and white / undergarment
 broyden° al bifoore° embroidered / in front
 And eek bihynde on hir coler° aboute collar
 Of col-blak° silk withinne and eek withoute. coal-black
 The tapes° of hir white voluper° ribbons / cap
 Were of the same suyte° of hir coler, pattern
 135 Hir filet° brood° of silk and set ful hye,° headband / broad / high
 And sikerly° she hadde a likerous° eye. certainly / flirtatious
 Ful smale ypullen° were hire browes° two, plucked / eyebrows
 And tho° were bent and blake° as any they / black sloo,° sloeberry
 She was ful moore blisful° on to see much more pleasant
 140 Than is the newe perejonette tree,° pear tree
 And softer than the wolfe° is of a wether.° wool / male sheep
 And by hir girdel° heeng a purs of belt
 lether° hung a purse of leather Tasseled with grene° and perled° with green / decorated latoun.° brass
 In al this world to seken° up and down seek 145 Ther nas° no man so wys° that koude was not / wise
 thenche° imagine

¹ in cage In a cage; i.e., he guarded her carefully.

² Catoun I.e., Cato. The Distichs, a widely circulating collection of proverbs and wise sayings in verse couplets, often used for teaching Latin in schools, were ascribed in the Middle Ages to the Roman writer Dionysius Cato.

- So gay a popelote° or swich a wenche.° doll / peasant girl
 Full brighter was the shynynge° of hir hewe° shining / complexion
 Than in the Tour° the noble° yforged° tower / gold coin / forged
 newe!³
 But of hir song, it was as loude and yerne° eager 150 As any swalwe° sittynge on a berne.° swallow / barn
 Therto she koude skippe° and make game° dance / play
 As any kyde° or calf folwyng his dame.° kid (young goat) / mother
 Hir mouth was sweete as bragot° or the ale
 meeth° mead (fermented honey)
 Or hoord° of apples leyde° in hey° or hoard / stored / hay
 heeth.° heather
 155 Wynsynge° she was as is a joly° colt, skittish / pretty
 Long as a mast and uprighte° as a bolt.° straight / arrow
 A brooch° she baar° upon hir loue brooch / wore coler° low collar
 As brood° as is the boos⁴ of a bokeler.° broad / shield
 Hir shoes were laced on hir legges hye.° high 160 She was a prymerole,° a piggesnye° primrose / pig's eye (flower)
 For any lord to leggen° in his bedde lay
 Or yet for any good yeman° to wedde. yeoman
 Now sire° and eft° sire, so bifel° the cas° sir / again / befell / event
 That on a day this hende° Nicholas handy
 165 Fil° with this yonge wyf to rage° and pleye fell / romp
 Whil that hir housbonde was at Oseneye,⁵
 As clerkes been ful subtile° and ful queynte,° subtle / clever
 And prively° he caughte hire by the queynte° secretly / genitals
 And seyde, "Ywis,° but if° ich° have my wille, indeed / unless / I 170 For deerne° love of thee, lemman,° I secret / sweetheart
 spille,"° die
 And heeld hire harde by the haunche bones° thighs
 And seyde, "Lemman,° love me al at ones° sweetheart / immediately
 Or I wol dyen,° also° God me save!" die / as

Than ... newe Gold coins were forged in the Tower of London.

³ boos I.e., boss, the center bulge of a shield, occasionally used to injure an enemy.

⁵ Oseneye I.e., Oseney, a small town just to the west of Oxford (now part of the modern city) where there was an abbey.

⁶ queynte A rhyme on two homonyms (such as blue / blew or guest / guessed), near homonyms (such as seke / seke, i.e., seek and sick in the General Prologue, lines 18–19) or on two different meanings of the same word, as here with queynte, was known as "rime riche" and was much valued by the French court poets of Chaucer's day. The modern term "rich rhyme" has a slightly narrower meaning and is confined to rhymes on homonyms.

- And she sproong° as a colt dooth° in the sprang / does
trave,° stall
- And with hir heed she wryed° faste away. twisted
- She seyde, "I wol nat kisse thee, by my fey!" faith
- Why, lat be, quod ich,¹ lat be Nicholas, I say
- Or I wol crie "Out, harrow, and allas!"²
- Do wey° youre handes, for youre curteisy!" let go
- This Nicholas gan mercy for to crye
- And spak so faire and profred° hire so faste urged
- That she hir love hym graunted atte last° at last
- And swoor hir ooth,° "By Seint Thomas of oath Kent,"° St. Thomas à Becket
- That she wol° been at his comandement would
- Whan that she may hir leyser° wel espie.° leisure / see
- "Myn housbonde is so ful of jalousie
- That but° ye wayte° wel and been privee,° unless / wait / secretive
- I woot° right wel I nam° but deed," quod she. know / am not
- "Ye moste been ful deerne° as in this cas."° secretive / business
- "Nay, therof care thee noght,"° quod Nicholas, have no care
- "A clerk hadde lutherly biset his whyle³
- But if° he koude a carpenter bigyle."° unless / trick
- And thus they been accorded° and ysworn° agreed / sworn
- To wayte a tyme° as I have told biforn.° wait (for a time) / before
- Whan Nicholas had doon° thus everideel° done / every bit
- And thakked° hire aboute the lendes° weel,° patted / loins / well
- He kiste hire sweete and taketh his sawtrie° psaltery
- And pleyeth° faste and maketh melodie. plays
- Thanne fil it° thus that to the paryssh chirche it happened
- Cristes owene werkes° for to wirche,° works / perform
- This goode wyf wente on an haliday.⁴
- Hir forheed° shoon° as bright as any day, forehead / shone
- So was it wasshen° whan she leet° hir werk.° washed / left / work
- Now was ther of that chirche° a pariss clerk⁵ church
- 205 The which that was ycleped° Absolon.⁶ called
- Crul° was his heer, and as the gold it shoon, curled
- And strouted° as a fanne° large and stretched out / fan
brode,° broad
- Ful streight and evene lay his joly shode.° parting of his hair
- His rode° was reed,° hise eyen greye as complexion / red goos,° goose
- 210 With Poules wyndow⁷ corven° on his shoos.° carved / shoes
- In hoses° rede° he wente fetisly.° stockings / red / elegantly
- Yclad° he was ful smal° and proprely clothed / very tightly
- Al in a kirtel° of a lyght waget.° tunic / blue
- Ful faire and thikke° been the poyntes° set, thick / laces
- 215 And therupon he hadde a gay surplys° surplice (liturgical garment)
- As whit as is the blosme upon the rys.° twig
- A myrie° child° he was, so God me save. merry / young man
- Wel koude he laten blood° and clippe and shave⁸ let blood
- And maken a chartre° of lond° or contract / land
acquitaunce.° quit-claim
- 220 In twenty manere koude he trippe and daunce
- After the scole° of Oxenford tho,° school / then
- And with his legges casten to and fro
- And pleyen songes on a smal
ruble.° rebec (bowed stringed instrument)
- Therto he song somtyme a loud quynbyle,° falsetto
- 225 And as wel koude he pleye on his giterne.° gittern (plucked stringed instrument)
- In al the toun° nas° brewhous ne taverne town / was not
- That he ne visited° with his solas° did not visit / comfort
- Ther any gaylard tappestere° was. merry bar-maid
- But sooth to seyn, he was somdeel
squaymous° somewhat squeamish

¹ quod ich Both Ellesmere and Hengwrt read "ich" here, yet modern editors emend to "she," under the assumption that Chaucer is here slipping in and out of direct discourse. The manuscript readings can be defended on the basis of her uttering these words: "Let me be, I said, let me be, Nicholas...!"

² Out, harrow, and allas Common cries of alarm to summon assistance.

³ lutherly biset his whyle Wasted his time.

⁴ haliday I.e., holy day; a saint's day or the day of a major religious celebration.

⁵ a pariss clerk Absolon is an assistant to the parish priest. He is a member of the clergy and probably in minor orders and might, in due course, be ordained as a priest himself.

⁶ Absolon The Biblical Absalom, son of King David, was famous for his beauty. Cf. 2 Samuel 14.25–26.

⁷ Poules wyndow Fancy shoes were sometimes cut to produce a lattice pattern, which Chaucer compares to the stained glass rose window at St. Paul's Cathedral, London, which burned down in the disastrous fire in 1666.

⁸ clippe and shave Medieval barbers not only worked on one's hair but also did minor surgery like letting blood. This procedure, which involved opening a vein and allowing blood to flow out, was considered important in keeping the body's four humors (one of which was blood) in balance, thus insuring good health.

230 Of fartyng, and of speche daungerous.^o fastidious
 This Absolon that jolif^o was and gay jolly
 Gooth^o with a sencer^o on the haliday,¹ goes / incense censer
 Sensynge^o the wyves^o of the parisshe incensing / wives
 faste.^o diligently
 And many a lovely look on hem^o he caste, them 235 And namely^o on this carpenteris wyf. especially
 To looke on hire hym thoughte a myrie lyf.
 She was so propre and sweete and likerous,
 I dar wel seyn if she hadde been a mous^o mouse
 And he a cat, he wolde hire^o hente^o anon. her / grab
 240 This parisshe clerk, this joly Absolon, Hath in his herte swich a love longynge
 That of no wyf took he noon offrynge.^o no offering
 For curteisie, he seyde, he wolde noon.^o wanted none
 The moone, when it was nyght, ful brighte shoon, 245 And Absolon his gyterne^o hath ytake;^o gittern / taken
 For paramours^o he thoghte for to wake.^o love's sake / stay awake
 And forth he gooth, jolif^o and amorous, jolly
 Til he cam to the carpenteres hous
 A litel after cokkes^o hadde ycrowe^o roosters / crowed
 250 And dressed^o hym up by a approached shot-wyndowe^o binged window
 That was upon the carpenteris wal.^o wall
 He syngeth in his voys^o gentil^o and voice / refined smal,^o high-pitched
 "Now deere lady, if thy wille be,
 I pray yow that ye wole thynke on me," 255 Ful wel acordaunt^o to his in accord
 gyternynge.^o playing of the gittern
 This carpenter awook and herde synge
 And spak unto his wyf and seyde anon,
 "What, Alison, herestow nat^o Absolon don't you hear That chauneth^o thus under oure boures^o who sings / bedroom's wal?"
 260 And she answerde hir housbonde therwithal,
 "Yis, God woot,^o John! I heere it every deel."^o God knows / every bit
 This passeth forth. What wol ye bet than weel?^o what more do you want?
 Fro day to day this joly Absolon
 So woweth^o hire that hym is wobigon.^o woos / filled with woe
 265 He waketh al the nyght and al the day.

He kembeth^o hise lokkes^o brode and combs / hair
 made hym gay.
 He woweth hire by meenes^o and brocage^o go-between / agents
 And swoor he wolde been hir owene page.^o young servant
 He syngeth brokkyng^o as a nyghtyngale. twittering 270 He sent hire pyment,^o meeth,^o and ale spiced wine / mead spiced
 And wafres^o pipyng hoot^o out of the wafer cakes / hot gleede,^o fire
 And for^o she was of towne, he profreth meede.^o because / money
 For som folk wol ben wonnen^o for richesse, won
 And somme for strokes,^o and somme for force
 gentillesse.^o nobility
 275 Somtyme to shewe his lightnesse^o and maistrye^o agility / ability
 He playeth Herodes² upon a scaffold^o hye.^o stage / high
 But what availleth hym as in this cas?
 She loveth so this hende Nicholas
 That Absolon may blowe the bukkes^o horn.³ buck's 280 He ne hadde^o for his labour but a scorn. did not have
 And thus she maketh Absolon hire ape,
 And al his earnest^o turneth til a jape.^o seriousness / joke
 Ful sooth^o is this proverbe, it is no lye,^o true / lie
 Men seyn right thus: "Alwey the nye slye^o near sly one 285 Maketh the ferre^o leewe^o to be looth."^o far / loved one / hated
 For though that Absolon be wood^o or wrooth,^o crazy / angry
 Bycause that he fer^o was from hire sighte, far
 This nye Nicholas stood in his lighte.
 Now bere^o thee wel, thou hende Nicholas, bear
 290 For Absolon may waille^o and synge "Allas!" complain
 And so bifel ir^o on a Saterdag it happened
 This carpenter was goon^o til Osenay,^o gone / to Oseney
 And hende Nicholas and Alisoun
 Acorded^o been to this conclusioun agreed 295 That Nicholas shal shapen^o hym a wyle^o fabricate / scheme
 This sely,^o jalous housbonde to bigyle,^o simple / trick
 And if so be the game wente aright,
 She sholde slepen^o in his arm al nyght, sleep
 For this was his desir and hire^o also. hers
 300 And right anon, withouten wordes mo,
 This Nicholas no lenger wolde tarie,^o delay

¹ Gooth ... haliday It was and is the custom in liturgical churches to burn incense in a censer, a metal container which hung from a chain and was swung about by a cleric called a thurifer.

² Herodes I.e., King Herod. Told of the birth of the Messiah, Herod ordered the slaughter of all male children born in Bethlehem, an event depicted in some religious plays.

³ blowe the bukkes horn The expression "blow the buck's horn" more or less means "go whistle."

But dooth ful softe° unto his chambre carie° quietly / carry Bothe mete° and drynke for a day or tweye° food / two
 And to hire housbonde bad hire for to seye,° asked her to say
 If that he axed° after Nicholas, asked
 She sholde seye she nyste° where he was; did not know
 Of al that day she saugh° hym nat° with eye. saw / not
 She trowed° that he was in maladye,° believed / sickness
 For° for° no cry hir mayde koude hym calle. because / with
 He nolde° answer for thyng° that myghte would not / anything
 falle.° happen
 This passeth forth al thilke° Saterdag, that same
 That Nicholas stille° in his chambre lay quietly
 And eet° and sleepe° or dide what hym ate / slept leste,° what he wanted
 Til Sondag that the sonne gooth to reste.
 This sely carpenter hath greet merveye° wondered greatly
 Of Nicholas or what thyng myghte hym eyle° ail (trouble)
 And seyde, "I am adrad,° by Seint Thomas, afraid
 It stondest nat aright with Nicholas.
 God shilde° that he deyde° sodeynly! forbid / died
 This world is now ful tikel,° sikerly.° uncertain / certainly
 I saugh today a cors° yborn° to chirche body / carried
 That now on Monday last I saugh hym wirche!° work Go up," quod he unto his knave° serving boy
 anoon,° immediately
 "Clepe° at his dore or knokke with a stoon. call Looke how it is and tel me boldly."
 This knave gooth hym up ful sturdily
 And at the chambre dore whil that he stood,
 He cride and knokked as that he were wood,
 "What how! What do ye, maister Nicholay?
 How may ye slepen al the longe day?"
 But al for noght. He herde nat a word.
 An hole he foond ful lowe upon a bord° board
 Theras° the cat was wont° in for to where / accustomed crepe,° creep
 And at that hole he looked in ful depe
 Til at the laste he hadde of hym a sighte.
 This Nicholas sat capyng evere uprighte° gaping upwards
 As he had kiked° on the newe moone. looked Adoun° he gooth and tolde his maister soone down
 In what array° he saugh that ilke° man. condition / same
 This carpenter to blessen¹ hym bigan° began

And seyde, "Help us, Seinte Frydeswyde!²
 A man woot litel what hym shal bityde!° shall happen to him
 This man is falle° with his astromye° fallen / astronomy
 In som woodnesse° or in som agonye.° madness / fit
 345 I thoghte ay° wel how that it sholde be. I always thought Men sholde nat knowe of Goddes pryvetee.° secrets
 Yblessed° be alwey a lewed° man blessed / uneducated
 That noght but oonly° his Bileve³ kan.° nothing other than / knows
 So ferde° another clerk with astromye:° it happened / astronomy
 350 He walked in the feeldes° for to pryce° fields / pry (study foolishly)
 Upon the sterres,° what ther sholde bifalle, stars
 Til he was in a marleput⁴ yfalle.° fallen
 He saugh nat that! But yet by Seint Thomas,
 Me reweth° soore of hende Nicholas. I have pity 355 He shal be rated of° his studyng scolded for If that I may, by Jhesus hevene° kyng! Heaven's Get me a staf° that I may underspore,° staff / pry
 Whil that thou, Robyn, hevest of the dore.° heave off the door
 He shal out of his studyng, as I gesse."^o guess
 360 And to the chambre dore° he gan hym dresse.° door / approached
 His knave° was a strong carl° for the servant / fellow
 nones,° occasion
 And by the haspe° he haaf it of° hinge / heaved it off
 atones;° at once
 Into° the floor the dore° fil° anon. onto / door / fell
 This Nicholas sat ay° as stille as stoon° ever / stone
 365 And evere caped° upward into the eir.° gaped / air
 This carpenter wende° he were in despeir, believed
 And hente° hym by the sholdres° myghtily grabbed / shoulders
 And shook hym harde and cride spitously,° loudly
 "What Nicholay! What, how! What! Looke adoun!
 370 Awake and thenk° on Cristes Passioun! think
 I crouche° thee from elves and fro sign with the cross
 wighetes."^o evil creatures
 Therwith the nyght spel⁵ seyde he anonrightes° right away

² Seinte Frydeswyde The Anglo-Saxon St. Frideswide, a young noblewoman who was persecuted for her desire to be a nun, is the patron saint of the town of Oxford. She was abbess of a monastery that was on the site of the present Christ Church, Oxford.

³ Bileve Carpenter John's "Believe" is his Creed—the Apostle's Creed, which, along with the Lord's Prayer, was to be memorized by every Christian.

⁴ marleput I.e., marl-pit, a ditch on a farm for keeping marl, a type of soil rich in clay and used for fertilizing fields.

⁵ nyght spel Spell or charm said at night to ward off evil spirits.

¹ blessen I.e., to bless oneself, to make the sign of the cross.

On foure halves° of the hous aboute four corners
 And on the thresshold° of the dore withoute. threshold
 375 "Jhesu Crist and Seint Benedight¹
 Blesse this hous from every wikked wight
 For nyghtes nerye° the white Pater Noster:° save / Lord's Prayer
 Where wentestow, Seint Petres soster?"²
 And atte laste this hende Nicholas 380 Gan for to sike° soore and seyde, "Allas!
 Shal al this world be lost eftsoones° now?" sigh
immediately
 This carpenter answerde, "What seystow?" do you say What! Thynk on God as we doon, men that swynke."³
 This Nicholas answerde, "Fecche° me drynke, get 385 And after wol I speke in pryvetee
 Of certeyn thyng that toucheth me and thee.
 I wol telle it noon oother° man certeyn." (to) no other
 This carpenter goth down and comth ageyn° comes again
 And broghte of myghty ale a large quart.
 390 And whan that ech of hem had dronke his part,
 This Nicholas his dore faste shette° shut
 And doun the carpenter by hym he sette.
 He seyde, "John, myn hoost, lief° and deere, beloved
 Thou shalt upon thy trouthe swere me here
 395 That to no wight thou shalt this conseil° wreye,° counsel / betray
 For it is Cristes conseil that I seye!
 And if thou telle man, thou art forlore,° lost
 For this vengeaunce thou shalt han therfore:° for it
 That if thou wreye° me, thou shalt be wood." betray 400 "Nay, Crist forbede it for his hooly blood!"
 Quod tho this sely man, "I nam no labbe.° am no blabber
 Ne, though I seye, I am nat lief to gabbe.° accustomed to gab
 Sey what thou wolt, I shal it nevere telle
 To child ne wyf, by hym that harwed helle!"⁴

¹ Seint Benedight St. Benedict of Nursia was an early sixth-century abbot who wrote the famous Rule for monasteries.

² For nyghtes ... soster These lines have never been satisfactorily explained and probably represent John's mangling of popular charms or invocations; Where wentestow Where did you go; soster Sister.

³ men that swynke Men who labor. John is making the old distinction between the three estates here. The first estate comprises those who pray (the profession for which Nicholas is studying), the second, those who fight (the nobility), and the third, those who work and thus provide the food for all three estates.

⁴ harwed helle The Harrowing of Hell (another subject of medieval religious drama) was the victorious entry Christ made into Hell between his death and resurrection to save the righteous souls held in limbo.

405 "Now John," quod Nicholas, "I wol nat lye.
 I have yfounde° in myn astrologye found
 As I have looked in the moone bright
 That now a Monday next° at quarter nyght° next Monday
 Shal falle a reyn,° and that so wilde and wood rain
 410 That half so greet° was nevere Noees° Flood. great / Noah's
 This world," he seyde, "in lasse° than an hour less
 Shal al be dreyn,° so hidous is the shour.° drowned / downpour
 Thus shal mankynde drenche° and lese hir lyf." drown
 This carpenter answerde, "Allas, my wyf!
 415 And shal she drenche? Allas, myn Alisoun!"
 For sorwe° of this he fil° almoost adoun sorrow / fell
 And seyde, "Is ther no remedie in this cas?"
 "Why, yis, for Gode," quod hende Nicholas.
 "If thou wolt werken° after loore° and act / teaching
 reed.° advice
 420 Thou mayst nat werken after thyn owene heed,° head (intelligence)
 For thus seith Salomon,⁶ that was ful trewe:
 'Werk° al by conseil and thou shalt nat rewe!'° do / regret
 And if thou werken wolt by good conseil,
 I undertake withouten mast and seyl° sail
 425 Yet shal I saven hire° and thee and me. save her Hastou nat herd how saved was Noe° Noah
 Whan that oure Lord hadde warned hym biforn° before
 That al the world with water sholde be lorn?"° lost
 "Yis," quod this carpenter, "ful yooore ago."° very long ago
 430 "Hastou nat herd," quod Nicholas, "also,
 The sorwe of Noe with his felaweshipe
 Er that he myghte brynge his wyf to shipe?⁷
 Hym hadde be levere,° I dar° wel he had rather / dare
 undertake,° affirm
 At thilke tyme° than alle hise wetheres at that time
 blake° black sheep
 435 That she hadde had a shipe herself° alone. to herself

⁵ quarter nyght One-fourth of the way through the night.

⁶ Salomon Solomon, the ancient King of Israel, was known for his wisdom and was thought to be the author of several books of the Hebrew Bible. The reference here is to Ecclesiasticus 32.24. John makes a mistake here: Ecclesiasticus, part of the Greek Old Testament considered apocryphal by Protestants or deuterocanonical by Catholics, was written by Jesus ben Sirach, not Solomon, as Saint Augustine (among others) noted.

⁷ to shipe On board. The difficulty Noah has in getting his wife aboard the Ark is depicted in medieval drama.

And therefore woostou° what is best to doone? do you know
 This asketh° haste, and of an hastif requires thyng° urgent business Men may nat preche or maken taryng.° delay
 "Anon, go gete us faste into this in° house
 A knedyng trogh° or ellis a kymelyn° kneading pot / tub
 For ech° of us—but looke that they be large— each
 In whiche we mowe swymme° as in a barge, may float
 And han therinne vitaille suffissant° enough food
 But for a day. Fy on° the remenant! disregard
 The water shal aslake° and goon away ebb
 Aboute pryme° upon the nexte day. prime (an early hour of prayer)
 But Robyn may nat wite° of this, thy knave,° know / servant
 Ne eek thy mayde Gille I may nat save.
 Axe nat° why, for though thou aske me, ask not
 I wol nat tellen Goddes pryvetee.° secrets
 Suffiseth thee, but if thy wittes madde,
 To han as greet a grace as Noe hadde.¹
 Thy wyf shal I wel saven, out of doute.° doubtless Go now thy wey, and speed thee heer aboute.
 "But whan thou hast for hire and thee and me
 Ygeten° us thise knedyng tubbes thre, gotten Thanne shaltow hange hem° in the roof ful hye, hang them
 That° no man of oure purveiaunce° spye. so that / preparations
 And whan thou thus hast doon as I have seyð
 And hast oure vitaille faire in hem yleyd,° laid
 And eek an ax to smyte the corde° atwo° rope / in two Whan that the water comth, that we may go,
 And breke an hole anheigh° up on the gable on high
 Unto the gardynward° over the stable, towards the garden
 That we may frely passen forth oure way
 Whan that the grete shour is goon away.
 Thanne shal I swymme as myrie,° I undertake,° merrily / expect
 As dooth the white doke° after hire drake.° duck / male duck Thanne wol I clepe,° 'How, Alison! How, John! call
 Be myrie, for the flood wol passe anon!'
 And thou wolt seyn, 'Hayl,° maister Nicholay, hail Good morwe! I se thee wel, for it is day.'
 And thanne shul° we be lordes al oure lyf shall
 Of al the world, as Noe and his wyf.
 "But of o° thyng I warne thee ful right:° one / directly
 Be wel avysed on that ilke nyght° that same night

That we ben entred° into shippes bord entered
 That noon of us ne speke nat a word,
 Ne clepe,° ne crie, but been in his preyere, call 480 For it is Goddes owene heeste° deere. commandment
 "Thy wyf and thou moote hange fer° atwynne,° far / apart
 For that bitwixe yow shal be no synne,° sin
 Namooore in looking than ther shal in deede.
 This ordinance° is seyð. Go, God thee speede! commandment
 485 Tomorwe at nyght, whan folk ben alle aslepe,
 Into oure knedyng tubbes wol we crepe,
 And sitten there abidyng Goddes grace.
 Go now thy wey. I have no lenger space° no more time
 To make of this no lenger sermonyng.° speech
 490 Men seyn thus: 'Sende the wise and sey nothing.'
 Thou art so wys, it nedeth thee nat to preche.° preach
 Go save oure lyf, and that I the biseche.'° implore
 This sely carpenter goth forth his wey.
 Ful ofte he seith "Allas!" and "Weylawey!"
 495 And to his wyf he tolde his pryvetee.° secret
 And she was war° and knew it bet° than he aware / better
 What al this queynte cast° was for to seye. unusual scheme
 But natheles she ferde as° she wolde deye, acted as if
 And seyde, "Allas! Go forth thy wey anon.
 500 Help us to scape° or we been lost echon!° escape / everyone
 I am thy trewe, verray° wedded wyf. faithful Go, deere spouse, and help to save oure lyf!"
 Lo, which a greet° thyng is affeccioun! what a great Men may dyen° of ymaginacioun,° die / imagination
 505 So depe° may impressioun be take.° deep / taken
 This sely carpenter bigynneth quake.° to shake
 Hym thynketh verrailly° that he may see it truly appears to him
 Noees° Flood come walwyng° as the see Noah's / surging
 To drenchen° Alisoun, his hony deere. drown
 510 He wepeth, weyleth, maketh sory cheere.° a sorry face
 He siketh with ful many a sory swogh.° groan
 He gooth and geteth hym a knedyng trogh,
 And after that a tubbe and a kymelyn,
 And pryvely he sente hem to his in° house
 515 And heng hem in the roof in pryvetee.
 His owene hand made laddres thre
 To clymben by the ronges and the stalkes° shafts
 Into the tubbes hangynge in the balkes,° beams
 And hem vitailleth,° bothe trogh and tubbe, provides food for 520 With breed and chese and good ale in a jubbe,° jug
 Suffisyng right ynogh as for a day.
 But er that he hadde maad al this array° these preparations

¹ Suffiseth ... hadde It is enough for you (i.e., you should be grateful), unless you are insane, to have as much favor as Noah had (by being warned of the Flood).

- He sente his knave and eek his wenche also Upon his nede^o to London for to go. need 525 And on the Monday whan it drow to nyght,^o approached night
 He shette^o his dore withoute candel lyght shut
 And dresseth^o alle thyng as it shal be. arranged
 And shortly, up they clomben alle thre.
 They sitten stille, wel a furlong way.¹
 530 Now, "Pater Noster, clom!"^o seyde Nicholay. be quiet
 And "Clom," quod John. And "Clom," seyde Alisoun.
 This carpenter seyde his devocioun,^o prayers
 And stille he sit and biddeth his preyere,^o offers his prayers
 Awaitynge on the reyn, if he it heere.
 535 The dede^o sleepe, for wery^o bisynesse, dead / weary
 Fil^o on this carpenter, right as I gesse,^o fell / guess
 About corfew^o tyme² or litel moore. curfew
 For travaille^o of his goost^o he groneth soore labor / spirit
 And eft^o he routeth,^o for his heed^o also / snores / head
 myslay.^o lay wrong
 540 Doun of the laddre stalketh Nicholay,
 And Alisoun ful softe adoun she spedde.^o hastens
 Withouten wordes mo they goon to bedde Theras^o the carpenter is wont to lye. where Ther was the revel^o and the melodye, fun
 545 And thus Alison and Nicholas
 In bisynesse of myrthe and of solas
 Til that the belle of laudes³ gan to ryng
 And freres^o in the chauncel⁴ gonne synge.^o friars / began to sing
 This parissch clerk, this amorous Absolon
 550 That is for love alway so wobigon,^o sorrowful
 Upon the Monday was at Oseneye With a compaignye hym to disporte and pleye,^o play and have fun
 And axed upon cas^o a cloistrer^o asked by chance / monk
 Ful prively^o after John the carpenter. very secretly
 555 And he drough hym apart^o out of the chirche drew him aside
 And seyde, "I noot.^o I saugh hym heere nat wirche don't know
- Syn^o Saturday.⁵ I trowe^o that he be went^o since / believe / is gone
 For tymber ther^o oure abbot hath hym sent, timber where
 For he is wont^o for tymber for to go accustomed
 560 And dwellen^o at the grange^o a day or two.⁶ stay / farm-house
 Or elles he is at his hous, certeyn.
 Where that he be, I kan nat soothly seyn."^o truly say
 This Absolon ful joly was and light
 And thoghte, "Now is tyme [to] wake^o al nyght, to stay awake
 565 For sikirly,^o I saugh hym nat stiringe^o certainly / not stirring Aboute his dore syn day bigan to sprynge.^o dawn
 "So moot I thryve,^o I shall at cokkes crowe thrive
 Ful pryvely knocke at his wyndowe
 That stant ful lowe upon his boures wal.^o bedroom's wall
 570 To Alison now wol I tellen al
 My love-longynge, for yet I shal nat mysse
 That at the leeste wey^o I shal hire kisse; very least
 Som maner^o confort shal I have, parfay.^o kind of / in faith
 My mouth hath icched^o al this longe day: itched
 575 That is a signe of kysying atte leeste!
 Al nyght me mette^o eek I was at a feeste.^o I dreamed / feast
 Therefore I wol goon slepe an houre or tweye
 And al the nyght thanne^o wol I wake and pleye."^o then Whan that the firste cok^o hath crowe anon, rooster
 580 Up rist^o this joly love Absolon rose
 And hym arraied^o gay at poynt devys.⁷ dresses
 But first he cheweth greyn^o of lycorys^o a grain / licorice
 To smellen sweete er he hadde kembd his heer.
 Under his tonge^o a trewe-love⁸ he beer,^o tongue / carried 585 For therby wende^o he to ben gracious.^o expected / attractive
 He rometh^o to the carpenteres hous, rooms
 And stille he stant^o under the stands shot-wyndowe^o— hinged window
 Unto his brist^o it raughte,^o it was so lowe— breast / reached
 And softe he knocketh with a semy soun.^o quiet sound
 590 "What do ye, honycomb, sweete Alisoun,
 My faire bryd,^o my sweete cynamone?^o bird / cinnamon
 Awaketh, lemman myn,^o and speketh to me. my sweetheart
 Wel litel^o thynken ye upon my wo, very little

¹ They ... way For the time it takes to walk a furlong (about an eighth of a mile).

² corfew tyme Curfew, from the French for "cover your fire," announced the time when all fires had to be covered and houses were shut up for the night.

³ laudes I.e., Lauds, the monastic hour of prayer that occurs very early in the morning, before dawn.

⁴ chauncel Chancel, the area of a church or chapel near the altar.

⁵ I ... Saturday I do not know. I have not seen him work here since Saturday.

⁶ And ... two Abbeys usually had outlying estates, such as this one where John the carpenter is working.

⁷ at poynt devys I.e., at point devise: perfectly.

⁸ a trewe-love Four-leaved clover.

That for youre love I swete° ther° I go. sweat / where No wonder is thogh° that I swelte° is it though / swelter and swete;
 I moorne° as dooth° a lamb after the tete.° yearn / does / teat
 Ywis,° lemman,° I have swich love longynge indeed / sweetheart
 That lik a turtel° trewe is my moornynge.° turtle-dove / mourning
 I may nat ete namoore° than a mayde." anymore
 "Go fro the wyndow, Jakke fool,"° she sayde. Jack-fool
 "As help me God, it wol nat be °com pa me."° come kiss me
 I love another, and elles° I were to blame, else
 Wel bet° than thee, by Jhesu, Absolon. better
 Go forth thy wey, or I wol caste a ston,° throw a stone
 And lat me slepe, a twenty devel wey!"¹
 "Allas," quod Absolon, "and weylawey,
 That trewe love was evere so yvel biset!° ill bestowed
 Thanne kys me, syn° it may be no bet,° since / better
 For Jhesus love and for the love of me."
 "Wiltow thanne go thy wey?" quod she.
 "Ye, certes, lemman," quod this Absolon.
 "Thanne make thee redy," quod she. "I come anon."
 And unto Nicholas she seyde stille,° quietly
 "Now hust,° and thou shalt laughen al thy fille." shush
 This Absolon down sette hym on his knees
 And seyde, "I am lord at alle degrees,° in every way
 For after this I hope ther cometh moore.
 Lemman, thy grace, and sweete bryd,° thyn oore!"° bird / favor
 The wyndow she undoth° and that in haste. unlatched
 "Have do," quod she. "Com of and speed the faste,"²
 Lest that oure neighebores thee espie."° see you
 This Absolon gan wyepe his mouth ful drie.
 Dirke° was the nyght as pich° or as the cole,° dark / pitch / coal
 And at the wyndow our she pitte° hir hole. put
 And Absolon hym fil° no bet° ne wers,° fell / better / worse
 But with his mouth he kiste° hir naked ers° kissed / ass
 Ful savourly° er he was war° of this. with relish / aware Abak° he stirte° and thoughte it was backwards / jumped amys,° wrong
 For wel he wiste a womman hath no berd.° beard
 He felte a thyng al rough and longe yherd° long-haired
 And seyde, "Fy! Allas! What have I do?"° done
 "Teheel!" quod she, and clapte° the wyndow to, slammed
 And Absolon gooth forth a sory° pas.° sorry / step

"A berd,° a berd!" quod hende Nicholas. beard, trick
 635 "By Goddes corpus,° this goth° faire and weel!" body / goes
 This sely° Absolon herde every deel° foolish / part
 And on his lippe° he gan for anger byte,° lip / began to bite
 And to hymself he seyde, "I shall thee quyte!"° repay
 Who rubbeth now, who frotheth° now his lippes wipes 640 With dust, with sond, with straw, with clooth, with chippes° chips (of wood)
 But Absolon, that seith ful ofte, "Allas!
 My soule bitake° I unto Sathanas° commit / Satan
 But me were levere° than al this toun," quod he, rather
 "Of this despit° awroken° for to be. insult / avenged
 645 Allas," quod he, "Allas, I ne hadde ybleynt!"° had not restrained (myself)
 His hoothe love was coold and al yqueynt.° quenched
 For fro that tyme that he hadde kist hir ers,
 Of paramours° he sette nat a kers,³ love
 For he was heeled of his maladie.
 650 Ful ofte paramours° he gan deffie,° passionate love / defied
 And weepe as dooth a child that is ybete.° beaten
 A softe paas° he wente over the strete° quiet step / street
 Until° a smyth° men cleped daun° unto / blacksmith / master
 Gerveys,
 That in his forge smythed plough° harneys. plow
 655 He sharpeth shaar° and kultour° bisily. plowshare / plow-blade
 This Absolon knokketh al esily° quietly
 And seyde, "Undo,° Gerveys, and that anon." open up
 "What! Who artow?"° "I am heere Absolon." are you
 "What! Absolon, for Cristes sweete tree,° cross 660 Why rise ye so rathe?"° Ey,° benedicitee! early / ah
 What eyleth° yow? Som gay gerl,° God it ails / girl woot,° knows
 Hath broght yow thus upon the viritoot.⁴
 By Seinte Note,⁵ ye woot wel what I mene."
 This Absolon ne roghte nat a bene° did not care a bean 665 Of al his pley. No word agayn he yaf.° gave
 He hadde moore tow° on his distaf⁶ flux
 Than Gerveys knew, and seyde, "Freend so deere,° kind

¹ a twenty devel wey For the sake of twenty devils.

² Com ... faste "Hurry up," she said, "make haste and be quick."

³ sette nat a kers Cared nothing. (A kers is a watercress.)

⁴ upon the viritoot Up and about.

⁵ Seinte Note I.e., St. Neot, a ninth-century monk from Glastonbury who became a hermit.

⁶ distaf I.e., distaff, a tool used in making thread to be spun into cloth.

That hooete° kultour° in the chymenee heere, hot / plow-blade
 As lene° it me. I have therwith to doone,° lend / do 670 And I wol brynge it thee agayn ful soone.”
 Gerveys answerde, “Certes, were it gold
 Or in a poke° nobles° alle untold,° bag / gold coins / unnumbered
 Thou sholdest have,° as I am trewe smyth. have (it)
 Ey, Cristes foo,° what wol ye do therwith?” foe 675 “Therof,” quod Absolon, “be as be may.
 I shal wel telle it thee tomorwe day,”
 And caughte the kultour by the colde stele.° handle
 Ful softe out at the dore he gan to stele° began to steal
 And wente unto the carpenteris wal.
 680 He cogheth° first and knokketh therwithal coughs Upon the wyndowe right° as he dide er. just
 This Alison answerde, “Who is ther
 That knokketh so? I warante it a theef.” “Why, nay,” quod he, “God woot, my sweete leef,° loved one
 685 I am thyn Absolon, my deerelyng,° darling
 Of gold,” quod he, “I have thee broght a ryng.
 My mooder yaf° it me, so God me save. gave Ful fyn° it is and therto wel ygrave,° fine / engraved
 This wol I yeve° thee if thou me kisse.” give 690 This Nicholas was risen for to pisse
 And thoughte he wolde amenden° al the jape: make better
 He sholde kisse his ers er that he scape.° escape
 And up the wyndowe dide he hastily,
 And out his ers he putteth pryvely
 695 Over the buttoke to the haunche bon.° thigh
 And therwith spak this clerk, this Absolon: “Spek, sweete bryd,° I noot nat° bird / do not know where thou art.”
 This Nicholas anon leet fle° a fart let fly
 As greet as it had been a thonder dent,° thunder-clap
 700 That with the strook he was almoost yblent.° blinded
 And he was redy with his iren hoot,° hot iron
 And Nicholas amydde the ers° he in the middle of the ass smoot.° struck
 Of gooth° the skyn° an off goes / skin
 hande brede° about, a hand-breadth
 The hooete kultour brende° so his toute,° burned / rear
 705 And for the smert° he wende° for to dye.° pain / expected / die
 As he were wood for wo, he gan to crye,
 “Help, water, water, help, for Goddes herte!”
 This carpenter out of his slomber sterte° jumped
 And herde oon crien,° “Water!” as he were wood, heard one cry
 710 And thoughte, “Allas, now comth Nowelis Flood!”

He sit hym up withouten wordes mo,
 And with his ax he smoot the corde atwo,
 And doun gooth al! He foond neither to selle,
 Ne breed ne ale, til he cam to the celle¹
 715 Upon the floor, and there aswowne° he lay. in a faint
 Up stirte hire Alison and Nicholay,
 And criden, “Out!” and “Harrow!” in the strete.
 The neighebores, bothe smale and grete,° big
 In ronnen° for to gauren on° this man ran in / gape at 720 That yet aswowne he lay, bothe pale and wan,
 For with the fal° he brosten hadde° his arm. fall / had broken
 But stonde he moste unto his owene harm.²
 For whan he spak, he was anon bore doun° shouted down
 With° hende Nicholas and Alisoun. by 725 They tolden every man that he was wood.
 He was agast° so of Nowelis Flood afraid
 Thurgh fantasie° that of his vanytee° fantasy / folly
 He hadde ybought° hym knedyng tubbes thre bought
 And hadde hem hanged in the rove° above, roof
 730 And that he preyde° hem for Goddes love asked
 To sitten in the roof par compaignye.° for company
 The folk gan laughen at his fantasye.
 Into the roof they kiken° and they cape° stare / gape
 And turned al his harm unto a jape.° joke
 735 For what° so that this carpenter answerde, whatever
 It was for noght.° No man his reson° herde. nothing / explanation
 With othes° grete he was so sworn adoun° oaths / shouted down
 That he was holde° wood in al the toun, considered
 For every clerk° anonright heeld° with oother; scholar / agreed
 740 They seyde, “The man was wood, my leeve° brother.” dear
 And every wight gan laughen of this stryf.° strife
 Thus swyved° was this carpenteris wyf made love to
 For al his kepyng° and his jalousye, guarding
 And Absolon hath kist hir nether° eye, lower 745 And Nicholas is scalded in the towte.° rear
 This tale is doon, and God save al the rowte!° company

HEERE ENDETH THE MILLERE HIS TALE

¹ Ne ... celle He did not find bread or ale to sell until he came to the bottom; i.e., he did not stop on his way down.

² moste ... harm This idiomatic expression has been interpreted differently. John the Carpenter must endure (or put up with, or take responsibility for) his own injury, or he must stand up for himself even though it turned out badly.

The Wife of Bath's Prologue and Tale

With the opening words of her extremely long prologue, the Wife of Bath introduces one of her central themes, the conflict between the experience of life, which for the Wife means sexual experience foremost, and “auctoritee,” the written commentary of learned men on religious, moral, and philosophical issues. These men, who included both the patristic writers (such as Saints Ambrose and Jerome) and classical philosophers, have little good to say about women, whom they repeatedly depict as deceitful, quarrelsome, and lecherous. Escape from this tradition, as the Wife herself indicates in her account of the debate between the man and the lion, is not easy. Just as all paintings of lions will always be painted by men, so in classical and medieval society almost all writing, especially writing that had official authority, was done by men. The Wife herself, in one of the tale’s many layers of ventriloquism, places traditional criticisms of women in the mouths of her first three husbands, whom she accuses of abusing her with these repeated insults. The criticisms can also be found in her fifth husband’s book, a compilation of misogynistic texts from Jerome and others, all counseling against marriage.

The great irony is that the Wife herself is drawn from this tradition. Her character is based in part on the Old Woman in The Romance of the Rose, a sexually experienced cynic who teaches young people the tricks of love, and both the Wife’s history and the literary shape of her prologue and tale conform to many of the traditional misogynistic stereotypes found in her husband’s book. The subtle layering of the text makes its final moral elusive. Readers continue to argue whether the Wife should be taken as a moral warning against unbridled carnality or admired for her independence, courage, and vitality. The glosses in the Ellesmere manuscript tend to support the first view, but the Wife herself has some telling comments to offer on men who write glosses.

The tale that the Wife finally tells is an Arthurian romance. It follows a well-established folk-tale plot in which a knight is given a year to answer a question or die and can only get the answer from an old and ugly woman who will not give it to him unless he promises either to marry her or, as in Chaucer’s version, to give her whatever she wants, which later turns out to be marriage. In several versions, including The Tale of Florent in John Gower’s Confessio Amantis, the question the knight must answer is what women most desire. Chaucer modifies the familiar story in a number of ways, so that the tale contributes to the argument the Wife has been making in her prologue. The knight in the Wife’s version is not innocent—he is a rapist—and he objects to the marriage not just because the woman is old and ugly, but also because she is of low birth, an objection she counters in a long disquisition on the nature of true gentility. Even the knight’s final choice, which in the other versions takes the form of “foul by day and fair by night” or the reverse, is subtly altered in keeping with the Wife’s interests.

Detail, opening page of the Prologue to The Wife of Bath's Tale, Ellesmere manuscript; see color insert for full page. (Reprinted by permission of The Huntington Library, San Marino, California. EL 26 C9 f. 72r.)

THE WIFE OF BATH'S PROLOGUE

THE PROLOGUE OF THE WYVVES TALE OF BATHE

“Experience, though noon auctoritee
 Were in this world, were right ynogh to me¹
 To speke° of wo° that is in mariage. speak / woe
 For lordynges,° sith° I twelve yeer was of age, lords / since Ythonked° be God that is eterne on lyve,° thanked / eternally alive
 Housbondes at chirche dore° I have had fyve,° church door / five
 For I so ofte have ywedded° bee,°² wedded / been
 And alle were worthy men in hir° degree. their
 But me was toold certeyn° nat longe certainly agoon° is, not long ago
 That sith that Crist ne wente° nevere but onis° did not go / once
 To weddyng in the Cane° of Galilee,³ Cana
 By the same ensample° thoughte me° example / it seemed to me
 That I ne sholde° wedded be but ones.° should not / once Herkne eek° which a sharpe word listen also for the nones° for the occasion
 Biside° a welle Jhesus, God and man, beside Spak° in repreeve° of the Samaritan;⁴ spoke / rebuke
 ‘Thou hast yhad° fyve housbondes,’ quod° he, have had / said
 ‘And that man the which that hath now thee° who now has you
 Is noght thyn housbonde.’ Thus seyde he certeyn.
 What that he mente therby,° meant by this
 I kan nat seyn.° cannot say
 But that I axe,° why that the fifthe man ask
 Was noon housbonde to the Samaritan?
 How manye myghte she have in mariage?
 Yet herde I nevere tellen° in myn age never heard told
 Upon this nombre° diffinicioun.° number / definition
 Men may devyne° and glosen⁵ up and down,° guess / gloss / down
 But wel I woot° expres° withoute lye,° well I know / clearly / lie

¹ Experience ... me Experience, even if there were no written authority in the world, would be quite enough for me. Authority, in this sense, refers to the writings of learned men, especially the patristic writers and ancient philosophers.

² For ... bee Many manuscripts have “If I so ofte myghte have ywedded be,” i.e., if these multiple marriages were indeed lawful.

³ Cane of Galilee See John 2.1–11.

⁴ Samaritan See John 4.1–42.

⁵ glosen Crucial points in the Bible, and other religious, philosophical, or legal texts were explained in glosses (comments written in the margins or between the lines).

God bad° us forto wexe° and multiplye.⁶ commanded / to increase
 That gentil° text kan° I understonde! noble / can 30 Eek wel I woot, he seyde myn housbonde Sholde lete fader and mooder° should leave father and mother and take me.⁷
 But of no nombre° mencion number made he° did he make mention
 Of bigamy° or of octogamy° bigamy / marriage to eight spouses
 Why sholde men speke° of it vileyny°? speak / as villainy
 35 “Lo heere° the wise kyng daun° Salamon: consider / master
 I trowe° he hadde wyves mo° than oon.⁸ believe / more / one
 As wolde God, it were lefevel unto me⁹
 To be refreshed° half so ofte° as he! refreshed / often
 Which yifte° of God hadde he for alle hise wyvys;° gift / wives
 40 No man hath swich° that in this world alyve° is. such / alive
 God woot,° this noble kyng, knows
 as to my wit,° as far as I know
 The first nyght° had many a myrie° fit night / merry
 With ech° of hem,° so wel was hym° each / them / he was so lucky
 on lyve.
 Yblessed be God that I have wedded five!¹⁰
 45 Welcome the sixte, whanevere he shal.° whenever he shall arrive
 Forsothe,° I wol nat kepe me chaast in al° in truth / entirely chaste
 Whan myn housbonde is fro° the world ygon.° from / gone
 Som° Cristen° man shal wedde me some / Christian anon,° immediately
 For thanne° th’apostle seith°¹¹ I am free then / the apostle says

⁶ God bad ... multiplye See Genesis 6.1.

⁷ myn housbonde ... me See Genesis 2.24.

⁸ I ... oon According to the Bible, King Solomon had seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines. See 1 Kings 11.33.

⁹ As wolde ... me If only God would permit that it should be lawful for me.

¹⁰ Yblessed ... five Some manuscripts contain the following six-line passage:

“Of whiche I have pyked out the beste
 Bothe of here nether purs and of here cheste.
 Diverse scoles maken parfyte clerkes,
 And diverse practyk in many sondry werkes,
 Maken the workman parfit, sekirly;
 Of five husbandes scoleiying am I.”

John Manly and Edith Rickert suggest that these lines are “a late Chaucerian insertion,” i.e., part of a late rough draft of the poem.

¹¹ th’apostle seith I.e., St. Paul. See 1 Corinthians 7.25–38.

50 To wedde, a Goddes half, where it liketh me.¹
 He seith to be wedded is no synne:^o sin ‘Bet^o is to be wedded than to brynne.’^{2a2} better / burn
 What rekketh me,^o thogh folk seye^o what do I care / say
 vileynye^o villainy
 Of shrewed^o Lameth³ and of bigamy^o cursed / bigamy
 55 I woot wel^o Abraham⁴ was an hooley^o man know well / holy
 And Jacob eek, as ferforth as I kan,^o as far as I know
 And ech of hem^o hadde wyves mo than two them
 And many another man also.
 Whanne^o saugh^o ye evere in manere^o age when / saw / any 60 That hye^o God defende^o mariage high / forbade
 By expres^o word? I pray yow, telleth me. specific
 Or where comanded he virginitee?^o virginity
 I woot as wel as ye,^o it is no drede,⁵ know as well as you
 Whan th’apostel^o speketh of maydenhede^o virginity
 65 He seyde that precept^o therof^o hadde he commandment / about noon.^{6o} none
 Men may conseil^o a womman to been oon,^o counsel / single
 But conseillyng is nat comandement.
 He putte it in oure owene juggement.^o left it to our own judgment
 For hadde^o God comanded maydenhede, had 70 Thanne^o hadde he dampned^o weddyng then / condemned with the dede.^o in the act
 And certein,^o if ther were no seed ysowe^o certainly / sown Virginitee, wherof thanne^o sholde^o it growe?^o how then / should Poul^o ne dorste nat^o St. Paul / dared not comanden atte leeste^o command at least A thyng of which his maister^o yaf^o master / gave noon heeste.^o no command
 75 The dart⁷ is set up of virginitee:

Cacche whoso may. Who renneth best, lat see!⁸
 “But this word is nat taken of every wight,^o does not apply to everyone
 But theras God lust gyve it of his myght.⁹
 I woot wel the apostel was a mayde.^o virgin
 80 But natheless,^o thogh^o that he wroot^o nevertheless / though / wrote and sayde
 He wolde^o that every wight^o were swich^o wished / person / such as he,
 Al nys but conseil^o to virginitee. is not but advice
 And for to been^o a wyf he yaf^o me leve^o be / gave / leave
 Of indulgence,^o so it is no repreve^o by permission / reproach
 85 To wedde me if my make^o dye,^o mate / should die
 Withouten excepcioun^o of bigamy^o.^o objection / bigamy
 Al^o were it good no womman for to touche, although
 He mente^o as in his bed or in his couche.^o meant / couch
 For peril is bothe fyr and tow t’assemble.¹⁰
 90 Ye knowe what this ensample^o may resemble. example
 This is al and som,^o that virginitee the whole matter
 Moore profiteth than weddyng in freletee;¹¹ Freletee^o clepe I^o but if^o that he and she weakness / I call it / unless Wolde lede^o al hir lyf^o in chastitee. would lead / their life
 95 “I graunte^o it wel; I have noon envie,^o grant / no envy
 Thogh maydenhede preferre bigamy^o.¹²
 Hem liketh^o to be clene,^o body and they prefer / pure
 goost.^o spirit
 Of myn estaat^o I nyl nat^o make no my condition / will not boost.^o boast
 For wel ye knowe, a lord in his houshold, 100 He nath nat^o every vessel al of gold. does not have Somme been of tree^o and doon^o hir^o wood / do / their lord servyse.
 God clepeth^o folk to hym in sondry wyse.^o calls / in different ways
 And everich hath^o of God a propre everyone has yifte^o— particular gift
 Som this, som that, as hym liketh shifte.^o as he pleases to give

¹ To wedde ... me To wed, by God’s permission, wherever I wish.

² Bet ... brynne See 1 Corinthians 7.9.

³ Lameth Lamech is the first to marry two wives. See Genesis 4.19.

⁴ Abraham The patriarch Abraham, as recounted in the book of Genesis, was favored by God, yet he had more than one wife, as did his grandson Jacob.

⁵ it is no drede Do not doubt it.

⁶ He ... noon Paul admits that he could find no justification for his view in the Old Testament. See 1 Corinthians 7.25.

⁷ dart A spear was sometimes given as a prize for a race in England in the Middle Ages. Many editors prefer the reading “for virginity” (found in many other manuscripts), which makes virginity the competitor rather than the prize.

⁸ Cacche ... see Let whoever can catch it. Let us see who runs best.

⁹ But ... myght Except where God wishes, through his might, to impose this principle (of virginity).

¹⁰ fyr ... t’assemble To bring together fire and flax (flammable material of which wicks are made).

¹¹ Moore ... freletee Remaining a virgin is better than marrying through weakness.

¹² Thogh ... bigamy Though virginity be preferred to bigamy.

"Virginitee is greet perfeccioun
 And continence° eek with devocioun.° chastity / religious devotion
 But Crist that of perfeccioun° is welles° perfection / well (source)
 Bad° nat every wight sholde go selle commanded Al that he hadde and gyve° it to the poore give
 And in swich wise folwe hym¹ and his foore.° steps
 He spak to hem that wolde lyve parfitly.° wished to live perfectly
 And, lordynges, by youre leve,° that am nat I! leave
 I wol bistowe° the flour° of myn age will bestow / flower
 In the actes and in fruyt° of mariage. fruit
 "Telle me also, to what conclusioun
 Were membres ymaad° of generacioun?² made
 And for what profit° was a wight ywroght?³ purpose / person made Trusteth° right wel, they were nat maad° believe me / not made for noght.° nothing
 Glose whoso wole and seye bothe up and down,³
 That they were maad for purgacioun° releasing
 Of uryne° and oure bothe thynges urine
 smale,° our two small things (sexual organs)
 And eek to knowe° a femele from a male, distinguish
 And for noon oother cause: sey° ye no? say
 The experience woot wel° it is experience (in general) knows well noght so.
 So that the clerkes° be nat with me wrothe,° theologians / angry
 I sey yis,° that they beth maked° for bothe! say yes / are made
 That is to seye, for office and for ese° pleasure
 Of engendrure,⁴ ther we nat God
 displese.° where we do not displease God
 Why sholde men elles° in hir bookes sette° otherwise / set down
 That a man shal yelde to his wyf hire dette?⁵
 Now, wherwith° sholde he make his with what paiement° payment
 If he ne used° his sely° instrument? did not use / innocent
 Thanne were they maad upon a creature
 To purge uryne° and for engendrure.° release urine / conception

135 "But I seye noght° that every wight is holde° not / obligated
 That hath swich harneys,° as I of tolde, such equipment
 To goon° and usen hem° in engendrure. go / them
 They shul° nat take of chastitee no cure.° shall / attention
 Crist was a mayde° and shapen° as a man, virgin / formed 140 And many a seint sith° the world bigan, since
 Yet lyved they evere in parfit° chastitee. perfect
 I nyl nat envye° no virginitee. will not envy
 Lat hem° be breed° of pured let them / bread
 whete° seed, refined wheat
 And lat us wyves hoten° barly breed. be called 145 And yet with barly breed, Mark telle kan, Oure Lord refresshed° many a man.° gave food to
 In swich estaat° as God hath cleped us° condition / has called us
 I wol persevere.° I nam nat precius.° remain / fastidious
 In wyfhode I wol use myn instrument° sexual organ
 150 As frely° as my makere hath it sent. freely
 If I be daungerous,° God yeve° me sorwe. stand-offish / give Myn housbonde shal it have bothe eve and morwe
 Whan that hym list com forth and paye his dette.⁷
 An housbonde I wol have, I nyl nat lette,° will not stop 155 Which shal° be bothe my dettour° and my who shall / debtor
 thral° slave
 And have his tribulacioun° withal° tribulation / also Upon his flesh whil I am his wyf.
 I have the power durynge° al my lyf during
 Upon his propre° body, and noght he. own 160 Right thus the apostel⁸ tolde it unto me
 And bad° oure housbondes for to love us weel.° commanded / well
 Al this sentence me liketh every deel.⁹
 Up stirte° the Pardoner and that anon.° jumped / immediately
 "Now, Dame," quod he, "by God and by Seint John, 165 Ye been° a noble prechour° in this cas!° are / preacher / matter
 I was aboute to wedde a wyf, allas!
 What sholde I bye it on my flesh so deere?¹⁰

¹ swich wise Such a manner; folwe hym Follow him.

² membres ... of generacioun Sexual organs.

³ Glose ... down Let whoever wishes to do so offer an interpretation and say both up and down.

⁴ Of engendrure Of conception. The phrase "office and ease of engendrure" means for a purpose (that is, conceiving children) and for the pleasure of procreation.

⁵ yelde ... dette Having sex. I.e., both partners owed each other a certain sexual fulfillment, lest sexual frustration drive one of them to adultery. The line is a quotation from 1 Corinthians 7.3.

⁶ And ... man The reference here is to John 6.9 and the miracle of the loaves and fishes, not to a passage in the Gospel of Mark.

⁷ Whan ... dette When he wishes to come forth and pay his debt.

⁸ the apostel I.e., St. Paul, whose insights on marriage the Wife of Bath has been mentioning since she began to speak. In addition to the passage referred to above in note 5, Paul's other major pronouncement on marriage is in Ephesians 5.21–33.

⁹ Al ... deel All this lesson (of Scripture) pleases me, every part (of it).

¹⁰ What ... deere Why should I pay so dearly for it with my flesh.

Yet hadde I levere° wedde no wyf to yeere!"^o rather / this year
 "Abyde,"^o quod she, "my tale is nat bigonne!" wait
 170 Nay, thou shalt drynken° of another tonne° drink / cask (of wine)
 Er that I go, shal savoure wors° than ale! that shall taste worse
 And whan that I have toold forth my tale
 Of tribulacioun that is in mariage,
 Of which I am expert in al myn age°— throughout my life
 175 This to seyn°, myself have been the whippe°— say / whip
 Than maystow chese wheither° thou choose whether wolt sippe° will sip
 Of that tonne that I shal abroche° open
 Bewar of it er thou to ny° approche°, too near / approach
 For I shal telle ensamples° mo° than ten. examples / more
 180 Whoso that wol nat bewar by othere men,¹
 By hym shul othere men corrected be.
 The same wordes writeth Protholomee°. Prolemy
 Rede° it in his Almageste and take it there!"² read
 "Dame, I wolde praye° if youre wyl° it were," ask / will 185 Seyde this Pardoner, "as ye bigan Telle forth youre tale. Spareth° for no man, spare
 And teche us yonge men of youre praktike!"^o practice
 "Gladly, sires°, sith it may yow like." sirs / it may please you
 But yet I praye to al this compaignye,
 190 If that I speke after my fantasye°, fancy
 As taketh it nat agrief° that° I seye, take it not wrong / what
 For myn entente is but for to pleye.
 "Now sire, now wol I telle forth my tale.
 As evere moote° I drynken wyn or ale, might 195 I shal seye sooth° of tho housbondes that I hadde, say the truth
 As thre of hem were goode and two were badde.
 The thre men were goode and riche and olde.
 Unnethe° myghte they the statut° holde scarcely / regulation
 In which that they were bounden° unto me.³ bound 200 Ye woot wel what I meene° of this, pardee°. mean / by God
 As help me God, I laughe whan I thynke
 How pitously anyght° I made hem swynke!^o at night / work
 And by my fey°, I tolde of it no stoor°. faith / set no store by it

They had me yeven° hir° gold and hir given / their tresoor°. treasure
 205 Me neded nat do lenger diligence⁴
 To wynne hir love or doon hem reverence°. honor them
 They loved me so wel, by God above,
 That I ne tolde no deyntee of hir love.⁵
 A wys° womman wol sette hire evere in wise
 oon° will always determine 210 To gete hire° love theras° she hath get herself / where noon°. has none
 But sith I hadde hem° hoolly° in myn hond, them / wholly
 And sith they hadde me yeven° al hir lond°, given / all their land
 What sholde I taken heede° hem for to plese°, bother / please
 But if° it were for my profit and myn ese°? unless / pleasure
 215 I sette hem so a werk°, by my fey°, to work / faith
 That many a nyght they songen° "Weilaway!"^o sang / alas
 The bacon was nat fet° for hem, I trowe°, fetch / believe
 That som° men han° in Essex at Dunmowe.⁶ some / have
 I governed hem so wel after my lawe, 220 That ech° of hem was ful blisful° and each / very happy
 fawe° eager
 To brynge me gaye thynges° fro the fayre°. pretty things / fair
 They were ful glad whan I spak to hem faire°, nicely
 For, God it woot, I chidde hem spitously!^o scolded them spitefully
 "Now herkneth hou° I baar me° proprely, how / bore myself
 Ye wise wyves that kan understonde.
 225 Thus shul ye speke and beren hem on honde.⁷
 For half so boldely kan ther no man
 Swere° and lye° as kan a womman. swear / lie
 I sey nat this by° wyves that been wyse, about
 But if° it be whan they hem unless 230 mysavse°. give themselves bad advice
 A wys wyf, if that she kan hir good°, knows what is good for her
 Shal bere hym on hond the cow is wood⁸
 And take witesse of hir owene mayde° own maid

¹ Whoso ... men The one who will not be warned (by examples offered) by others.

² Rede ... there The aphorism is not found in the Almagest, the great astrological treatise of Claudius Ptolemy (second century CE), but in the preface to one of the translations of his work.

³ In ... me I.e., the three old husbands could barely fulfill their obligation to pay the marriage debt.

⁴ Me ... diligence I did not need to make any more effort.

⁵ ne tolde ... love Did not put any value on their love.

⁶ The bacon ... Dunmowe In the village of Dunmow, it was the custom to award a side of bacon to a married couple if they did not quarrel for a year.

⁷ beren hem on honde Either to deceive them or to accuse them falsely. The Wife does both to her husbands.

⁸ A wys ... wood A wise woman can convince her husband that a tale-telling cowbird (a kind of jackdaw) who tells him she has been unfaithful is mad and use her own maid as a witness.

Of hir^o assent, but herkneth^o her / listen to how I sayde:^o how I spoke
 "Sire olde kaynard,^o is this thyn array?^o dotard / your behavior
 Why is my neighebores wyf so gay?^o well dressed
 She is honoured over al ther she gooth.^o wherever she goes
 I sitte at hoom. I have no thrifty clooth.^o appropriate clothing
 What dostow^o at my neighebores hous? are you doing
 Is she so fair? Artow^o so amorous? are you
 What rowne^o ye with oure mayde,^o benedicite? whisper / maid
 Sire olde lecchour,^o lat thy japes^o be! sir old lecher / tricks
 And if I have a gossib^o or a freend,^o confidant / friend
 Withouten gilt,^o thou chidest^o as a feend!^o guilt / complain / fiend
 If that I walke or pleye unto his hous,
 Thou comest hoom as dronken as a mous¹
 And prechest^o on thy bench, with yvel preach
 preef!^o bad luck to you
 "Thou seist^o to me it is a greet you say
 meschief^o great misfortune
 To wedde a povre^o womman for costage.^o poor / expense
 And if she be riche and of heigh parage,^o lineage
 Thanne seistow^o it is a tormentrie^o you say / torment
 To suffren^o hire pride and hire malencolie. endure
 And if she be fair, thou verray knave,²
 Thou seyst that every holour^o wol hire have: lecher
 She may no while in chastitee abyde^o remain
 That is assailed upon ech a syde.^o every side
 "Thou seyst that som folk desiren us for richesse,
 Somme for oure shape, somme for oure fairnesse
 And som for she kan synge and daunce
 And som for gentillesse^o and som for nobility
 daliaunce,^o flirtation
 Som for hir handes and hir armes smale.^o slender
 Thus goth al to the devel,^o by thy tale! devil
 Thou seyst men may nat kepe^o a castel wal,^o not hold / wall
 It may so longe assailed been overal!^o everywhere
 "And if that she be foul,^o thou seist that she ugly
 Coveiteth every man that she may se.^o see
 For as a spaynel^o she wol on hym lepe,^o spaniel / leap
 Til that she fynde som man hire to chepe.^o to buy her
 Ne noon so grey goos gooth in the lake

270 As, seistow, wol been withoute make.³
 And seyst it is an hard thyng for to welde,^o control
 A thyng that no man wole his thankes helde.^o willingly hold
 "Thus seistow, lorel,^o whan thow goost to bedde, fool
 And that no wys man nedeth^o for to wedde, needs 275 Ne^o no man that entendeth unto nor hevene.^o intends to go to heaven
 With wilde thonder dynt^o and thunder claps
 firy leve^o fiery lightning
 Moote^o thy welked nekke^o be may / withered neck
 tobroke!^o broken
 "Thow seyst that droppying^o houses and eek smoke dripping
 And chiding^o wyves maken men to flee nagging 280 Out of hir owene houses. A, benedicitee,
 What eyeth^o swich an old man for to chide? ails
 "Thow seyst that we wyves wol oure vices hide
 Til we be fast,^o and thanne we wol hem shewe.^o secure / show
 Wel may that be a proverbe of a shrewel^o villain
 285 "Thou seist that oxen, asses, hors,^o and houndes, horses
 They been assayd^o at diverse stoundes;^o tried / different times
 Bacyns,^o lavours^o er that men hem bye,^o basins / bowls / buy them
 Spoons and stooles and al swich
 housbondrye,^o household equipment
 And so been pottes,^o clothes, and array.^o pots / ornaments
 290 But folk of wyves maken noon assay^o do not try them out
 Til they be wedded. Olde dotard^o shrewel! foolish Thanne seistow we wol oure vices shewe.
 "Thou seist also that it displeth me
 But if^o that thou wolt preye^o my beautee unless / will praise
 295 And but^o thou poure^o alwey upon my face unless / gaze
 And clepe^o me "faire dame!" in every place, call
 And but thou make a feeste^o on thilke^o day feast / the same
 That I was born, and make me fressh and gay,
 And but thou do to my norice⁴ honour
 300 And to my chambrere^o withinne my chambermaid
 bour.^o bedroom
 And to my fadres^o folk^o and his allies: father's / relatives
 Thus seistow, olde barel^o ful of lyes!^o barrel / lies
 "And yet of oure apprentice Janekyn,

³ Ne noon ... make Proverbial: There is no goose in the lake, no matter how grey, who does not have a mate.

⁴ norice Nurse. Wealthy medieval people were attended to in their childhood by wet nurses, who often became, for a time, surrogate mothers.

¹ drunken as a mous It is not clear why mice are thought to be drunk, but the expression was common in medieval England.

² thou verray knave You true villain.

For his crise heer° shynynge° as gold so curly hair / shining
 fyn,° fine
 305 And for he squiereth° me bothe up and down, escorts
 Yet hastow° caught a fals suspecioun. you have
 I wol° hym noght,° though thou were deed want / not to-morwe!
 “But tel me, why hydestow° with sorwe° do you hide / sorrow
 The keyes of my cheste° away fro me? chest (safety box)
 310 It is my good° as wel as thyn, pardee!° possession / by God
 What, wenestow to make an ydiot of oure dame?¹
 Now by that lord that called is Seint Jame,° Saint James
 Thou shalt nat bothe, thogh° thou were wood,° though / crazy
 Be maister° of my body and of my good!° master / possessions
 315 That oon thou shalt forgo, maugree thyne eyen!²
 What nedeth thee of me to enquere° or spyen?° inquire / spy
 I trowe thou woldest loke me in thy chiste!³
 Thou sholdest seye, “Wyf, go wher thee liste.⁴ Taak youre disport!° I wol leve° no enjoyment / believe
 talys.° tales
 320 I knowe yow for a trewe wyf, Dame Alys!”
 We love no man that taketh kepe or charge° takes heed or cares
 Wher that we goon. We wol ben at oure large.° free “Of alle men, blessed moot° he be, may
 The wise astrologien° Daun astronomer
 Protholome° Master Ptolemy
 325 That seith this proverbe in his Almageste, “Of alle men his wysdom is the hyeste° highest
 That rekketh nevere who hath the world in honde.”⁵
 By this proverbe thou shalt understonde:
 Have thou ynogh, what thar thee recche or care°⁶
 330 How myrily° that othere folkes fare?° merrily / behave
 For certeyn, olde dotard,° by youre leve,° fool / leave

Ye shul have queynte⁷ right ynogh° at eve!° enough / at night
 He is to greet° a nygard° that wolde too great / skinflint
 werne° refuse
 A man to lighte his candle at his lanterne.
 335 He shal have never the lasse° light, pardee! less
 Have thou ynogh, thee thar nat pleyne thee.⁸
 “Thou seyst also that if we make us gay
 With clothyng and with precious array,° expensive adornment
 That it is peril of° oure chastitee. a danger to 340 And yet with sorwe thou most° must enforce thee° support yourself
 And seye thise wordes in the apostles name:⁹
 “In habit° maad° with chastitee and shame clothing / made Ye wommen shul appaill yow,”° quod he dress yourselves
 “And noght° in tressed heer° and gay not / braided hair
 perree,° jewels
 345 As perles,° ne with gold ne clothes riche.” pearls
 After thy text° ne after thy rubriche° quotation / rubric
 I wol nat wirche° as muchel as a gnat!¹⁰ work “Thou seydest this, that I was lyk° a cat. like
 For whoso wolde senge° a cattes skyn, singe
 350 Thanne wolde the cat wel dwellen in his in.° lodgings
 And if the cattes skyn be slyk° and gay, sleek
 She wol nat dwelle in house half a day,
 But forth she wole° er any day be dawed° will go / dawned
 To shewe hir skyn and goon a caterwawed.¹¹
 355 This is to seye, if I be gay, sire shrewe,° sir villain
 I wol renne out my borel° for to shewe! cheap clothing
 “Sire olde fool, what eyleth° thee to spyen?° ails / spy

¹ What ... dame What, do you expect to make an idiot of our lady? I.e., the Wife herself.

That ... eyen You must give up one of them, despite your eyes! (I.e., despite anything you can do.)

³ I trowe ... chiste I believe you would lock me in your chest. Medieval merchants used large locked chests to lock up their coins and their valuables.

Thou ... liste You should say, “Wife, go wherever you want.”

⁵ That ... honde Who does not care who possesses the world.

⁶ Have ... care If you have enough, why do you need to bother yourself or care.

⁷ queynte Literally meaning elegant, clever, or pleasing thing, queynte is also a medieval euphemism for the female sexual organs.

⁸ Have ... thee If you have enough, you do not need to complain for yourself.

⁹ the apostles name St. Paul. The following quotation is from 1 Timothy 2.9.

¹⁰ After thy ... gnat I will not follow (work after) your quotation or your text in the smallest way, or, any more than a gnat would. In medieval service books and books of devotion, rubrics (whose name comes from the red ink in which they were written) were directions about how to use the texts to which they referred either in communal worship or private devotion.

¹¹ caterwawed Caterwauling, the loud noise cats make while they are mating.

Thogh thou preye Argus¹ with hise hundred eyen
 To be my wardecors,^o as he kan^o best. bodyguard / knows how
 In feith, he shal nat kepe me but me lest!^o unless I want to be kept
 Yet koude I make his berd,^o so moot I theel!² fool him
 "Thou seydest eek that ther been thynges thre,^o three things
 The whiche thynges troublen^o al this erthe trouble
 And that no wight may endure the ferthe.^o fourth
 O leewe^o sire shrew! Jhesu^o shorte^o thy lyf! dear / Jesus / shorten
 Yet prechestow^o and seyst an hateful wyf still you preach Yrekned is for^o oon of thise is counted as meschances,^o misfortunes
 Been ther none othere resemblances
 That ye may likne^o youre parables to, liken
 But if a sely^o wyf be oon of tho?^o innocent / those
 "Thou liknest^o wommenes love to helle, liken
 To bareyne^o lond^o ther^o water may nat barren / land / where dwelle.
 Thou liknest it also to wilde fyr:
 The moore^o it brenneth,^o the moore it hath more / burns
 desir^o desires
 To consumen^o everythyng that brent wole be. consume
 Thou seyst, right as wormes^o shendeth^o a tree, grubs / harm
 Right so a wyf destroyeth hire housbond;
 This knowe they that been to wyves bonde.^o bound
 "Lordynges, right thus as ye have understonde
 Baar I stifly myne olde housbondes on honde,
 That thus they seyden in hir dronkenesse!³
 And al was fals, but that I took witesse
 On Janekyn and on my nece^o also. niece
 O Lord, the pyne^o I dide hem^o and the wo, pain / to them
 Ful giltles,^o by Goddes sweete pyne!^o guiltless / pain
 For as an hors I koude byte and whyne.^o whinny
 I koude pleyne^o thogh^o I were in the complain / though gilt,^o guilty
 Or elles ofentyme hadde I been spilt.^o destroyed
 Whoso comth^o first to mille,^o first whoever comes / mill
 grynt.^o grinds
 I pleynd first, so was oure were^o ystynt.^o war / concluded
 They were ful glad to excuse hem^o blyve^o them / quickly

Of thyng of which they nevere agilde hir lyve.⁴
 Of wenchis^o wolde I beren hym on honde,^o girls / accuse him
 Whan that for syk^o unnethes^o myghte he sickness / scarcely stonde.
 395 "Yet tikled^o it his herte,^o for that^o he tickled / heart / because Wende^o that I hadde of hym^o so greet thought / for him
 chiertee.^o love
 I swoor^o that al my walkyng^o out by swore / walking nyghte^o night
 Was for t'espye^o wenchis that he dighte.^o spy / had sex with Under that colour^o hadde I many a myrthe,^o pretense / mirth
 400 For al swich thyng was yeven^o us in oure byrthe.^o given / birth
 Deceite, wepyng, spynnyng^o God hath yeve^o spinning / given
 To wommen kyndely^o whil that they may lyve. naturally
 And thus of o^o thyng I avaunte^o me: one / boast Atte^o ende, I hadde the bettre^o in ech at the / better degree^o instance 405 By sleighte,^o or force, or by deceit
 som maner thyng,^o manner of thing
 As by continueel murmure^o or continual murmur
 grucchyng.^o complaining Namely^o abedde^o hadden they especially / in bed
 meschaunce;^o misfortune
 Ther wolde I chide^o and do hem no plesaunce.^o nag / pleasure
 I wolde no lenger^o in the bed abyde^o longer / remain
 410 If that I felte his arm over my syde^o side
 Til he had maad his raunsoun^o unto me. paid his ransom
 Thanne wolde I suffre hym do his nycetee.^o foolishness
 And therfore every man this tale I telle:
 Wynne^o whoso may, for al is for to selle.^o win / for sale
 415 With empty hand men may none^o haukes^o lure; no / hawks
 For wynnyng^o wolde I al his lust endure profit
 And make me a feyned^o appetit. pretended
 And yet in bacon⁵ hadde I nevere delit.^o delight
 That made me that evere I wolde hem chide, 420 For thogh the Pope hadde seten hem biside,^o sat beside them
 I wolde nat spare hem at hir owene bord.^o table
 For by my trouthe, I quitte hem,^o word for word, requited them
 As^o helpe me verray^o God omnipotent! so / true
 Though I right now sholde make my testament, 425 I ne owe hem nat a word that it nys quit.^o was not paid back

¹ Argus Hundred-eyed creature of Greek mythology hired by Hera to guard her husband Zeus's mistress Io. He was killed by Hermes.

² so moot I thee I.e., indeed, or by my word.

³ Baar ... dronkenesse I bore witness firmly to my old husbands that they said this when they were drunk.

⁴ Of... lyve Of a thing that they had never been guilty of in their lives.

⁵ bacon Old meat preserved by salting; in other words, old men.

I broghte° it so aboute, by my wit, brought
 That they moste yeve it up° as for the beste had to give it up
 Or elles hadde we nevere been in reste.° at rest
 For thogh° he looked as a wood leoun,° although / crazy lion
 430 Yet sholde he faille of his conclusion.° intent
 "Thanne wolde I seye, 'Goodlief, taak keepe
 How mekely looketh Wilkyn oure sheepe!¹
 Com neer, my spouse. Lat me ba° thy cheke. kiss
 Ye sholde been al pacient and meke° meek
 435 And han° a sweete, spiced conscience,° have / delicate conscience
 Sith ye so preche° of Jobes pacience.°² preach / Job's patience
 Suffreth alwey,° syn ye so wel kan preche, endure always
 And bur° ye do, certein we shal yow teche° unless / teach you
 That it is fair to have a wyf in pees.° peace
 440 Oon of us two moste bowen,° doutelees,° must bow / doubtless
 And sith a man is moore resonable
 Than womman is, ye moste been suffrable.° you must be patient
 What eyleth yow,° to grucche° thus and ails you / complain
 grone?° groan
 Is it for ye wolde have my queynte° female sexual organs
 allone?° alone
 445 Wy,° taak it al! Lo, have it everydeell° why / every bit
 Peter, I shrewe yow but ye love it weel!³
 For if I wolde selle my bele chose,⁴
 I koude walke as fressh as is a rose.⁵
 But I wol kepe it for youre owene tooth.° own taste (pleasure)
 450 Ye be to blame, by God, I sey yow sooth!⁶ tell you the truth
 "Swiche manere wordes hadde we on honde.⁶
 Now wol I speken of my fourthe housbonde.
 "My fourthe housbonde was a revelour°— party-goer
 This is to seyn, he hadde a paramour°— lover
 455 And I was yong and ful of ragerye,° high spirits
 Stibourne° and strong and joly° as a stubborn / pretty pye.° magpie

Wel koude I daunce to an harpe smale° small harp
 And synge,° ywis,° as any nyghtyngale sing / indeed
 Whan I had dronke a draughte of sweete wyn.° wine
 460 Metellius,⁷ the foule cherl, the swyn,° swine
 That with a staf° birafte° his wyf hir lyf club / stole from
 For° she drank wyn, thogh I hadde been his wyf, because He sholde nat han daunted me fro drynke!⁸
 And after wyn, on Venus° moste° I thynke. must 465 For also siker° as cold engendreth hayl,° as sure / causes hail
 A likerous° mouth moste han° a likerous lecherous / must have tayl.° tail
 In wommen vinolent is no defence.¹⁰
 This knowen lecchours° by experience. lechors
 "But, Lord Crist, whan that it remembreth me° when I remember 470 Upon my yowthe° and on my jolitee,° youth / gaiety
 It tikleth° me aboute myn herte roote.° tickles / heart's root Unto this day it dooth myn herte boote° does my heart good
 That I have had my world as in my tyme.° time
 But age, allas, that al wole envenyme,° will poison all 475 Hath me biraft° my beautee and my stolen from me
 pith.° strength
 Lat go! Farewel! The devel go therwith!° with it
 The flour is goon,° ther is namoore° to telle; gone / no more
 The bren° as I best kan now moste° I selle. bran / must
 But yet to be right myrie° wol I fonde.° merry / try 480 Now wol I tellen of my fourthe housbonde.
 "I seye I hadde in herte° greet despit° heart / great anger
 That he of any oother° had delit.° any other (woman) / delight
 But he was quit,° by God and by Seint Joce!¹¹ punished
 I made hym of the same wode° a croce.° wood / cross
 485 Nat of my body in no foul manere,° manner
 But certein I made folk swich cheere,° hospitality
 That in his owene grece° I made hym frye° own grease / fry
 For angre and for verray jalousie.° true jealousy

¹ Thanne ... sheepe Then would I say, "Sweetheart, note well, how meekly Willie, our sheep (i.e., her husband) looks."

² Jobes pacience God allowed Satan to attempt to shake Job's faith through a series of terrible misfortunes. See the Biblical Book of Job.

³ Peter ... weel By St. Peter! I curse you unless you love it well, i.e., do you ever love it well.

⁴ bele chose French: beautiful thing, i.e., sexual organs.

⁵ I ... rose In other words, if I sold myself sexually, I could dress myself beautifully with the proceeds.

⁶ Swiche ... honde We were occupied by this kind of conversation.

⁷ Metellius See Facta et dicta memorabilia (Memorable Facts and Deeds), a collection of short stories for orators, written by Valerius Maximus (first century CE).

⁸ He ... drynke He should not have prevented me from drink.

⁹ Venus Goddess of love.

¹⁰ In ... defence There is no defense in drunken women, i.e., they are defenseless.

¹¹ Seint Joce St. Judoc or St. Joyce was a seventh-century prince in Brittany who gave up his succession to the throne to become a priest. He was also famous for going on a pilgrimage to Rome.

By God, in erthe I was his purgatorie,^o purgatory
 For which I hope his soule be in glorie.
 For God it woot,^o he sat ful ofte and song^o knows it / sang
 Whan that his shoo^o shoe
 ful bitterly hym wrong.^o hurt him very bitterly
 Ther was no wight save God and he that wiste^o who knew
 In many wise^o how soore^o I hym twiste.^o ways / sorely / tormented
 He deyde^o whan I cam fro^o died / came from (a pilgrimage to)
 Jerusalem
 And lith ygrave^o under the roode beem,¹ lies buried
 Al^o is his tombe^o noght so curyus^o although / tomb / elaborate
 As was the sepulcre of hym Daryus,^o Darius
 Which that Appeles wroghte^o subtilly.^{o2} made / subtly
 It nys^o but wast to burye hym preciously.^o is not / expensively Lat hym^o fare wel! God yeve^o his soule reste. may he / give
 He is now in his grave and in his cheste.^o coffin
 "Now of my fifthe housbonde wol I telle.
 God lete his soule nevere come in Helle!
 And yet was he to me the mooste shrewe.
 That feele I on my ribbes^o al by rewe,^o ribs / in a row
 And evere shal unto myn endyng day.
 But in oure bed he was ful fressh and gay.
 And therwithal so wel koude he me glose,^o flatter
 Whan that he wolde han my bele chose,
 That thogh he hadde me bet^o on every bon,^o beaten / bone
 He koude wynne agayn my love anon.
 I trowe^o I loved hym best for that he believe
 Was of his love daungerous^o to me. standoffish
 We wommen han, if that I shal nat lye,
 In this matere a queynte fantasye:^o odd whim
 Wayte,^o what^o thyng we may nat lightly know (that) / whatever have,
 Therafter^o wol we crie al day and crave!
 Forbede^o us thyng,^o and that desiren we; after it
 Preesse on us faste, and thanne wol we fle.^o forbid / something
 With daunger oute we al oure chaffare;³ flee

¹ And ... beem Her fourth husband was buried inside the local parish church under the cross-beam of the cross near the high altar, a place reserved for only the most influential members of a parish.

² As was ... subtilly The legendary tomb of Darius the Mede, fashioned by the Jewish sculptor Appeles, was famous for its beauty.

³ With ... chaffare Either (where we are greeted) with scorn, we (put) out all our goods (i.e., are anxious to sell), or we (put) out all our goods with (a show of) scorn (i.e., as if we did not care if anyone buys them).

Greet prees^o at market maketh crowd
 deere ware,^o expensive goods
 And to greet cheepe^o is holde at too much merchandise
 litel prys.^o little price
 This knoweth every womman that is wys.
 My fifthe housbonde, God his soule blesse,
 Which that I took for love and no richesse,
 He somtyme^o was a clerk^o of Oxenford^o once / student / Oxford
 And hadde left scole^o and wente at hom^o school / home
 to bord^o rent a room
 With my gossib,^o dwellynge in oure toun. confidant
 God have hir soule! Hir name was Alisoun.
 She knew myn herte and eek my privetee^o secrets
 Bet^o than oure parisshe preest, as better
 moot I theel!^o may I thrive
 To hire biwreyed^o I my conseil^o al. revealed / counsel
 For hadde myn housbonde pissed on a wal^o wall
 Or doon a thyng that sholde han cost his lyf,
 To hire and to another worthy wyf
 And to my nece,^o which that I loved weel, niece
 I wolde han toold his conseil everydeel.^o every bit
 And so I dide ful often, God it woot!^o God knows it
 That made his face ful often reed and hoot^o hot
 For verray^o shame, and blamed hymself, for he true
 Had toold to me so greet a pryvetee.
 "And so bifel^o that ones^o in a Lente—⁴ it happened / once
 So oftentymes I to my gossyb^o wente, confidant
 For evere yet I loved to be gay
 And for to walke in March, Averill, and May Fro hous to hous to heere sondry talys— various tales
 That Jankyn clerk and my gossyb Dame Alys
 And I myself into the feeldes^o wente. fields
 Myn housbonde was at Londoun al the Lente;
 I hadde the bettre leyser^o for to pleye better opportunity
 And for to se^o and eek for to be seye^o see / seen
 Of lusty folk. What wiste I wher my grace
 Was shapen for to be or in what place?⁵
 Therefore I made my visitaciouns^o visits

⁴ Lente Period in the late winter and early spring when Christians prepare for Easter by fasting and doing penance.

⁵ What wiste ... place How could I know where or in what place my good luck was destined to be? or possibly (to avoid the redundancy) how could I know whether I was destined to have good luck, or where?

To vigilies and to processions,¹
 To prechyng° eek and to thise pilgrimages, preaching
 To pleyes° of myracles and to mariages, plays
 And wered upon° my gaye scarlet gytes.° wore / robes 560 Thise wormes, ne thise motthes,° ne thise mytes° moths / mites
 Upon my peril frete° hem never a deel,° eat / never a bit
 And wostow° why? For they were used weel. do you know “Now wol I tellen forth what happed me.° happened to me
 I seye that in the feeldes walked we 565 Til trewely we hadde swich daliance,° flirtation
 This clerk and I, that of my purveiance° foresight
 I spak to hym and seyde° hym how that he, said to
 If I were wydwe,° sholde wedde me. widowed
 For certainly I sey for no bobance,° pride
 570 Yet was I nevere withouten purveiance
 Of mariage n°of° othere thynges eek. nor of
 I holde a mouses herte° nat worth a leek mouse's heart
 That hath but oon hole forto sterre° to, escape
 And if that faille,° thanne is al ydo.² should fail / completely done for 575 “I bar hym on honde° he hadde enchanted me; accused him
 My dame° taughte me that soutiltee.° mother / trick
 And eek I seyde I mette° of hym al nyght; dreamed
 He wolde han slayn° me as I lay upright,° killed / on my back
 And al my bed was ful of verray blood.
 580 But yet I hope that he shal do me good,
 For blood bitokeneth° gold, as me was taught.³ signifies
 And al was fals! I dremed of it right naught.° not at all
 But I folwed ay° my dammes followed ever loore,° mother's teaching
 As wel of this as othere thynges° moore.° matters / more 585 “But now sire, lat me se° what I shal seyn. see Aha! By God, I have my tale ageyn!° again “Whan that my fourthe housbonde was on beere,°⁴ bier
 I weepe algate° and made sory cheere,° continuously / face

As wyves mooten,° for it is usage,° must / custom 590 And with my coverchief° covered my visage.° kerchief / face
 But for that° I was purveyed of° because / provided with a make,° mate
 I wepte but smal,° and that I undertake.° little / attest
 “To chirche° was myn housbonde born church
 amorwe,° in the morning
 With neighebores that for hym maden sorwe,° sorrow
 595 And Jankynoure clerk was oon of tho.° one of those
 As help me God, whan that I saugh° hym go saw
 After the beere, me thoughte he hadde a paire
 Of legges and of feet so clene° and faire,° neat / attractive
 That al myn herte I yaf° unto his hooold.° gave / possession 600 He was, I trowe,° a twenty wynter oold, believe
 And I was fourty, if I shal seye sooth.° say the truth
 And yet I hadde alwey a coltes° tooth. colt's
 Gat-tothed I was, and that bicam me weel;⁵
 I hadde the prente° of Seint Venus seel.⁶ print
 605 As help me God, I was a lusty oon,
 And faire and riche and yong and wel bigon.° established
 And trewely, as myne housbondes tolde me,
 I hadde the beste ‘quonyam’° myghte be. sexual organ
 For certes, I am al venerien⁷
 610 In feelynge,° and myn herte is marcién.⁸ feeling
 Venus me yaf° my lust, my likerousnesse,° gave / lecherousness
 And Mars yaf me my sturdy hardynesse.° courage
 Myn ascendent was Taur, and Mars therinne.⁹
 Allas! Allas! That evere love was synne!⁹ sin
 615 I folwed° ay° myn inclinacioun° followed / ever / inclination
 By vertu° of my constellacioun,° influence / constellation
 That made me I koude noght withdrawe° withhold

¹ To ... processions To vigils and to processions. Vigils were church services held on the evening before the feast day of a saint. Ceremonial processions formed part of the service on the day itself.

² I holde ... ydo The mouse who has only one hole to which it can escape appears in various proverbs as well as in the Romance of the Rose (line 13554), whose character La Vieille, the old woman who knows all about love, is one of the models for the Wife of Bath. Not worth a leek means worth nothing at all.

³ blood ... taught Blood could serve as a token or symbol of gold, which was often described as red.

⁴ beere Bier, i.e., in his coffin.

⁵ Gat-tothed ... weel I was gap-toothed, and that suited me well. Women with gaps between their teeth were said to have lustful and licentious natures.

⁶ I hadde ... seel I had the imprint of Venus's seal; in other words, Venus has given the Wife of Bath a birthmark, another supposed indication of a lascivious nature.

venerien In astrology, one who is influenced by the planet Venus—i.e., prone to love.

⁸ marcién In astrology, one who is influenced by the planet Mars—i.e., war-like.

⁹ Myn ... therinne At the moment when the Wife was born the constellation of stars known as Taurus (the Bull) was coming over the horizon (ascendant) along with the planet Mars. It was believed that if a woman is born with Venus and Mars ascending together she will be unchaste.

My chambre° of Venus from a good felawe.° organ / fellow
 Yet have I Martes° mark¹ upon my face— Mars's
 And also in another privee place.
 For God so wys° be my savacioun,° wise / salvation
 I ne loved nevere° by no discrecioun never loved
 But evere folwed myn appetit,° appetite
 Al° were he short or long° or blak° or whether / tall / dark whit.° fair
 I took no kepe,° so that he liked° me, did not care / pleased
 How poore he was ne eek of what degree.
 "What sholde I seye, but at the monthes ende,
 This joly° clerk Jankyn that was so hende° pretty / handy
 Hath wedded me with greet solempnytee.° ceremony
 And to hym yaf° I al the lond and fee° gave / property
 That evere was me yeven° therbifoore.° given / before this
 But afterward repented me ful soore!° I regretted it sorely
 He nolde suffre nothyng of my list.²
 By God, he smoot° me ones° on the lyst,° hit / once / ear
 For that° I rente° out of his book a leef,° because / tore / page
 That of the strook° myn ere° wax° blow / ear / grew al deaf.° completely deaf
 Stibourne° I was as is a leonesse° stubborn / lionsess
 And of my tonge° a verray° tongue / true
 jangleresse.° ceaseless talker
 And walke I wolde as I had doon biforn° before
 From hous to hous, although he had it sworn.° forbidden
 For which he often tymes wolde preche° preach
 And me of olde Romayn geestes³ teche° teach
 How he Symplicius Gallus lefte his wyf
 And hire forsook for terme° of al his lyf, the rest
 Noght but for open heveded,⁴ he hir say,
 Lookynge out at his dore° upon a day. door
 "Another Romayn tolde he me by name,
 That, for° his wyf was at a someres game° because / entertainment
 Withouten his wityng,° he forsook hire eke. knowledge
 And thanne wolde he upon his Bible seke° seek
 That ilke° proverbe of Ecclesiaste⁵ same

¹ Martes mark Red birthmark.

² He ... list He would not allow anything I desired.

³ Romayn geestes Roman stories. Like the reference to Metellius above in line 460, the following are old misogynistic or anti-matrimonial stories dating back to ancient Rome.

⁴ Noght ... heveded Just because he saw her bare-headed.

⁵ That ... Ecclesiaste See Ecclesiasticus 25.34.

Where he comandeth and forbedeth faste° firmly
 Man shal nat suffre° his wyf go roule° aboute. allow / wander
 Thanne wolde he seye right thus, withouten doute:
 655 "Whoso that buyldeth his hous al of salves⁶
 And priketh° his blynde hors° over the spurs / blind horse
 falwes° fields
 And suffreth his wyf to go seken halwes° shrines
 Is worthy to been° hanged on the galwes.⁷ be / gallows
 But al for noght! I sette noght an hawe° hawthorn berry 660 Of his proverbes n° of his olde lawe, nor of Ne I wolde nat of hym° corrected be. by him
 I hate hym that my vices telleth me° tells me about
 And so doo mo,° God woot,° of us than I. do more / knows
 This made hym with me wood° al outrelly:° crazy / entirely 665 I nolde noght° forbere° hym in no cas.° would not / endure / case
 "Now wol I seye° yow° sooth,° by tell / you / the truth
 Seint Thomas,⁸
 Why that I rente out of his book a leef,
 For which he smoot me so that I was deaf.
 "He hadde a book that gladly, nyght and day,
 670 For his desport° he wolde rede° alway. fun / read
 He cleped° it Valerie and Theofraste,⁹ called
 At which book he lough° alwey ful faste.° laughed / very much
 And eek ther was somtyme° a clerk° at Rome, once / theologian
 A cardinal that highte° Seint Jerome, was named 675 That made a book, Agayn° Jovinian,¹⁰ against

⁶ Whoso ... salves Whoever builds his house of all willow branches.

⁷ Whoso ... galwes Proverb.

⁸ Seint Thomas There are three possible candidates for this St. Thomas: Thomas the apostle, mentioned in the Gospels; St. Thomas Aquinas, the thirteenth-century theologian (though his second name was more often used than not); and St. Thomas Becket, whose shrine the Canterbury pilgrims are journeying to visit. Thomas the apostle was often referred to as "Thomas of India." Becket is the likely reference.

⁹ Valerie and Theofraste The Wife of Bath is actually referring to two separate works, often bound together into one volume in the Middle Ages—the Dissuasio Valerii ad Rufinum by the English scholar and courtier Walter Map (c. 1140–c. 1208) and the Golden Book of Marriages by Theophrastus, a supposed disciple of Aristotle. Both books were full of stories attacking women and discouraging men from marrying.

¹⁰ Seint Jerome Late fourth and early fifth centuries, theologian who wrote many influential works, including a translation of the Bible into Latin; Agayn Jovinian One of Chaucer's major sources for this prologue, Against Jovinian, extols virginity as superior to marriage.

In which book eek ther was Tertulan,¹
 Crisippus,² Trotula,³ and Helowys⁴
 That was abbesse nat fer^o fro Parys, not far
 And eek the Parables of Salomon,⁵ 680 Ovides^o Art,⁶ and bookes many on.^o Ovid's / many (other) books
 And alle thise were bounden in o^o volume. one
 And every nyght and day was his custume
 Whan he hadde leyser^o and vacacioun^o leisure / opportunity
 From oother worldly occupacioun
 685 To reden on this Book of Wikked Wyves.⁷
 He knew of hem mo legendes and lyves^o biographies
 Than been^o of goode wyves in the Bible. there are
 For, trusteth wel, it is an impossible^o impossibility
 That any clerk wol speke good of wyves 690 But if^o it be of hooly seintes lyves, unless Ne of noon other womman never the mo.
 Who peynted the leoun,⁸ tel me who?
 By God, if wommen hadde writen stories
 As clerkes han^o withinne hire^o oratories,^o have / their / chapels
 695 They wolde han writen of men moore wikkednesse
 Than al the mark of Adam^o may redresse. male sex (i.e., men)
 The children of Mercurie and Venus⁹

Been in hir wirkyng ful contrarius.¹⁰
 Mercurie loveth wysdam^o and science,^o wisdom / knowledge
 700 And Venus loveth ryot^o and dispenche.^o parties / squandering money
 And for hire diverse disposicioun,^o natures
 Ech falleth in otheres exaltacioun,^o exaltation
 And thus, God woot, Mercurie is desolat
 In Pisces, wher Venus is exaltat,^o exalted 705 And Venus falleth ther^o Mercurie is reysed. where Therefore no womman of no clerk is preysed.
 The clerk, whan he is oold and may noght^o do cannot
 Of Venus werkes¹¹ worth his olde sho,^o shoe
 Thanne sit he doun and writ in his dotage¹² 710 That wommen kan nat kepe hir mariage.
 "But now to purpos^o why I tolde thee the reason
 That I was beten^o for a book, pardee.^o beaten / by God
 Upon a nyght Jankyn, that was oure sire,^o master
 Redde on his book as he sat by the fire
 715 Of Eva^o first, that for hir wikkednesse Eve
 Was al mankynde broght to wrecchednesse,
 For which Crist hymself was slayn,
 That boghte^o us with his herte blood agayn. who bought
 Lo, heere,^o expres^o of womman may ye fynde here / specifically 720 That womman was the los^o of al mankynde. destruction
 "Tho^o redde he me how Sampson¹³ loste hise then
 heres:^o hairs
 Slepynge, his lemman^o kitte^o it with hir lover / cut sheres,^o scissors
 Thurgh^o which tresoun^o loste he through / betrayal
 bothe hise eyen.
 "Tho redde he me, if that I shal nat lyen,^o lie
 725 Of Hercules and of his Dianyre,¹⁴
 That caused hym to sette hymself a fyre.^o on fire
 Nothyng^o forgat he the sorwe and wo not at all

¹ Tertulan Early third-century theologian who wrote several treatises about the value of virginity.

² Crisippus Mentioned in Jerome's treatise, referred to in line 675, but none of his works survive.

³ Trotula Female doctor who taught medicine at the University of Salerno in the eleventh century and wrote a treatise about gynecology.

⁴ Helowys Tried to persuade her lover Abelard not to marry her, giving typical anti-matrimonial reasons. She eventually became the abbess of the Paraclete, a convent of nuns near Paris.

⁵ Parables of Salomon Biblical Book of Proverbs.

⁶ Ovides Art Ovid's Art of Love concludes with a long argument about why it is prudent to avoid love.

⁷ Book of Wikked Wyves Title of the whole compendium volume mentioned above.

⁸ Who ... leoun In medieval versions of the fable of Aesop, a man and a lion were having a dispute about who was the stronger. For proof, the man showed the lion a picture of a man killing a lion, and the lion then asked the man who painted the lion—implying the painting is biased. Then the lion ate the man.

⁹ The children ... Venus I.e., scholars and lovers.

¹⁰ Been ... contrarius In addition to influencing the body's humors (Cf. General Prologue, lines 413 ff.), the planets were thought to govern various parts of the body and various trades. Mercury was the planet of scholars and merchants, who, in their ways of doing things, are completely at odds with lovers.

¹¹ Venus werkes I.e., sex.

¹² Thanne ... dotage Then he sits down and writes in his old age.

¹³ Tho ... Sampson See Judges 16.15–22.

¹⁴ Hercules ... Dianyre Deianira was the wife of Hercules and inadvertently caused his death by giving him a shirt that she thought would keep him faithful. It was in fact poisoned and he had himself burned alive to escape the pain.

That Socrates hadde with hise wyves two,
 How Xantippa¹ caste° pisse° upon his heed.° threw / urine / head
 This sely° man sat stille° as he were innocent / quietly deed.° dead
 He wiped his heed. Namooore dorste° he seyn dared
 But, 'Er° that thonder stynte,° comth a before / stops
 reyn.° rain
 "Of Phasipha, that was the queene of Crete,
 For shrewednesse° hym thoughte the tale nastines
 swete.° sweet
 735 Fy! Spek namooore! It is a grisly thyng,
 Of hire horrible lust and hir likyng!²
 "Of Clitermystra,³ for hire lecherye,
 That falsly made hire housbonde for to dye,° die
 He redde it with ful good devocioun.
 740 "He tolde me cek for what occasioun
 Amphiorax at Thebes loste his lyf:⁴
 Myn housbonde hadde a legende° of his wyf, story
 Eriphilem, that for an ouche° of gold brooch
 Hath prively° unto the Grekes told secretly
 745 Wher that hir housbonde hidde hym in a place,
 For which he hadde at Thebes sory° grace. sorry
 "Of Lyvia tolde he me and of Lucye.⁵
 They bothe made° hir° housbondes for to dye— caused / their
 That oon for love, that oother was for hate.
 750 Lyvia hir housbonde upon an even° late evening
 Emposoned° hath, for that she was his fo;° poisoned / foe
 Lucia likerous° loved hire housbonde so, lustfully

That, for he sholde alwey upon hire thynke,
 She yaf° hym swich a manere° love drynke° gave / type of / potion
 755 That he was deed° er it were by the morwe.° dead / morning
 And thus algates° housbondes han sorwe.° always / have sorrow
 "Thanne tolde he me how that oon Latumyus⁶
 Compleyned unto his felawe° Arrius friend
 That in his gardyn growed swich a tree
 760 On which he seyde how that hise wyves thre Hanged himself° for herte° despitus.° themselves / heart / cruel
 'O leeve° brother,' quod this Arrius, dear
 'Yif° me a plante° of thilke° blissed tree, give / seedling / that
 And in my gardyn planted it shal bee.'
 765 "Of latter date of wyves hath he red,
 That somme han slayn hir housbondes in hir bed
 And lete hir lecchour dighte hire al the nyght⁷
 Whan that the corps lay in the floor upright,
 And somme han dryve° nayles° in hir brayn⁸ driven / nails
 770 Whil that they slepte, and thus they han hem slayn;
 Somme han hem yeve poysson in hire drynke.⁹
 He spak moore harm than herte may bithynke.° imagine
 And therewithal° he knew of mo proverbes with all this
 Than in this world ther growen gras or herbes.
 775 'Bet° is,' quod he, 'thyn habitacioun° better / dwelling place
 Be with a leoun or a foul dragoun
 Than with a womman usynge° for to chyde. accustomed Bet is,' quod he, 'hye° in the roof abyde high
 Than with an angry wyf down in the hous,
 780 They been° so wikked and contrarious; are
 They haten that hir housbondes loveth ay.¹⁰
 He seyde, 'A womman cast° hir shame away throws
 Whan she cast of° hir smok.° And forthermo, off° undergarment
 A fair womman, but° she be chaast° also, unless / chaste
 785 Is lyk a gold ryng in a sowes° nose.' pig's
 Who wolde leeve or who wolde suppose° believe
 The wo that in myn herte was and pyne° pain
 "And whan I saugh he wolde nevere fyne° finish
 To reden on this cursed book al nyght,

¹ Xantippa I.e., Xanthippe (late fifth c. BCE) famously shrewish wife of the philosopher Socrates (469–399 BCE).

² Phasipha ... likyng In Greek mythology, Queen Pasiphae of Crete had sex with a bull and gave birth to the monster Minotaur; likyng Desire.

³ Clitermystra I.e., Clytemnestra, who with her lover Aegisthus, murdered her husband Agamemnon when he returned from the Trojan war.

⁴ Amphiorax ... lyf Amphiarus hid so he would not have to fight in war, but his hiding place was betrayed by his wife Eriphyle, and he was killed in battle.

⁵ Of ... Lucye Livia was either Augustus's wife, who poisoned several prominent Romans (including her own husband) for political gain, or Livilla, Livia's granddaughter, who poisoned her husband at the instigation of her lover Sejanus. Lucilla poisoned her husband, the Roman philosopher Lucretius (c. 99–c. 55 BCE), author of On the Nature of Things, with a love-potion intended to increase his desire for her.

⁶ Thanne ... Latumyus The incident related below is another misogynistic story from ancient Rome, for which Chaucer's source is probably Walter Map's Dissuasio Valerii.

⁷ And ... nyght And let her lover have sex with her all night.

⁸ And ... brayn See Judges 4.17–22.

⁹ Somme ... drynke Some have given them poison in their drink.

¹⁰ They ... ay They always hate what their husbands love.

790 Al sodeynly thre leves have I plyght° plucked
 Out of his book, right as he radde. And eke
 I with my fest° so took° hym on the cheke, fist / hit
 That in oure fyr he fil° bakward adoun. fell
 And he up stirte° as dooth a wood leoun, jumps
 795 And with his fest he smoot me on the heed,
 That in° the floor I lay as I were deed. on
 And whan he saugh how stille that I lay,
 He was agast° and wolde han fled his way.° afraid / away
 Til atte laste out of my swogh° I breyde.° faint / awoke 800 'O hastow° slayn me, false thief?' I seyde. have you
 'And for my land thus hastow mordred me!
 Er° I be deed, yet wol I kisse thee.' before
 "And neer he cam and kneled faire° adoun pleasantly
 And seyde, 'Deere suster° Alisoun, sister
 805 As help me God, I shal thee nevere smyte!
 That I have doon, it is thyself to wyte.° blame
 Foryeve it me, and that I thee biseke!° beg
 And yet eftsoones° I hitte hym on the cheke once more
 And seyde, 'Theef, thus muchel am I wreke.° avenged
 810 Now wol I dye. I may no lenger speke.'
 But atte laste, with muchel care and wo,
 We fille acorded° by usselven° came to an agreement / ourselves
 two.
 He yaf me al° the bridel° in myn hond completely / bridle
 To han the governance of hous and lond, 815 And of his tonge and his hond also,
 And made hym brenne his book anon right tho.° there
 And whan that I hadde geten° unto me gotten
 By maistrie° al the soveraynetee, mastery
 And that he seyde, 'Myn owene trewe wyf,
 820 Do as thee lust to terme of al thy lyf:¹
 Keepe thyn honour and keepe eek myn estaat.'—
 After that day we hadden never debaat.° disagreement
 God helpe me so, I was to hym as kynde
 As any wyf from Denmark unto Ynde° India
 825 And also trewe, and so was he to me.
 I prey to God that sit in magestee,
 So blesse his soule for his mercy deere.
 Now wol I seye° my tale, if ye wol heere." tell

BIHOLDE THE WORDES BITWENE THE SOMONOUR AND THE FRERE

830 The Frere° lough° whan he hadde herd al this. friar / laughed
 "Now dame," quod he, "so have I joye or blis,
 This is a long preamble of a tale!"
 And whan the Somonour herde the Frere gale,° speak up
 "Lo," quod the Somonour, "Goddess armes two!²
 A frere wol entremette hym evere mo!³
 835 Lo, goode men, a flye and eek a frere
 Wol falle in every dyssh and mateere!⁴
 What spekestow° of what do you say
 preambulacioun?° preambling
 What! Amble or trotte° or pees° or go sit doun! trot / pace
 Thou lettest° oure disport° in this manere." spoil / fun 840 "Ye, woltow so,° sire Somonour?" will you say so quod the Frere.
 "Now by my feith, I shal er that I go
 Telle of a somonour swich a tale or two,
 That alle the folk shal laughen in this place!"
 "Now elles,° Frere, I bishrewe° thy face!" otherwise / curse
 845 Quod this Somonour, "and I bishrewe me
 But if° I telle tales two or thre unless
 Of freres er I come to Sidyngborne!⁵
 That I shal make thyn herte for to morne,° mourn
 For wel I woot thy pacience is gon."
 850 Oure Hoost cride, "Pees,° and that anon!" peace
 And seyde, "Lat the womman telle hire tale.
 Ye fare° as folk that dronken were of ale! behave
 Do, dame, telle forth youre tale, and that is best."
 "Alredy,° sire," quod she, "right as yow lest,° ready / wish 855 If I have licence of this worthy Frere."
 "Yis, dame," quod he, "tel forth, and I wol heere."

HEERE ENDETH THE WYF OF BATHE HIR PROLOGE AND BIGYNNETH HIR TALE

² Goddess armes two God's two arms. This is an oath like those uniformly condemned by the Church.

³ A ... mo A friar will always put himself in the middle of things.

⁴ Wol ... mateere Will fall into every dish and matter.

⁵ Sidyngborne I.e., Sittingbourne, a small town about forty miles from London on the road to Canterbury.

THE WIFE OF BATH'S TALE

In th'olde dayes of Kyng Arthour,
 Of which that Britons spoken greet honour,¹ Al was this land fulfild of^o fairye.² filled up with
 The Elf Queene with hir joly compaignye
 Daunced ful ofte in many a grene mede.^o meadow
 This was the olde opinion, as I rede^o— read
 I speke of manye hundred yeres ago.
 But now kan no man se none elves mo,^o no more elves
 For now the grete charitee and prayeres
 Of lymytours³ and othere hooly^o freres holy
 That serchen every lond and every streem,
 As thikke as motes^o in the sonne beem, dust particles
 Blessynge halles, chambres, kichenes, boures,^o bedrooms
 Citees, burghes,^o castels, hye toures,^o fortified towns / towers
 Thropes,^o bernes,^o shipnes,^o villages / barns / stables
 dayeryes^o— dairies
 This maketh^o that ther been^o no fairyes. causes it / are
 For theras^o wont^o to walken was an elf, where / accustomed
 Ther walketh now the lymytour^o hymself friar
 In undermeles^o and in morwenynges,^o early afternoons / mornings
 And seyth his matyns^o and his hooly morning service
 thynges^o prayers
 As he gooth in his lymytacioun.^o limited area
 Wommen may go sauflly^o up and down: safely
 In every bussh or under every tree
 Ther is noon oother incubus⁴ but he,
 And he ne wol doon hem but dishonour.⁵
 And so bifel^o that this Kyng Arthour it happened
 Hadde in hous a lusty bachelor^o young knight
 That on a day cam ridyng fro ryver,^o from a river
 And happed that, allone^o as he was born, alone
 He saugh a mayde^o walkyng hym biforn,^o maid / in front of him
 Of^o which mayde anon, maugree^o hir heed,^o from / despite / will
 By verray^o force birafte^o hire maydenhed, true / stole
 For which oppressioun was swich clamour^o outcry

¹ Kyng Arthour ... honour Legendary British king of roughly the fifth or sixth century CE, the subject of many medieval tales and romances.

² faurye Supernatural beings known as elves or faines.

³ lymytours Friars who were licensed to preach in a limited area in a parish or county.

⁴ incubus Devilish spirit who would appear to women in dreams and thereby impregnate them.

⁵ ne ... dishonour Will do them nothing but dishonor.

890 And swich pursute^o unto the Kyng Arthour, appeal
 That dampned^o was this knyght for to be condemned deed^o dead
 By cours of lawe, and sholde han lost his heed—
 Paraventure^o swich was the statut tho^o— by chance / then
 But that the queene and othere ladyes mo
 895 So longe preyden^o the kyng of grace,^o requested / mercy
 Til he his lyf hym graunted in the place
 And yaf hym to the queene al at hir wille
 To chese^o wheither she wolde hym save or spille.^o choose / kill
 The queene thanketh the kyng with al hir myght
 900 And after this thus spak she to the knyght
 Whan that she saugh hir tyme upon a day:
 “Thou standest yet,” quod she, “in swich array^o condition
 That of thy lyf yet hastow^o no suretee.^o have you / certainty
 I grante thee lyf if thou kanst tellen me
 905 What thyng is it that wommen moost desiren.
 Bewar and keepe thy nekke boon^o from iren!^o bone / iron
 And if thou kanst nat tellen it anon,
 Yet shal I yeve thee leve for to gon^o go
 A twelf month and a day to seche^o and leere^o seek / learn 910 An answer suffisant^o in this mateere. sufficient
 And suretee^o wol I han er that thou pace^o— guarantee / leave
 Thy body for to yelden^o in this place.” return
 Wo^o was this knyght, and sorwefully he siketh,^o sad / sighs
 But he may nat do al as hym liketh.^o as he wishes
 915 And at the laste he chees^o hym for to wende,^o chooses / go
 And come agayn right at the yeres^o ende year's
 With swich answer as God wolde hym purveye,^o provide
 And taketh his leve and wendeth forth his weye.
 He seketh every hous and every place 920 Whereas^o he hopeth for to fynde grace where
 To lerne what thyng wommen loven moost,
 But he ne koude arryven in no coost^o region
 Wheras he myghte fynde in this mateere
 Two creatures accordyng^o in feere.^o agreeing / together
 925 Somme seyde wommen loven best riches;
 Somme seyde honour, somme seyde jolynesse,^o jollity
 Somme riche array.^o Somme seyden lust clothing
 abedde^o in bed
 And ofetyme to be wydwe^o and wedde.^o widowed / married
 Somme seyde that oure hertes been moost esed^o refreshed
 930 Whan that we been^o yflatered and yplesed. are
 He gooth ful ny the sothe, I wol nat lye!⁶

⁶ He ... lye He gets very near the truth, I will not lie.

- A man shal wyne us best with flaterye
 And with attendance^o and with bisynesse^o attention / diligence
 Been we^o ylymed¹ bothe moore and lesse. we are
- 935 And somme seyn that we loven best
 For to be free and so do right^o as us lest^o just / wish
 And that no man repreve us^o of oure vice complain to us
 But seye that we be wise and nothyng^o nyce.^o not / foolish
 For trewely, ther is noon^o of us alle, none
- 940 If any wight^o wol clawe^o us on the galle,^o person / claw / a sore
 That we nel kike,^o for he seith us sooth. will not kick
 Assay^o and he shal fynde it that so dooth. try
 For be we never so vicious^o withinne,^o wicked / within
 We wol been holden^o wise and clene wish to be considered of synne.
- 945 And somme seyn that greet delit han we
 For to been holden stable and eek secree,^o discreet
 And in o^o purpos stedefastly to dwelle, one
 And nat biwreye^o thyng^o that men us telle. betray / something
 But that tale is nat worth a rake-stele!^o handle of a rake
- 950 Pardee, we wommen konne nothyng hele.²
 Witnesse on Myda.³ Wol ye heere the tale?
 Ovyde, amonges othere thynges smale,
 Seyde Myda hadde under his longe heres^o hairs
 Growynge upon his heed two asses eres,
 955 The which vice he hydde as he best myghte
 Ful subtilly^o from every mannes sighte, carefully
 That save his wyf, ther wiste of it namo.^o no one else
 He loved hire moost and triste^o hire also. trusted
 He preyde^o hire that to no creature asked 960 She sholde tellen of his disfigure.^o disfigurement
 She swoor hym nay: for al this world to wyne^o gain
 She nolde^o do that vileynye or synne would not
 To make hir housbonde han so foul a name.
 She nolde nat telle it for hir owene shame.
- 965 But natheles, hir thoughte that she dyde,^o would die
 That^o she so longe sholde a conseil^o hyde. if / secret
 Hir thoughte it swal so soore aboute hir herte
- That nedely som word hire moste aterne.⁴
 And sith she dorste^o telle it to no man, dared 970 Doun to a mareys^o faste by^o she ran; marsh / close by Til she cam there hir herte was afyre.^o on fire
 And as a bitore⁵ bombleth^o in the myre,^o calls out / mud
 She leyde hir mouth unto the water doun.
 "Biwreye me nat, thou water, with thy soun,"^o sound
- 975 Quod she. "To thee I telle it and namo:
 Myn housbonde hath longe asses erys two!
 Now is myn herte al hool.^o Now is it oute! whole
 I myghte no lenger kepe it, out of doute."^o without doubt
 Heere may ye se,^o thogh we a tyme^o abyde, see / for a time
 980 Yet out it moot!^o We kan no conseil hyde. must (go)
 The remenant of the tale if ye wol heere, Redeth Ovyde, and ther ye may it leere.^o learn
- This knyght of which my tale is specially,
 Whan that he saugh he myghte nat come therby,
 985 This is to sey, what wommen love moost,
 Withinne his brest ful sorweful was the goost.^o spirit
 But hoom he gooth. He myghte nat sojourne.^o delay
 The day was come that homward moste he tourne.
 And in his wey it happed hym to ryde
- 990 In al this care under a forest syde
 Wheras he saugh upon a daunce⁶ go
 Of ladyes foure and twenty and yet mo,
 Toward the which daunce he drow ful yerne^o drew very eagerly
 In hope that som wysdom sholde he lerne.
- 995 But certainly, er he cam fully there, Vanysshed was this daunce he nyste^o where. knew not
 No creature saugh he that bar lyf,^o bore life
 Save on the grene^o he saugh sittynge a wyf^o— meadow / woman
 A fouler^o wight ther may no man devyse.^o uglier / imagine
- 1000 Agayn^o the knyght this olde wyf gan ryse^o towards / rose up
 And seyde, "Sire Knyght, heer forth ne lith^o no lies
 wey.^o road
 Tel me what that ye seken, by youre fey.^o faith
 Paraventure it may the better be;
 Thise olde folk kan^o muchel^o thyng," quod she. know / many

¹ ylymed Limed. Lime was used to catch birds.

² Pardee ... hele By God, we women know nothing about how to keep a secret.

³ Myda I.e., Midas. See Ovid's Metamorphoses, Book 11 (although in Ovid's version it is the king's barber, not his wife, who whispers the secret).

⁴ Hir thoughte ... aterne It seemed to her that it became so sorely swollen around her heart. That by necessity some word had to burst out.

⁵ bitore I.e., bittern, a small heron.

⁶ Wheras ... daunce One way in which mortals were said to encounter elves was at night in the woods, where the elves performed a ritual dance.

5 "My leeve^o mooder,"^o quod this knyght dear / mother
 certeyn,
 "I nam bur^o deed but if^o that I kan seyn am as good as / unless
 What thyng it is that wommen moost desire.
 Koude ye me wisse, I wolde wel quite youre hire."¹
 "Plight^o me thy trouthe^o heere in myn pledge / word
 hand," quod she,
 10 "The nexte thyng that I requere^o thee, ask of Thou shalt it do if it lye in thy myght,
 And I wol telle it yow^o er it be nyght." to you
 "Have heer my trouthe," quod the knyght. "I grante."
 "Thanne," quod she, "I dar^o me wel avante^o dare / boast
 15 Thy lyf is sauf^o, for I wol stonde therby. safe
 Upon my lyf, the queene wol seye as I.
 Lat se^o which is the proudeste of hem alle let's see
 That wereth on a coverchief^o or a calle^o kerchief / hairnet
 That dar seye nay of that I shal thee teche.^o teach 20 Lat us go forth withouten lenger speche."
 Tho^o rowned^o she a pistel^o in his ere then / whispered / lesson
 And bad hym to be glad and have no fere.
 Whan they be comen to the court, this knyght
 Seyde he had holde^o his day as he hadde high^o kept / promised
 And redy was his answer, as he sayde.
 Full many a noble wyf and many a mayde
 And many a wydwe^o, for that they been^o wise, widow / are
 The queene herself sittynge as justise,^o sitting as a judge Assembled been^o his answer for to heere, are 30 And afterward this knyght was bode^o commanded appeere.^o to appear
 To every wight comanded was silence
 And that the knyght sholde telle in audience^o in their hearing
 What thyng that worldly wommen loven best.
 This knyght ne stood nat^o stille as doth a best,^o did not stand / best
 35 But to his questioun anon answerde
 With manly voys^o, that al the court it herde. voice
 "My lige^o lady, generally," quod he, liege
 "Wommen desiren to have sovereynetee^o to have sovereignty
 As wel over hir housbond as hir love
 And for to been in maistrie hym above.
 40 This is youre mooste^o desir, thogh ye me kille. greatest Dooth as yow list. I am at youre will."

In al the court ne was ther^o wyf ne mayde there was neither
 Ne wydwe that contraried that he sayde,

¹ Koude ... hire If you could inform me, I would pay you back well.

1045 But seyden he was worthy han^o his lyf. to have
 And with that word up stirte^o the olde wyf jumped Which that the knyght saugh sittynge in the grene.
 "Mercy," quod she, "my sovereyn lady queene!
 Er that youre court departe, do me right.
 1050 I taughte this answer unto the knyght,
 For which he plighte^o me his trouthe^o there, promised / word
 The firste thyng I wolde hym requere,
 He wolde it do if it lay in his myght.
 Bifore the court thanne preye^o I thee, sire knyght," ask 1055 Quod she, "that thou me take unto thy wyf.
 For wel thou woost^o that I have kept thy lyf. know
 If I seye fals, sey nay, upon thy fey!"^o faith
 This knyght answerde, "Allas and weylawey!"^o woe is me
 I woot^o right wel that swich^o was my know / such biheste.^o promise
 1060 For Goddes love, as chees^o a newe requeste! choose Taak^o al my good,^o and lat^o my body go!" take / possessions / let "Nay thanne,"^o quod she, "I shrewe^o us then / curse
 bothe two,
 For thogh that I be foul, oold, and poore,
 I nolde^o for al the metal ne for oore^o would not / ore
 1065 That under erthe^o is grave^o or lith^o above earth / buried / lies
 But if thy wyf I were and eek thy love."
 "My love!" quod he. "Nay, my dampnacioun!"^o damnation
 Allas, that any of my nacioun^o family
 Sholde evere so foule disparaged^o be!" badly shamed 1070 But al for noght! Th'end is this: that he Constreyned^o was. He nedes moste hire wedde, compelled
 And taketh his olde wyf and gooth to bedde.
 Now wolden som men seye paraventure^o perhaps
 That for my negligence I do no cure^o care
 1075 To tellen yow the joye and al th'array^o the arrangements
 That at the feeste was that ilke^o day same
 To which thyng shortly answer I shal.
 I seye ther nas^o no joye ne feeste at al. was no
 Ther nas^o but hevynesse and muche sorwe. was nothing
 1080 For prively he wedded hire on a morwe,^o morning
 And al day after hidde hym as an owle,
 So wo was hym, his wyf looked so foule.
 Greet was the wo the knyght hadde in his thoght
 Whan he was with his wyf abedde ybrought.²
 1085 He walweth,^o and he turneth to and fro. writhes about

² Whan ... ybrought It was a custom for weddings guests to escort the bride and groom to their bedroom.

His olde wyf lay smylng^o evere mo smiling
 And seyde, "O deere housbonde, benedicitee,^o bless you
 Fareth^o every knyght thus with his wyf as ye? behaves
 Is this the lawe of Kyng Arthures hous?
 1090 Is every knyght of his so dangerous?^o standoffish
 I am youre owene love and youre wyf;
 I am she which that saved hath youre lyf.
 And certes, yet ne dide^o I yow nevere unright:^o did not / injustice
 Why fare ye thus with me this firste nyght?
 1095 Ye faren lyk a man had lost his wit.
 What is my gilt?^o For Goddes love, tel it, guilt
 And it shal been amended if I may."
 "Amended!" quod this knyght. "Allas, nay! Nay!
 It wol nat been amended nevere mo.^o forever more 1100 Thou art so loothly^o and so oold^o also, ugly / old
 And therto comen of so lough^o a kynde,^o low / lineage
 That litel wonder is thogh^o I walwe^o and though / writhe
 wynde.^o twist about
 So wolde God myn herte wolde breste!"^o burst
 "Is this," quod she, "the cause of youre unreste?"
 1105 "Ye, certainly," quod he, "no wonder is!"
 "Now sire," quod she, "I koude amende al this
 If that me liste^o er it were dayes thre,^o I wished / three days
 So wel ye myghte bere yow unto me.¹
 But for^o ye speken of swich gentillesse because 1110 As is descended out of old richesse,
 That therfore sholden ye be gentilmen,
 Swich arrogance is nat worth an hen!
 Looke who that is moost vertuous alway,
 Pryvee and apert and moost entendeth ay
 1115 To do the gentil dedes that he kan:²
 Taak hym for the grettest gentilman.
 Crist wole^o we clayme^o of hym oure desires that / claim
 gentillesse,
 Nat of oure eldres^o for hire old richesse. ancestors
 For thogh they yeve us al hir heritage,
 1120 For which we clayme to been of heigh parage,^o lineage
 Yet may they nat biquethe^o for nothyng bequeath
 To noon^o of us hir vertuous lyvyng^o none / living
 That made hem^o gentilmen ycalled be, them
 And bad us folwen hem in swich degree.

1125 Wel kan the wise poete of Florence
 That highte Dant^o speken in this is named Dante sentence.^o matter
 Lo, in swich maner rym^o is Dantes tale: such a kind of rhyme
 'Ful selde up riseth by his branches smale
 Prowesse of man.³ For God of his goodnesse
 1130 Wole^o that of hym we clayme oure gentillesse.⁷ wishes
 For of oure eldres may we nothyng clayme
 But temporel thyng^o that man may hurte temporal things and mayme.^o maim
 Eek every wight woot this as wel as I.
 If gentillesse were planted naturelly^o implanted by nature
 1135 Unto a certeyn lynage down the lyne,^o line (of generations)
 Pryvee nor apert thanne wolde they nevere fyne
 To doon of gentillesse the faire office.⁴
 They myghte do no vileynye or vice.
 Taak fyr^o and ber^o it in the derkeste hous fire / carry 1140 Bitwix this and the mount of Kaukasous^o Caucasus
 And lat men shette the dores and go thenne:^o go away
 Yet wole the fyr as faire lye^o and brenne^o blaze / burn
 As twenty thousand men myghte it biholde.
 His^o office naturel ay^o wol it holde, its / ever 1145 Up peril of my lyf, til that it dye.⁵
 Heere may ye se wel how that genterye
 Is nat annexed^o to possessioun, linked
 Sith folk ne doon hir operacioun^o do not behave
 Alwey as dooth the fyr, lo, in his kynde.^o according to its nature
 1150 For God it woot, men may wel often fynde
 A lordes sone do shame and vileynye,
 And he that wole han^o pris of^o his gentrye, will have / esteem for
 For he was born of a gentil hous
 And hadde hise eldres noble and vertuous, 1155 And nel hymselfen^o do no gentil dedis^o will not himself / deeds
 Ne folwen his gentil auncestre that deed^o is, dead
 He nys nat^o gentil, be he duc^o or erl,^o is not / duke / earl
 For vileyns synful dedes make a cherl.^o churl
 For gentillesse nys but^o renomee^o is not / renown

¹ So ... me Provided that you might behave yourself well towards me.

² Looke ... kan Look for whoever is always most virtuous in private and in public and always strives to do the most noble deeds.

³ Ful ... man The excellence of a man seldom extends to the further branches (of his family tree); i.e., the sons are seldom worthy of the father. Cf. Dante's Convivio 4 and Purgatorio 7.121.

⁴ Pryvee ... office Then they would never stop doing the fair office of gentle deeds either in private or in public.

⁵ His ... dye Upon my life, it will always perform its natural function (i.e., burn) until it dies.

60 Of thyne auncestres for hire heigh bountee,^o their high goodness
 Which is a strange^o thyng to thy persone. separate
 Thy gentillesse cometh fro God allone.
 Thanne comth oure verray gentillesse of grace;
 It was nothyng biquethe us^o bequeathed to us
 with oure place.^o social position
 65 Thenketh how noble, as seith Valerius,
 Was thilke^o Tullius Hostillius,¹ that
 That out of poverte roos^o to heigh noblesse. rose Reed Senek and redeth eek Boece.²
 Ther shul ye seen expres^o that no drede^o is specifically / doubt 70 That he is gentil that dooth gentil dedis.
 And therfore, leewe housbonde, I thus conclude,
 Al^o were it that myne auncestres weren rude,^o although
 of low birth
 Yet may the hye^o God—and so hope I— high
 Grante me grace to lyven^o vertuously. live
 75 Thanne am I gentil whan that I bigynne^o begin
 To lyven vertuously and weyve synne.^o avoid sin
 And theras^o ye of poverte me repreve,^o since / reproach
 The hye God on whom that we bileeve
 In wilful^o poverte chees^o to lyve his lyf. voluntary / chose 80 And certes, every man, mayden, or wyf
 May understonde that Jesus Hevene kyng^o King of Heaven
 Ne wolde nat chesen^o vicious lyving. choose
 Glad^o poverte is an honeste thyng, certeyn. joyful
 This wole Senec and othere clerkes^o seyn.^o writers / say 85 Whoso that halt hym payd of^o his poverte, satisfied with
 I holde^o hym riche, al^o hadde he nat a sherte. consider / although
 He that coveiteth^o is a povere wight, covets
 For he wolde han that^o is nat in his myght. what
 But he that noght hath ne coveiteth have^o and does not covet
 90 Is riche, although ye holde hym but a knave.
 Verray poverte, it syngeth properly.
 Juvenal³ seith of poverte myrily,^o merrily
 ‘The povre man, whan he goth by the weye,^o along the road
 Bifore the theves he may synge and pleye.’
 95 Poverte is hateful good and, as I gesse,

A ful greet bryngere^o out of bisynesse,^o very great bringer / busyness
 A greet amendere^o eek of sapience^o improver / wisdom
 To hym that taketh it in pacience.^o patience
 Poverte is this, although it seme alenge.^o wretched
 1200 Possessioun that no wight wol chalenge.^o claim
 Poverte ful ofte, whan a man is lowe,
 Maketh^o his God and eek hymself to knowe. causes
 Poverte a spectacle^o is, as thynketh me, lens
 Thurgh^o which he may hise verray^o freendes see. through / true
 1205 And therfore sire, syn that I noght yow greve,^o do not grieve you
 Of my poverte namoore^o ye me repreve. no more
 Now sire, of elde^o ye repreve me, old age
 And certes, sire, thogh noon auctoritee
 Were in no book, ye gentils^o of honour nobles
 1210 Seyn that men sholde an oold wight doon favour^o do honor
 And clepe^o hym fader for youre gentillesse. call
 And auctours^o shal I fynden, as I gesse. authorities
 Now ther^o ye seye that I am foul and old: where
 Than drede^o you noght to been a cokewold.⁴ fear
 1215 For filthe^o and eelde,^o also moot ugliness / old age
 I thee,^o might I thrive
 Been grete wardeyns upon^o chastitee. guardians of
 But natheles, syn I knowe youre delit,^o delight
 I shal fulfille youre worldly appetit.
 Chese now,” quod she, “oon of thise thynges tweye:^o two 1220 To han me foul and old til that I deye
 And be to yow a trewe, humble wyf
 And nevere yow displese^o in al my lyf, displease you
 Or elles^o ye wol han me yong and fair else
 And take youre aventure of the repair
 1225 That shal be to youre hous bycause of me,
 Or in som oother place, may wel be.⁵
 Now chese yourselves wheither that yow
 liketh.^o whichever pleases you
 This knyght avyseth^o hym and sore siketh,^o considers sorely sighs
 But atte laste he seyde in this manere:
 1230 “My lady and my love and wyf so deere,
 I put me in youre wise governance.
 Cheseth youreself which may be moost plesance^o most pleasant
 And moost honour to yow and me also.

¹ Valerius ... Hostillius Tullius Hostillius started life as a peasant and rose to become king. The story is told by the Roman writer Valerius Maximus.

² Senek I.e., Seneca, Stoic philosopher (c. 5 BCE–65 CE); Boece I.e., Boethius. See his Consolation of Philosophy, book 3, prose 6 and meter 3.

³ Juvenal Roman poet and satirist (55–127 CE).

⁴ cokewold I.e., cuckold, a man whose wife has been unfaithful to him.

⁵ And ... be And take your chances of the visiting (i.e., by lovers) at your house, or perhaps in some other places, in order to see me.

I do no fors° the wheither of the two, I do not care 1235 For as yow liketh, it suffiseth me."
 "Thanne have I gete° of yow maistrie,"° gotten / mastery quod she,
 "Syn I may chese and governe as me lest?"° as I wish
 "Ye certes, wyf," quod he, "I holde it best."
 "Kys me," quod she, "we be no lenger wrothe."° angry
 1240 For by my trouthe,° I wol be to yow bothe. truth
 This is to seyn, ye, bothe° fair and good. indeed both
 I prey to God that I moote sterven wood° die crazy
 But° I to yow be also good and trewe unless
 As evere was wyf, syn that the world was newe.
 1245 And but° I be tomorn° as fair to seene unless / tomorrow
 As any lady, emperice,° or queene empress
 That is bitwixe the est and eke the west,
 Dooth° with my lyf and deth right° as yow lest.° do / just / wish Cast up the curtyn. Looke how that it is."

1250 And whan the knyght saugh veraily al this,
 That she so fair was and so yong therto,
 For joye he hente° hire in hise armes two. held
 His herte° bathed in a bath of blisse. heart
 A thousand tyme arewe° he gan hire kisse. in a row
 1255 And she obeyed hym in everythyng
 That myghte doon hym plesance or likyng.° enjoyment
 And thus they lyve unto hir lyves ende
 In parfit° joye. And Jesu Crist us sende perfect
 Housbondes meeke, yonge, and fressh abedde° in bed
 1260 And grace to t'overbyde° hem that we wedde. control
 And eek I pray Jhesu shorte hir lyves° shorten their lives
 That nat wol be governed by hir wyves.
 And olde and angry nygardes° of dispence,° skinflints / spending
 God sende hem soone verray pestilence!

HEERE ENDETH THE WYVES TALE OF BATHE

The Pardoner's Prologue and Tale

The Pardoner calls himself "a full vicious man," yet, paradoxically, his tale is one of the few that has a completely straightforward moral: covetousness is the root of all evil. The tale is actually a popular sermon of the kind that the Pardoner has given so often that he knows it by rote. A story of three men who go in search of death, The Pardoner's Tale has at its core an exemplum, a short and gripping story with a clear moral message. To this exemplum a preacher might add, as the Pardoner does, dramatic denunciations of the Seven Deadly Sins, supported by Biblical quotations, and calls for repentance. Medieval popular preachers were often excellent storytellers, but the level of detail in The Pardoner's Tale goes beyond the needs of any sermon. Like the Miller, the Pardoner is a churl, and their two tales share an interest in the concrete and seamy aspects of daily life, down to such matters as how people rented rooms or poisoned rats. Although the time period is not specified the Pardoner's story captures the brutal joys of the tavern and the grim atmosphere of England in a time of plague, with the death cart making the rounds to retrieve the bodies, as it would have done during the Black Death of 1348–49. The enigmatic old man who cannot die but knows where death is to be found further enriches the basic exemplum.

The Pardoner's greatest modification of a popular sermon, however, is to offer a full commentary on his own art, describing his motivation (simple covetousness) and the various tricks, including blackmail, which he uses to persuade his listeners to buy his spurious relics and pardons. By holding out false promises of salvation, the Pardoner is endangering the souls of others and his own. His character has fascinated readers, perhaps because it is so enigmatic. There has been much discussion of what drives the Pardoner to such extensive self-revelation and why, having just explained his methods to the pilgrims, he is so rash as to make a final sales pitch for his relics. In one much-discussed line in The General Prologue, "I trowe [I believe] he were a gelding [a castrated stallion] or a mare," the narrator indicates that he does not precisely know what to make of the Pardoner, while defining him as other than "masculine." Based on this line and other features of his depiction, some have seen the Pardoner as a tormented outsider, anxious to win group approval, others as a figure of spiritual sterility, corrupted by his own covetousness and in turn corrupting those who listen to him.

Opening page of The Pardoner's Tale, Ellesmere manuscript (detail). (Reprinted by permission of The Huntington Library, San Marino, California.

EL 26 C9 f. 138r.)

Opening page of The Pardoner's Tale, Ellesmere manuscript. (Reprinted by permission of The Huntington Library, San Marino, California. EL 26 C9 f. 138r.)

THE INTRODUCTION TO THE PARDONER'S TALE

THE WORDES OF THE HOOST
TO THE PHISICIEN AND THE PARDONER

Oure Hoost gan to swere° as° he were began to swear / as if wood.° crazy
“Harrow!” quod he. “By nayles and by blood!”¹
This was a fals° cherl° and a fals justice.° false / churl / judge
As shameful deeth° as herte° may devyse° death / heart / imagine
Come to this° false juges° and hire these / judges
advocat!° their lawyers
Algate° this sely° mayde° is slayn°, but / innocent / maid / killed
allas!²
Allas, to deere° boughte she beautee! too dearly
Wherfore° I seye° al day as men may see, therefore / say
That yiftes° of Fortune and of nature gifts
Been° cause of deeth to many a creature. are
Of bothe yiftes that I speke of now Men han ful ofte° moore for harm than have very often
prow.° profit
But trewely°, myn owene maister° deere°, truly / master / dear
This is a pitous° tale for to here.° pitiful / hear
But natheles°, passe over.° Is no nevertheless / let it pass
fors.° matter
I pray to God so save thy gentil cors° noble body
And eek thyne urynals and thy jurdones,³
Thyn ypocras° and eek thy galiones° hypocras / galian (medicines)
And every boyste° ful of thy letuarie.° box / medicine
God blesse hem° and oure Lady, Seint Marie! them
So moot° I theen°, thou art a propre° man might / thrive / fine
And lyk° a prelat°, by Seint Ronyan!⁴ like / prelate (high clergyman)

¹ Harrow ... blood Harrow Help; Nails and blood By Christ's nails and by Christ's blood, i.e., alas. Medieval swearing often referred to parts of Christ's body.

² Harow ... allas The tale told previously, by the Physician, involved an innocent young girl who agrees to let her father kill her in order to save her from the lewd desires of a corrupt judge.

³ urynals Vessels to hold urine; jurdones Jars. These were both part of the equipment medieval doctors used.

⁴ Seint Ronyan There were several medieval saints called St. Ronan—a seventh-century Scottish hermit, a Breton bishop who died in Cornwall, a Scottish bishop who helped settle a dispute about the date of Easter, and an early bishop of Caesarea, whose arm was kept as a relic at Canterbury Cathedral. Most editors state that it was the Scottish hermit to whom the Host refers here, but the last

Seyde I nat wel? I kan nat speke in terme,° in the right jargon
But wel I woot°, thou doost myn herte to know
erme,° make my heart grieve
25 That I almoost have caught a cardynacle.⁵
By corpus bones,° bur° I have triacle⁶ : by God's bones / unless Or elles a draughte° of moyste° and drink / moist corny° ale, malty (strong)
Or but I heere anon° a myrie° tale, immediately / merry
Myn herte is lost for pitee of this mayde.
30 Thou beel amy°, thou Pardoner,” he sayde, good friend
“Telle us som myrthe or japes° right anon.” jokes
“It shal be doon!” quod he, “by Seint Ronyon!
But first,” quod he, “heere at this ale-stake⁷
I wol bothe drynke and eten° of a cake.”° eat / bread
35 And right anon the gentils° gonne° to crye, gentle folk / began “Nay, lat hym telle us of no ribaudye!” ribald story
Telle us som moral thyng that we may leere° learn
Som wit°, and thanne wol we gladly here.” piece of wisdom
“I graunte, ywis,” quod he. “But I moot indeed thynke° must think
40 Upon som honeste thyng° whil that I drynke.” respectable subject

THE PARDONER'S PROLOGUE

HEERE FOLWETH THE PROLOGE OF THE PARDONERS TALE

*Radix malorum est Cupiditas. Ad Thimotheum 6.10*⁸

“Lordynges,” quod he, “in chirches° lords / churches
whan I preche,° preach

Saint Ronan, given his association with Canterbury, seems the most likely reference, for the pilgrims are traveling to the place where his relic was kept. There may also be a pun on runnions (male sexual organs).

⁵ cardynacle The Host means heart attack, though he blunders for the proper word, which is cardiacle.

⁶ triacle Medicine or cordial, usually made primarily from molasses.

⁷ ale-stake Post set up outside a house when the people who lived there had brewed up some ale and were ready to sell it to those passing by.

⁸ Radix ... 6.10 Latin: The root of evils is cupidity. From 1 Timothy 6.10. Cupidity is often translated as avarice, or love of money, but, like the word covetousness, it can also refer to any excessive or sinful love of earthly things.

I peyne me to han° an hauteyn take pains to have speche° dignified speech
 And ryng° it out as round° as gooth a ring / roundly
 belle,° rings a bell
 For I kan° al by rote° that I telle.° know / by memory / say 45 My theme¹ is alwey oon° and evere was: always one
Radix malorum est cupiditas.
 “First I pronounce° whennes° that I come, say / whence
 And thanne my bulles² shewe I alle and some.° one and all
 Oure lige lordes³ seel° on my patente,° seal / license
 50 That shewe I first, my body to warente,° protect
 That no man be so boold,° ne preest ne clerk,⁴ bold
 Me to destourbe° of Cristes hooly werk. disturb
 And after that thanne° telle I forth my tales. then Bulles of popes and of cardynales,° cardinals
 55 Of patriarkes° and bisshopes° I shewe, patriarchs / bishops
 And in Latyn° I speke a wordes fewe Latin
 To saffron with⁵ my predicacioun° preaching
 And for to stire hem° to devocioun. stir them
 Thanne shewe I forth my longe cristal stones,° glass cases
 60 Ycrammed° ful of cloutes° and of bones. crammed / rags
 Relikes been they, as wenen they echoon.° as everyone believes
 Thanne have I in latoun° a sholder boon° brass / shoulder bone
 Which that was of an hooly Jewes sheepe.° holy Jew's sheep
 ‘Goode men,’ I seye, ‘taak of my wordes keepe.’° heed
 65 If that this boon be wasshe° in any welle, washed
 If cow or calf or sheepe or oxe swelle° swell
 That any worm° hath ete° or worm snake / has eaten
 ystonge,° stung
 Taak water of that welle and wassh his tonge,

¹ theme “Text.” Medieval sermons were usually organized around a short passage from the Bible.

² bulles I.e., papal bulls (written documents which put official policy into effect). Pardoners had licenses from the Pope to raise money for charitable causes by selling indulgences (certificates that reduce the number of years the buyer must serve in Purgatory after death).

³ lige lordes The liege lord in question might be the bishop or possibly even the king.

⁴ ne preest ne clerk The term clerk can refer to students, scholars, or assistants to priests (as in The Miller's Tale), so neither priest nor clerk means not a member of the clergy. The parish clergy often regarded wandering preachers as interlopers.

⁵ To saffron with To season with saffron, a very expensive yellow spice imported from the East.

And it is hool° anon. And forthermoor, healthy 70 Of pokkes° and of scabbe° and every soor° pocks / scab / sore
 Shal every sheepe be hool that of this welle Drynketh a draughte. Taak kepe° eek° take heed / also what I telle!
 If that the goode man that the beestes° oweth° beasts / owns Wol every wyke° er° that the cok° hym week / before / rooster
 croweth° crows
 75 Fastynge° drynke of this welle a draughte, while fasting
 As thilke° hooly Jew oure eldres° taughte, that / ancestors
 Hise beestes and his stoor° shal multiplie. possessions
 “And sire, also it heeleth° jalousie. heals
 For though a man be falle° in jalous rage, fallen
 80 Lat maken with this water his potage,° soup
 And nevere shal he moore his wyf mystriste,° mistrust
 Though he the soothe° of hir defaute° truth / default wiste,° knew
 Al had she taken preestes two or thre.⁶
 “Heere is a miteyn° eek that ye may se. mitten
 85 He that his hand wol putte in this mitayn, grain
 He shal have multipliynge of his grayn° wheat / oats
 Whan he hath sowen, be it whete° or otes,° wheat / oats
 So that he offre pens or elles grotes.⁷ “Goode men and wommen, o° thyng warne I yow: one
 90 If any wight° be in this chirche now person
 That hath doon° synne° horrible, that he committed / sin
 Dar nat for shame of it yshryven° be, confessed
 Or any womman, be she yong or old,
 That hath ymaked° hir housbonde cokewold,⁸ made
 95 Swich folk shal have no power ne no grace
 To offren° to my relikes in this place. make an offering
 And whoso fyndeth hym out° of swich finds himself free fame,° (ill-) repute
 They wol come up and offre on° Goddes name, in
 And I assoille hem° by the auctoritee° absolve them / authority
 100 Which that by bulle ygraunted was to me.
 “By this gaude° have I wonne° yeer° trick / gained / year
 by yeer

⁶ Al ... thre Even if she had taken two or three priests as lovers.

⁷ So ... grotes Provided that he offers pennies or else groats (a coin worth fourpence).

⁸ cokewold I.e., cuckold, a man whose wife has committed adultery.

An hundred mark sith I was pardonere.¹
 I stonde lyk a clerk° in my pulpet, cleric
 And whan the lewed peple² is down yset,° settled down
 I preche so as ye han herd bifoore° have heard before
 And telle an hundred false japes° moore. tricks Thanne peyne I me° to strecche° I take pains / stretch forth the nekke
 And est° and west upon the peple° I bekke° east / people / nod
 As dooth a dowve° sittyng on a berne.° sitting / barn
 Myne handes and my tonge goon so yerne° eagerly
 That it is joye to se° my bisynesse.° see / busyness
 Of avarice and of swich cursednesse° cursedness
 Ys° al my prechyng, for to make hem free° is / generous
 To yeven hir pens°—and namely unto me. give their pence
 For myn entente° is nat but for to wynne° intent / profit
 And nothyng° for correccioun° of synne. by no means / correction
 I rekke° nevere whan they been beryed,° care / buried
 Though that hir soules goon a blakeberied!³
 For certes, many a predicacioun° sermon
 Comth ofte tyme of yvel entencioun°— evil intent
 Som for plesance° of folk and flaterye pleasure
 To been avaunced by ypocrisye° hypocrisy
 And som for veyneglorie° and som for hate. pride
 For whan I dar noon oother weyes° debate, in no other way Thanne wol I styng° hym⁴ with my tonge sting
 smerte° sharp
 In prechyng, so that he shal nat asterte° escape
 To been defamed falsly if that he Hath trespassed° to my bretheren or to me. has done harm
 For though I telle noght° his propre° name, not / own Men shal wel knowe that it is the same
 By signes and by othere circumstances.
 Thus quyte° I folk that doon us displeasances.° pay back / offenses
 Thus spitte I out my venym under hewe° guise
 Of hoolynesse, to semen° hooly and trewe. seem 135 “But shortly, myn entente I wol devyse:° describe

 I preche of nothyng but for coveityse.° covetousness Therefore my theme is yet and evere was Radix malorum est cupiditas.
 Thus kan I preche agayn° that same vice against 140 Which that I use, and that is avarice.
 But though myself be guilty in that synne,
 Yet kan I maken oother folk to twynne° turn away
 From avarice and soore° to repente. sorely
 But that is nat my principal entente;° intent
 145 I preche nothyng but for coveitise.° covetousness
 Of this mateere it oghte ynogh suffice.° should be sufficient “Thanne telle I hem ensamples° many examples
 oon° many a one
 Of olde stories longe tyme agoon,° ago
 For lewed peple° loven tales olde; laypeople
 150 Swiche thynges kan they wel reporte and holde.° remember What? Trowe ye,° the whiles I may preche do you believe
 And wynne° gold and silver for I teche,° gain / because I teach
 That I wol lyve in poverté wilfully?° willingly
 Nay, nay! I thoghte it nevere, trewely.
 155 For I wol preche and begge in sondry landes;° different countries
 I wol nat do no labour with myne handes
 Ne make baskettes and lyve therby,
 Bycause I wol nat beggen ydelly.° beg in vain
 I wol noon of the apostles countrefete!⁵
 160 I wol have moneie,° wolle,° chese, and money / wool
 whete,° wheat
 Al° were it yeven° of the povereste page° even if / given / poorest boy
 Or of the povereste wydwe° in a village, widow
 Al sholde hir children sterve° for famyne. die
 Nay, I wol drynke licour of the vyne
 165 And have a joly wenche° in every toun. pretty girl
 But herkneþ,° lordynges, in condusioun: listen
 Youre likyng° is that I shal telle a tale. pleasure
 Now have I dronke a draughte of comy ale,
 By God, I hope I shal yow telle a thyng
 170 That shal by resoun° been at youre liking. with reason
 For though myself be a ful° vicious man, very
 A moral tale yet I yow telle kan,
 Which I am wont° to preche for to wynne. accustomed
 Now hoold youre pees!° My tale I wol bigynne. peace

¹ An ... pardonere A hundred marks equaled over £66, making the Pardoner a wealthy man. In comparison, in 1367 Chaucer was granted an annual pension of 20 marks.

² lewed peple Uneducated, illiterate (in the medieval sense—i.e., unable to read Latin), or simple, but it can also refer to lay people in general. It does not have the modern meaning of sexual offensiveness.

³ a blakeberied Go picking blackberries (i.e., wandering).

⁴ hym I.e., any opponent. Pardoners were much criticized by the parish clergy and by reformers.

⁵ noon ... countrefete In the Gospels and the Book of Acts the apostles were enjoined to live in poverty so as to give surplus goods to the poor.

THE PARDONER'S TALE

HEERE BIGYNNETH THE PARDONERS TALE

175 In Flaundres^o whilom^o was a Flanders / once compaignye^o company
 Of yonge folk that haunteden folye
 As riot, hasard, stywes, and tavernes,¹ Whereas^o with harpes, lutes, and gyternes² where They daunce and pleyen^o at dees^o bothe day and play / dice
 nyght
 180 And eten also and drynken over hir myght,^o capacity
 Thurgh which they doon the devel sacrificise^o sacrifice to the devil
 Withinne that develes temple³ in cursed wise^o manner
 By superfluytee^o abhomynable. excess
 Hir othes^o been so grete and so dampnable^o oaths / damnable
 185 That it is grisly^o for to heere hem swere. horrible
 Oure blised^o Lordes body they to-tere^o — blessed / tear apart
 Hem thoughte that Jewes rente hym noght ynough!⁴
 And ech of hem at otheres synne^o lough.^o sin / laughed
 And right anon thanne comen tombesteres^o female acrobats 190 Fetys^o and smale^o and yonge elegant / slender frutesteres,^o fruit-sellers
 Syngeres with harpes, baudes,^o wafereres,^o pimps / pastry-sellers
 Whiche been^o the verray devels officeres who are
 To kyndle and blowe the fyr of lecherye
 That is annexed unto^o glotonye.^o allied with / gluttony
 195 The Hooly Writ^o take I to my wisesse Bible
 That luxurie^o is in wyn^o and dronkenesse. lust / wine
 Lo how that dronken Looth⁵ unkyndely^o unnaturally
 Lay by hise doghtres^o two unwityngly!^o daughters / unknowingly
 So dronke he was, he nyste^o what he did not know
 wroghte.^o did

200 Herodes,⁶ whoso wel the stories soghte,⁷ Whan he of wyn was replest^o at his feeste,^o most filled / feast
 Right at his owene table he yaf^o his heeste^o gave / command
 To sleen^o the Baptist John ful giltelees.⁸ kill Senec⁹ seith a good word, doutelees.^o doubtless 205 He seith he kan no difference fynde Bitwix^o a man that is out of his mynde between
 And a man which that is dronkelewe,^o often drunk
 But that woodnesse,^o fallen^o in a madness / occurring
 shrewe,^o villain
 Persevereth^o lenger than dooth dronkenesse. lasts
 210 O glotonye, ful of cursednesse,
 O cause first of oure confusioun,
 O original of oure dampnacioun,¹⁰
 Til Crist hadde boght^o us with his blood agayn! redeemed
 Lo how deere,^o shortly for to seyn,^o expensively / say 215 Aboght^o was thilke^o cursed vileynye! purchased / that Corrupt was al this world for glotonye.
 Adam oure fader and his wyf also Fro^o Paradys to labour and to wo^o from / woe
 Were dryven^o for that vice, it is no drede.^o driven / doubt 220 For whil that Adam fasted, as I rede,^o read
 He was in Paradys, and whan that he Eet^o of the fruyt deffended^o on the tree, ate / prohibited
 Anon he was outcast to wo and peyne.
 O glotonye, on thee wel oghte us pleyn!^o complain
 225 O, wiste a man how manye maladyes^o diseases
 Folwen of excesse and of glotonyes,
 He wolde been the moore mesurable^o temperate
 Of his diete, sittyng at his table.
 Allas, the shorte throte,^o the tendre mouth throat
 230 Maketh that^o est and west and north and south, causes
 In erthe, in eir, in water man to swynke^o labor
 To gete a glotoun^o deyntee^o mete^o glutton / delicious / meat and drynke.

¹ Of yonge ... tavernes Of young folk that gave themselves to foolish living, such as loud parties, gambling, brothels, and taverns.

² gyternes Like the harp and the lute, the medieval gittern was a plucked stringed instrument.

³ develes temple I.e., a tavern.

⁴ Hem ... ynough They thought that Jews did not tear him apart enough. The oaths figuratively tore God's body apart, according to the moralists. In the Middle Ages, Jews were usually blamed for Christ's crucifixion.

⁵ Looth I.e., Lot. The story of how Lot, while drunk, made his daughters pregnant is recounted in Genesis 19.30–38.

⁶ Herodes I.e., Herod, King of the Jewish people (74–3 BCE).

⁷ whoso ... soghte As whoever consulted the stories carefully can confirm.

⁸ ful giltelees Entirely guiltless. See Matthew 14.1–12.

Senec I.e., Seneca, Roman playwright, orator, and philosopher (4 BCE–65 CE).

¹⁰ O cause ... dampnacioun A reference to the role of gluttony in causing Adam and Eve to eat the forbidden fruit of the Tree of Knowledge in the Garden of Eden. See Genesis 2–3.

Of this matiere, O Paul,¹ wel kanstow trete:° can you write
 "Mete unto wombe° and wombe eek unto mete:° stomach
 5 Shal God destroyen bothe," as Paulus seith.²
 Allas, a foul thyng is it, by my feith,
 To seye this word, and fouler is the dede Whan man so drynketh of the white and rede,° white and red wine
 That of his throte he maketh his pryvee,° latrine
 Thurgh thilke cursed superfluitee.° excess
 The apostel³ wepyng seith ful pitously,° pitifully
 "Ther walken manye of whiche yow toold have I.° I have told you
 I seye it now wepyng with pitous voys:° pitiful voice
 Ther been° enemys of Cristes croys° are / cross
 45 Of whiche the ende is deeth.° Wombe is hir god."⁴ death
 O wombe, o bely, o stynkyng cod,° stinking bag (stomach)
 Fulfilled of donge° and of corrupcioun, filled with dung
 At either ende of thee foul is the soun!° sound
 How greet labour and cost is thee to fynde.° provide for 50 Thise cookes, how they stampe° and streyne° pound / strain and grynde
 And turnen substaunce into accident⁵
 To fulfillen al thy likerous° talent!° lecherous / inclination
 Out of the harde bones knocke they
 The mary,° for they caste° noght away marrow / throw 55 That may go thurgh the golet° softe and swoote.° throat / sweet
 Of spicerie° of leef and bark and roote spices
 Shal been his sauce ymaked,° by delir° made / through delight
 To make° hym yet a newer appetit. give
 But certes, he that haunteth° swiche delices° follows / delights 60 Is deed whil that he lyveth in tho° vices.⁶ those
 A lecherous thyng is wyn, and dronkenesse

Is ful of stryvyng° and of wrecchednesse. quarreling
 O dronke man, disfigured is thy face!
 Sour is thy breeth! Foul artow° to embrace! are you 265 And thurgh thy dronke nose semeth the soun° the sound seems to come
 As though thou seydest ay° "Sampsoun, Sampsoun!" ever
 And yet, God woot,° Sampsoun drank nevere God knows no wyn!⁷
 Thou fallest as it were a styked swyn.° stuck (i.e., speared) pig
 Thy tonge is lost and al thyn honeste cure.° care
 270 For dronkenesse is verray sepulture° tomb
 Of mannes wit and his discrecioun.
 In whom that drynke hath dominacioun,
 He kan no conseil° kepe, it is no drede.° counsel / doubt
 Now kepe yow fro the white and fro the rede
 275 And namely fro the white wyn of Lepe⁸
 That is to selle° in Fyssh Strete or in Chepe.⁹ for sale
 This wyn of Spaigne° crepeth subtilly Spain
 In othere wyne growynge faste° by,¹⁰ near
 Of which ther ryseth swich fumositee° such vapors
 280 That whan a man hath dronken draughtes thre° three
 And weneth° that he be at hoom° in Chepe, thinks / home
 He is in Spaigne, right at the toune of Lepe—
 Nat at the Rochele ne at Burdeux toun¹¹—
 And thanne wol he seye, "Sampsoun, Sampsoun!"
 285 But herkneth, lordes, o° word, I yow preye, one
 That alle the sovereyn actes, dar I seye,
 Of victories in the Olde Testament
 Thurgh verray° God that is omnipotent true
 Were doon in abstinence and in preyere.
 290 Looketh the Bible, and ther ye may it leere.° learn
 Looke, Atilla¹² the grete conquerour
 Deyde° in his sleepe with shame and dishonour, died

¹ Paul I.e., St. Paul.

² Shal ... seith See 1 Corinthians 6.13.

³ apostel I.e., apostle, here St. Paul.

⁴ Ther walken ... god See Philippians 3.18–19.

⁵ And ... accident This distinction between the basic food and the flavors the cooks give to it draws on Aristotle's distinction between substance (essential inner reality) and its superficial qualities (accidents). This line could be read as an allusion to contemporary philosophical debates between Nominalists and Realists or to contemporary theological controversies concerning the process through which the bread and wine of the Eucharist are transformed into the body and blood of Christ.

⁶ he that ... vices Cf. 1 Timothy 5.6: "But she that lives in pleasure is dead while she lives."

⁷ And yet ... wyn As recounted in Judges 13, in which it is written that Samson's mother did not drink wine during her pregnancy.

⁸ Lepe Town in Spain.

⁹ Fyssh ... Chepe I.e., Fish Street and Cheapside, two market districts in London. Chaucer's father was a wine merchant on Fish Street.

¹⁰ This wyn ... by Expensive French wines, shipped through Bordeaux and La Rochelle, were often surreptitiously mixed with cheaper, but stronger, Spanish wines.

¹¹ the Rochele ... Burdeux toun I.e., La Rochelle and Bordeaux.

¹² Atilla I.e., Attila the Hun, a fifth-century nomadic chieftain who ravaged vast stretches of central Europe. According to medieval histories, such as those of Jordanes and Paul the Deacon, he died from drink on the night that he took a new bride.

Bledyng^o ay at his nose in dronkenesse. bleeding
 A capitayn^o sholde lyve in sobrenesse. leader
 295 And over al this^o avyseth yow^o right wel above all / consider
 What was comaunded unto Lamwel.¹
 Nat Samuel² but Lamwel, seye I.
 Redeth the Bible, and fynde it expresly^o specifically
 Of wyn yevyng^o to hem that han giving wine
 justise.^o have legal power
 300 Namooore of this, for it may wel suffice.
 And now I have spoken of glotonye,
 Now wol I yow deffenden^o hasardrye.^o prohibit / gambling
 Hasard is verray mooder^o of lesynges^o mother / lying
 And of deceite and cursed forswerynges,^o perjury 305 Blasphemying of Crist, manslaughter, and wast^o also wasteful spending
 Of catel^o and of tyme. And forthermo, goods
 It is repreeve^o and contrarie of^o honour reproach / to
 For to ben holde^o a commune hasardour.^o be considered / gambler
 And ever the hyer^o he is of estaat^o higher / condition
 310 The moore is he holden^o desolaat.^o regarded as / vile
 If that a prynce^o useth hasardrye,^o prince / frequently gambles
 In alle governaunce and policye
 He is as by commune opinioun
 Yholde^o the lasse^o in reputacioun. held / less 315 Stilboun,³ that was a wys embassadour,
 Was sent to Cornythe^o in ful greet honour Corinth
 Fro Lacidomye^o to maken hire alliaunce, Sparta
 And whan he cam, hym happed par chaunce⁴
 That alle the gretteste that were of that lond 320 Pleyynge atte hasard he hem fond,
 For which, as soone as it myghte be,
 He stal hym^o hoom agayn to his contree stole away
 And seyde, "Ther wol I nat lese^o my name!
 Ne I wol nat take on me so greet defame^o lose dishonor
 325 Yow for to allie^o unto none hasardours. ally
 Sendeth otherewise^o embassadours. other
 For by my trouthe, me were levere dye^o rather die
 Than I yow sholde to hasardours allye.

For ye that been so glorious in honours
 330 Shul nat allyen yow with hasardours,
 As by my wyl,^o ne as by my tretee."^o will / treaty
 This wise philosophre thus seyde hee.
 Looke eek that to the kyng Demetrius,
 The kyng of Parthes,^o as the book seith^o us,⁵ Parthia / tells 345 Sente him a paire of dees^o of gold in scorn, dice
 For he hadde used hasard ther-biforn,^o often gambled before this
 For which he heeld his glorie or his renoun
 At no value or reputacioun.
 Lordes may fynden oother maner pley^o kinds of amusement 340 Honeste ynough to dryve the day away.
 Now wol I speke of othes^o false and grete oaths
 A word or two, as olde bookes trete.
 Greet sweryng^o is a thyng abhominable, swearing
 And fals sweryng^o is yet moore repreveable.^o perjury / disgraceful
 345 The heighe God forbad sweryng at al,⁶ Witnesse on Mathew, but in special,^o specialy
 Of sweryng seith the hooly Jeremye,^o Jeremiah
 "Thou shalt seye sooth thyne othes^o and nat lye truly your oaths
 And swere in doom^o and eek in rightwisnesse."⁷ judgment
 350 But ydel sweryng is a cursednesse.
 Bihoold and se that in the firste table^o tablet (of Moses)
 Of heighe Goddes heestes^o honorable commandments
 Hou that the seconde heeste of hym^o is this them
 "Take nat my name in ydel or amys."⁸
 355 Lo, rather^o he forbedeth swich earlier (in the commandments)
 sweryng
 Than homycide or any cursed thyng.
 I seye that as by ordre thus it stondeth.^o stands
 This knowen that hise heestes understondeth,⁹
 How that the seconde heeste^o of God is second commandment that.

The kyng ... us King Demetrius of Parthia has not been securely identified, but John of Salisbury tells his story in the Policraticus immediately after that of Chilon.

⁶ The heighe ... al See Matthew 5.34.

Thou ... rightwisnesse See Jeremiah 4.2; rightwisnesse Righteousness.

Take ... amys See Deuteronomy 5.7–21. In the Middle Ages the first two commandments were normally grouped as one, making what is now considered the third commandment the second, as it is here. The tenth commandment was then broken into two to make up the difference; amys In vain.

This ... understondeth Those who understand his commandments know this.

¹ Lamwel I.e., Lemuel, King of Massa, whose mother warns him not to drink wine. See Proverbs 31.4–5.

² Samuel I.e., the prophet Samuel. See 1 Samuel.

³ Stilboun I.e., Chilon, an ambassador who is mentioned in John of Salisbury's Policraticus, 1.5.

⁴ And ... chaunce And when he came, it happened to him by chance.

And forther over,° I wol thee telle al plat° furthermore / plainly
 That vengeance shal nat parten° from his hous depart
 That of his othes° is to° outrageous. oaths / too
 "By Goddes precious herte!" and "By his nayles"¹ nails
 And "By the blood of Crist that is in Hayles,"¹ Sevene is my chaunce and thyn is cynk° and treye!² five / three
 By Goddes armes, if thou falsly pleye,
 This daggere shal thurghout thyn herte go!"° pierce
 This fruyt° cometh of the bicched bones two³— fruit
 Forsweryng,° ire,° falsnesse, homycide. perjury / anger
 Now for the love of Crist that for us dyde,
 Lete° youre othes, bothe grete and smale. leave
 But sires, now wol I telle forth my tale.
 Thise riotours° thre of whiche I telle party-goers
 Longe erst er° prime° rong° of any belle before / early morning / rang
 Were set hem in a taverne to drynke.
 And as they sat, they herde a belle clynke° ring
 Biforn° a cors° was° caried before / corpse / that was being to his grave.
 That oon of hem gan callen to his knave,° servant
 "Go bet,"° quod he, "and axe° redily° quickly / ask / eagerly
 What cors is this that passeth heer forby,
 And looke that thou reporte his name weel."
 "Sire," quod this boy, "it nedeth never a deel."° it is not necessary
 It was me toold er ye cam heer two houres.⁴
 He was, pardee,° an old felawe° of youre, by God / friend
 And sodeynly he was yslayn tonyght.
 For dronke as he sat on his bench upright
 Ther cam a privee theef° men clepeth° Deeth, secret thief / call
 That in this contree al the peple sleeth,
 And with his spere he smoor° his herte atwo° cut / in two
 And wente his wey withouten wordes mo.
 He hath a thousand slayn this pestilence.⁵ during this epidemic

¹ Hayles I.e., Hales Abbey in Gloucestershire, a monastery that claimed to have some of Christ's blood as a relic.

² Sevene ... treye The modern game of craps is a version of medieval hazard, in which the player rolling the dice must call out the numbers he hopes to get.

³ bicched bones two Two cursed bones; i.e., the dice, which were made of bone in the Middle Ages.

⁴ It ... houres It was told to me two hours ago, before you came here.

⁵ Ther cam ... pestilence The reference here is doubtless to plague, the Black Death that spread from Italy across Europe, hit England in 1348, and in the space of a year killed at least a third of the population. There were further outbreaks in 1361–62, 1369, and 1375–76.

And maister, er ye come in his presence,
 Me thynketh that it were necessarie
 For to bewar of swich an adversarie.
 395 Beth° redy for to meete hym everemoore.° be / always Thus taughte me my dame.° I sey namoore."° mother
 "By seinte Marie," seyde this taverner,° tavern keeper
 "The child seith sooth, for he hath slayn this yeer Henne° over a mile withinne a greet° village from here / large 400 Bothe man and womman, child and hyne° hired hand and page.
 I trowe° his habitacioun° be there. believe / dwelling
 To been avysed° greet wysdom it were, warned
 Er° that he dide° a man a dishonour."° lest / cause / harm
 "Ye, Goddes armes," quod this riotour, 405 "Is it swich peril with hym for to meete?
 I shal hym seke by wey° and eek by strete,° road / street
 I make avow° to Goddes digne° bones. a vow / worthy Herkneeth, felawes, we thre been al ones.° are three together
 Lat ech of us holde up his hand til oother,° to the other 410 And ech of us bicomem° otheres brother, become
 And we wol sleen this false traytour, Deeth!
 He shal be slayn, which that so manye sleeth,
 By Goddes dignitee er it be nyght!"
 Togidres° han thise thre hir trouthes plight° together / promised 415 To lyve and dyen ech of hem for oother
 As though he were his owene ybom° brother. born
 And up they stirt° al dronken in this rage. jumped
 And forth they goon towards that village
 Of which the taverner hadde spoke biforn.
 420 And many a grisly° ooth thanne han they sworn, horrible
 And Cristes blessed body they torente.° tear apart (with their oaths)
 Deeth shal be deed, if that they may hym hente!° catch him
 Whan they han goon° nat fully half a mile Right° as they wolde han troden over a stile,⁷ just 425 An oold man and a povre° with hem poor
 mette.° encountered them
 This olde man ful mekely° hem grette° meekly / greeted
 And seyde thus: "Now, lordes, God yow see!"° watch over
 The proudeste of thise riotours three

⁶ han goon Have gone. Chaucer frequently alternates between the simple past (the rioters jumped up, the old man met with them) and the present or the perfect forms (the rioters have gone rather than had gone or went, which we would expect in modern English).

⁷ stile Steps to get over a wall or fence.

- Answerde agayn, "What, carl,^o with sory
 grace!^o peasant
 430 Why artow al forwrapped,^o save thy face? bad luck to you
 Why lyvestow^o so longe in so greet age?" wrapped up
 This olde man gan looke in his visage^o live you
 And seyde thus: "For^o I ne kan nat fynde face
 A man, though that I walked into Ynde,^o because 435 Neither in citee nor in no village, India
 That wolde chaunge his youthe for myn age.
 And therfore moot I han^o myn age stille, I must have
 As longe tyme as it is Goddes wille.
 Ne deeth, allas, ne wol nat han my lyf.
 440 Thus walke I lyk a resteles^o kaityf,^o restless / wretch
 And on the ground which is my moodres^o gate mother's
 I knokke with my staf^o bothe erly and late walking stick
 And seye, 'Leeve^o Mooder, leet me in! dear
 Lo how I vanysshe^o—flessh and blood and skyn! waste away
 445 Allas, whan shul my bones been at reste?
 Mooder, with yow wolde I chaunge my cheste^o money box
 That in my chambre^o longe tyme hath be,^o room / been Ye, for an heyre clowt^o to wrappe me.¹ hair-shirt
 But yet to me she wol nat do that grace,^o favor
 450 For which ful pale and welked^o is my face. withered
 "But sires, to^o yow it is no curteisye in
 To speken to an old man vileynye,^o insults
 But^o he trespasse^o in word or elles in dede. unless / offend
 In Hooly Writ ye may yourself wel rede 455 'Agayns^o an oold man hoor^o upon in the presence of / gray
 his heed
 Ye sholde arise.² Wherefore^o I yeve^o yow therefore / give reed:^o advice
 Ne dooth unto an oold man noon harm now,
 Namooore than that ye wolde^o men did to yow³ desire
 In age—if that ye so longe abyde,^o live long enough
 460 And God be with yow, where^o ye go^o or ryde. wherever / walk
 I moot go thider as^o I have to go." thither where
 "Nay, olde cherl, by God thou shalt nat so!"
 Seyde this oother hasardour^o anon. gambler
 "Thou partest nat^o so lightly, by Seint John! do not get away
- 465 Thou spak right now of thilke traytour Deeth,
 That in this contree^o alle oure freendes sleeth. country
 Have heer my trouthe:^o as thou art his espye,^o on my word / spy
 Telle where he is, or thou shalt it abyde,^o pay for it
 By God and by the hooly sacrament!^o holy sacrament (the Eucharist)
 470 For soothly, thou art oon of his assent^o plot
 To sleen us yonge folk, thou false theef!"
 "Now sires," quod he, "if that ye be so leef,^o desirous
 To fynde Deeth, turne up this croked wey.^o crooked way
 For in that grove I lafte hym, by my fey,^o faith
 475 Under a tree, and there he wole abyde.^o wait
 Noght for youre boost he wole him nothyng hyde.⁴
 Se ye that ook?^o Right there ye shal hym fynde. oak
 God save yow that boghte agayn^o mankynde⁵ redeemed
 And yow amende!"^o Thus seyde this olde man. make you better
 480 And everich^o of thise riotours ran each
 Til he cam to that tree, and ther they founde
 Of floryns^o fyne of gold ycoyned^o rounde florins (coins) / coined Wel ny^o an eighte bussshels, as hem very nearly thoughte.^o it seemed to them
 No lenger thanne^o after Deeth they soughte, then 485 But ech of hem so glad was of that sighte,
 For that the floryns been so faire and brighte,
 That doun^o they sette hem^o by this precious down / themselves
 hoord.^o hoard
 The worste of hem, he spak the firste word.
 "Bretheren," quod he, "taak kepe^o what I seye. pay attention to 490 My wit is greet, though that I bourde^o and pleye. joke
 This tresor hath Fortune unto us yeven^o given
 In myrthe and joliftee^o oure lyf to lyven. jollity
 And lightly^o as it comth, so wol we spende. easily
 Ey, Goddes precious dignitee! Who wende^o expected 495 Today that we sholde han so fair a grace?
 But myghte this gold be caried fro this place
 Hoom to myn hous, or elles unto yours—
 For wel ye woot that al this gold is oures—
 Thanne were we in heigh felicitee.^o great happiness 500 But trewely, by daye it may nat bee.^o not be
 Men wolde seyn that we were theves stronge^o downright thieves
 And for oure owene tresor doon us honge.^o cause us to be hanged
 This tresor moste ycaried be by nyghte

¹ Mooder ... me People in the Middle Ages sometimes wore shirts made of hair, which irritated the body, expecting the pain to gain them spiritual benefit. Here the old man wishes to be buried in such a shirt, exchanging it for the chest that holds his money.

² Agayns ... arise See Leviticus 19.3.

³ Namooore ... yow Cf. the Golden Rule from Matthew 7:12: "So whatever you wish that men would do to you, do so to them."

⁴ Noght ... hyde He will not hide himself in any way because of your boasting.

⁵ God ... mankynde May God, who redeemed mankind (by sending his Son Jesus Christ to die on the Cross), save you.

As wisely and as slyly as it myghte.

Wherefore I rede° that cut° among us alle advise / lots

Be drawe° and lat se wher the cut wol falle, drawn

And he that hath the cut with herte blithe°

happy

Shal renne to towne, and that ful swithe°,

quickly

And brynge us breed and wyn ful prively°

secretly

And two of us shul kepen subtilly°

cleverly

This tresor wel. And if he wol nat tarie°

delay

Whan it is nyght we wol this tresor carie

By oon assent° whereas us thynketh best."

in agreement

That oon of hem the cut° broghte in his fest°

lots / fist

And bad hem drawe and looke where it wol falle.

And it fil on the yongeste of hem alle,

And forth toward the toun he wente anon.

And also soone as that he was gon,

That oon spak thus unto that oother:

"Thow knowest wel thou art my sworn brother;

Thy profit° wol I telle thee anon.

your advantage

Thou woost wel that oure felawe is agon,

And heere is gold, and that ful greet plentee°

a great deal of it

That shal departed° been among us thre.

divided

But natheles, if I kan shape it so,

That it departed were among us two,

Hadde I nat doon a freendes torn° to thee?"

friend's turn

That oother answerde, "I noot hou° that do not know how may be.

He woot how that the gold is with us tweye°

two

What shal we doon? What shal we to hym seye?"

"Shal it be conseil?" seyde the firste shrewe°

our plan / villain

"And I shal tellen in a wordes fewe

What we shal doon and bryngen it wel aboute."

"I graunte," quod that oother, "out of doute°,

without doubt

That by my trouthe I shal thee nat biwreye°" betray

"Now," quod the firste, "thou woost wel we be tweye,

And two of us shul strenger be than oon.

Looke whan that he is set, that right anon

Arys° as though thou woldest with hym pleye,

arise

And I shal ryve° hym thurgh the sydes tweye°

stab / two sides

Whil that thou strogelest° with hym as in game°,

struggle / jest

And with thy daggere, looke thou do the same.

And thanne shal al this gold departed be,

My deere freend, bitwixen me and thee.

Thanne may we bothe oure lustes° all fulfille pleasures

And pleye at dees° right at oure owene wille."

dice

And thus acorded been° thise shrewes tweye

are agreed

To sleen° the thridde, as ye han herd me seye.

kill

This yongeste, which that wente unto the toun,

550 Ful ofte in herte he rolleth up and doun

The beautee of thise floryns newe and brighte.

"O Lord," quod he, "if so were that I myghte

Have al this tresor to myself allone,

Ther is no man that lyveth under the trone°

throne

555 Of God that sholde lyve so murye° as I!"

merry

And atte laste the feend° oure enemy

devil

Putte in his thought that he sholde poyson beye°

buy

With which he myghte sleen° hise felawes tweye,

kill

For why the feend foond hym in swich lyvyng

560 That he hadde leve hym to sorwe brynge.¹

For this was outrelly° his fulle entente, utterly

To sleen hem bothe and nevere to repent.

And forth he gooth—no lenger wolde he tarie—

Into the toun unto a pothecarie°

apothecary

565 And preyde hym that he hym wolde selle

Som poyoun that he myghte hise rattes° quelle°

rats / kill

And eek ther was a polcat in his hawe,

That, as he seyde, hise capouns hadde yslawe.²

And fayn° he wolde wreke hym,° if he gladly / avenge himself

myghte,

570 On vermyne that destroyed° hym by nyghte.

harmed

The pothecarie answerde, "And thou shalt have

A thyng that, also° God my soule save,

as

In al this world ther is no creature

That eten or dronken hath of this confiture°

concoction

575 Noght° but the montance° of a com° of nothing / size / grain

whete,

That he ne shal his lif anon° forlete°

immediately / lose

Ye, sterve° he shal, and that in lasse while°

die / less time

Than thou wolt goon a paas° nat but a mile,

at a walking pace

The poyoun is so strong and violent."

580 This cursed man hath in his hond yhent° taken

This poyoun in a box, and sith° he ran afterwards

Into the nexte strete° unto a man

street

And borwed hym° large botels thre.

borrowed from him

And in the two his poyson poured he.

585 The thridde he kepte clene for his owene drynke.

For al the nyght he shoophe° hym for to swynke°

intended / labor

¹ For why ... brynge Because the devil found him living in such a way (i.e., so sinfully) that he had permission (from God) to bring him to sorrow (i.e., damnation).

² And eek ... yslawe And also there was a polecat (a type of weasel) in his yard that, as he said, had killed his poultry.

- In carynge of the gold out of that place.
 And whan this riotour with sory grace° wretched misfortune
 Hadde filled with wyn hise grete botels thre, 590 To hise felawes agayn repaireth he.
 What nedeth it to sermone° of it moore? talk
 For right so° as they hadde cast° just as / determined
 his deeth bifoore,
 Right so they han hym slayn, and that anon.
 And whan that this was doon, thus spak that oon:° the first 595 "Now lat us sitte and drynke and make us merie,
 And afterward we wol his body berie."° bury
 And with that word it happed hym par cas° by chance
 To take the botel ther the poyssoun was,
 And drank and yaf his felawe drynke also,
 600 For which anon they storven° bothe two. died
 But certes, I suppose that Avycen¹
 Wroot° nevere in no Canoun ne in no fen° wrote / chapter
 Mo wonder° signes° of more terrible / symptoms
 empoisonyng° poisoning
 Than hadde thise wrecches two er hir endyng.° before their death
 605 Thus ended been thise homycides° two murderers
 And eek the false empoysonere° also. poisoner
 O cursed synne of alle cursednesse,
 O traytours° homycide, o wikkednesse, traitorous
 O glotonye, luxurie,° and hasardrye, lust
 610 Thou blasphemour of Crist with vileynye
 And othes grete° of usage° and of pride! great oaths / habit
 Allas, mankynde, how may it bitide° happen
 That to thy creatour, which that the wroghte° who made you
 And with his precious herte blood thee boghte,° redeemed
 615 Thou art so fals and so unkynde,° allas? unnatural
 Now goode men, God foryeve yow youre trespass
 And ware° yow fro the synne of avarice! guard
 Myn hooly pardoun may yow all warice,° save
 So° that ye offre nobles or sterlynges² provided 620 Or elles silver broches, spoones, rynges.
 Boweth youre heed under this hooly bulle.° license
 Com up, ye wyves, offreth of youre wolles;° wool
 Your names I entre heer in my rolle° anon. list
- Into the blisse of Hevene shul ye gon.
 625 I yow assoille° by myn heigh power, pardon
 Yow that wol offer, as clene and eek as cleer
 As ye were born. And lo, sires, thus I preche.
 And Jesu Crist that is oure soules leche° soul's physician
 So graunte yow his pardoun to receyve.
 630 For that is best; I wol yow nat deceyve.
 "But sires, o° word forgat I in my tale. one
 I have relikes and pardoun in my male° pouch
 As faire as any man in Engeland,
 Whiche were me yeven° by the Popes hond.° given / hand
 635 If any of yow wole of devocioun° in devotion
 Offren and han myn absolucioun,
 Com forth anon, and kneleth heere adoun,
 And mekely° receyveth my pardoun. meekly
 Or elles taketh pardoun as ye wende,° go 640 Al newe and fressh at every miles ende,
 So that ye offren alwey newe° and newe anew
 Nobles or pens,° whiche that be goode and trewe.³ pence
 It is an honour to everich° that is heer everyone
 That ye mowe° have a suffisant° pardoneer may / capable 645 T'assoille yow in contree° as ye ryde the country
 For adventures° whiche that may bityde.° accidents / befall
 Paraventure° ther may fallen oon or two perhaps Doun of his hors and breke his nekke atwo.° in two Looke which a seuretee° is it to yow alle guarantee 650 That I am in youre felaweshipe yfalle,° fallen into your company
 That may assoille yow bothe moore and lasse° greater and lesser (of)rank
 Whan that the soule shal fro the body passe.
 I rede° that oure Hoost heere shal bigynne,° advise / begin
 For he is moost enveloped in synne.
 655 Com forth, sire Hoost, and offre first anon,
 And thou shalt kisse my relikes everychon.
 Ye, for a grote unbokle anon thy purs."⁴
 "Nay, nay," quod he, "thanne have I Cristes curs!° curse
 Lat be,"° quod he. "It shal nat be so, thee'ch! leave it be 660 Thou woldest make me kisse thyn olde breech° pants
 And swere it were a relyk of a seint—
 Though it were with thy fundement° depeint!° anus / stained

Avycen I.e., Avicenna or Ibn Sina (980–1037 CE), a Persian philosopher who wrote, among other things, a treatise about medicine entitled Liber Canonis Medicinæ (The Book of the Canon of Medicine). The word Canon in the next line refers to this book. It was divided into chapters called "fens," from the Arabic word for a part of a science.

² nobles or sterlynges Gold and silver coins respectively.

³ Nobles ... trewe Forgery and also the clipping of coins (i.e., shaving off some of the silver or gold from the edges) were major concerns in Chaucer's day.

⁴ Ye ... purs Yes, unbuckle your purse immediately for a groat (fourpenny coin).

But by the croys which that Seint Eleyne¹ fond,
 I wolde I hadde thy coillons° in myn hond testicles
 Inside of relikes or of seintuarie!° reliquaries
 Lat kutte hem of!° I wol with thee hem let them be cut off
 carie.° carry
 They shul be shryned° in an enshrined
 hogges toord!° hog's turd
 This Pardoner answerde nat a word.
 So wrooth° he was, no word ne wolde he seye. angry
 "Now," quod oure Hoost, "I wol no lenger pleye° joke
 With thee ne with noon oother angry man!"
 But right anon the worthy knyght bigan° began Whan that he saugh that al the peple lough,° laughed
 "Namooore of this! For it is right ynough!° quite enough

675 Sire Pardoner, be glad and myrie of cheere.° merry of face
 And ye, sire Hoost, that been to me so deere,
 I prey yow that ye kisse the Pardoner.
 And Pardoner, I prey thee, drawe thee neer,
 And as we diden,° lat us laughe and pleye!" did 680 Anon they kiste and ryden forth hir weye.° their way

HEERE IS ENDED THE PARDONERS TALE

¹ Seint Eleyne I.e., St. Helena, the mother of the fourth-century Roman emperor Constantine. Legend had it that she went to the Holy Land and found there the cross on which Christ was crucified.

The Prioress's Prologue and Tale

The Prioress's Tale belongs to the genre of the miracles of the Virgin, collections of stories recounting the Virgin Mary's dramatic interventions to save people who had shown her particular devotion. These melodramatic stories were enormously popular. In these miracle stories, Jews often figure as villains, and there are several in which they are depicted murdering or trying to murder a Christian child, whom the Virgin rescues or takes to Heaven. One such legend concerned the boy-saint Hugh of Lincoln. The Prioress describes his death as happening "but a little while ago" (line 252), but all Jews had been expelled from England in 1290 and Hugh was in fact killed in 1255.

Chaucer's presentation of this anti-Semitic story, a version of the so-called "blood libel," which accuses Jews of killing Christian children, has troubled modern readers, who have often debated whether Chaucer's own attitudes are to any degree distanced from those of the Prioress. The contrast between the sentimentality she is shown to display in The General Prologue (as a character who weeps if a man beats one of her lap dogs) and the extreme virulence of her hatred of the Jews—who are punished more savagely at the end of her tale than in other versions of the story—might suggest a narrative distancing. On the other hand, The Prioress's Tale was popular in the fifteenth century, and was copied separately in several manuscripts, with no reference to The General Prologue; the opening Hymn to the Virgin, the Alma redemptoris, is set above any possible parody; the Man of Law is no less hostile to Islam; and there are anti-Semitic lines in The Parson's Tale as well. In short, it is difficult not to think it likely that Chaucer shared substantially in the anti-Semitism that was so prevalent in fourteenth-century England.

Also of interest is the style of The Prioress's Tale. Written in rhyme-royal stanzas, and drawing on the language of the liturgy, it has moments of stately elegance, as the Prioress employs a high rhetorical style in formal praise of the Virgin. But it also contains lurid details of the murder and the disposal of the body in a privy which seem at odds with the Prioress's courtly manners.

The relation between the teller and the tale has attracted much critical attention. The Prioress clearly identifies with the innocent little clergeon, who is absolute in his devotion to the Virgin, even to the point of neglecting his education. His faith, like hers, is child-like in its innocence, or so she would have us believe. The tale can perhaps be explained as Chaucer's exploration of a particular kind of devotional story, the emotionally charged saint's life or miracle of the Virgin, which was immensely popular in his day.

Detail of the opening page of The Prioress's Tale, Ellesmere manuscript. (Reprinted by permission of The Huntington Library, San Marino, California. EL 26 C9 f. 148v.)

THE PRIORESS'S PROLOGUE

BIHOOLD THE MURIE WORDES OF THE HOOST TO THE SHIPMAN AND TO THE LADY PRIORESSE

- “Wel seyde,° by corpus dominus,¹ quod° well said / said
oure Hoost.° host
“Now longe moote° thou saille° by the cost,° may / sail / coast
Sire gentil° maister,° gentil maryneer!° noble / master / mariner God yeve° this monk a thousand last quade give yeer!° cart-loads of bad years
5 Aha, felawes,° beth war° of swich° a fellows / beware / such jape!° joke
The monk putte in the mannes hood an ape,²
And in his wyves° eek,° by Seint wife's / also Austyn!° St. Augustine Draweth° no monkes moore unto youre take in.° into your house
“But now passe over,° and lar° us seke° aboute on / let / seek 10 Who shal now telle first of al° this route° all / company
Another tale.” And with that word he sayde
As curteisly° as it had been a mayde,° courteously / maid (speaking)
“My Lady Prioress, by youre leve,° leave
So that I wiste° I sholde yow nat knew greve,° would not distress you 15 I wolde demen° that ye tellen sholde° would judge / should tell
A tale next, if so were that ye wolde.
Now wol° ye vouchesauf,° my lady deere?”° will / agree / dear “Gladly,” quod she, and seyde° as ye shal heere.° said / hear

EXPLICIT³

¹ corpus dominus Incorrect Latin: “the Lord’s body”; a reference to the sacrament of the Eucharist, in which the communion bread was transubstantiated into Christ’s body.

² The ... ape Literally, “The monk put an ape in the man’s hood.” I.e., he made a fool of him (to “put an ape” was an expression meaning “to fool”).

³ EXPLICIT Latin: Here it ends.

THE PROLOGUE OF THE PRIORESS'S TALE

*Domine Dominus noster*⁴

- “O Lord, oure Lord, thy name how merveillous° marvelous 20 Is in this large world ysprad,°” quod she. spread about
“For noght oonly° thy laude° precious not only / praise
Parfourned° is by men of dignitee, proclaimed
But by the mouth of children thy bountee° goodness
Parfourned is, for on the brest° soukyng° breast / sucking
25 Somtyme° shewen° they thyn heriynge.° sometimes / show / praise
Wherefore° in laude, as I best kan° or may, therefore / know how
Of thee and of the lylle flour° lily flower
Which that° thee bar° and is a mayde° who / bore you / virgin always,⁵
To telle a storie I wol do my labour—
30 Nat that I may encreessen° hir honour, increase
For she herself is honour and the roote° root
Of bountee, next hir sone, and soules boote.⁶
O mooder° mayde,° o mayde mooder mother / maid
free,° noble
O bussh unbrent, brennyng in Moyses sighte,⁷ 35 That ravysedest° doun° fro° snatched / down / from the Deitee,
Thurgh thyn humblesse, the goost that in th’alighte,⁸
Of whos vertu whan he thyn herte lighte⁹

⁴ Domine Dominus noster Latin: “O Lord, our Lord.” These are the first words of Psalm 8, which the Prioress paraphrases in the first stanza of her Prologue.

⁵ lylle ... always In medieval iconography, the Virgin Mary is presented with a lily, a symbol of her purity, by the angel Gabriel during the Annunciation of the birth of Christ.

⁶ Of ... boote Of goodness, next to her son, and the soul’s help.

⁷ O ... sighte O unburned bush, burning in Moses’s sight. The reference is to the encounter Moses has in Exodus 3 with God in the form of a burning bush that is unconsumed by the fire. This became a popular image for Mary, who preserved her virginity despite being a mother.

Thurgh ... alighte Through your humility, the spirit that alighted in you.

⁹ Of ... lighte Of whose power when he illumined your heart.

Conceyved^o was the Fadres sapience,¹ conceived
 Helpe me to telle it in thy reverence.^o for your honor

Lady, thy boun tee,^o thy magnificence,^o goodness / majesty
 Thy vertu,^o and thy grete humylitee^o power / great humility
 Ther may no tonge expresse in no science.^o whatever its knowledge

For somtyme,^o Lady, er^o men praye to thee, sometimes / before
 Thou goost biforn^o of thy benyngnytee^o anticipate / goodness
 And getest us thurgh lyght^o of thy preyere^o light / prayer
 To gyden^o us unto thy Sone^o so deere. guide / Son

My konnyng^o is so wayk,^o o blisful^o ability / weak / blessed queene,

For to declare thy grete worthynesse,
 That I ne may the weighte^o nat sustene,^o the weight / not sustain
 But as a child of twelf monthe oold or lesse
 That kan unnethe^o any word expresse,^o can scarcely / pronounce Right^o so fare I. And therfore I yow preye,^o just / pray you Gydeth my song that I shal of yow seye."^o tell of you

EXPLICIT

THE PRIORESS'S TALE

HEERE BIGYNNETH THE PRIORESSES TALE

Ther was in Asye² in a greet cite^o great city
 Amonges Cristene^o folk a Jewerye^o Christian / Jewish quarter
 Sustened^o by a lord of that contree^o sustained / country

For foul usure^o and lucre^o of vileynye,³ interest (rates) / profit
 Hateful to Crist and to his compaignye.^o company (i.e., Christians)
 And thurgh this strete^o men myghte ride or wende,^o street / go
 For it was free and open at eyther ende.

A litel scole^o of Cristen folk ther stood little school
 Doun at the ferther ende, in which ther were Children an heepe^o ycomen^o of Cristen many children / come blood,

That lerned in that scole yeer by yeer
 Swich manere doctrine^o as men used there. such kind of teaching
 This is to seyn, to syngen^o and to rede,^o sing / read
 As smale children doon in hire childhede.^o their childhood

Among thise^o children was a wydwe sone,^o these / widow's son
 A litel clergeoun⁴ seven yeer of age,
 That day by day to^o scole was his wone.^o to [go to] / custom
 And eek also whereas^o he saugh^o where / saw th'ymage^o the image
 Of Cristes mooder, he hadde in usage,^o he had the habit
 As hym was taught, to knele adoun and seye
 His Ave Marie⁵ as he goth by the weye.^o goes along the road

Thus hath this wydwe hir litel sone ytaught^o taught
 Oure blisful lady, Cristes mooder deere,
 To worshipe ay.^o And he forgat it naught,^o always / not
 For sely^o child wol alday soone leere.^o innocent / learn
 But ay^o whan I remembre on this mateere, ever
 Seint Nicholas⁶ stant^o evere in my presence, stands
 For he so yong to Crist dide^o reverence. did

¹ Fadres sapience Father's wisdom (i.e., Christ). Although each member of the Christian Trinity is equal, they are often associated with particular qualities. Christ, the word or logos, is associated with wisdom; the Father with power, and the Holy Spirit with love.

² Asye Asia. In the Middle Ages, the geographical term "Asia" meant Asia Minor, which today is the country of Turkey and part of northern Greece. All Jews were expelled from England in 1290. In Chaucer's day there were some Jews living in France (from which they were expelled first in 1306 and again in 1394), some in central and eastern Europe, the Balkans and Asia Minor. There were also significant Jewish communities in Spain, Italy, North Africa, and the Middle East.

³ For ... vileynye In the Middle Ages, the Church prohibited Christians from lending money at interest. Such commerce, increasingly necessary for the economy of the time, was engaged in by the few non-Christian peoples of Europe, especially the Jews. See the section on "Religious and Spiritual Life" elsewhere in this volume for a further discussion of this issue.

⁴ clergeoun Term meaning pupil but also choir boy. Young boys often served in choirs in exchange for education.

⁵ Ave Marie Latin: "Hail Mary," the words of the angel Gabriel to the Virgin at the Annunciation. His speech was set to music and frequently sung in church services in the Middle Ages.

⁶ Seint Nicholas Fourth-century bishop of Myra in Asia Minor who became the patron saint of children. His legend maintained that as an infant he fasted on Wednesdays and Fridays by refusing his mother's breast-milk.

- This litel child, his litel book lernynge,^o learning
 As he sat in the scole at his prymer,^o primer (school book)
 He *Alma redemptoris*¹ herde synge^o heard being sung 85 As children lerned hire^o antiphoner.² their
 And as he dorste,^o he drough hym^o dared / drew himself
 ner^o and ner nearer
 And herkned ay^o the wordes and the ever listened (to) noote^o melody
 Til he the firste vers koude^o al by rote.^o knew / by heart
- Noght wiste he^o what this Latyn was to he did not know
 seye,^o meant
 90 For he so yong and tendre was of age.
 But on a day his felawe^o gan he preye^o his friend / he began to ask
 T'expounden hym^o this song in his langage, to explain to him
 Or telle hym why this song was in usage;
 This preyde he hym to construe^o and declare translate 95 Ful often tyme^o upon hise knowes^o bare. very often / knees
- His felawe, which that elder was than he,
 Answerde hym thus: "This song, I have herd seye,^o heard said
 Was maked of^o oure blisful lady free,^o made for / noble
 Hir to salue^o and eek hire for to preye honor
 100 To been^o oure helpe and socour^o whan we deye.^o be / aid / die
 I kan namoore expounde in this mateere.
 I lerne song; I kan^o but smal^o grammeere." know / little
- "And is this song maked^o in reverence^o made / honor
 Of Cristes mooder?" seyde this innocent.
 105 "Now, certes,^o I wol do my diligence^o certainly / will work hard
 To konne^o it al er Cristemas is went,^o learn / has passed
 Though that I for my prymer shal be shent³
 And shal be beten^o thries^o in an houre. beaten / three times
 I wol it konne,^o oure Lady for to honoure." will learn it
- 110 His felawe taughte hym homward prively⁴
 Fro day to day, til he koude it by rote.
 And thanne he song^o it wel and boldly sang Fro word to word, acordynge with the note.^o according to the melody
 Twies^o a day it passed thurgh his throte, twice 115 To scoleward^o and homward whan he wente; towards school
 On Cristes mooder set was his entente.
- As I have seyde, thurghout^o the Juerie throughout
 This litel child, as he cam to and fro,
 Ful murily^o wolde he synge and crie merrily
 120 O Alma redemptoris everemo.
 The swetnesse his herte perced^o so pierced
 Of Cristes mooder, that to hire^o to preye her
 He kan nat stynte^o of syngyng^o by the weye. cannot stop / singing
- Oure firste foo,^o the serpent Sathanas,^o foe / Satan
 125 That hath in Jues herte^o his waspes^o nest Jewish hearts / wasp's
 Up swal^o and seide, "O Hebrayk peple,^o alas! swelled up
 Hebrew people
 Is this to yow^o a thyng that is honest,^o you / respectable
 That swich a boy shal walken as hym lest^o wishes
 In youre despit,^o and synge of swich scorn of you sentence^o subject
 130 Which is agayn^o oure lawes reverence?" against
- Fro thennes^o forth the Jues han^o conspired thence / have
 This innocent out of this world to chace.^o chase
 An homycide^o therto han they hyred murderer
 That in an aleye^o hadde a privee^o place, alley / secret 135 And as the child gan forby for to pace,^o to pass by
 This cursed Jew hym hente^o and heeld hym faste grabbed
 And kitte^o his throte and in a pit hym caste.^o cut / threw
- I seye^o that in a wardrobe^o they hym threwe, say / latrine
 Whereas^o thise Jewes purgen^o hire where / empty
 entaille.^o bowels
 140 O cursed folk of Herodes⁵ al newe,
 What may youre yvel^o entente^o yow availle? evil / intent
 Mordre wol out! Certeyn, it wol nat faille,

¹ Alma redemptoris I.e., "Alma redemptoris mater" (Latin: Gracious mother of the redeemer), an antiphon used in church services in the Middle Ages during Advent.

² antiphoner Book containing the words and music of antiphons like Alma Redemptoris.

Though ... shent Although I shall be punished for [neglecting] my school book. Corporal punishment was the norm in medieval schools for students who were slow at learning their lessons.

⁴ His ... prively On the way home, his friend taught him privately.

⁵ O ... Herodes In Matthew 2.1–18, Herod causes all the children of the region to be murdered in his effort to kill the baby Jesus.

And namely, ther th'onour of God shal sprede.¹

The blood out crieth° on youre cursed dede! cries out

45 O martir° sowed° to virginitee, martyr / united Now maystow° syngen, folwyng evere in may you
oon° following ever in unity

The white Lamb celestial,² quod she,³
Of which the grete evaungelist Seint John
In Pathmos wroot,⁴ which seith that they that goon° go
150 Biforn this Lamb and syng a song al newe
That nevere fleshly° wommen they ne knewe.⁵ carnally

This povre wydwe awaiteth° al that nyght waits
After hir litel child. But he cam noght.° did not come
For which, as soone as it was dayes lyght, 155 With face pale of drede° and bisy thought° for fear / hectic thoughts
She hath at scole and elleswhere hym soght,
Til finally she gan so fer espie,° found out this much
That he last seyn was in the Juerie.

With moodres picee° in hir brest enclosed, mother's pity
160 She gooth as she were half out of hir mynde
To every place where she hath supposed
By likihede° hir litel child to fynde. it likely
And evere on Cristes mooder meeke and kynde
She cride. And atte laste thus she wroghte:° did thus 165 Among the cursed Jues she hym soghte.

She frayneth,° and she preyeth pitously° asks / begs pitifully
To every Jew that dwelte in thilke place
To telle hire if hir child wente oght forby.° by at all
They seyde nay, but Jesu of his grace

¹ Mordre... sprede Murder will come to light. Certainly, it will not fail, and especially wherever the honor of God shall spread.

² Lamb celestial Heavenly lamb. The reference is to Revelation 14.1–5, in which Christ appears as the Lamb of God.

³ she I.e., the Prioress. This line-filler reinforces momentarily the fiction that the Prioress is telling this tale on the road to Canterbury.

⁴ Of which... wroot The writer of Revelation identifies himself as John, who was exiled for his faith on the island of Patmos off the coast of Turkey, where he had the visions that form the basis of the book of Revelation.

⁵ That... knewe Reference to the virginity of those who praise the Lamb.

170 Yaf in hir thought inwith a litel space,⁶
That in that place after hir sone she cryde,
Where he was casten in a pit bisyde.° nearby

O grete God, that parfournest° thy laude° proclaims / praise
By mouth of innocentz, lo heere° thy myght! behold here
175 This gemme° of chastite, this emeraude,° gem / emerald
And eek of martirdom° the ruby bright, martyrdom
Ther° he with throte ykorven° lay where / cut upright,° on his back
He Alma redemptoris gan to syng
So loude that al the place gan to ryngel!

180 The Cristene folk that thurgh° the strete wente through
In coomen° for to wondre upon this thyng, came
And hastily they for the provost⁷ sente.
He cam anon withouten taryng° delay
And herieth° Crist that is of Hevene kyng praises
185 And eek his mooder, honour of mankynde,
And after that the Jewes leet he° he commanded bynde.° to be bound

This child with pitous lamentacioun
Up taken° was, syngynge his song alway, lifted up
And with honour of greet processioun
190 They carien hym unto the nexte abbay.° nearest monastery
His mooder swownynge° by his beere° lay. fainting / bier
Unnethe° myghte the peple that was theree scarcely
This newe Rachel⁸ brynge fro his beere.

With torment° and with shameful deeth° torture / death
echon,° each one
195 This provost dooth° the Jewes for to sterve,° causes / die
That of this mordre wiste,° and that anon.° knew / immediately
He nolde° no swich cursednesse° would not / villainy observe.° tolerate
Yvele° shal he have that yvele wol deserve! evil

⁶ Yaf... space Brought to her mind within a little while.

⁷ provost Medieval judge who oversaw legal matters within a town.

⁸ This newe Rachel Reference to Matthew 2.18, which quotes Jeremiah 31.15: "Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, because they are not." Rachel, according to Matthew, is a metaphor for the Jewish mothers whose children were slaughtered by Herod.

Therfore with wilde hors^o he dide hem horses
 drawe,^o had them drawn 200 And after that he heng^o hem by^o the lawe. hanged / according to

Upon this beere ay lith^o this innocent ever lies
 Biforn^o the chief auter^o while the masse^o laste, before / altar / mass
 And after that the abbot with his covent^o group of monks
 Han sped^o hem for to burien^o hym ful faste. have hurried / bury 205 And when they hooly water on hym caste, Yet spak^o this child whan spreyn^o was spoke / sprinkled
 hooly water
 And song^o O alma redemptoris mater. sang

This abbot, which that was an hooly man,
 As monkes been^o or elles oghte be, are 210 This yonge child to conjure he bigan^o. began to call upon
 And seyde, "O deere child, I halse^o thee ask
 In vertu of the Hooly Trinitee,
 Tel me what is thy cause for to synge,
 Sith that thy throte is kut, to my semyng^o." as it seems to me

215 "My throte is kut unto my nekke boon,"^o neck-bone
 Seyde this child, "and as by wey^o of kynde^o way / nature
 I sholde have dyed, ye,^o longe tyme agon.^o yes / ago
 But Jesu Crist, as ye in bookes fynde,
 Wil^o that his glorie laste and be in mynde,^o wishes / remembered 220 And for the worshippe of his mooder deere,
 Yet may I synge O alma loude and cleere.

"This welle^o of mercy, Cristes mooder sweete, well (source)
 I loved alwey, as after my konnyng^o.^o according to my knowledge
 And whan that I my lyf sholde forlete,^o have lost 225 To me she cam and bad^o me for to synge commanded
 This anthephen^o verrailly^o in my antiphon / truly
 deyng^o,^o dying
 As ye han herd. And whan that I hadde songe,
 Me thoughte she leyde a greyn^o upon my tonge. grain

"Wherfore I synge, and synge I moot, certeyn, 230 In honour of that blisful mayden free,^o noble maiden
 Til fro my tonge of taken^o is the greyn. taken off
 And afterward thus seyde she to me:

'My litel child, now wol I fecche^o thee fetch Whan that the greyn is fro thy tonge ytake.^o taken 235 Be nat agast.^o I wol thee nat forsake!' not afraid

This hooly monk, this abbot, hym meene I,^o I mean him
 His tonge out caughte^o and took away the greyn, pulled out
 And he yaf^o up the goost ful softly.^o gave / very quietly
 And whan this abbot hadde this wonder seyn,^o seen 240 Hise salte teeris^o trikked down as reyn,^o salty tears / rain
 And gruf^o he fil^o al plat^o upon the grounde, on his face / fell / flat
 And stille he lay as he had leyn ybounde.^o lain bound

The covent eek lay on the pavement,
 Wepyng and heryng Cristes mooder deere.
 245 And after that they ryse and forth been went^o are gone away
 And taken away this martir from his beere,
 And in a temple of marbul stones cleere
 Enclosen they his litel body sweete.
 Ther he is now, God leve^o us alle for to meete! allow

250 O yonge^o Hugh of Lyncoln,¹ slayn also young
 With^o cursed Jewes, as it is notable,^o by / well known
 For it is but a litel while ago,
 Preye eek for us, we synful folk unstable,^o unsteadfast
 That of his mercy God so merciable^o merciful
 255 On us his grete mercy multiplie
 For reverence of his mooder Marie. Amen.

HEERE IS ENDED THE PRIORESSES TALE

¹ Hugh of Lyncoln Child supposedly murdered by Jews in 1255. He was one of the two principal saints associated with Lincoln, a town midway up England's east coast. In 1386 Henry, Earl of Derby (John of Gaunt's son by his first wife and the future Henry IV), became a member of the fraternity of Lincoln Cathedral, to which Edward III and John of Gaunt already belonged. Chaucer's wife Philippa, who was a member of the household of John of Gaunt's wife, Constance or Constanza of Castille, also became a member of the fraternity at the same ceremony. Chaucer may have had a special interest in Hugh of Lincoln because of this connection to the Cathedral's fraternity, although he was not a member himself.

The Nun's Priest's Prologue and Tale

In the full Canterbury Tales this tale is preceded by The Monk's Tale, in which the Monk recites a long list of tragedies, which for him are simply stories of those who have fallen suddenly from great rank. This wearies the Knight, who interrupts him. When the Monk refuses to tell stories of hunting instead, the Host calls peremptorily upon the Nun's Priest. The Nun's Priest, who is not even described in the General Prologue, is at first almost a nonentity. By the end of his tale, however, he will have won whole-hearted admiration, at least from the rather undiscerning Host, whose response (also included here) is contained in a passage that does not appear in the Ellesmere Manuscript.

The tale offered by the Nun's Priest is a beast fable of the kind told by Aesop. It revolves around animals who are all too human in their follies, and it teaches a clear moral lesson: beware of flatterers. The Nun's Priest expands on this simple structure, beginning with a rich rhetorical evocation of the rooster Chauntecleer's crowing, which he contrasts to the austere life of the poor widow who owns him. The tale then moves into an elaborate debate on dream lore, in which the hen Pertelote speaks for the materialist for whom dreams are the result of indigestion, and Chauntecleer for those who see them as veiled prophecies. This debate alone takes up nearly half the lines in the tale. Throughout, the tale fluctuates between a world in which Chauntecleer and Pertelote are aristocratic lovers and a world in which they are just barnyard fowl. Much of the comedy lies in the elaborate rhetorical language, which is both celebrated and mocked. The Nun's Priest is clearly a master of this art, and it is typical of the tale's comic approach to the eloquence it proudly displays that he should invoke Geoffrey of Vinsauf and his basic textbook on rhetoric. This is a work that, while it is several steps up on Pertelote's only written authority, an elementary grammar drawn from the moral writings of Cato, is scarcely sophisticated. For all its comedy, the tale contains one of Chaucer's grimmest and most pointed historical references, to the rebels in 1381 who hunted down and murdered Flemish weavers.

The Nun's Priest ends by suggesting that the tale exists only for its moral, the fruit, and that we should discard the story, the chaff. All that is written, he tells us, is written for our doctrine, a line Chaucer repeats in his Retraction. But the Nun's Priest also tells us that his story is as true as that of Lancelot de Lake (line 445), that he speaks only in game (line 495), and that when he criticizes women his words are those of Chauntecleer (line 498). Filled with references to books and sayings, such as Chauntecleer's comment that "Mulier est hominis confusio" (Latin: Woman is man's confusion, line 397), that are misrepresented or otherwise untrustworthy, the tale does not allow such an easy distinction between literary art and moral content.

Opening page of The Nun's Priest's Tale, Ellesmere manuscript (detail).

(Reprinted by permission of The Huntington Library, San Marino, California. EL 26 C9 f. 179r.)

Opening page of The Nun's Priest's Tale, Ellesmere manuscript. (Reprinted by permission of The Huntington Library, San Marino, California. EL 26 C9 f. 179r.)

THE NUN'S PRIEST'S PROLOGUE

HEERE STYNTETH THE KNYGHT THE MONK OF HIS TALE¹

THE PROLOGE OF THE NONNES PREESTES TALE

“Hoo,”^o quod^o the Knyght, “good sire, whoa / said namoore^o of this! no more
 That ye han seyð is right ynough, ywis,²
 And muchel moore,^o for litel much more hevynesse^o a little heaviness
 Is right ynough^o to muche folk,^o I gesse. enough / many people
 I seye^o for me it is a greet disese,^o say / great discomfort
 Whereas^o men han been in greet welthe^o and where / wealth
 ese,^o ease
 To heeren^o of hire^o sodeyn fal,^o allas! hear / their / sudden fall
 And the contrarie^o is joye and greet solas,^o contrary / comfort
 As whan a man hath been in povre^o estaat,^o poor / condition
 And clymbeth^o up, and wexeth^o fortunate, climbs / grows
 And there abideth^o in prosperitee. remains Swich^o thyng is gladsom,^o as it such a / pleasant
 thynketh^o me, seems to
 And of swich thyng were goodly for to telle.”
 “Ye,”^o quod oure Hoost, “by Seint Poules belle,³ yes
 Ye seye right sooth.^o This Monk, he clappeth truth
 lowed.^o chatters loudly
 He spak how Fortune covered with a clowde^o cloud
 I noot^o nevere what, and also of a tragedie know not Right now ye harde,^o and, pardee,^o no heard / by God
 remedie^o remedy
 It is for to biwaille^o ne^o compleyne^o bewail / nor / lament
 That that^o is doon,^o and als^o it is a which / done / also peyne,^o pain
 As ye han seyð, to heere of hevynesse.^o sadness
 “Sire Monk, namoore of this, so God yow blesse!
 Youre tale anoyeth al this compaignye.
 Swich talkyng is nat worth a boterflye!^o butterfly
 For therinne is ther no desport^o ne game. sport

Wherefore,^o sire Monk, daun^o Piers by therefore / sir
 youre name,
 I pray yow hertely^o telle us somewhat elles.^o heartily / something else
 For sikerly, nere^o clynkyng^o of youre were it not for / clinking
 belles
 That on youre bridel^o hange on every syde, bridle
 By Hevene Kyng^o that^o for us alle the King of Heaven / who dyde,^o died
 I sholde er^o this han^o fallen doun for sleepe, before / have Althogh the slough^o had never been so deepe. mud
 Thanne hadde youre tale al be^o toold in veyn.^o been / vain
 For certainly, as that thise clerkes seyn,^o these scholars say
 Whereas^o a man may have noon^o audience, where / no
 Noght helpeth it^o to tellen his sentence.^o it is of no use / meaning
 And wel I woot, the substance is in me
 If anythyng shal wel reported be.⁴
 Sire, sey^o somewhat of huntyng, I yow preye.” tell us “Nay,” quod this Monk, “I have no lust^o to desire playe.^o play
 Now lat^o another telle as I have toold.” let Thanne spak oure Hoost with rude speche^o rough speech and boold^o bold
 And seyde unto the Nonnes Preest^o Nun's Priest
 anon,^o immediately
 “Com neer, thou Preest. Com hyder,^o thou sire John!⁵ here
 Telle us swich thyng as may oure hertes glade.^o gladden
 Be blithe,^o though thou ryde upon a jade.^o happy / bad horse
 What thogh^o thyn hors be bothe foul and lene?^o though / lean
 If he wol serve thee, rekke nat a bene!^o do not care a bean
 Looke that thyn herte be murie^o everemo.” merry “Yis sire,” quod he, “yis, Hoost, so moot I go.^o as I may go
 But^o I be myrie, ywis,^o I wol be blamed.” unless / indeed
 And right anon his tale he hath attamed,^o has begun
 And thus he seyde unto us everichon,^o everyone
 This sweete preest, this goodly man, sire John.

EXPLICIT⁶

¹ HEERE ... TALE Here the Knight stops the Monk from telling his tale. The Monk's tragic tale recounted the fall of numerous people from greatness to wretchedness and misery.

² That ... ywis What you have said is quite enough, indeed.

³ Seint Poules belle I.e., the bell of St. Paul's Cathedral in London.

⁴ the substance ... be Either I have the stuff (substance) in me (i.e., the power) to understand if a story is well told, or possibly, if a story is well told, I know when I have grasped the substance of it.

⁵ thou sire John The Host addresses the Nun's Priest with the familiar thou, not the polite you that he uses for the Knight, the Monk, or most of the other gentle folk.

⁶ EXPLICIT Latin: Here it ends.

THE NUN'S PRIEST'S TALE

HEERE BIGYNNETH THE NONNES PREESTES TALE OF THE COK AND HEN, CHAUNTECLEER AND PERTELOTE

55 A povre° wydwe° somdeel° poor / widow / somewhat stape° in age advanced
 Was whilom° dwellyng° in a narwe° cottage once / living / small Biside° a grene¹ stondynge° in a dale. beside / standing
 This wydwe of which I telle yow my tale, Syn° thilke° day that she was last a wyf since / that 60 In pacience ladde° a ful° symple lyf, led / very
 For litel° was hir catel° and hir rente.° little / possessions / income
 By housbondrie° of swich° as God frugal use / such hire° sente her
 She foond° himself and eek° hir provided for / also doughtren° two. daughters
 Thre° large sowes hadde she and namo°, three / no more 65 Thre keen°, and eek a sheepe that highte° cows / was called Malle.
 Ful sooty was hir bour° and eek hir halle° bedroom / hall
 In which she eet° ful many a sklendre meel.° ate / meager meal
 Of poynaunt° sauce hir neded never a deel;° spicy / portion
 No deyntee° morsel passed thurgh hir throte.° dainty / throat
 70 Hir diete was accordant to hir cote.° in accord with her cottage
 Repleccioun° ne made hire nevere sik.° gluttony / sick
 Attempree° diete was al hir phisik,° temperate / medical remedy
 And excercise and hertes suffisaunce.° heart's content
 The goute lette hire nothyng for to daunce,² 75 N'apoplexie° shente° nat hir heed.° nor stroke / harmed / head
 No wyn ne drank she, neither whit ne reed.
 Hir bord° was served moost with whit and blak— table
 Milk and broun breed, in which she foond no lak,³ Seynd bacoun° and somtyme an cy° or smoked bacon / egg tweye.° two
 80 For she was, as it were, a maner° deye.° kind of / dairy farmer

A yeerd° she hadde enclosed al aboute yard
 With stikkes° and a drye dych⁴ withoute, sticks
 In which she hadde a cok° heet° Chauntecleer.⁵ rooster / named
 In al the land of crowyng° nas° his peer. crowyng / there was not 85 His voys° was murier° than the murie voice / merrier
 orgon° organ
 On messedayes that in the chirche gon.⁶
 Wel sikerer° was his crowing in his logge° reliable / lodging
 Than is a klokke or an abbey orlogge.° monastery clock
 By nature he crew° ech ascencioun° crowed / each ascension 90 Of the equynoxial⁷ in thilke° toun. that
 For whan degrees fiftene weren ascended, Thanne crew he that it myghte nat been amended.° could not be improved
 His coomb° was redder than the fyn° coral coxcomb / fine
 And batailled° as it were a castel wal.⁸ crenellated
 95 His byle° was blak, and as the jeet° it bill / jet (gemstone)
 shoon.° shone
 Lyk asure° were his legges and his toon,° azure / toes
 Hise nayles° whitter than the lylle flour,° nails / lily flower
 And lyk the burned° gold was his colour. polished
 This gentil° cok hadde in his governaunce° noble / control
 100 Sevene hennes for to doon° al his plesaunce,° do / pleasure
 Whiche were hise sustres° and his paramours° his sisters / lovers
 And wonder lyk° to hym as of colours, marvelously similar
 Of whiche the faireste hewed° on hir throte° colored / her throat
 Was cleped° faire damoysele° Pertelote. called / damsel
 105 Curteys° she was, discret, and debonaire° courteous / gracious
 And compaignable,° and bar° hyrself so friendly / behaved
 faire° well
 Syn thilke day that she was seven nyght oold,° nights old

¹ drye dych Contrasts with the moat of a castle.

⁵ Chauntecleer From the French, "clear singer." Chauntecleer is the name of the rooster in The Romance of Renard, which tells the adventures of a wily fox and contains one of the best known medieval versions of the story told by the Nun's Priest.

⁶ On ... gon That go (i.e., are played—the organ, an instrument of many pipes, was spoken of as plural) in Church on feast days.

⁷ By nature ... equynoxial The sense of this passage is that Chauntecleer crows when each hourly point of the celestial equator rises past the horizon.

⁸ And ... wal The crenelation on a castle's walls is the alternation of high, squared masonry with blank spaces. This would provide cover for the archers defending the castle against the arrows of the attackers.

¹ grene I.e., green, a common area in a village used for pasturage or other agricultural pursuits that did not demand the plowing of the green into a field.

The goute ... daunce The gout (a disease affecting the feet and brought on by over-eating or drinking) by no means hindered her from dancing.

³ in ... lak Either defect or lack, so either: In which she found no fault, or of which she had no shortage.

That trewely, she hath the herte in hoolde° holds the heart
 Of Chauntecleer, loken° in every lith.° locked / limb
 He loved hire so, that wel was hym therwith.
 And swich a joye was it to here hem° synge, them
 Whan that the brighte sonne bigan to sprynge,° rise
 In sweete accord,° "My Lief Is Faren in Londe."¹ harmony
 For thilke tyme,° as I have understonde, at that time
 Beestes and briddes° koude speke and synge. birds
 And so bifel° that in the dawenyng,° it happened / at dawn
 As Chauntecleer among hise wyves alle
 Sat on his perche° that was in the halle, perch
 And next hym sat this faire Pertelote,
 This Chauntecleer gan gronen° in his throte began to groan
 As man that in his dreem is drecched soore.° sorely disturbed
 And whan that Pertelote thus herde hym roore,° roar
 She was agast° and seyde, "O herte deere, afraid
 What eyleth° yow to grone in this manere?° ails
 Ye been° a verray° slepere. Fy!° For shame!" are / good / fie
 And he answerde and seyde thus: "Madame,
 I pray yow that ye take it nat agrief.° amiss
 By God, me thoughte I was in swich meschief° such trouble
 Right now, that yet myn herte is soore afright.
 Now God," quod he, "my swevene recche aright,²
 And kepe my body out of foul prisoun!
 Me mette° how that I romed up and doun I dreamed Withinne oure yeerd, wheereas° I saugh a beest where
 Was lyk an hound, and wolde han maad areest° grabbed hold
 Upon my body and han had me deed!° have had me dead
 His colour was bitwixe yelow and reed,° red
 And tipped was his tayl° and bothe hise eeris° tail / his ears
 With blak, unlyk° the remenant of hise heeris;° unlike / hairs
 His snowte° smal with glowynge eyen tweye.° nose / two
 Yet° of his look for feere° almoost I deye. still / fear
 This caused me my gronyng, doutelees."° doubtless
 "Avoy!"° quod she. "Fy on yow, hertelees!° shame / coward
 Allas," quod she, "for by that God above,
 Now han ye lost myn herte and al my love.
 I kan nat love a coward, by my faith!
 For certes,° whatso° any womman seith, certain / whatever
 We alle desiren, if it myghte bee,

¹ My... Londe My dear one has traveled into (a foreign) land. This is the title of a popular song, one version of which, from c. 1500, has survived in a manuscript at Trinity College, Cambridge.

² Now ... aright "Now God," he said, "interpret my dream correctly."

To han housbondes hardy,° wise, and free,° brave / generous
 And secree° and no nygard° ne no fool, discreet / cheapskate
 Ne hym that is agast° of every tool,° afraid / weapon
 Ne noon avauntour,° by that God above. nor any braggart
 How dorste° ye seyn, for shame, unto youre love dare
 That anythyng myghte make yow aferd?° afraid
 Have ye no mannes herte,° and han a berd?° man's heart / beard
 Allas, and konne ye been agast of swevenys?° be afraid of dreams
 Nothyng, God woot,° but vanitee° in knows / foolishness swevene is!
 Swevenes engendren of° replecciouns° are caused by / overeating
 And ofte of fume° and of complecciouns³ stomach-gas Whan humours been° to habundant° in a are / too abundant
 wight.° person
 Certes, this dreem which ye han met° tonyght have dreamed Cometh of greet superfluytee° excess
 Of youre rede colera, pardee,⁴
 Which causeth folk to dreden° in hir dremes fear
 Of arwes° and of fyr° with rede lemes,° arrows / fire / red flames
 Of grete beestes that they wol hem byte,° will bite them
 Of kontek° and of whelpes° grete and lyte,° conflict / dogs / small Right° as the humour of malencolie⁵ just Causeth ful many a man in sleepe to crie
 For feere of blake beres° or boles° blake black bears / bulls
 Or elles blake develes wole hem take.
 Of othere humours koude I telle also
 That werken° many a man in sleepe ful wo,° cause / much woe
 But I wol passe° as lightly as I kan. pass over
 "Lo Catoun,⁶ which that was so wys° a man, wise
 Seyde he nat thus: 'Ne do no fors of dremes'?⁷

³ complecciouns I.e., complexions, or temperaments. Medieval medical theory maintained that what we now call personality was a function of the balance in the body of the four bodily fluids known as humors. If these fluids were unbalanced, disease would result.

⁴ Of... pardee Of your red choler, by God. Choler was one of the four bodily humors. The red choler was formed of yellow bile, which is hot and dry.

⁵ malencolie I.e., melancholy, another of the four humors. It was formed of a black bile, which was cold and dry.

⁶ Catoun I.e., Dionysius Cato, a Roman politician who was believed in the Middle Ages to be the author of a widely-circulating collection of proverbs which was often used to teach basic Latin grammar.

⁷ Seyde ... dremes Said he not this: "Do not pay attention to dreams?"

Now sire," quod she, "whan ye flee° fro the fly down
 bemes,° beams
 For Goddes love, as taak som laxatyf!° take some laxative
 Up° peril of my soule and of my lyf, upon
 I conseil° yow the beste—I wol nat lye°— counsel / lie
 180 That bothe of colere° and of malencolye choler
 Ye purge yow,° and for ye shal nat yourself
 tarie,° so you do not delay
 Though in this toun is noon apothecarie,° no pharmacist
 I shal myself to herbes° techen yow, about herbs
 That shul been for youre heele° and for youre health
 prow,° profit
 185 And in oure yeerd° tho° herbes shal I fynde, yard / those
 The whiche han of hire propretee° by kynde° their property / nature
 To purge yow bynethe and eek above.
 Foryet nat this, for Goddes owene love!
 Ye been ful coleryk of compleccioun.
 190 Ware the sonne in his ascencioun
 Ne fynde yow nat repleet of humours hootē.¹
 And if it do, I dar wel leye° a grote² bet
 That ye shul° have a fevere terciane³ shall
 Or an agu° that may be youre bane.° ague (fever) / cause of death
 195 A day or two ye shul have digestyves° stomach medicines
 Of wormes, er ye take youre laxatyves⁴
 Of lawriol,° centaure,° and fumetere,° laurel / centaur / fumaria
 Or elles of ellebor,° that groweth there; hellebore
 Of katapuce° or of gaitrys beryis,° euphorbia / rhamus berries
 200 Of herbe yve,° growyng in oure yeerd ther mery herb-ivy is,° where it is merry
 Pekke hem up right as they growe, and ete hem yn.° eat them up
 Be myrie,° housbonde, for youre fader kyn!° merry / father's kin Dredeth no dreem. I kan sey yow namoore."

¹ Ware ... hootē Beware that the sun when it is climbing does not find you when you are (already) full of hot humors. The movements of the planets were thought to affect a patient's balance of humors.

² grote Coin equal to four pence.

³ fevere terciane I.e., tertian fever. Medieval people classified the types of fevers they would contract by how frequently they recurred. This one would return every third day—meaning every other day, in which the first day is counted, as is the non-fever day and the recurring-fever day. The disease is possibly malaria.

⁴ laxatyves The laxatives listed by the hen are all types of bitter herbs.

"Madame," quod he, "graunt mercy° of youre loore!° advice
 205 But nathelees, as touchyng° daun pertaining to Catoun,° Master Cato
 That hath of° wysdom swich a greet renoun,° for / fame
 Though that he bad° no dremes for to drede, commanded
 By God, men may in olde bookes rede
 Of many a man moore of auctorite
 210 Than evere Caton was, so moot I thee,° so might I thrive
 That al° the revers° seyn of this sentence, completely / opposite
 That han wel founden° by experience have found out well
 That dremes been significaciouns° are signs
 As wel of joye as of tribulaciouns° troubles
 215 That folk endure in this lif present.
 Ther nedeth make of this noon argument.
 The verray preeve° sheweth it in dede.° true proof / deed
 "Oon of the gretteste auctour⁶ that men rede
 Seith thus: that whilom° two felawes wente once 220 On pilgrimage in a ful good entente,
 And happed so° they coomen in a toun, it so happened
 Wheras ther was swich congregacioun° a gathering
 Of peple, and eek so streit of herbergage,° such a shortage of lodging
 That they ne founde as muche as o° cotage one 225 In which they bothe myghte logged bee,
 Wherefore they mosten of necessitee
 As for that nyght departen compaignye.° part company
 And ech of hem gooth to his hostelrye° lodging place
 And took his loggyng as it wolde falle.° would happen
 230 That oon of hem was logged in a stalle° stall
 Fer° in a yeerd, with oxen of the plough. far
 That oother man was logged wel ynough,
 As was his aventure° or his fortune, chance
 That us governeth alle as in commune.° in common 235 "And so bifel that, longe er it were day,
 This man mette in his bed, theas° he lay, where
 How that his felawe gan upon hym calle° to call
 And seyde, 'Allas, for in an oxes stalle
 This nyght I shal be mordred ther I lye!
 240 Now helpe me, deere brother, or I dye.
 In alle haste com to me,' he sayde.

⁵ graunt mercy From the French "grand merci" or "much thanks." Chauntecleer, as an aristocrat, employs French phrases.

⁶ Oon ... auctour The Roman orator and writer (auctour) Cicero (106–43 BCE) tells the story in On Divination, and it is also found in the Memorable Deeds and Sayings of Valerius Maximus (written c. 30–31 CE).

This man out of his sleepe for feere abrayde,^o woke up
 But whan that he was wakened of his sleepe,
 He turned hym^o and took of it no keepe.^o turned over / notice
 45 Hym thoughte his dreem nas but a vanitee.^o folly
 Thus twies in his slepyng dremed hee,
 And atte thridde tyme yet his felawe
 Cam as hym thoughte and seide, 'I am now slawe.^o slain
 Bihoold my bloody woundes depe and wyde.
 50 Arys^o up erly in the morwe tyde,^o arise / morning-time
 And at the west gate of the toun,' quod he,
 'A carte ful of donge^o ther shaltow^o se^o dung / shall you / see
 In which my body is hid ful prively.^o secretly
 Do thilke carte arresten boldely.¹
 55 My gold caused my mordre, sooth to sayn,'^o true to say
 And tolde hym every point how he was slayn
 With a ful pitous face, pale of hewe.^o color
 And truste wel, his dreem he foond ful trewe.
 For on the morwe, as soone as it was day,
 260 To his felawes in^o he took the way, friend's inn
 And whan that he cam to this oxes stalle,
 After his felawe he bigan to calle.
 "The hostiler^o answerde hym anon innkeeper
 And seyde, 'Sire, youre felawe is agon.'^o gone
 265 As soone as day he wente out of the toun.'
 "This man gan fallen in suspicioun,^o to be suspicious
 Remembrynge on hise dremes that he mette.^o dreamed
 And forth he gooth—no lenger wolde he lette^o— delay
 Unto the west gate of the toun and fond^o found 270 A dong-carte, as it were to donge lond^o to manure a field
 That was arrayed in that same wise^o way
 As ye han herd the dede man devyse.^o describe
 And with an hardy herte he gan to crye,
 'Vengeance and justice of this felonye!
 275 My felawe mordred is this same nyght,
 And in this carte heere he lith,^o gapyng lies upright.^o facing upright
 I crye out on the ministres,^o quod he, magistrates
 'That sholden kepe^o and reulen^o this citee!
 Harrow!^o Allas! Heere lith my felawe slayn!' care for / rule 280 What sholde I moore unto this tale sayn?
 The peple out sterte^o and caste the cart to grounde, jumped up
 And in the myddel of the dong they founde
 The dede man that mordred was al newe.^o recently

"O blisful^o God that art so just and trewe, blessed 285 Lo how that thou biwreyst^o mordre alway! reveal Mordre wol out.^o That se we day by day. will be found out
 Mordre is so wlatom^o and abhomyneable^o repulsive / abominable
 To God, that is so just and resonable,
 That he ne wol nat suffre it heled^o be, concealed 290 Though it abyde a yeer or two or thre.
 Mordre wol out! This my conclusioun.
 And right anon, ministres of that toun
 Han hent^o the cartere, and so soore^o hym arrested / sorely
 pyned,^o tortured
 And eek the hostiler so soore engyned,^o tortured on a rack
 295 That they biknewe^o hire wikkednesse anon confessed
 And were anhangd^o by the nekke bon.^o hanged / neck-bone
 "Heere may men seen that dremes been to drede.^o are to be feared
 And certes, in the same book I rede,
 Right in the nexte chapitre after this—
 300 I gabbe^o nat, so have I joye or blis— babble
 Two men that wolde han^o passed over see^o would have / the sea
 For certeyn cause into a fer contree,^o distant country
 If that the wynd^o ne hadde been contrarie, wind
 That made hem in a citee for to tarie^o delay
 305 That stood ful myrie^o upon an haven-syde.^o merrily / harbor-side
 But on a day agayn the eventyde,^o towards evening
 The wynd gan chaunge and blew right as hem leste.^o they wanted
 Jolif^o and glad, they wente unto hir reste jolly
 And casten^o hem ful erly for to saille. decided 310 But herkneth: to that o man fil a greet mervaille.²
 That oon of hem, in slepyng as he lay, Hym mette^o a wonder dreem agayn the dreamed day.^o toward daybreak
 Hym thoughte a man stood by his beddes syde
 And hym comanded that he sholde abyde^o wait
 315 And seyde hym thus: 'If thou tomorwe wende,^o go Thow shalt be dreynt.^o My tale is at an ende.'
 He wook and tolde his felawe what he mette
 And preye hym his viage^o to lette,^o voyage / delay
 As for that day he preye hym to byde.^o wait
 320 His felawe, that lay by his beddes syde, Gan for to laughe, and scorned hym ful faste.^o very much
 'No dreem,' quod he, 'may so myn herte agaste^o frighten

¹ Do ... boldely Cause that cart to be seized boldly.

² But ... mervaille But listen! To one man there happened a great marvel.

That I wol lette for to do my thynges.^o business
 I sette nat a straw by thy dremynges!^o dreams
 325 For swevenes been but vanytees^o and japes.^o nonsense / tricks
 Men dreme al day of owles or of apes,
 And of many a maze^o therewithal.^o delusion / with it all Men dreme of thyng that nevere was ne shal.^o nor shall be
 But sith I see that thou wolt heere abyde, 330 And thus forlewthen^o wilfully thy tyde,^o waste / time
 God woot, it reweth me!^o And have good day!¹ I regret it
 And thus he took his leve^o and wente his way. leave
 But er that he hadde half his cours yseyled,^o sailed
 Noot I nat^o why, ne what myschaunce^o I know not / went wrong
 it eyled,
 335 But casuelly^o the shippes botme^o rente,^o by chance / bottom / split
 And shipe and man under the water wente
 In sighte of othere shippes it bisyde^o beside it
 That with hem seyled at the same tyde.^o tide
 And therefore, faire Pertelote, so deere, 340 By swiche ensamples olde yet maistow leere^o may you learn
 That no man sholde been to reccheles^o too careless
 Of dremes. For I seye thee doutelees
 That many a dreem ful soore is for to drede!
 "Lo in the *Lyf of Seint Kenelm*¹ I rede, 345 That was Kenulphus sone,^o the noble kyng Cenwulf's son
 Of Mercenrike,^o how Kenelm mette^o a thyng Mercia / dreamed
 A lite er^o he was mordred on a day. little before
 His mordre in his avysoun^o he say.^o vision / saw
 His norice^o hym expowned^o every deel^o nurse / explained / part 350 His swevene, and bad hym for to kepe hym weel^o protect himself
 For traisoun.^o But he nas but^o sevene from treason / was only year oold,
 And therefore litel tale hath he toold^o paid little attention
 Of any dreem, so hooly^o is his herte. holy
 By God, I hadde levere than my sherte
 355 That ye hadde rad his Legende as have I,² Dame Pertelote! I sey yow trewely, Macrobeus, that writ the avysoun

¹ Lyf... Kenelm This is a saint's life, or hagiography, of Kenelm (Cenhelm), a seven-year-old Anglo-Saxon king of Mercia who was murdered at the command of his aunt.

² I hadde... I I would rather that you had read this saint's life than that I had my shirt, or, as we might say, I'd give my shirt to have you read it.

In Affrike of the worthy Cipiou,³ Affermeth^o dremes and seith that they affirms (the validity of)
 been 360 Warnynge of thynges that men after seen.^o see afterwards
 And forthermoore, I pray yow, looketh wel
 In the Olde Testament of Daniel,
 If he heeld^o dremes any vanitee.^o considered / folly
 Reed eek of Joseph,⁴ and ther shul ye see 365 Wher dremes be somtyme—I sey nat alle^o— not always Warnynge of thynges that shul after falle.^o happen
 Looke of Egipte^o the kyng daun Pharao,^o Egypt / Lord Pharaoh
 His bakere and his butiller^o also, butler
 Wher^o they ne felte noon^o effect whether / did not feel any in dremes.
 370 Whoso wol seken actes of sondry remes^o various realms
 May rede of dremes many a wonder thyng.
 Lo Cresus,⁵ which that was of Lyde kyng,
 Mette he nat^o that he sat upon a tree, did he not dream
 Which signified he sholde anhangd^o bee? hanged
 375 Lo heere Adromacha,^o Ectores^o wyf, Andromache / Hector's
 That day that Ector sholde lese his lyf
 She dremed on the same nyght biforn
 How that the lyf of Ector sholde be lom^o lost
 If thilke day he wente into bataille.
 380 She warned hym, but it myghte nat availle.^o could not help
 He wente for to fighte natheles,^o nevertheless

³ In... Cipiou The Roman writer Macrobius (c. 400 CE) wrote a commentary on the part of Cicero's Republic called "The Dream of Scipio." This book tells how Scipio Africanus Minor, a Roman consul, dreamed of meeting his famous ancestor, Scipio Africanus Major (so-called because he defeated Hannibal, the great general of Carthage, in North Africa) and urged him to pursue virtue for the sake of reward in a future life. Chauntecleer misinterprets his name, assuming the dream happened in Africa.

⁴ Daniel... Joseph Both Daniel and Joseph were famous for their ability to interpret dreams. Daniel interpreted the dream of King Nebuchadnezzar to predict that the king would be banished for seven years (see Daniel 4). Joseph interpreted his own dream to predict that he would be lord over his brothers, interpreted the dreams of Pharaoh's butler and his baker to predict that the former would be restored to office but the latter hanged, and interpreted Pharaoh's dream to predict that Egypt would have seven years of good harvest followed by seven years of famine (see Genesis 37.5–11; 40.1–23; 41.1–32).

⁵ Cresus The Monk had mentioned the dream of Croesus, the fabulously rich king of Lydia who was conquered by King Cyrus of Persia, in the previous tale.

But he was slayn anon of Achilles.¹
 But thilke is al to° longe for to telle, too
 And eek it is ny° day. I may nat dwelle.° near / not delay
 Shortly I seye, as for conduioun,
 That I shal han of this avisioun
 Adversitee. And I seye forthermoor
 That I ne telle of laxatyves no stoor!° set no store in laxatives
 For they been venymes,° I woot° it weel. venomous / know
 I hem diffye,° I love hem never a deel!° reject them / not at all
 "Now lat us speke of myrthe° and mirth
 stynte° al this. be silent about
 Madame Pertelote, so have I blis,° happiness
 Of o° thyng God hath sent me large grace,° one / great favor
 For whan I se the beautee of youre face—
 Ye been so scarlet reed° aboute youre eyen— red
 It maketh al my drede for to dyen.
 For also siker° as In principio,² as certain Mulier est hominis confusio.³
 Madame, the sentence° of this Latyn is, meaning
 'Womman is mannes joye and al his blis.'
 For whan I feelee anyght° youre softe side— at night
 Albeit that I may nat on yow ryde,° ride
 For that oure perche is maad° so narwe,° allas! made / narrow
 I am so ful of joye and of solas
 That I diffye° bothe swevene and dreem!"⁴ defy
 And with that word he fly° doun fro the beem,° flew / beam
 For it was day, and eek hise hennes alle,° did also all his hens
 And with a "chuk" he gan hem for to calle,
 For he hadde founde a corn lay° in the yerd. kernel that lay
 Real° he was. He was namoore aferd, regal
 And fethered Pertelote twenty tyme

And trad as ofte er it was pryme.⁵
 He looketh as it were° a grym leoun,° as if he were / fierce lion
 And on hise toos° he rometh° up and doun. his toes / roams
 415 Hym deigned nat to sette his foot to grounde.
 He chukketh° whan he hath a corn yfounde, chucks
 And to hym rennen thanne° hise wyves alle. run then
 Thus roial° as a prince is in an halle regal
 Leve° I this Chauntecleer in his pasture, leave 420 And after wol I telle his aventure.
 Whan that the monthe in which the world bigan,
 That highte March, whan God first maked man,⁶
 Was compleet, and passed were also,
 Syn March bigan, thritty dayes and two,⁷ 425 Bifel° that Chauntecleer in al his pryde, it happened
 Hise sevene wyves walkyng by his syde,
 Caste up hise eyen to the brighte sonne,
 That in the signe of Taurus hadde yronne
 Twenty degrees and oon° and somewhat twenty-one degrees
 moore,
 430 And knew by kynde° and by noon oother nature
 loore° teaching
 That it was pryme,° and crew with blisful early morning
 stevene.° voice
 "The sonne," he seyde, "is clomben upon hevene
 Fourty degrees and oon and moore, ywis.
 Madame Pertelote, my worlde blis,
 435 Herkneþ thise blisful briddes,° how they synge, birds
 And se the fresshe floures, how they sprynge.° bloom
 Ful is myn herte of revel° and solas." amusement
 But sodeynly hym fil° a sorweful cas,° befell / event
 For evere the latter ende of joye is wo.
 440 God woot that worldly joye is soone ago!° gone
 And if a rethor° koude faire endite,° retorician / write well

¹ Lo heere ... Achilles The narrative of the Trojan war recounted by Dares Phrygius (one of the standard versions of the story in the Middle Ages) includes the story of the dream of Hector's wife. Homer's Iliad, which was not well known in western Europe at the time, does not include the episode.

² In principio Latin: in the beginning; i.e., as certain as the Bible. These words begin both the book of Genesis and the Gospel of John.

³ Mulier ... confusio Latin: Woman is the confusion of man.

⁴ That ... dreem Chauntecleer appears to distinguish between two kinds of dreams here, but it is not clear what the difference is. Medieval dream theory distinguished between prophetic dreams and those that had no special significance, but the terms swevene and dreem (and also mete) cover both.

⁵ And fethered ... pryme He covered Pertelote with his feathers twenty times and copulated with her as often before it was the hour of prime (early morning).

⁶ That ... man According to various medieval authorities, including Saint Basil and the English monastic writer Bede, God created the world at the spring equinox.

⁷ Was compleet ... two The phrasing is ambiguous but the events seem to take place on May 3, when all of March and a further thirty-two days had passed. This date is in keeping with the position of the sun in the sky and the other astrological information. May 3 was considered an unlucky day and is also the day on which Palamon escapes from prison in The Knight's Tale (lines 604–05).

He in a cronycle saufly^o myghte it write safely
 As for a sovereyn notabilitee.^o very notable thing
 Now every wys man, lat hym herkne me.^o listen to me
 445 This storie is also trewe, I undertake,^o swear
 As is The Book of Launcelot de Lake,¹
 That wommen holde in ful greet reverence.
 Now wol I come agayn to my sentence.^o purpose
 A colfox² ful of sly iniquitee,^o malice
 450 That in the grove hadde woned^o yeeres three, lived
 By heigh ymaginacioun forncast,³
 The same nyght thurghout^o the hegges^o through / hedge
 brast^o burst
 Into the yerd ther^o Chauntecleer the faire where
 Was wont, and eek hise wyves, to repaire,^o retire
 455 And in a bed of wortes^o stille^o he lay herbs / quietly
 Til it was passed undren^o of the day, dawn
 Waitynge his tyme^o on Chauntecleer to falle, opportunity
 As gladly doon this homycides alle^o all these murderers
 That in await liggen^o to mordre men. lie in wait
 460 O false mordreour, lurkyng in thy den!
 O newe Scariot,^o newe Genylon!^o (Judas) Iscariot / Ganelon
 False dissymulour,^o o Greek Synon, liar
 That broghtest Troye al outrelly^o to sorwe!⁴ utterly
 O Chauntecleer, cursed be that morwe 465 That thou into that yerd flaugh^o fro the bemes! flew
 Thou were ful wel ywarned by thy dremes
 That thilke day was perilous to thee,
 But what that God forwoot^o moot nedes foreknous be,^o necessarily be

The Book ... Lake This is the title of any one of a number of Arthurian romances that recount the adventures of Sir Lancelot, including his love affair with Guinevere, wife of King Arthur.

² colfox Fox with black feet, ears, and tail.

³ By ... forncast Foreseen by exalted imagination. What this means is disputed. Many editors take it to refer to the mind or conception (ymaginacioun) of God, which foresees all events. Others take "ymaginacioun" as a reference, expressed in deliberately and ridiculously grandiose language, to Chauntecleer's dream, or as a reference to the plotting of the fox. In each case, the word "forncast" introduces the theme of predestination discussed in lines 468–85.

⁴ O newe ... sorwe In the Gospel, Judas Iscariot betrayed Christ by identifying him to the Roman soldiers who came to arrest him; in The Song of Roland, Ganelon betrayed Roland with a plot that led to his death in the pass at Roncesvalles; and in The Iliad, Sinon betrayed Troy by suggesting the Greeks conceal themselves in a wooden horse to gain access to the city.

After^o the opinioun of certein clerkis.^o according to / scholars
 470 Witnesse on hym that any parfit clerk is,⁵
 That in scole^o is greet altercacioun^o the universities / debate
 In this mateere, and greet disputisoun,
 And hath been of an hundred thousand men.⁶
 But I ne kan nat bulte it to the bren⁷
 475 As kan the hooly doctour Augustyn,^o holy scholar Augustine
 Or Boece, or the Bisshope Bradwardyn⁸—Wheither that Goddes worthy forwityng^o foreknowledge Streyneth^o me nedely^o to doon a thyng— constrains / necessarily
 "Nedely" clepe^o I symple necessitee— call 480 Or elles, if free choys be graunted me
 To do that same thyng or do it noight,
 Though God forwoot it er that it was wroght,^o done
 Or if his wityng^o streyneth^o never a knowing / constrains
 deel^o not at all
 But by necessitee condicioneel.⁹

⁵ Witnesse ... is As any fully qualified scholar can testify.

⁶ But what ... men The question of how God's foreknowledge could be reconciled with human free will was always important in medieval theology, but the debate flared up in Chaucer's day. The radical theologian John Wycliffe (d. 1394), best known for initiating the translation of the Bible into English, argued that God's omniscience gave him absolute knowledge of who would be saved or damned. This meant for Wycliffe that there was no justification for the institutions of the earthly church or for penitential practices such as confession or pilgrimage.

⁷ But ... bren But I cannot separate (the kernels) from the bran. That is, the Nun's Priest cannot sort out the issues in the debate about God's foreknowledge.

⁸ As kan ... Bradwardyn The great patristic writer St. Augustine (d. 430 CE), the late Roman scholar Boethius (d. 524 CE), and Thomas Bradwardine, chancellor of Oxford and very briefly Archbishop of Canterbury (who died of the Black Death in 1349), all wrote about the concept of predestination. Although stressing God's omniscience, all three were thoroughly orthodox in their insistence that humans have free will.

⁹ necessitee condicioneel Boethius distinguishes between simple necessity and conditional necessity in his Consolation of Philosophy 5, prose 6, and then draws on God's status outside time to resolve the theological dilemma. To use Boethius's example, that a man must die is a matter of simple necessity. But if you know someone is walking, while he must then necessarily be walking, the necessity is only conditional; i.e., it depends on the condition of the man having decided to take a walk. From your perspective, he could have chosen not to do so. The issue here is whether God, in knowing in advance all future events and choices, necessarily removes free choice (for how can God be wrong?). The solution, proposed [continued ...]

15 I wol nat han to do of° swich mateere. have to do with My tale is of a cok, as ye may heere,
 That took his conseil of his wyf with sorwe
 To walken in the yerd upon that morwe
 That he hadde met that dreem that I of tolde.
 20 Wommennes conseils been ful ofte colde.° bad
 Wommannes conseil broghte us first to wo
 And made Adam out of Paradys to go,
 Theras° he was ful myrie° and wel at ese. where / merry
 But for I noot° to whom it myght displese, since I do not know
 25 If I conseil of wommen wolde blame,
 Passe over, for I seye it in my game.° in jest
 Rede auctours° where they trete of swich mateere, authors
 And what they seyn of wommen ye may heere.
 Thise been the cokkes wordes and nat myne!
 30 I kan noon harm of no womman divyne!° imagine
 Faire in the soond° to bathe hire myrily sand
 Lith° Pertelote, and alle hire sustres by° lies / nearby
 Agayn the sonne.° And Chauntecleer so free in the sunshine
 Soong murier° than the mermayde in the sang more merrily
 see—
 35 For Physiologus¹ seith sikerly° surely
 How that they syngen wel and myrily—
 And so bifel that as he caste his eye
 Among the wortes° on a boterflye, herbs
 He was war° of this fox that lay ful lowe. aware 40 Nothyng ne liste hym thanne for to crowe,²
 But cride anon, “Cok! Cok!” and up he sterte
 As man that was affrayed in his herte.
 For naturelly a beest desireth flee
 Fro his contrarie° if he may it see, enemy
 45 Though he never erst hadde seyn it with his eye.
 This Chauntecleer, whan he gan hym espye,° spotted him
 He wolde han fled, but that the fox anon

by Boethius, is this idea of conditional necessity: to know about an event is not necessarily to cause it. As he says, “God sees those future events which happen of free will as present events; so that these things when considered with reference to God’s sight of them do happen necessarily as a result of the condition of divine knowledge; but when considered in themselves they do not lose the absolute freedom of their nature.”

¹ Physiologus The supposed author of a bestiary, a book explaining the allegorical significances of various animals. According to this work, mermaids use their sweet singing to lure sailors to their deaths.

² Nothyng ... crowe He did by no means want then to crow.

Seyde, “Gentil sire, alas, wher wol ye gon?
 Be ye affrayed of me, that am youre freend?
 520 Now certes, I were worse than a feend° fiend
 If I to yow wolde° harm or vileynye! intended
 I am nat come youre conseil for t’espye.° to spy on your council
 But trewely, the cause of my comynge
 Was oonly for to herkne° how that ye synge. listen
 525 For trewely, ye have as myrie° a stevene° merry / voice
 As any aungel that is in Hevene.
 Therwith ye han in musyk moore feelynge
 Than hadde Boece³ or any that kan synge.
 My lord, youre fader, God his soule blesse,
 530 And eek youre mooder of hire gentillesse
 Han in myn hous ybeen to my greet ese.
 And certes, sire, ful fayn° wolde I yow plese. very gladly
 But for men speke of syngyng, I wol yow seye—
 So moote I brouke wel myne eyen tweye⁴—
 535 Save yow,° herde I nevere man yet synge apart from yourself
 As dide youre fader in the morwenynge.
 Certes, it was of herte° al that he song! from the heart
 And for to make his voys the moore strong,
 He wolde so payne hym° that with bothe hise eyen take pains 540 He moste wynke°—so loude he wolde cryen— had to wink
 And stonden on his tip-toon° therwithal,° tip-toes / in doing so
 And strecche forth his nekke long and smal.° slender
 And eek he was of swich discrecioun° discernment
 That ther nas no man in no regioun
 545 That hym in song or wisdom myghte passe.° surpass
 I have wel rad° in Daun Burnel the Asse,⁵ read
 Among hise vers,° how that ther was a cok, verses
 For that° a preestes sone yaf° hym a knok because / gave
 Upon his leg whil he was yong and nyce,° silly
 550 He made hym for to lese his benefice.

³ Boece Boethius not only wrote The Consolation of Philosophy, which Chaucer translated, but also wrote the basic university textbook on music used in the Middle Ages.

⁴ So ... tweye So may I enjoy the use of my eyes, a common expression meaning little more than “indeed,” but it is ill suited to express musical appreciation.

⁵ Daun ... Asse Title of a twelfth-century Latin satire by Nigel Wireker about a foolish donkey, Master Brunellus, who becomes a wandering scholar. The episode described below concerns a young man who was about to be ordained and to receive a benefice. The cock, whom he had injured in his youth, took its revenge by not crowing, causing the man to oversleep and miss his opportunity for a benefice.

But certeyn, ther nys no° comparisoun is no
 Bitwixe the wisdom and discrecioun
 Of youre fader and of his subtiltee.° cleverness
 Now syngeth, sire, for seinte charitee!° holy charity
 555 Lat se, konne ye youre fader cowntrefete?"° imitate
 This Chauntecleer hise wynges gan to bete° beat
 As man that koude his traysoun° nat espie,° betrayal / perceive
 So was he rayvsshed with his flaterie.
 Allas, ye lordes, many a fals flatour° false flatterer
 560 Is in youre courtes,° and many a losengeour° courts / flatterer
 That plesen yow wel moore, by my feith,
 Than he that soothfastnesse° unto yow seith. truth
 Redeth Ecclesiaste¹ of° flaterie. on Beth war,° ye lordes, of hir trecherye! beware
 565 This Chauntecleer stood hye upon his toos, Strecchyng his nekke, and heeld his eyen cloos° closed
 And gan to crowe loude for the nones.° occasion
 And Daun Russell the fox stirte up atones° jumped up at once
 And by the gargar° hente° Chauntecleer throat / grabbed 570 And on his bak toward the wode hym beer,
 For yet° ne was ther no man that hym sewed.° as yet / pursued
 O Destinee, that mayst nat been eschewed!° avoided
 Allas, that Chauntecleer fleigh fro the bemes!
 Allas, his wyf ne roghte nat° of dremes! paid no attention
 575 And on a Friday fil al this meschaunce!
 O Venus, that art goddesse of plesaunce,²
 Syn that thy servant was this Chauntecleer,
 And in thy servyce dide al his power° all he could Moore for delit than world to multiplye,° to increase the world (procreate) 580 Why woldestow suffre° hym on thy day to would you allow dye?³

O Gaufred,⁴ deere maister soverayn,° sovereign teacher
 That whan thy worthy kyng Richard was slayn
 With shot,° compleynedest° his deeth so soore, arrow / lamented
 Why ne hadde I now thy sentence° and thy meaning
 loore° learning
 585 The Friday for to chide as diden ye?
 For on a Friday soothly° slayn was he. truly
 Thanne wolde I shewe yow how that I koude pleyne
 For Chauntecleres drede and for his peyne!
 Certes swich cry ne lamentacioun
 590 Was nevere of ladyes maad° whan Ylioun° made / Ilion (Troy)
 Was wonne,° and Pirrus° with his streite conquered / Pyrrhus
 swerd,° drawn sword
 Whan he hadde hent° Kyng Priam by the berd° seized / beard
 And slayn hym, as seith us Eneydos,° Aeneid
 As maden alle the hennes in the clos° yard
 595 Whan they had seyn of Chauntecleer the sighte.
 But sodeynly Dame Pertelote shrighthe° shrieked
 Ful louder than dide Hasdrubales wyf
 Whan that hir housbonde hadde lost his lyf
 And that the Romayns hadde brend° Cartage.⁵ burned
 600 She was so ful of torment and of rage
 That wilfully into the fyr she sterte
 And brende herselfen with a stedefast herte.
 O woful hennes, right so criden ye
 As, whan that Nero⁶ brende the citee
 605 Of Rome, cryden senatours wyves,
 For that hir housbondes losten alle hir lyves.
 Withouten gilt this Nero hath hem slayn.
 Now turne I wole to my tale agayn.
 This sely° wydwe and eek hir doghtres two innocent
 610 Herden thise hennes crie and maken wo,
 And out at dores stirten they anon
 And syen the fox toward the grove gon

¹ Ecclesiaste Ecclesiasticus 12.16 warns against deceptive enemies but does not specifically mention flattery. The reference might be a mistake for Ecclesiastes or for Proverbs, other books of the Bible that were, like Ecclesiasticus, attributed to King Solomon.

² O ... plesaunce In classical mythology, Venus is the goddess of love.

³ Why ... dye According to medieval astrology, each of the planets had special influence on a given day of the week. Venus, who gives her name to Friday (Veneris dies) in Romance languages, controlled that day.

⁴ Gaufred I.e., Geoffrey of Vinsauf, whose treatise Poetria Nova, a basic manual on how to write rhetorically elaborate poetry, is alluded to by Chaucer in the following lines. King Richard is Richard I, the Lion-hearted, who in 1199 was wounded on a Friday while besieging a castle and later died of his wound.

⁵ Hasdrubales ... Cartage I.e., Hasdrubal (245–207 BCE), Carthaginian general, who died in battle at the Metaurus River in central Italy when he met the army of Caius Claudius Nero. Carthage was destroyed by Scipio Africanus in 146 BCE.

⁶ Nero Nero (r. 54–68 CE), Emperor of Rome, who had his city burned while he stood by, according to Suetonius, playing the bagpipes. In the previous tale the Monk narrates his tragedy.

And bar upon his bak the cok away,
 And cryden, "Out! Harrow!" and "Weylaway!" alas
 Ha! Ha! The fox!" And after hym they ran,
 And eek with staves° many another man; clubs
 Ran Colleoure dogge, and Talbot and Gerland,¹
 And Malkyn with a dystaf° in hir hand. spinning staff
 Ran cow and calf and the verray hogges,
 So fered° for berkyng of the dogges afraid
 And shoutyng of the men and wommen eek.
 They ronneso hem thoughte hir herte breek;²
 They yollenden° as feendes° doon in Helle. yelled / fiends
 The dokes° cryden as men wolde hem quelle,° ducks / kill them
 The gees° for feere flowen° over the trees, geese / flew
 Out of the hyve° cam the swarm of bees. hive
 So hydous° was the noyse,° a, hideous / noise
 benedicitee,° ah, bless us
 Certes he Jakke Straw and his meynee° gang
 Ne made nevere shoutes half so shrille,
 Whan that they wolden any Flemyng kille,³
 As thilke day was maad upon the fox.
 Of bras they broghten bemes and of box,
 Of horn, of boon, in whiche they blew and powped,⁴
 And therewithal° they skried° and they with this / shrieked
 howped.° whooped
 It semed as that Hevene sholde falle.
 Now, goode men, I prey yow, herkneth alle.
 Lo how Fortune turneth sodeynly
 The hope and pryde of hir enemy.
 This cok that lay upon the foxes bak,
 In al his drede unto the fox he spak
 And seyde, "Sire, if that I were as ye,
 Yet wolde I seyn, as wys° God helpe me, wise
 "Turneth agayn, ye proude cherles° alle! churls
 A verray pestilence upon yow falle!" fall upon you
 Now I am come unto the wodes syde.° border

Maugree youre heed,° the cok shal heere despite your efforts abyde.
 I wol hym ete,° in feith, and that anon!" eat
 The fox answerde, "In feith, it shal be don!"
 And as he spak that word al sodeynly,
 This cok brak° from his mouth delyverly° broke / quickly
 And heighe upon a tree he fleigh anon.
 And whan the fox saugh that he was gon,
 "Allas!" quod he. "O Chauntecleer, alas!
 I have to yow," quod he, "ydoon trespass,° done wrong
 In as muche as I maked yow aferd
 Whan I yow hente° and broghte into this yerd.⁵ seized
 But sire, I dide it of no wikke° entente. wicked
 Com down, and I shal telle yow what I mente.
 I shal seye sooth° to yow, God help me so!" tell the truth
 "Nay, thanne," quod he, "I shrewe° us bothe two! curse
 And first I shrewe myself, bothe blood and bones,
 If thou bigyle° me any ofter° than ones!" trick / more often / once
 Thou shalt namoore thurgh thy flaterye
 Do me to synge and wynke with myn eye!
 For he that wynketh whan he sholde see Al wilfully,° God lat hym nevere thee!"° voluntarily / thrive
 "Nay," quod the fox, "but God yeve° hym give meschaunce° misfortune
 That is so undiscreet° of governaunce° indiscreet / behavior
 That jangleth° whan he sholde holde his pees!"° chatters / peace
 Lo, swich it is for to be recchelees° reckless
 And negliget° and truste on flaterye! negligent
 But ye that holden° this tale a folye° consider / folly
 As of a fox or of a cok and hen,
 Taketh the moralite,° goode men. moral
 For Seint Paul seith that al that writen is,
 To oure doctrine° it is ywrite, ywis.⁶ for our teaching Taketh the fruyt,° and lat the chaf be fruit
 stille.° let the chaff alone

¹ Colle ... Talbot and Gerland Names for dogs.

² They ... breek They ran so (fast) that they thought their hearts would burst.

³ Certes ... kille Jack Straw was the name of one of the leaders of the Uprising of 1381; about thirty or forty Flemish merchants and weavers were murdered in London during this period of violence and rioting.

⁴ Ofbras ... powped They brought trumpets (bemes) made of brass and boxwood and of horn and of bone, on which they blew and puffed.

⁵ into this yerd This seems an obvious slip that should instead read "out of this yerd," as this line does in some manuscripts. Derek Pearsall, however, in the Variorum edition, defends "into" by suggesting that the fox is still trying to deceive Chauntecleer and so refers to the place they have come to as "this yerd" as if it were the kind of safe enclosure the rooster were used to.

⁶ For Seint ... ywis Cf. Romans 15.4. Chaucer cites the same line in his "Retraction" and it is also paraphrased at the beginning of the medieval translation and allegorical interpretation of Ovid's Metamorphoses, the Ovide Moralisé.

Now, goode God, if that it be thy wille,
 As seith my lord,¹ so make us alle goode men,
 680 And brynge us to his heighe blisse. Amen!

HEERE IS ENDED THE NONNES PREESTES TALE

THE NUN'S PRIEST'S EPILOGUE²

"Sire Nonnes Preest," oure Hoost seide anoon,
 "iblessed° be thy breche° and every blessed / buttocks
 stoon!^o testicles
 This was a murie tale of Chauntecleer.
 But by my trouthe, if thou were seculer° a lay man

685 Thow woldest be a tredefoul³ aright.
 For if thou have corage° as thou hast myght,^o spirit / power
 The were nede° of hennes, as I you would have need of wene,^o think
 Ya, moo° than sevene tymes seventeen! more
 Se which braunes° hath this gentil° preest, what muscle / fine
 690 So gret a nekke and swich a large breest.^o chest
 He loketh as a sperhauke° with hise eyen. sparrowhawk
 Him nedeth nat his colour° for to dyghen° complexion / dye
 With brasile ne with greyn of Portingale.⁴
 Now sire, faire falle yow° for your tale." may good befall you
 695 And after that he with ful murie chere
 Seide unto another as ye shuln here.
 —C. 1476

Chaucer's Retraction

The Retraction is found in all complete manuscripts of The Canterbury Tales, including the Ellesmere. In it Chaucer revokes most of his poems, including his early elegy The Book of the Duchess; his dream vision The House of Fame, which deals with worldly reputation; his great love poem Troilus and Criseyde; The Legend of Good Women, in which Chaucer compensates for telling the story of Criseyde's betrayal by telling of numerous good women; and those of The Canterbury Tales "that sownen into synne" (that tend to promote sin). Chaucer takes credit only for his translation of Boethius and for works of obvious moral or devotional content. Many critics, troubled by Chaucer's disavowal of so many of his poems as "worldly vanitees," have seen ironies in the Retraction. It effectively provides a list of his life's work, it does not name which of The Canterbury Tales it is revoking, and it is found in manuscripts that contain all the tales, including the ones that would seem to "sownen into synne." As a confession of Chaucer's sins, however, the Retraction follows logically from The Parson's Tale, which is not a tale at all but a penitential treatise, calling for full confession and repentance. As a penitent should, Chaucer lists all his works that may be sinful, even those he cannot remember writing. The connection to The Parson's Tale may also explain the opening line, with its reference to those who read or hear this "lityl treatise," a description that can only rather awkwardly fit the entire Canterbury Tales. By this point, the tale-telling pilgrims have faded from the scene. If we accept the retraction as a sincere act of personal atonement, however, the crucial question becomes how far this act should affect our understanding of The Canterbury Tales as a whole.

¹ my lord The Nun's Priest might be referring to the Archbishop of Canterbury, Christ, or, since he is attached to the nunnery at Stratford-at-Bow near London, his immediate ecclesiastical superior, the Bishop of London.

THE ... EPILOGUE This epilogue is found in nine manuscripts but not in either Ellesmere or Hengwrt. It seems most likely that the epilogue is part of an earlier draft that Chaucer later abandoned, incorporating some of the lines into the Host's words to the Monk.

³ tredefoul Copulator with chickens, a rooster.

⁴ brasile ... Portingale Imported red dyes.

CHAUCER'S RETRACTION

HEERE TAKETH THE MAKERE OF THIS BOOK HIS LEVE

Now preye° I to hem alle° that herkne° this litel tretys° or rede,° that if ther be anythyng in it that liketh hem,° that therof° they thanken oure Lord Jhesu Crist, of whom procedeth al wit and al goodnesse. And if ther be anythyng that displese hem,° I preye° hem also that they arrette° it to the defaute° of myn unkonnyng° and nat to my wyl,° that wolde° ful fayn° have seyde bettre, if I hadde had konnyng°. For oure book seith, "Al that is written is written for oure doctrine."¹ And that is myn entente.° Wherefore I biseke° yow mekely° for the mercy of God that ye preye for me, that Crist have mercy on me and foryeve° me my giltes,° and namely° of my translations and enditynges° of worldly vanitees,° the whiche I revoke in my retracciouns—as is The Book of Troilus, The Book also of Fame, The Book of the Five and Twenty Ladies, The Book of the Duchesse, The Book of Seint Valentynes Day of the Parlement of Briddes,² The Tales of Caunterbury (thilke° that sownen into synne°), The Book of the Leoun,² and many another book (if they were in my remembrance) and many a song and many a lecherous° lay—that Crist for his grete° mercy foryeve me the synne.

But of the translacioun of Boece, *De Consolacioun*³ and othere bookes of legendes° of seintes and omelies° and moralitee and devocioun, that thanke I oure Lord Jhesu Crist and his blisful mooder° and alle the seintes of Hevene, bisekyng hem° that they from hennes° forth unto my lyves° ende sende me grace to biwayle° my giltes and to studie° to the salvacioun of my soule and graunte me grace of verray° penitence, confessioun, and satisfaccioun to doon° in this present lyf thurgh the benigne grace of hym that is Kyng of kynges and Preest over alle preestes, that boghte° us with the precious blood of his herte,° so that I may been oon° of hem at the Day of Doome° that shulle° be saved. Qui cum patre, etc.⁴

HEERE IS ENDED THE BOOK OF THE TALES OF CAUNTERBURY COMPILED BY GEOFFREY CHAUCER, OF WHOS SOULE JHESU CRIST HAVE MERCY, AMEN.

—C. 1476

pray / them all / listen to / treatise / read [it] pleases them / for it

them / ask / ascribe / default my ignorance / will / would / very gladly knowledge
my intent / ask / meekly
forgive / sins
especially / writings / acts of folly

Parliament of Fowles / those tend towards sin
lecherous great moral stories / homilies

mother
asking them / hence / life's / lament take thought true / do

redeemed / heart / one Judgment Day / shall

¹ Al ... doctrine From 2 Timothy 3.16; doctrine Instruction.

² The ... Leoun This text, probably a translation of the Dit de Leon by the French court poet Guillaume de Machaut (c. 1300–77), one of Chaucer's major early influences, does not survive.

³ De Consolacioun This is The Consolation of Philosophy, the famous treatise of the late Roman scholar and statesman Boethius.

⁴ Qui ... etc. The full liturgical phrase is Qui cum Patre et spiritu sancto vivit et regnat Deus per omnia secula, Amen. Latin: Who with the Father and the Holy Spirit lives and reigns, God forever and ever, Amen.

*Complaint of Chaucer to His Purse*¹
A Supplication to King Henry

To yow, my purs, and to non other wight^o person
 Complaine I, for ye ben my lady dere!
 I am so sory, now that ye been light;^o empty
 For certes, but if^o ye make me hevy chere, unless 5 Me were as lief be² laid upon my bier;
 For which unto your mercy thus I crye, Beth hevy ayeyn, or elles mot^o I dye! must

Now voucheth sauf^o this day, or^o hyt be grant / ere
 nyght,
 That I of you the blissful soun^o may hear, sound
 10 Or see your colour lyk the sonne bright,
 That of yelownesse had never peer.

Ye be my lyf, ye be myne hertes stere,³
 Quene of comfort and of good companye;
 Beeth hevy again, or elles mot I dye!

15 Ye purs, that ben to me my lyves^o light life's
 And saviour, as down in this worlde here,
 Out of this towne helpe me thurgh your might,
 Syn^o that ye wylle nat ben my tresorere; since
 For I am shave as nye as any frere.⁴
 20 But yet I pray unto youre curtesye, Beeth hevy ayeyn, or elles mot I dye!
 —1477 (WRITTEN C. 1399)

¹ Complaint of Chaucer to His Purse The tradition in which this poem is written is that of courtly love; "complaints" to a lady concerning unrequited love were a staple of love poetry on French models.

² Me were as lief be I would be just as happy to be.

³ myne hertes stere Rudder of my heart.

⁴ shave ... any frere As close-cropped as any friar (i.e., with nothing left).

JULIAN OF NORWICH

c. 1342 – c. 1416

We know very little of Julian of Norwich, one of the great medieval English mystics. It is possible that she was trained as Benedictine nun, and some have speculated that she may have received some form of education at Carrow Priory, the school attached to the Cathedral in Norwich. Her lineage, name, and even the date of her death are unknown. Given what we do know of her, though, it seems likely that she would want her readers to focus on her meditations—her “shewings” and what they revealed about the nature of God—rather than her own life.

Our knowledge of Julian of Norwich’s life and mystical experiences is derived from the records she allowed others to keep. At the age of 30 years, on 8 May 1373, Julian of Norwich lay critically ill, her mother at her side. Her curate, called to administer the last rites, held a crucifix aloft at the foot of her bed. With her sight beginning to fail, she felt a creeping numbness spread from her toes to her waist. As her field of vision narrowed and she fixed her eyes on the crucifix near her bed, Julian reports that she suddenly saw the figure of Jesus begin to bleed from his forehead in drops that reminded her of rain falling from the eaves of a house. For several hours, while those around her presumed she was near death, Julian continued to experience what she termed a “bodely sight”—a total of sixteen visions. Soon after her recovery, Julian wrote a short narrative of her visions (the Short Text, here titled A Vision Shown to a Devout Woman), and 20 years later, a longer and more theologically complex version (the Long Text, here titled A Revelation of Love) that incorporated the fruits of her years of intense and studied meditation on her sixteen original showings.

At some point after her miraculous recovery, Julian became an anchoress at St. Julian’s church in Norwich, a bustling and thriving town in the north of England. Being an anchoress required taking a vow of seclusion, which would have meant that she lived the majority of her years in a small room within the sides of the church. This would probably have afforded her a certain autonomy; anchorites and anchoresses did not answer to any ecclesiastical authority other than the bishop. The ritual for enclosure included a Mass with prayers for the dead; as an anchoress Julian was, in effect, choosing to “die” to the world so that she could devote herself to prayer and meditation. Most anchoritic strongholds were small, perhaps no more than 12 or 15 feet square, with three windows. Through hers, Julian could view the altar and the Sacrament and hear Mass. She would have spoken to her confessor or counseled those, like Margery Kempe, who came to talk to her through this window. Another small window would have allowed access to those who saw to her physical needs, and a third, quite possibly facing the street but covered with a translucent cloth, would have allowed in light.

Although there is evidence that Julian, in her role as an anchoress, served her community for many years as a spiritual director and may have enjoyed at least a modicum of public attention, her written works did not garner much interest outside of ecclesiastical circles for over two centuries; in fact, the first time her writings are mentioned at length after her death is in the 1650s, during the Puritan Revolution. The anti-Catholic and anti-mystical temper of the political times led those who were sympathetic to her theological views to transfer their copies of her Revelations to several monastic houses in France, where, for all intents and purposes, her writings remained buried until the 1800s.

Early in the twentieth century the scholar Evelyn Underhill revived interest in Julian's writings, which began to be read again by lay, clerical, and academic readers. Over the last few decades, partly as the result of a growing interest in works by women, Julian's writings have become the focus of considerable critical attention. Along with her contemporaries Richard Rolle, Walter Hilton, and the anonymous author of the Cloud of Unknowing, Julian is now regarded as one of the great fourteenth-century English mystics.

Her writing is known for its innovative and sometimes startling theology: perhaps most strikingly, she says God is Mother as well as Father. Her meditations on her visions over the years persuaded her that God is not a vindictive God, prone to punish or rebuke, although she emphasized that she adhered to Church doctrine about sin and damnation, as about all other matters; for a woman writing in her time, it was essential to avoid the charge of heresy. Julian found herself unable to embrace the idea of eternal damnation, however, and perceived a God who saw His people through the eyes of love and through grace brought by Christ's death and resurrection. The strength of her unique vision, together with her ability to tap the deep potential for image and metaphor afforded by the Middle English of her time, make her texts a fascinating study of the intersection between affective piety and the flowering of the English language.

from *A Vision Showed to a Devout Woman*¹

Here is a vision, shewed² by the goodness of God to a devout woman. And her name is Julian, that is recluse at Norwich and yet is on life, anno domini 1413.³ In the whilke vision are full many comfortabille words and greatly stirrande⁴ to all they that desires to be Christ's lovers.⁵

I desired three graces⁶ by the gift of God. The first I wasto have mind of Christ's passion.⁷ The second was bodily sickness. And the third was to have of God's gift⁸ three wounds.

For the first, come⁹ to my mind with devotion: methought I had great feeling in the passion of Christ, but yet I desired to have more, by the grace of God. Methought I would have been that time with Mary Maudeleyne and with other that were Christ's lovers, that I might have seen bodily¹⁰ the passion of our lord that he suffered for me, that I might have suffered with him as other did that loved him. Notwithstanding that I leaved sadly all the pains of Christ as holy church shews and teaches, and also the paintings of crucifixes that are made by the grace of God after the teaching of holy church to the likeness of Christ's passion, as farfurthe as man's wit may reach¹¹—notwithstanding

¹ A Vision Showed to a Devout Woman The following partially modernized text is based on the original spelling text of The Writings of Julian of Norwich, edited by Nicholas Watson and Jacqueline Jenkins. The notes in this version have been based upon their notes.

² shewed Revealed (with a connotation of divine revelation).

³ that is ... 1413 Who is enclosed (i.e., as an anchoress) at Norwich and is still living, in the year of our lord 1413.

⁴ whilke Which; comfortabille Comforting, spiritually inspiring; stirrande Stirring, moving, inspiring.

⁵ Here is ... lovers This introduction was added by one or more scribes.

⁶ desired Wished for, asked for; graces Miracles or gifts bestowed by God.

⁷ have mind ... passion Remember and reflect upon Christ's passion in an immersive, profound way.

⁸ of God's gift I.e., by the gift of God.

⁹ come Which came.

¹⁰ would ... time Wished to have been at that time; Mary Maudeleyne Mary Magdalene, whose presence at Christ's crucifixion is mentioned in the Bible several times. She was noted for her profound love of Christ and was often a central figure in depictions of Christ's crucifixion; other Others; bodily Physically (as opposed to in the imagination).

¹¹ leaved sadly Believed firmly; and also ... may reach As are also shown in the paintings of crucifixes that are made by the grace of God according to the teaching of holy church, [continued ...]

all this true belief, I desired a bodily sight, wherein I might have more knowing of bodily pains of our lord our saviour, and of the compassion of our lady, and of all his true lovers that were belevande his pains that time and sithen.¹ For I would have² been one of them and suffered with them. Other sight of God ne shewing desired I never none till at the soul were departed from the body, for I trayste sothfastly that I should be safe.³ And this was my meninge:⁴ for I would after, because of that shewing, have the more trewe mind in⁵ the passion of Christ.

For the second, come to my mind with contrition, freely withouten any seeking; a wilfulle⁶ desire to have of God's gift a bodily sickness. And I would that this bodily sickness might have been so hard as to the dede, so that I might in the sickness take all my rightinges of holy church, wenande myself that I should die, and that all creatures that saw me might wene⁷ the same. For I in the likeness of Christ's passion, insofar as human mental capacity can extend. The art that commonly decorated churches was a subject of controversy in the late fourteenth century; some considered such art to be a waste of money better spent on charitable works, and were concerned that it encouraged idolatry—worship of the art works rather than of God.

¹ knowing of Sensory perception and/or spiritual understanding of the; our lady The Virgin Mary; of all his ... and sithen Of all his true lovers who were believers in his suffering at that time and since; i.e., those believers who were present at the crucifixion, and those who have been true lovers of Christ since then. Some of Julian's contemporaries, such as the mystic Margery Kempe, described attending the crucifixion in a vision.

² would have Wanted to have.

³ Other sight ... none I never expressed a wish for any other sight or revelation from God; till at Until; trayste sothfastly Was certain, had righteous faith; safe Saved, granted salvation.

⁴ meninge Meaning, intention. The formal prose here suggests that this request for "grace" has itself the formality of a pledge.

⁵ would after Wanted afterward (to); trewe Faithful, genuine, spiritually right; mind in Memory of.

⁶ come Which came; contrition Penitence, sorrow for sin; freely withouten any seeking Freely, without my seeking it; i.e., this second desire is itself a gift of God's grace; wilfulle Eager.

⁷ so hard ... the dede So harsh that it would bring me to the point of death; rightinges Last rites, ceremonies performed when a Christian is on the brink of death; wenande Expecting, believing; wene Expect.

would have no comfort of no fleshly nother earthly life.⁸ In this sickness I desired to have all manner of pains, bodily and gastelye, that I should have if I should die, all the dreads and tempests of fiends, and all manner of other pains, safe of the outpassing of the soul, for I hoped that it might be to me a spede when I should die.⁹ For I desired soon to be with my God.

These two desires of the passion and of the sickness, I desired them with a condition.¹⁰ For methought that it passed the common course of prayers.¹¹ And therefore I said: "Lord, thou woote what I would."¹² If it be thy will that I have it, grant it me. And if it be nought thy will, good lord, be nought displeased, for I will nought but as thou wilt."¹³ This sickness desired I in my youth, that I might have it when I were in thirty year elde.¹⁴

For the third, I heard a man tell of holy church of the story of Saint Cecilie, in the whilke shewing I understood that she had three wounds with a sword in the neck, with the whilke she pinede to the dede.¹⁵ By the stirringe of this, I conceived a mighty desire,

⁸ I wolde ... life I did not want to have any comfort of either bodily or earthly life.

⁹ gastelye Spiritual; tempests Agitations, especially those of a spiritual nature; dreads ... fiends It was considered usual for demons to tempt a dying person; safe of Except for; hoped that it ... should die Hoped it might be a help to me when I was really dying; spede Help.

¹⁰ I desired ... condition I.e., there was a condition attached to my desires.

¹¹ it passed ... of prayers It (what I desired) went beyond the ordinary practice of prayer.

¹² woote what I would Know what I want.

¹³ if it be nought If it is not; I will ... thou wilt I want nothing except according to your will. See Matthew 26.39, in which Christ, the night before his crucifixion, says "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me: nevertheless not as I will, but as thou wilt."

¹⁴ This sickness ... year elde In my youth, I wanted to have this sickness when I was thirty; in thirty year elde In my thirtieth year of age.

¹⁵ the third I.e., the third grace; a man ... holy church A man of holy church tell; Saint Cecilie Saint Cecilia, a martyr who, in apocryphal legend, received three wounds in the neck but did not die for three days, during which time she continued to preach. Her story is included in The Golden Legend, a collection of saints' lives that was popular in the later Middle Ages; whilke Which; pinede to the dede Suffered until death.

prayande our lord God that he would grant me three wounds in my life time: that is to say, the wound of contrition, the wound of compassion, and the wound of willful longing to¹ God. Right as I asked the other two with a condition, so I asked the third withouten any condition.² This two desires before said passed fro³ my mind, and the third dwelled continually.

2

And when I was thirty winter old and a half, God sent me a bodily sickness in the whilke I lay three days and three nights, and on the fourth night I took all my rightinges of holy church, and wened nought till have lived till day.⁴ And after this I languorede furthe⁵ two days and two nights, and on the third night I wenede oft times to have passed, and so wened they that were about me. But in this I was right sorry and lothe thought for to die, but for nothing that was in earth that me liked to live for, nor for nothing that I was aferde⁶ for, for I trusted in God. But it was for I would have lived⁷ to have loved God better and longer time, that I might, by the grace of that living, have the more knowing and loving of God in the bliss of heaven. For methought all the time that I had lived here so little and so short in the regard of⁸ endless bliss. I thought thus: "Good lord, may my living be no longer to thy worshippe?"⁹ And I was answered in my reason and by the feelings of my pains that I should die, and I assented fully with all the will of my heart to be at God's will.

Thus I endured till day, and by then was my body dead fra the middes¹⁰ downward, as to my feeling. Then was I stirrede to be sat upperlightes, lenande with cloths to my head, for to have the more freedom of my heart to be at God's will, and thinkinge¹¹ on him while my life would last. And they that were with me sent for the person my curette¹² to be at mine ending. He come, and a child with him, and brought a cross, and by then I had set mine eyen and might nought¹³ speak. The person set the cross before my face and said: "Daughter, I have brought thee the image of thy saviour. Look thereupon, and comfort thee therewith in reverence of him that died for thee and me." Methought then that I was well, for mine eyen were set upward into heaven, whither I trusted for to come. But nevertheless I assented to set mine eyen in the face of the crucifix, if I might, for to endure the longer into the time of mine ending. For methought I might longer endure to look evenforthe¹⁴ than upright.

After this my sight began to fail, and it was all dark about me in the chamber, and mirke as it had been night, save in the image of the cross there held a common light, and I wiste¹⁵ never how. All that was beside the cross was ugly to me, as if it had been mekille¹⁶ occupied with fiends.

After this the over partye¹⁷ of my body began to die, as to my feeling. Mine hands fell down on either side, and also for unpower my head settled down on side.¹⁸ The most pain that I feled was shortness of wind¹⁹ and failing of life. Then wende I sothelye to have been at the

¹ By the stirring of Inspired by; prayande Praying (to); compassion I.e., compassion for Christ's suffering; willful longing to Strong, devoted longing toward.

² Right as ... any condition This third desire does not require any "condition" because it is more conventional than the other two.

This These; fro From.

³ bodily Physical; in the whilke In which; rightinges Last rites, ceremonies performed when a Christian is on the brink of death; wened ... day Did not expect to live until day.

⁵ languorede furthe Continued to languish or suffer sickness.

⁶ lothe ... to die Thought unwillingly of death; me liked I wanted; aferde Afraid.

⁷ would have lived Wanted to live.

⁸ in the regard of By comparison to.

⁹ worshippe Honor, glorification.

¹⁰ fra the middes From the middle.

¹¹ stirrede Moved; upperlightes Up; lenande Leaning or lying down; thinkinge Concentrating or meditating.

¹² person Parson, parish priest; curette Clergy member responsible for the spiritual care of a group of people.

¹³ I had ... mine eyen My eyes were fixed; might nought Could not.

¹⁴ evenforthe Forward.

¹⁵ mirke as Dark as if; common Natural, proper; wiste Knew.

¹⁶ mekille Greatly.

¹⁷ over partye Upper part.

¹⁸ on side On one side.

¹⁹ feled Felt; wind Breath.

point of dede.¹ And in this, suddenly all my pain was away fro me and I was all whole, and namely² in the over partye of my body, as ever I was before or after. I marvelled of this change, for methought it was a prive working of God, and nought of kinde.³ And yet by the feeling of this ese I trystede never the more⁴ that I should live, ne the feeling of this ese was ne full ese to me.⁵ For methought I had levere have been delivered of this world, for my heart was wilfulle⁶ thereto.

3

And suddenly come unto my mind that I should desire the second wound of our lord's gift and of his grace: that he would fulfill my body with mind⁷ and feeling of his blessed passion, as I had before prayed. For I would⁸ that his pains were my pains, with compassion and afterward longing to God. Thus thought me that I might, with his grace, have his wounds that I had before desired. But in this I desired never ne bodily sight ne no manner shewing of God, but compassion, as methought that a kind soul might have with our lord Jhesu, that for love would become man dedlye.⁹ With him I desired to suffer, lyevande in dedlye¹⁰ body, as God would give me grace.

And in this, suddenly I saw the red blood trickle down fro under the garland all hot, freshly, plentifully, and livelye,¹¹ right as methought that it was in that time that the garland of thorns was thrust on his blessed head. Right so, both God and man, the same suffered for me. I consevevede truly and mightelye that it was himself that shewed it me, withouten any meen.¹² And then I said: "Benedicte dominus!"¹³ This I said reverently in my meninge,¹⁴ with a mighty voice. And full greatly was I astonned, for wonder and merveye that I had, that he would be so homlye¹⁵ with a sinful creature lyevande in this wretched flesh.

Thus I tokede it for that time that our lord Jhesu, of his curtayse¹⁶ love, would shew me comfort before the time of my temptation. For methought it might be well that I should, by the sufferance of God and with his keeping, be tempted of fiends or¹⁷ I died. With this sight of his blessed passion, with the godhede that I saw in mine understanding, I saw that this was strength enough to me—yea, unto all creatures lyevande that should be safe—against all the fiends of hell and against all gostelye¹⁸ enemies.

¹ Then ... dede Then I thought with certainty that I was at the point of death.

² namely Particularly.

³ prive Mysterious; nought Not; kinde Physical nature.

⁴ trystede never the more Was no more certain.

⁵ ese Ease, comfort, health; ne the ... to me Neither was the feeling of this health entirely a comfort to me.

⁶ had levere Would rather; wilfulle Eager.

⁷ mind Memory.

⁸ would Wished.

⁹ I desired ... of God I never desired a physical vision or any kind of revelation from God. Too much eagerness to experience a vision was frowned upon, and Julian here emphasizes that she did not expect or ask for one; would Wanted to; dedlye Mortal.

¹⁰ lyevande in dedlye Living in mortal.

¹¹ garland I.e., crown of thorns; livelye Vividly.

¹² consevevede Realized; mightelye Powerfully; withouten anymeen Without any intermediary.

¹³ Benedicte dominus Latin: Praise the lord.

¹⁴ meninge Intention, understanding.

¹⁵ astonned Astonished; merveye Surprise; homlye Intimate; also plain or direct.

¹⁶ tokede it Supposed; curtayse Courtly and polite; also beneficent and merciful.

¹⁷ sufferance Permission; keeping Protection; of fiends or By fiends before.

¹⁸ the godhede Here, the divine Christ, as distinct from the human Jesus. Julian literally sees the human Jesus, who suffers the Passion, but she also intellectually conceives of the divine Christ, who does not; safe Saved, granted salvation; gostelye Spiritual.

4 [ORIGINAL SPELLING]

And this same time that I sawe this bodily sight, oure lorde shewed me a gastelye sight of his hamly lovinge. I sawe that he es to us alle thinge that is goode and comfortabile to oure helpe. He es oure clerhinge, that for love wappes us and windes us, halses us and alle becloses us, hinges aboute us for tender love, that he maye nevere leve us. And so in this sight I sawe sothelye that he is alle thinge that is goode, as to mine understandinge.

And in this, he shewed me a litille thinge the quantite of a haselle nutte, lygande in the palme of my hande, and, to my understandinge, that it was as rounde as any balle. I lokede theropon, and thought: "Whate maye this be?" And I was answerde generally thus: "It is alle that is made." I merveylede howe that it might laste, for methought it might falle sodaynlye to nought for litille. And I was answerde in mine understandinge: "It lastes and ever shalle, for God loves it. And so hath alle thinge the beinge thorowe the love of God."

In this litille thinge I sawe thre parties: the firste is that God made it, the seconde is that he loves it, the thirde is that God kepes it. Botte whate is that to me? Sothelye, the makere, the love, the kepere. For to I am substantiallylye aned to him I may nevere have full reste ne varray blisse: that is to saye, that I be so festenede to him that thare be

4 [MODERN SPELLING]

And this same time that I saw this bodily sight, our lord shewed me a gastelye sight of his hamly¹ loving. I saw that he is to us all thing that is good and comfortabile² to our help. He is our clothing, that for love wappes us and winds us, halses us and all becloses us, hinges³ about us for tender love, that he may never leave us. And so in this sight I saw sothelye that he is all thing that is good, as to mine understanding.

And in this, he shewed me a little thing the quantite of a hazelnut lygande in the palm of my hand, and, to my understanding,⁴ that it was as round as any ball. I looked therupon, and thought: "What may this be?" And I was answered generally⁵ thus: "It is all that is made." I marvelled how that it might last, for methought it might fall suddenly to nought for little.⁶ And I was answered in mine understanding: "It lasts and ever shall, for God loves it. And so hath all thing the being through the love of God."⁷

In this little thing I saw three parties: the first is that God made it, the second is that he loves it, the third is that God kepes⁸ it. But what is that to me? Sothelye, the maker, the lover, the kepere.⁹ For to I am substantiallylye aned to him I may never have full rest ne varray bliss:¹⁰ that is to say, that I be so fastened to him that there be

¹ bodily Physical; gastelye Spiritual; hamly Intimate.

² comfortabile Comforting, spiritually inspiring.

³ wappes ... winds us Wraps us and winds about us; halses ... becloses us Embraces us and wholly encloses us; hinges Hangs.

⁴ quantite Size; lygande Lying; to my understanding I.e., he showed to my understanding.

⁵ generally Not by a specific speaker, i.e., by intuition.

⁶ I marvelled ... little I marveled at how it might continue to exist, for I thought it might collapse suddenly into nothingness, it was so little.

⁷ hath all ... God All things have their being through the love of God.

⁸ parties Parts; kepes Protects.

⁹ Sothelye Truly; the maker ... kepere These three terms correspond to the three persons of the Trinity: Father (maker), Son (keeper), and Holy Ghost (lover).

¹⁰ For to ... blisse For until I am united to him in substance I can never have complete rest or true bliss.

[ORIGINAL SPELLING]

right nought that is made betwyxe my God and me. And wha shalle do this dede? Sothlye himselfe, be his mercye and his grace, for he has made me thereto and blisfullye restored.

In this, God brought oure ladye to mine understandinge. I sawe hir gastelye in bodilye lykenes, a simpille maidene and a meeke, yonge of age, in the stature that sho was when sho conceivede. Also God shewed me in parte the wisdom and the trowthe of hir saule, wharein I understode the reverente beholdinge that she behelde hire God, that is hir makere, mervelande with grete reverence that he wolde be borne of hir that was a simpille creature of his makinge. For this was hir mervelinge: that he that was hir makere walde be borne of hir that was made. And this wisdom and trowthe, knawande the gretnes of hir makere and the litellehede of herselfe that is made, made hir for to saye mekelye to the angelle Gabrielle: "Lo me here, Goddes handmaidene." In this sight I sawe sothfastlye that sho is mare than alle that God made benethe hir in worthines and in fulhede. For abovene hir is nothinge that is made botte the blissede manhede of Criste.

[MODERN SPELLING]

right nought that is made betwyxe¹ my God and me. And who shall do this deed? Sothlye himself, by his mercy and his grace, for he has made me thereto and blissfully restored.²

In this, God brought our lady to mine understanding. I saw her gastelye in bodily likeness, a simple maiden and a meek, young of age, in the stature that she was when she conceived.³ Also God shewed me in part the wisdom and the trowthe of her soul, wherein I understood the reverent beholding that she beheld her God, that is her maker, mervelande⁴ with great reverence that he would be borne of her that was a simple creature of his making. For this was her marvelling: that he that was her maker would be borne of her that was made.⁵ And this wisdom and trowthe, knawande the greatness of her maker and the litellehede of herself that is made, made her for to say mekelye⁶ to the angel Gabrielle: "Lo me here, God's handmaiden."⁷ In this sight I saw sothfastlye that she is more than all that God made beneath her in worthiness and in fulhede.⁸ For abovene her is nothing that is made but the blessed manhede⁹ of Christ.

¹ right nought Nothing at all; betwyxe Betwixt, between.

² made me ... restored Created and joyfully redeemed me for this purpose.

³ gastelye ... likeness Spiritually, but in physical form; simple Humble or innocent; in the stature ... conceived At the stage of growth she was in when she conceived. Most medieval scholars thought Mary to have been close to fifteen when she became pregnant.

⁴ trowthe of her soul Faithfulness of her soul; the reverent ... beheld The reverent contemplation with which she looked upon; mervelande Marveled.

⁵ her marvelling What she marveled at; made Created, with a pun on "handmaiden" and "maiden" (i.e., virgin).

⁶ knawande Knowing; litellehede Littleness; mekehe Humbly, obediently, graciously.

⁷ Lo me ... handmaiden See Luke 1.38: "And Mary said, Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word."

⁸ sothfastlye Truly; more Greater; fulhede Abundance, perfection.

⁹ abovene Above; manhede Humanity.

[ORIGINAL SPELLING]

This litille thinge that es made that es benethe oure ladye Saint Marye, God shewed it unto me als litille as it hadde beene a haselle notte. Methought it might hafe fallene for litille.

In this blissede revelation God shewed me thre noughtes, of whilke noughtes this is the firste that was shewed me. Of this nedes ilke man and woman to hafe knowinge that desires to lyeve contemplifelye, that him like to nought alle thinge that es made for to hafe the love of God that es unmade. For this es the cause why thaye that er occupiede wilfullye in erthelye besines, and evermare sekis warldlye wele, er nought all in ese in herte and in saule: for thaye love and seekes here reste in this thinge that is so litille, whare no reste is in, and knowes nought God, that es alle mighty, alle wise, and alle goode. For he is varraye reste. God wille be knawen, and him likes that we reste us in him. For alle that ar benethe him suffices nought to us. And this is the cause why that na saule is restede to it be noghthed of alle that es made. When he is noughthid for love to hafe him that is alle that is goode, than es he abyllle to resayve gostlye reste.

[MODERN SPELLING]

This little thing that is made that is beneath¹ our lady Saint Mary, God shewed it unto me as little as it had been a hazelnut. Methought it might have fallen for little.

In this blessed revelation God shewed me three noughtes, of whilke noughtes this is the first² that was shewed me. Of this needs ilke man and woman to have knowing that desires to live contemplatively, that him like to nought all thing that is made for to have the love of God that is unmade.³ For this is the cause why they that are occupied wilfully in earthly besines, and evermore sekis worldly wele, are nought all in ese⁴ in heart and in soul: for they love and seekes here rest in this thing that is so little, where no rest is in, and knowes nought God, that is all mighty, all wise, and all good. For he is varraye rest. God will be known, and him likes that we rest us in him. For all that are beneath him suffices nought to⁵ us. And this is the cause why that no soul is rested to it be noghthed of⁶ all that is made. When he is noughthid⁷ for love to have him that is all that is good, than is he able to receive gostlye rest. . . .

¹ is beneath Is lesser than, but possibly also literally beneath. This paragraph may reference Revelations 12.1: "And there appeared a great wonder in heaven; a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars."

noughtes Zeros; whilke Which; this is the first I.e., the first of the three "noughts" is shown in this revelation of the hazelnut. The first "nought" is the nothingness of the created world without God; the other two are described elsewhere in the text. The second is sin and the reduction to nothing of the Devil, and the third is the humiliation and death suffered by Christ at his crucifixion.

³ Of this ... is unmade Every man and woman who desires to live contemplatively needs to know about this (first zero), so that he will be pleased to reject as nothing all that is created in order to have the love of God who is uncreated.

⁴ wilfully Deliberately; besines Business, affairs; sekis worldly wele Seek worldly prosperity; nought all in ese Not completely comfortable.

⁵ suffices nought to Is not enough for.

⁶ to it be noghthed of Until it is freed from.

⁷ noughthid This and the previous sentence pun on the dual meanings of "noughted," which can mean either "freed" or "effaced, valued as nothing."

10

After this, Christ shewed me a partye¹ of his passion near his dying. I saw that sweet face as it were dry and bloodless with pale dying; sithen more dede pale, langourande;² and then turned more dede to the blue; and sithene more blue, as the flesh turned more deep dede. For all the pains that Christ suffered in his body shewed to me in the blessed face, as farfurthe as I saw it, and namely in the lips, there I saw these four colours—they that I saw beforehand freshly and ruddy, lively and likande³ to my sight. This was a heavy change, to see this deep dying. And also the nose claungede⁴ and dried to my sight. This long pininge seemed to me as he had been a sevennight dead, allewaye sufferande⁵ pain. And methought the drying of Christ's flesh was the most pain of his passion and the last.

And in this dryhede was brought to my mind this worde that Christ said: "I thirst."⁶ For I saw in Christ a double thirst: one bodily, an other gastelye.⁷ This worde was shewed to me for the bodily thirst, and for the gastelye thirst was shewed to me as I shall say afterward.⁸ And I understood of bodily thirst that the body had failing of moisture, for the blessed flesh and bones were left alone withouten blood and moisture. The blessed body dried alone long time, with wringing of the nails and paysinge of the head and weight of the body, with blowing of wind from withouten that dried more, and pined him⁹ with cold more, than mine heart can think, and all other pains.

¹ partye Part.

² sithen Afterward; dede Deathly; langourande Languishing, suffering sickness.

³ as farfurthe as Insofar as; namely Particularly; likande Pleasing, beautiful, delicious.

⁴ claungede Withered.

⁵ pininge Suffering; as he had ... allewaye sufferande As if he had been dead for seven nights, always suffering.

⁶ dryhede Dryness; worde Word, phrase, or sentence; I thirst See John 19.28.

⁷ gastelye Spiritual.

⁸ as I shall say afterward Julian discusses the spiritual ("gastelye") thirst in section 15, not included in this anthology.

⁹ long time For a long time; wringinge Wrenching; paysinge Settling; pined him Caused him to suffer.

Swilke pains I saw that all is too little that I can tell or say, for it may nought¹⁰ be told. But ilke soul, after the saying of Saint Paule, should "feel in him that in Christ Jhesu."¹¹ This shewing of Christ¹² pains filled me full of pains. For I wate well he suffered nought but once, but as he would shewe it me and fill me with mind, as I had desired before.¹³

My mother, that stood emanges other and beheld me, lifted up her hand before my face to lokke mine eyen.¹⁴ For she wened I had been dead or else I had died.¹⁵ And this increased mekille¹⁶ my sorrow. For notwithstanding all my pains, I would nought have been letted¹⁷ for love that I had in him. And towthethere, in all this time of Christ's presence, I feled¹⁸ no pain but for Christ's pains. Then thought me, I knew full little what pain it was that I asked,¹⁹ for methought that my pains passed any bodily dede.²⁰ I thought: "Is any pain in hell like this pain?" And I was answered in my reason that "despair is more, for that is gastelye pain. But ¹⁰ Swilke Such; nought Not.

¹¹ ilke Every; Sainte Paule ... Jhesu See Philippians 2.5: "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus."

¹² Christ Christ's.

¹³ wate Know; he suffered ... shewe it me He suffered only once, except insofar as he would reveal it to me. I.e., Christ is not suffering the passion again, but is showing Julian a representation of it. See Hebrews 10.10: "we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all"; as I had desired before This experience grants Julian's desire to "have mind of Christ's passion"

¹⁴ My mother ... mine eyen This sentence marks a return to Julian's sick bed, from which she is experiencing the revelations; that Who; emanges other Among the others; lokke Close; eyen Eyes.

¹⁵ she wened ... had died She thought I had been dead for a while or else had just died.

¹⁶ mekille Greatly.

¹⁷ would nought have been letted Did not want to be hindered (from seeing Christ's suffering).

¹⁸ towthethere Nevertheless; feled Felt.

¹⁹ I knew ... I asked See Matthew 20.22; when the mother of the apostles James and John ask that her sons sit on either side of Jesus in his kingdom, Jesus says "Ye know not what ye ask. Are ye able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of, and to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?"

²⁰ passed ... dede Surpassed any bodily death.

bodily pain is nane¹ more than this. How might my pain be more than to see him that is all my life, all my bliss, and all my joy suffer?" Here feled I sothfastlye that I loved Christ so mekille aboven myself that methought it had been a great ese² to me to have died bodily.

Herein I saw in partye the compassion of our lady, Saint Mary. For Christ and she were so anede in love that the greatness of her love was the cause of the mekillehede³ of her pain. For so mekille as she loved him more than all othere, her pain passed alle othere. And so all his disciples and all his trewe⁴ lovers suffered pains more than their own bodily dying. For I am seker, by mine own feeling, that the least of them loved him more than they did thamsel⁵.

Here I saw a great aninge betwyx⁶ Christ and us. For when he was in pain, we were in pain, and all creatures that might suffer pain suffered with him. And they that knew him nought, this was their pain: that all creatures, sun and the moon, withdrew their service and so were they all left in sorrow for the time.⁷ And thus they that loved him suffered pain for love, and they that loved him nought suffered pain for failing of comfort of⁸ all creatures.

In this time I would have looked beside the cross, but I durst not, for I wiste well whiles I looked upon the cross I was seker⁹ and safe. Therefore I would nought assent to put my soul in peril, for beside the cross was no sykernes¹⁰, but ugliness of fiends. Then had I a profer in my reason, as if it had been friendly, isaide¹¹ to me "Look up to heaven to his father." Then saw I well, with the faith that I feled, that there were nothing betwyx the cross and heaven that might have desesed me, and other me behoved look up or else answer.¹² I answered and said: "Nay, I may not! For thou art mine heaven."¹³ This I said for I would not. For had I lever have been in that pain to doomsday,¹⁴ then have comen to heaven otherwise than by him. For I wiste well, he that bound me so sare¹⁵ should unbind me when he would.

II

Thus chose I Jhesu for my heaven, whom I saw only in pain at that time. Me liked no nothere heaven than Jhesu, whilke¹⁶ shall be my bliss when I am there. And this has ever been a comfort to me, that I chesed Jhesu to¹⁷ my heaven in all time of passion and of sorrow. And this has been a lerninge to me, that I should evermore do so, and choose only him to my heaven in wele and in wa.¹⁸

And thus saw I my lord Jhesu langoure¹⁹ long time. For the aninge of the godhede for love gave strength to the manhede²⁰ to suffer more than all men might. I mean not only more pain only than all men might suffer, but also that he suffered more pain than all men that ever was, fra²¹ the first beginning to the last day. No tongue may tell, ne heart fully think, the pains that our saviour suffered for us, haffande reward to the worthiness of the highest, worshipfulle king and to the shame-nane Not any.

² sothfastlye Truly; aboven Above; ese Relief.

³ anede United; mekillehede Magnitude, profundity.

trewe Faithful, genuine, spiritually right.

⁴ seker Certain; thamsel⁵ Themselves.

aninge (Cause of) union; betwyx Between.

⁷ all creatures ... for the time See Luke 23.44–45: At the sixth hour of the crucifixion "there was a darkness over all the earth until the ninth hour. And the sun was darkened, and the veil of the temple was rent in the midst"; creatures Divinely created beings.

⁸ for failing of comfort of Because of the failure of the comfort given by (or to).

⁹ wiste Knew; seker Secure.

¹⁰ sykernes¹¹ Security.

¹¹ profer Proposition; isaide Said.

¹² desesed Harmed; other me behoved ... else answer I must either look up or answer.

¹³ thou art mine heaven See Walter Hilton's late fourteenth-century mystic text The Scale of Perfection 2.33: "What is heaven to a reasonable soul? Sothly, not else but Jhesu God."

¹⁴ had I lever I would rather; doomsday Judgment Day.

¹⁵ sare Tightly.

¹⁶ no nothere No other; whilke Who.

¹⁷ chesed Chose; to To be.

¹⁸ lerninge Lesson; in wele and in wa In happiness and in misery.

¹⁹ langoure Languor, suffer.

²⁰ the aninge ... the manhede The unification through love of Christ's divinity with his manhood.

²¹ fra From.

ful, dispyttous, and painful dede.¹ For he that was highest and worthiest was fulliest noghthede and witterliest² despyded. But the love that made him to suffer all this, it passes as far all his pains as heaven is aboven³ earth. For the pains was a deed done in a time by the working of love. But love was withouten beginning, and is, and ever shall be without any end.

And suddenly, me behaldande in the same cross, he chancede into blissful chere.⁴ The changing of his chere changed mine, and I was all glad and merry as it was possible. Then brought our lord merrily to my mind: What is any pointe of⁵ thy pain or of thy grief? And I was full merry.

12

Then said our lord, askande: "Art thou well payde⁶ that I suffered for thee?" "Yea, good lord," quod I, "Gramercy good lord, blessed mut⁷ thou be!" "If thou be payede," quod our lord, "I am payede. It is a joy and a bliss and an endless liking⁸ to me that ever I suffered passion for thee. For if I might suffer more, I would suffer."

In this feeling, mine understanding was lifted up into heaven, and there I saw three heavens.⁹ Of the whilke sight I was greatly merveylede, and thought: "I saw three heavens, and all of the blessed manhede¹⁰ of Christ. And none is more, none is less, none is higher, none is lower, but even like in bliss." For the first heaven, shewed Christ me his father, but in no bodily likeness but in his properte and in his wyrkinge.¹¹ The wyrkinge of the father it is this: that he gives mede tille¹² his son Jhesu Christ. This gift and this mede is so blissful to Jhesu that his father might have given no mede that might have liked him better.¹³

For the first heaven, that is blessing of the father, shewed to me as a heaven, and it was full blissful. For he is full blessed with all the deeds that he has done about our salvation, wherefore we are nought only his through buying, but also by the curtayse gift of his father.¹⁴ We are his bliss, we are his mede, we are his wyrshippe,¹⁵ we are his crown. This that I say is so great bliss to Jhesu that he sets at nought his travaile and his hard passion, and cruel and shameful dede.¹⁶ And in these wordes—"If I might suffer more, I would suffer more"—I saw sothly that if he might die as oft as for everilke man once that shall be safe as he died once for all, love should never let him have rest to he had done it.¹⁷ And when he had done it, he would set it at nought for love, for all think him but little in regard of his love.¹⁸ And that shewed he me well soberly, sayande¹⁹ this worde: "If I might suffer more." He said not "if it were needful to suffer more," but, "if I might suffer more." For though it be nought needful and he might suffer more, more he would.

This dede and this werke about our salvation was as well as he might ordain it, it was done as wyrshipfullye

¹ ne Nor; haffande reward to Taking account of; worshipfulle Glorious; dispyttous Pitiless; dede Death.

² fulliest noghthede Most fully humiliated; witterliest Most utterly.

³ passes Surpasses; aboven Above.

⁴ me behaldande ... chere As I looked upon the same cross, his expression transformed into one of joy.

⁵ What is any pointe of What is the worth of any part of.

⁶ askande Asking; payde Satisfied.

⁷ quod Said; Gramercy Great thanks; mut May.

⁸ likinge Pleasure, delight.

⁹ three heavens In 2 Corinthians 12.2, Paul makes reference to a "third heaven."

¹⁰ Of the ... merveylede Which sight filled me with astonishment; of Here, both "for" and "consisting of"; manhede Humanity.

¹¹ shewed Christ me Christ showed me; in no ... wyrkinge Not a visual representation of his body but his character and activity.

¹² mede tille Reward to.

¹³ might have ... better Could have given him no reward that could have pleased him more.

¹⁴ we are ... his father We are not only his through buying (i.e., through his suffering, which "purchases" humanity's redemption) but also through the courtly (but also generous) gift of his father.

¹⁵ wyrshippe Honor, glorification.

¹⁶ sets at nought Considers to be nothing; travaile Suffering; dede Death.

¹⁷ wordes Words, phrases, or sentences; If I might If I could; I saw ... done it I saw truly that if he could die so often that he could die once for every person that will be saved, in the way he died once for everyone, love would never let him rest until he had done so.

¹⁸ all think ... his love All seems to him little in comparison with his love.

¹⁹ soberly Seriously, earnestly; sayande Saying.

as Christ might do it. And in this, I saw a full bliss in Christ, but this bliss should nought have been done full¹ if it might any better have been done than it was done. And in these three wordes—"It is a joy, a bliss, and an endless liking to me"—were shewed to me three heavens, as thus: for the joy, I understood the plesance² of the fater; for the bliss, the wirshippe of the son; and for the endless likinge, the holy ghost. The fadere is plesed, the son is worshipped,³ the holy ghost likes. Jhesu will that we take heed to this bliss that is in the blissedfulle trinity of our salvation, and that we like as mekille,⁴ with his grace, whiles we are here. And this was shewed me in this worde: "Art thou well payed?" By the tothere worde that Christ said—"if thou be payed, I am paid"—he shewed me the understanding,⁵ as if he had said: "It is joy and likinge enough to me, and I ask nought else for my travaile but that I might paye thee." Plenteously and fully was this shewed to me. Think also wiselye of the gretnesse⁶ of this worde: "That ever I suffered passion for thee." For in that worde was a high knowing of love and of likinge that he had in our salvation.

13

Full merrily and gladly our lord looked into his side and beheld, and said this worde⁷—"Lo, how I loved thee"—as if he had said: "My child, if thou can nought look in my godhede,⁸ see here how I let open my side, and my heart be cloven in twa, and let out blood and should nought ... done full Would not have been fully accomplished.

² plesance Delight, satisfaction.

³ worshipped Honored, glorified.

⁴ blissedfulle Blessed; like as mekille Take as much pleasure (as do the persons of the Trinity).

⁵ the tothere I.e., the latter; the understanding I.e., the understanding of "Art thou well paid?"

⁶ wiselye Intelligently; gretnesse Magnitude.

⁷ his side I.e., the wound in his side, one of the wounds sustained during the passion. See John 19.34: "one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith came there out blood and water"; worde Word, phrase, or sentence.

⁸ if thou ... godhede Even if you cannot contemplate my divinity.

water all that was therein. And this likes⁹ me, and so will I that it do thee." This shewed our lord me to make us glad and merry.

And with the same chere and mirthe he looked down on the right side, and brought to my mind where our lady stood in the time of his passion, and said: "Will thou¹⁰ see her?" And I answered and said: "Yea, good lord, gramercy,¹¹ if it be thy will." Oft times I prayed it, and wened¹² to have seen her in bodily likeness. But I saw her nought so. And Jhesu in that worde shewed me a gastelye¹³ sight of her. Right as I had before seen her litille and simple,¹⁴ right so he shewed her then high and noble and glorious and pleasant to him aboven all creatures. And so he will that it be known that all they that likes¹⁵ in him should like in her, and in the likinge that he has in her and she in him.

And in that worde that Jhesu said—"Will thou see her?"—methought I had the most likinge that he might have given me, with the gastelye shewing that he gave me of her. For our lord shewed me nothing in speciale¹⁶ but our lady Saint Mary. And her he shewed me in three times: the first was as she conceived; the second was as she were in her sorrows under the cross; and the third as she is now, in likinge, wirshippe,¹⁷ and joy.

And after this, our lord shewed him¹⁸ to me more glorified as to my sight than I saw him before. And in this was I lerede that ilke soul contemplative to whilke is given¹⁹ to look and seek God shall see her and pass unto God by contemplation.

⁹ likes Pleases.

¹⁰ chere Expression; mirthe Joy, spiritual bliss; where our ... passion Paintings of the crucifixion from this period typically show the Virgin Mary on Christ's right; Will thou Do you want to.

¹¹ gramercy Great thanks.

¹² wened Expected.

¹³ gastelye Spiritual.

¹⁴ litille I.e., young; simple Humble or innocent.

¹⁵ likes Delights.

¹⁶ in speciale Individually.

¹⁷ in three times On three occasions (in sections 4, 10, and 13); wirshippe Glory.

¹⁸ him Himself.

¹⁹ lered ... given Taught that every contemplative soul to whom it is given.

And after this teaching, hamelye, curtayse, and blissful and verray life,¹ oft times our lord Jhesu said to me: "I it am that² is highest. I it am that thou loves. I it am that thou likes. I it am that thou serves. I it am that thou langes.³ I it am that thou desires. I it am that thou menes.⁴ I it am that is all. I it am that holy church preaches thee and teaches thee. I it am that shewed me are to thee."⁵ These wordes I declare nought, but for ilke man, after the grace that God gives him in understanding and loving, receive them in our lord's meninge.⁶

And after, our lord brought unto my mind the longing that I had to him before.⁷ And I saw that nothing letted⁸ me but sin. And so I beheld generally in us all, and methought: "If sin had nought been, we should all have been clene and like to our lord⁹ as he made us." And thus in my folly before this time, oft I wondered why, by the great foreseande¹⁰ wisdom of God, sin was nought letted. For then thought me that all should have been well.

This stirring was mekille to forsake, and mourning and sorrow I made withouten reason and discretion of full great pride.¹¹ Nevertheless Jhesu in this vision informed me of all that me needed. I say nought that me nedes¹² no more teaching. For our lord, with the shewing of this, has left me to holy church; and I am hungry and thirsty and needy and sinful and frail, and wilfully submittes me to the teaching of holy church, with all mine evencristen,¹³ into the end of my life.

He answered by this worde and said: "Sin is behovelye."¹⁴ In this worde "sin," our lord brought to my mind generally all that is nought good: the shameful dispite and the utter noghtinge¹⁵ that he bare for us in this life and in his dying, and all the pains and passions of all his creatures, gastelye and bodily. For we are all in party noghted, and we should be noghted, followande our master Jhesu, to we be full¹⁶ purged: that is to say, to we be fully noghted of our own dedely flesh, and of all our inward affections whilke are nought good.¹⁷

And the beholding of this, with all the pains that ever were or ever shall be, all this was shewed me in a toch¹⁸ and readily passed over into comfort. For our good lord God would nought that the soul were afferde¹⁹ of this ugly sight. But I saw not sin. For I lefe it has no manner of substance, no partye of being, na it might nought be known but by the pains that it is cause of.²⁰ And this pain, it is something, as to my sight, for a time. For it purges us and makes us to know ourself and ask mercy. For the passion of our lord is comfort to us against all this, and so is his blessed will.²¹ And for the tender love that our good lord hath to all that shall be safe,²² he comforts readily and sweetly by his wordes, and says: "But all shall be well, and all manner of thing shall be well." These wordes were shewed well tenderly, shewande no manner of blame to me, na to nane²³ that

¹ hamelye Intimate; curtayse Courtly and polite; also beneficent and merciful; verray life True to life.

² I it am that I am the one who.

³ that thou langes For whom you long.

⁴ that thou menes To whom you direct your intention.

⁵ that shewed ... thee Who revealed myself before you.

⁶ ilke man Every person; meninge Intention.

⁷ to him For him; before I.e., before the revelation occurred.

⁸ letted Prevented.

⁹ clene ... lord As pure and as like our lord.

¹⁰ foreseande Foreseeing.

¹¹ This stirring ... pride This thought was much to be repudiated, and [yet] I mourned and sorrowed over it without reason or moderation with very great pride.

¹² nought that me nedes Not that I need.

¹³ wilfully submittes me Willingly submit myself; evencristen Fellow Christians.

¹⁴ behovelye Necessary, fitting, or good.

¹⁵ dispite Contempt; noghtinge Humiliation.

¹⁶ in party Partly; noghted Negated; followande Following; to we be full Until we are fully.

¹⁷ dedely Mortal; inward ... good Inner impulses which are not good.

¹⁸ toch Moment.

¹⁹ would nought ... afferde Did not want the soul to be afraid.

²⁰ For I ... cause of For I believe it has no kind of actuality, nor any share of existence, nor could it be apprehended except by the pain it causes.

²¹ so is his blessed will It is his blessed will that this is so (i.e., that his passion is a comfort to us).

²² that shall be safe Who will be saved.

²³ shewande Showing; na to nane Nor to anyone.

shall be safe. Then were it a great unkindness of me to blame or wonder of God for my sins, sen¹ he blames me not for my sin.

Thus I saw how Christ has compassion of us for the cause of sin.² And right as I was before with the passion of Christ fulfilled with pain and compassion, like in this I was in party filled with compassion of³ all mine even cristene. And then saw I that ilke kinde compassion⁴ that man has of his even cristene with charity, that it is Christ in him.

from *A Revelation of Love*⁵

THE FIFTY-EIGHTH CHAPTER

God, the blissful trinity, which is everlasting being, right as he is endless fro without beginning, right so it was in his purpose endless to make mankind; which fair kind first was dight to his own son, the second person.⁶ And when he would, by full accord of all the trinity, he made us all at once. And in our making he knit us and oned us to himself, by which oning we be kept as clene⁷ and as noble as we were made. By the virtue of that each⁸ precious oning we love our maker and like him, praise him and thank him and endlessly enjoy in him. And this is the werking which is wrought continually in each soul that shall be saved, which is the godly will before said.⁹ And thus in our making God almighty is our kindly father, and God all wisdom is our kindly mother, with the love and the goodness of the holy ghost, which is all one God, one lord. And in the knitting and in the oning he is our very true spouse, and we his loved wife and his fair maiden, with which wife he was never displeased. For he saith: "I love thee and thou lovest me, and our love shall never be departed¹⁰ in two."

I beheld the werking of all the blessed trinity, in which beholding I saw and understood these three properties: the property of the faderhed, and the property of the motherhed, and the property of the lordhede¹¹ in one God. In our father almighty we have our keping and our bliss, as anemptes our kindly¹² substance, which is to us by our making fro without beginning. And in the second person, in wit and wisdom, we have our keping, as anemptes our sensuality,¹³ our restoring, and our saving. For he¹⁴ is our mother, brother, and saviour. And in our good lord the holy ghost we have our rewarding and our yelding for our living and our travayle, and endlessly overpassing all that we desire in his marvelous curtesy¹⁵ of his high, plenteous grace.

For all our life is in three: in the first we have our being, and in the second we have our encresing,¹⁶ and in the third we have our fulfilling. The first is kinde, the second is mercy, the third is grace. For the first: I saw

¹ sen Since.

² compassion ... of sin Compassion for us by reason of sin.

³ right as Just as; like In the same way; compassion of Compassion for.

ilke kinde compassion Every natural feeling of compassion.

⁵ A Revelation of Love The following partially modernized text is based on the original spelling text of The Writings of Julian of Norwich, edited by Nicholas Watson and Jacqueline Jenkins. The notes in this version have been based upon their notes.

⁶ fro From; purpose endless Endless purpose; which fair kind Human nature; dight Assigned to; the second person The second person of the trinity, i.e., Christ.

⁷ oned United; oning Union; clene Pure.

⁸ that each That same.

⁹ werking Activity; the godly will before said In Chapter 38 (not included in this anthology), Julian explains that "in every soul that shall be saved is a godly will that never assented to sin, nor never shall. Right as there is a bestely [bestial] will in the lower party [part], that may will no good, right so there is a godly will in the higher party, which will is so good that it may never will evil, but ever good."

¹⁰ departed Parted.

¹¹ faderhed Fatherhood; motherhed Motherhood; lordhede Lordhood.

¹² keping Protection; anemptes Regards; kindely Essential, natural, created. In this passage, "kinde" is used to mean "being," "nature," and "creation," all treated as synonyms for "substance."

¹³ wit Mind, intellect; sensuality Sensual nature.

¹⁴ he Christ.

¹⁵ yelding Payment; travayle Suffering; curtesy Courtliness, also beneficence and mercy.

¹⁶ encresing Strengthening and growth (especially of virtues).

and understood that the high might of the trinity is our father, and the deep wisdom of the trinity is our mother, and the great love of the trinity is our lord. And all these have we in kinde and in our substantial making. And furthermore I saw that the second person, which is our mother substantially, the same derewurthy person is now become our mother sensual.¹ For we be double of God's making: that is to say, substantial and sensual. Our substance is the higher perty,² which we have in our father God almighty. And the second person of the trinity is our mother in kind in our substantial making, in whom we be grounded and rooted, and he is our mother of mercy in our sensuality taking.³

And thus our mother is to us diverse manner werking, in whom our pertes be kept undeperthed.⁴ For in our mother Christ we profit and encrease, and in mercy he reformeth us and restoreth, and by the virtue of his passion, his death, and his uprising oneth us to our substance. Thus worketh our mother in mercy to all his beloved children which be to him buxom⁵ and obedient. And grace werketh with mercy, and namely in two properties, as it was shewed, which werking longeth to⁶ the third person, the holy ghost: he werketh, rewarding and giving. Rewarding is large giving of truth that the lord doth to them that hath traveyled, and giving is a curtesse werking which he doth freely of grace, fulfilling and overpassing all that is deserved of creatures.⁷

Thus in our father God almighty we have our being. And in our mother of mercy we have our reforming and our restoring, in whom our partes be oned and all made perfite⁸ man. And by yelding and giving in grace of the holy ghost we be fulfilled. And our substance is in our father, God almighty, and our substance is in our mother, God all wisdom, and our substance is in our lord God the holy ghost, all goodness. For our substance is whole in each person of the trinity, which is one God. And our sensuality is only in the second person, Christ Jhesu, in whom is the father and the holy ghost. And in him and by him we be mightly taken out of hell and out of the wretchedness in earth, and wurshipfully brought up into heaven, and blissfully oned to our substance, encresed in riches and nobly⁹ by all the virtue of Christ, and by the grace and werking of the holy ghost.

THE SIXTIETH CHAPTER

But now me behoveth to say a little more of this forthspreading,¹⁰ as I understand in the mening of our lord: how that we be brought again, by the motherhed of mercy and grace, into our kindly stede where that we were made by the moderhed of kind love,¹¹ which kinde love never leaveth us.

Our kinde mother, our gracious mother, for he would all wholly become our mother in all thing, he took the ground¹² of his werke full low and full mildly in the maiden's womb. And that shewed he in the first, where he brought that meek maiden before the eye of my understanding, in the simple stature as she was when

¹ the second ... mother sensual The second person, who is mother to our substance, this same precious person has now become mother to our sensual nature. This statement refers to Christ's human incarnation.

² perty Part.

³ in our sensuality taking By taking our sensuality.

⁴ in whom ... undeperthed In whom our parts (i.e., substance and sensuality) are kept undivided.

⁵ buxom Compliant.

⁶ namely Particularly; as it was shewed Probably a reference to Chapter 48, not excerpted in this anthology; longeth to Belongs to, is fitting for.

⁷ curtesse Courteous, beneficent, merciful; of grace Out of grace; creatures Created beings.

⁸ perfite Perfect.

⁹ mightly Valiantly; wurshipfully Gloriously; richesse Wealth; nobly Nobility.

¹⁰ me behoveth ... forthspreading I need to say a little more about this spreading forth. In the previous chapter, omitted here, Julian describes three modes of understanding motherhood in God; one is "moderhed in werking [activity], and therein is a forthspreding by grace, of length and brede [breadth], of high [height] and of deepness without end."

¹¹ mening Intention; kindly stede Natural home; kind love Essential love.

¹² for he would ... all thing Because he wanted to become our mother in all things; ground Foundation.

she conceived:¹ that is to say, our high God, the sovereign wisdom of all, in this low place he arrayed him and dight him² all ready in our poor flesh, himself to do the service and the office of moderhode in all thing.

The mother's service is nearest, readiest, and sekerest:³ nearest, for it is most of kind; readiest, for it is most of love; and sekerest, for it is most of truth. This office ne might nor could never none done⁴ to the full but he alone.

We wit that all our mothers bear us to pain and to dying.⁵ Ah, what is that? But our very mother Jhesu, he alone beareth us to joy and to endless living—blessed mot⁶ he be! Thus he sustaineth us within him in love, and traveyled into the full time⁷ that he would suffer the sharpest throes and the grievousest pains that ever were or ever shall be, and died at the last. And when he had done, and so borne us to bliss, yet might not all this make aseeth to⁸ his marvellous love. And that shewed he in these high, overpassing words of love: “If I might suffer more, I would suffer more.” He might no more die, but he would not stinte of⁹ werking. Wherefore him behoveth to feed us, for the deerworthy¹⁰ love of moderhed hath made him debtor to us.

The mother may give her child suck her milk. But our precious mother Jhesu, he may feed us with himself, and doth full curtesly and full tenderly with the blessed sacrament that is precious food of very life.¹¹ And with all the sweet sacraments he sustaineth us full mercifully and graciously. And so ment he in these blessed wordes¹² where he said: “I it am that holy church preacheth thee and teacheth thee.” That is to say: “All the health and the life of sacraments, all the virtue and the grace of my worde, all the goodness that is ordained in holy church to thee,¹³ I it am.”

The mother may lay her child tenderly to her breast. But our tender mother Jhesu, he may homely lead us into his blessed breast by his sweet, open side, and shew us therein perty of the godhead and the joys of heaven, with gostely sekernesse¹⁴ of endless bliss. And that shewed he in the tenth,¹⁵ giving the same understanding in this sweet worde where he saith: “Lo, how I loved thee,” beholding into his blessed side, enjoying.

This fair, lovely worde, “mother,” it is so sweet and so kinde in itself that it may not verily be said of none, ne¹⁶ to none, but of him and to him that is very mother of life and all. To the property of moderhede longeth¹⁷ kind love, wisdom, and knowing; and it is God. For though it be so that our bodily forthbringing be but little, low, and simple¹⁸ in regard of our gostely forthbringing, yet it is he that doth it in the creatures by whom that it is done.

The kinde, loving mother that woot and knoweth the need of her child, she kepeth it full tenderly, as the kinde¹⁹ and condition of moderhed will. And ever as it

¹ in the first See Section 4 of A Vision Showed to a Devout Woman for a description of the vision of the Virgin Mary referenced here; it is similarly described in Chapter 4 of A Revelation of Love, not included in this anthology; in the simple ... conceived At the humble, lowly (or innocent) stage of growth she was in when she conceived.

² arrayed ... dight him Arrayed himself and prepared himself.

³ sekerest Surest.

⁴ This office ... done None but he alone might or could fully perform this office.

⁵ wit Know; to pain and to dying Into pain and death.

⁶ mot May.

⁷ traveyled into the full time Was in labor until the fullness of time. The phrase “the full time” means that he carried humanity to term, but also alludes to Ephesians 1.10, according to which God the Father’s plan is “That in the dispensation of the fullness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ.”

⁸ make aseeth to Give satisfaction to.

⁹ stinte of Stop.

¹⁰ him behoveth to He has to; deerworthy Precious.

¹¹ curtesly Courteously, beneficently, mercifully; very True; he may ... very life This passage refers to the practice of Communion, in which a congregation consumes bread and wine as the body and blood of Christ.

¹² ment Meant; wordes Words, phrases, or sentences.

¹³ that is ... to thee That is ordained for you by holy church.

¹⁴ homely Intimately; open side During his passion, Christ was wounded by a spear in his side; perty Part; gostely sekernesse Spiritual certainty.

¹⁵ the tenth The tenth vision described in A Revelation of Love (in Chapter 24, not included in this anthology); see A Vision Showed to a Devout Woman, Section 13, for a description of the same vision.

¹⁶ ne Nor.

¹⁷ longeth Belongs.

¹⁸ forthbringing Delivery; simple Humble.

¹⁹ kinde, loving Natural, loving; woot Knows; kepeth Protects; kinde Nature.

waxeth¹ in age and in statute, she changeth her werking, but not her love. And when it is waxed of more age, she suffereth it that it be chastised in breaking down of vices,² to make the child to receive virtues and grace. This werking, with all that be fair and good, our lord doth it in him by whom it is done.³

Thus he is our mother in kinde by the werking of grace in the lower perty,⁴ for love of the higher. And he will that we know it, for he will have all our love fastened to him. And in this I saw that all our debt that we owe by God's bidding to faderhod and moderhod is fulfilled in true loving of God, which blessed love Christ werketh in us. And this was shewed in all, and namely in the high plenteous wordes where he saith: "I it am that thou lovest."⁵

THE EIGHTY-SIXTH CHAPTER

This book is begun by God's gift and his grace, but it is not yet performed,⁶ as to my sight. For charity pray we all together, with God's wurking:⁷ thanking, trusting, enjoying. For thus will our good lord be prayed, by the understanding that I took in all his own mening, and in the sweet wordes⁸ where he saith full merrily: "I am ground⁹ of thy beseeching." For truly I saw and understood in our lord's mening that he shewed it for he will¹⁰ have it known more than it is. In which knowing he will give us grace to love him and cleave to him. For he behold his heavenly treasure with so great love on earth that he will give us more light and solace in heavenly joy, in drawing of our hearts fro¹¹ sorrow and darkness which we are in.

And fro the time that it was shewed, I desired oftentimes to witte¹² what was our lord's mening. And fifteen year after and more, I was answered in gostly¹³ understanding, saying thus: "What wouldest thou wit thy lord's mening in this thing? Wit it well, love was his mening. Who shewed it thee? Love. What shewed he thee? Love. Wherefore shewed he it thee? For love. Hold thee therein,¹⁴ thou shalt wit more in the same. But thou shalt never wit therein other withouten end." Thus was I lerned¹⁵ that love is our lord's mening. And I saw full sekerly in this and in all, that or God made us he loved us, which love was never sleked, ne never shall.¹⁶ And in this love he hath done all his werkes, and in this love he hath made all things profitable to us. And in this love our life is everlasting. In our making we had beginning, but the love wherein he made us was in him fro without beginning, in which love we have our beginning. And all this shall we see in God withouten end. Deo gracias.¹⁷

Explicit liber revelationum Juliane anachoretæ Norwich, cuius anime propicietur Deus.¹⁸

—LATE 14TH CENTURY

waxeth Grows.

² she suffereth ... vices She allows it to be punished to break down its vices.

³ our lord ... is done Our lord does it (this "werking" of parenting) in those by means of whom it is done.

⁴ Thus he ... perty So he is our mother in the natural sense through the working of grace in the lower part of the self. I.e., Christ is our actual mother in that he is in mothers and causes the good that they do.

⁵ namely Particularly; the high ... thou lovest The speech referenced appears in Chapter 26 of A Revelation of Love (not included in this anthology); see Section 13 A Vision Shewed to a Devout Woman for the same speech (with minor variations).

⁶ performed Fully perfected, completed, ornamented, or enacted.

⁷ wurking Activity.

⁸ thus will ... prayed This is how our good lord wants to be prayed to; mening Meaning, intention; wordes Words, phrases, or sentences.

⁹ ground Foundation.

¹⁰ for he will Because he wants to.

¹¹ fro From.

¹² witte Know.

¹³ gostly Spiritual.

¹⁴ Hold thee therein Hold yourself in love.

¹⁵ lerned Taught.

¹⁶ sekerly Certainly; or Before; sleked Satiated; ne never shall Nor never shall be.

¹⁷ Deo gracias Latin: Thanks be to God.

¹⁸ Explicit ... Deus Latin: here ends the book of the revelations of Julian, anchorite of Norwich, in whose soul may God be pleased.

MARGERY KEMPE

c. 1373 – 1439

Widely varying descriptions of Margery Kempe have been proposed in the past century—mystic, eccentric, feminist, lunatic, saint, fanatic, heretic, visionary—but for literary purposes, one point about her is central: hers is often considered the first extant autobiography written in English. Dictated to two different scribes, The Book of Margery Kempe describes the spiritual awakening and religious fervor of a medieval woman who could neither read nor write, but who had a wide and heartfelt knowledge of theology from listening to sermons and lectures. Modeling herself after various female saints (Bridget of Sweden and Katherine of Alexandria, for example), Kempe was herself on a self-described quest for sainthood; in her autobiography she describes the many obstacles that stood in her spiritual path, as well as her shrewd approaches to dealing with the impediments. Her willingness to challenge powerful men—including the Archbishop of York—and her determination to follow her calling at any cost make her story as fascinating as it is remarkable.

Margery Brunham Kempe's early life was typical of a prosperous woman of the fifteenth century. Her father was an important man in the affluent port town of Bishop's Lynn (now called King's Lynn) in Norfolk, England. John Brunham was five times mayor of the town, two times Member of Parliament, and he held various other estimable positions. At the age of 20 Margery married John Kempe, also of Bishop's Lynn; the couple had 14 children over the following 20 years. Kempe's autobiography begins with her marriage, although she mentions having committed some sin, possibly of a sexual nature, before the age of 20 and having felt deeply remorseful about it ever since; she seemed to feel that no amount of penance or atonement would redeem her. Following the difficult birth of her first child, Kempe, believing she was near death, called for a priest and attempted to confess her "crime." The priest's response was so unsympathetic and threatening that Kempe was not able to continue her confession, nor would she ever again mention her misdeed to anyone. She subsequently suffered what most modern readers would describe as a mental breakdown and experienced visions of the Devil and of Christ; she would endure many more travails before experiencing salvation.

At the age of 60, Kempe dictated an account of these travails and of the happiness she eventually found in God. Narrated in a colloquial and often non-chronological manner, her book describes her progress from a strong-willed wife who ran her own businesses to a strong-willed ascetic who renounced her family and her conjugal bed and set out on a series of pilgrimages. Kempe candidly describes the various ways in which she alienated both priests and laypeople wherever she went. Weeping and sobbing were not unusual occurrences in the medieval church, but Kempe's unrestrained crying and her obsessive discourse on religious topics annoyed many townsfolk and travelers and led some to believe that she was insane. More than once she was taken into custody as a heretic, only to use her wiles and her knowledge of Scripture to assuage (if not always win over) her accusers.

Although she had not lived with her husband for some years, when he suffered a bad accident Kempe rushed to his side and nursed him for several years until his death in 1431. While settled in Bishop's Lynn, she claimed to have performed a miracle that prevented the town from burning down, and her claim was widely believed. The last known mention of Kempe is in the town records of 1439, so she is presumed to have died around that time. These days Kempe is often studied alongside anchoress Julian of Norwich (in fact the two had once met when Kempe went to Julian to seek spiritual guidance), who also described mystical visions in her Revelations of Divine Love; Kempe's autobiography, however, affords greater insights into the lives of secular women and the lay spirituality of medieval England.

from *The Book of Margery Kempe*¹

THE PROEM

Here begins a short treatise, and a comforting one for sinful wretches, from which they can take great solace and comfort and understand the exalted and ineffable mercy of our sovereign Saviour Jesus Christ, whose name should be worshipped and exalted without end, who now in our time deigns to exercise His nobility and goodness upon us unworthy ones. All the works of our Savior serve as an example and instruction for us, and whatever grace He works in any creature is for our benefit, provided that a lack of charity does not hinder us.

And therefore, by leave of our merciful Lord Jesus Christ, for the exaltation of His Holy Name, Jesus, this little treatise will treat a small part of his wonderful works: how mercifully, how kindly, and how charitably He moved and stirred a sinful wretch² to love Him, a sinful wretch who for many years wished and intended, through the incitement of the Holy Spirit, to follow our Savior, and made great promises of fasting and many other acts of penance. And she was continually turned back from this in time of temptation, like a reed that bends with every wind and is never stable unless no wind blows, until the time when our merciful Lord Jesus Christ, taking pity and compassion on His handiwork and His creature, turned health into sickness, prosperity into adversity, honor into reproach, and love into hatred. With all these things turning upside down in this way, this creature, who for many years had gone astray and had always been unstable, was perfectly drawn and stirred to enter the way of noble righteousness, the righteous way that Christ our Savior exemplified in His own person. He trod it steadfastly and diligently prepared it.

Then this creature, whose way of life this treatise, through the mercy of Jesus, will partly show, was touched by the hand of our Lord with great bodily sickness, from which she lost her reason and her wits for a long time until our Lord restored her again by grace, as will be more clearly showed hereafter. Her worldly goods, which were plenteous and abundant at that time, shortly afterward became quite worthless and meager. Then pomp and pride were cast down and laid aside. Those who had honored her before reproached her most sharply; her kin and those who had been her friends were now her greatest enemies. Then she, considering this astonishing change, seeking help under the wings of her spiritual mother, Holy Church, went and submitted herself to her spiritual father, accusing herself of her misdeeds, and then did great bodily penance.

And in a short time our merciful Lord endowed this creature with plenteous tears of contrition, day by day, to such an extent that some men said she could weep at will, and slandered the work of God. She was so accustomed to being slandered and reproached, to being chided and rebuked by the world on account of the grace and virtue with which she was endowed through the strength of the Holy Spirit, that it was a kind of solace and comfort to her when she suffered any unhappiness for the love of God and for the grace that God worked in her. For the more slander and reproach that she suffered, the more she increased in grace and in devotion to holy meditation and deep contemplation and in the wonderful speech and conversation that our Lord spoke and provided in her soul, teaching her how she would be despised for love of Him, how she should have patience, putting all her trust, all her love, and all her affection in Him alone. She knew and understood many secret and hidden things that were going to happen afterward, by inspiration of the Holy Spirit. And often, while she was engaged in such holy speech and conversation, she would weep and sob so much that many people were greatly astonished, for they little knew how much at home our Lord was in her soul. Nor could she herself ever tell the grace that she felt, it was so heavenly, so high above her reason and her bodily wits, and her body was so weak when grace was present in her that she could never express it in words as she felt it in her soul.

¹ The Book ... Kempe The text has been translated from the Middle English for this anthology by Claire Waters.

² 'a sinful wretch' Kempe refers to herself in the third person throughout her text.

Then this creature was very much afraid of illusions and deceptions by her spiritual enemies. She went, at the bidding of the Holy Spirit, to many estimable learned men, both archbishops and bishops, teachers of divinity and scholars as well. She also spoke with many anchor-esses¹ and showed them her way of life and the grace that the Holy Spirit, in His goodness, worked in her mind and in her soul, as well as her wits allowed her to express it. And all those to whom she showed her secrets said that she should greatly love our Lord for the grace that He showed her, and they counseled her to follow her movings and stirrings and trustingly believe they were from the Holy Spirit and not from an evil spirit.

Some of these worthy and estimable clerks accepted, on the peril of their souls and as they would answer to God for it, that this creature was inspired by the Holy Spirit, and asked her to have written and made for them a book of her experiences and her revelations. Some offered to write down her experiences with their own hands, and she would not by any means consent, for she was commanded in her soul not to write so soon. And so it was twenty years and more from the time when this creature had her first experiences and revelations before she had any of them written down. Afterward, when it pleased our Lord, He commanded and charged her that she should have her experiences and revelations and way of life written down so that His goodness might be known to all the world.

The creature had no writer who would fulfil her desire or give credence to her experiences until the time when a man living in Germany, who was an Englishman by birth and later was married in Germany and had both a wife and child there, having good knowledge of this creature and of her desire, moved, I trust, by the Holy Spirit, came to England with his wife and his belongings and lived with the aforementioned creature until he had written as much as she would tell him during the time they were together. And then he died. Then there was a priest for whom this creature had great affection, and so she conversed with him about this matter and brought him the book to read. The book was so badly written that he could do little with it, for it was neither good English nor German, and the letters were not shaped or formed as other letters are. Therefore the priest fully believed that no one would ever be able to read it, unless it were by special grace. Nevertheless, he promised her that if he could read it he would with good will copy it out and write it better.

Then there was such ill spoken of this creature and of her weeping that the priest, out of cowardice, did not dare speak with her often, and would not write as he had promised the aforementioned creature. And so he avoided and deferred the writing of this book well into the fourth year or more, despite the fact that the creature often asked him for it. At last he said to her that he could not read it, and so he would not do it. He would not, he said, put himself in danger from it. Then he advised her to go to a good man who had been well acquainted with the man who first wrote the book, on the supposition that he would be best able to read the book, for he had sometimes read letters in the other man's writing that were sent from overseas while he was in Germany. And so she went to that man, asking him to write this book down and never to let it be known as long as she lived, and granting him a large portion of goods for his labor. And this good man wrote about a page, and yet it was not much help, for he could not do much with it, the book was so badly presented and so poorly written.

Then the priest was troubled in his conscience, for he had promised her to write this book, if he could manage to read it, and had not done his part as well as he could have, and he asked this creature to get the book back if she were able. Then she got the book back and brought it to the priest with a glad face, asking him to do his best, and she would pray to God for him and get him grace to read and also to write it. The priest, trusting in her prayers, began to read this book, and it was much easier, it seemed to him, than it had been before. And so he read it over in this creature's presence, every word, with her sometimes helping him when there was any difficulty.

¹ anchoresses Female religious ascetics who secluded themselves and devoted their lives to God.

This book is not written in order, each thing after another as it was done, but just as the material came to the creature's mind when it was being written down, for it was so long before it was written that she had forgotten the time and the order in which things happened. And therefore she had nothing written down unless she knew for certain it was really true. When the priest first began to write this book, his eyes failed him so that he could not see to form his letters, nor could he see to mend his pen. Everything else he could see well enough. He set a pair of spectacles on his nose, and then it was even worse than it had been before. He complained to the creature of his trouble. She said his enemy resented his good deed and would prevent him if he could, and she told him to do as well as God would give him grace to do, and not to stop. When he went back to his book, he could see as well, it seemed to him, as he had ever done before, by both daylight and candlelight. And for this reason, when he had written a quire,¹ he added a leaf to it, and then wrote this prologue to be clearer than the next one is, which was written before this one. *Anno domini*² 1436.

THE PREFACE

A short treatise of a creature living in great pomp and worldly pride, who then was drawn to our Lord by great poverty, sickness, shame, and great reproaches in many diverse countries and places, some of which tribulations will be depicted below, not in order as they happened but as the creature was able to recall them when it was written, for it was twenty years and more from the time when this creature had forsaken the world and eagerly devoted herself to our Lord before this book was written, even though this creature was greatly advised to have her tribulations and experiences written down, and a Carmelite friar³ offered to write them willingly, if she would agree. And she was warned in her spirit that she should not write so soon. And many years afterward she was bidden in her spirit to write. And yet then it was first written by a man who wrote neither good English nor German, so it was unreadable except by special grace, for there was so much malicious talk and slander of this creature that few people would believe her. And so at last a priest was greatly moved to write this treatise, and he could not easily read it for four whole years. And then at the request of this creature and the urging of his own conscience he tried again to read it, and it was much easier than it had been previously. And so he began to write in the year of our Lord 1436, on the day after Mary Magdalene's day,⁴ according to the information of this creature.

from BOOK 1

CHAPTER 1

When this creature was twenty years old or a little more, she was married to a respected townsman and was pregnant within a short time, as nature would have it. And after she had conceived, she was afflicted with great fever until the child was born, and then, because of the labor she had in giving birth and the sickness that had gone before, she despaired of her life, believing she might not survive. And then she sent for her spiritual father, for she had something on her conscience that she had never told before that time, in all her life. For she was always prevented by her enemy, the devil, continually saying to her while she was in good health that she did not need confession but should ³ Carmelite friar Monk of the religious order of Our Lady of Mount Carmel, founded in the twelfth century; Kempe refers here to Alan of Lynn.

⁴ Mary Magdalene's day 23 July.

quire Four large sheets of paper folded to create eight sheets.

² Anno domini Latin: In the year of our Lord.

do penance alone, by herself, and all would be forgiven, for God is merciful enough. And therefore this creature often did great penance by fasting on bread and water, and other charitable deeds with devout prayers, but she would not tell it in confession. And whenever she was sick or unwell, the devil said in her mind that she would be damned, for she was not absolved of that sin. Therefore, after the child was born, she, not trusting she would live, sent for her spiritual father, as was said before, with the full intention of being absolved for her entire life, as near as she could. And when she came to the point of saying the thing that she had concealed for so long, her confessor was a little too hasty, and began sharply to rebuke her before she had said everything she meant to, and so she would say no more for anything he could do.

And then, on account of the fear she had of damnation, on the one hand, and his sharp reproofs on the other hand, this creature went out of her mind and was terribly troubled and harassed by spirits for half a year, eight weeks and some days. And in this time she saw, as it seemed to her, devils opening their mouths, all aflame with burning flames of fire as though they would swallow her in, sometimes raging at her, sometimes threatening her, sometimes pulling her and dragging her, night and day, during this time. And also the devils cried out at her with great threats and told her to forsake her Christianity, her faith, and deny her God, His mother, and all the saints in heaven, her good works and all good virtues, her father, her mother, and all her friends. And so she did. She slandered her husband, her friends and her own self; she spoke many reproving words and many harsh words; she knew no virtue or goodness; she desired all wickedness; just as the spirits tempted her to say and do, so she said and did. She would have destroyed herself many times at their instigation, and been damned with them in hell. And in demonstration of this, she bit her own hand so violently that it could be seen for the rest of her life afterward. And she tore the skin of her body above her heart with her nails pitilessly, for she had no other instrument, and she would have done worse except that she was bound and strongly restrained both day and night, so that she could not do what she wished.

And when she had been oppressed for a long time by these and many other temptations, so that no one thought she would escape or live, then at one point, as she lay alone and her keepers were away, our merciful Lord Jesus Christ, who is ever to be trusted, worshiped be His name, never forsaking His servant in time of need, appeared to His creature, who had forsaken Him, in the likeness of the loveliest, most beauteous, most pleasing man who could ever be seen with human eye, wearing a mantle of purple silk, sitting on her bedside, looking upon her with such a blessed face that she was strengthened in all her spirits, and He said to her these words: "Daughter, why have you forsaken me, and I never forsook you?"

And at once, as He said these words, she saw truly how the air opened, as bright as any light, and He rose up into the air, not hastily or quickly, but gently and easily so that she could see Him well in the air until it closed again.

And at once the creature was confirmed in her wits and her reason as well as she had ever been before, and asked her husband, as soon as he came to her, to give her the keys of the cellar so that she could get her food and drink as she had done before. Her maids and her keepers advised him not to give her any keys, for they said she would just give away whatever goods there were, for they believed she did not know what she was saying. Nevertheless, her husband, still having tenderness and compassion for her, commanded them to give her the keys. And she ate and drank as well as her bodily strength would allow her, and recognized her friends and her household and everyone else who came to her to see how our Lord Jesus Christ had worked His grace in her, so blessed may He be who is always near in tribulation. When people think He is far from them, He is very near, by His grace. Then this creature did all the other tasks that fell to her wisely and soberly enough, but she did not truly know the ecstasy of our Lord.

CHAPTER 2

And when this creature had in this way, by grace, come to herself again, she thought she was indebted to God and that she would be His servant. Still, she would not leave the pride and pompous display that she had been accustomed to beforehand, either at her husband's or at anyone else's advice. And yet she knew full well that men said many bad things of her, for she wore ornaments of gold wire on her head and her hoods were fringed with tassels. Her cloaks were fringed as well and decorated with many colors between the fringes, so that they would be more striking to men's eyes and she herself would be more admired. And when her husband would tell her to leave her pride, she answered harshly and sharply and said that she came from such a worthy family that he could never have expected to marry her, for her father had once been mayor of the town N. and then was alderman of the noble Guild of the Trinity¹ in N., and therefore she would defend the honor of her kin whatever anyone said.

She was very envious of her neighbours if they were dressed as well as she was. All her desire was to be admired by people. She would not be warned by any chastisement nor be content with the goods God had given her, as her husband was, but always wanted more and more. And then, for pure greed and to support her pride, she began to be a brewer, and was one of the main brewers in the town of N. for three or four years until she lost a great deal of money, for she had no experience at it. For no matter how good her servants were, nor how knowledgeable about brewing, it would never ferment with them. For when the air was standing as nicely under the froth as anyone could see, suddenly the froth would fall down so that all the ale was lost, one brewing after another, so that her servants were ashamed and would not stay with her.

Then this creature thought of how God had punished her previously and she would not take the warning, and now again by the loss of her goods, and then she left it and did no more brewing. And then she asked her husband's pardon for not following his advice before, and she said that her pride and sin were the cause of all her punishment and that she would make good what she had done wrong, with good will. And yet she did not entirely leave the world, for now she thought of a new business. She had a horse-mill. She got two good horses and a man to grind people's corn and in this way she thought she would make her living. This plan did not last long, for a short while after, on the eve of Corpus Christi,² this marvel took place. The man was in good bodily health, and his two horses, which were strong and healthy, had pulled well in the mill before, but now he took one of these horses and put it in the mill as he had done before, and the horse would not pull at all in the mill, for anything the man might do. The man was upset and tried with all his wits to think how he could get the horse to pull. Now he led him by the head, now he beat him, now he coaxed him, and all to no avail, for he would rather go backward than forward. Then the man set a sharp pair of spurs on his heels and rode on the horse's back to make him pull, and still it was no better. When the man saw that it was not going to work, he put the horse back in the stable and gave him food, and he ate well and heartily. And then he took the other horse and put him in the mill, and just as his companion had done, so he did, for he would not pull for anything the man might do. And then the man gave up his position and would no longer stay with the aforesaid creature.

As soon as it was reported around the town of N. that no man or beast would work for the said creature, some said she was cursed; some said God took open vengeance on her; some said one thing and some said another. And some wise men, whose minds were more grounded in a love of our Lord, said it was the divine mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ that called and cried to her from the pride and vanity of the wretched world. And then this creature, seeing all the adversity coming on every side, thought it was the scourges of our Lord that were chastising her for her sin. Then she asked God's mercy and forsook her pride, her greed, and her desire for worldly honor, and did great bodily penance, and began to enter the way of everlasting life, as will be told hereafter.

CHAPTER 3

One night, as this creature lay in bed with her husband, she heard the sound of a melody as sweet and delectable, alderman ... Guild of the Trinity Leader of an organization dedicated to the Holy Trinity that served as a social aid group; Kempe was inducted into the Guild in the 1440s.

² Corpus Christi Feast of the Blessed Sacrament, in early summer.

it seemed to her, as if she had been in Paradise. And at that she jumped out of bed and said, "Alas that ever I did sin; it is full merry in heaven."

This melody was so sweet that it surpassed, beyond comparison, all the melody that could ever be heard in this world, and caused this creature, when she heard any mirth or melody after that, to experience most plenteous and abundant tears of sincere devotion, and great sobbing and sighing after the bliss of heaven, without dreading the shame and spite of the wretched world. And after this spiritual ecstasy she always had in her mind the mirth and melody that were in heaven, so much so that she could not easily restrain herself from speaking of it. For, whenever she was in company, she would often say, "It is full merry in heaven."

And those who knew her previous behavior and now heard her speak so much of the bliss of heaven said to her, "Why do you talk in this way of the mirth that is in heaven? You do not know it, and you have not been there any more than we have," and they were angry with her because she would not hear any talk of worldly things as they did and as she had done before.

And after this time she never wished to have intercourse with her husband, for the debt of matrimony was so abominable to her that it seemed to her she would rather eat or drink slime, or the muck in the gutter, than to consent to any bodily intercourse, except out of obedience. And so she said to her husband, "I cannot deny you my body, but the love of my heart and my affection is drawn away from all earthly creatures and set only on God."

He would have his will, and she obeyed with great weeping and lamenting because she could not live chastely. And often this creature lived chastely, advised her husband to live chastely, and said that she knew well that they had often displeased God by their excessive love and the great enjoyment that they both had in sleeping together, and now it was right that they should, by the will and consent of both of them, both punish and chastise themselves deliberately by abstaining from their bodily lust. Her husband said it would be good to do so, but that he could not yet, and he would when God wished him to. And so he slept with her as he had done before, he would not restrain himself. And she continually prayed to God that she might live chastely, and three or four years later, when it pleased our Lord, her husband made a vow of chastity, as will be written hereafter by leave of Jesus.

And also, after this creature heard this heavenly melody, she did great bodily penance. She was confessed sometimes twice or three times in a day, and especially of that sin that she had so long concealed and hidden, as is written in the beginning of the book. She gave herself to great fasting and keeping vigils. She got up at two or three o'clock and went to church, and stayed there in her prayers until noontime and also all afternoon. And then she was slandered and reproached by many people because she lived so strict a life. Then she got a rough haircloth¹ from a kiln, of the kind that men use to dry malt on, and put it under her gown as craftily and secretly as she could, so that her husband would not notice it, and he did not, even though she lay by him every night in bed and wore the haircloth every day, and bore children during this time.

Then she spent three years being greatly troubled by temptations, which she bore as meekly as she could, thanking our Lord for all His gifts, and was as happy when she was reproached, scorned, or jeered at for love of our Lord, as she had been before at worldly honor—indeed, much happier. For she knew full well that she had sinned greatly against God and was worthy of more shame and sorrow than any man could do to her, and that being despised by the world was the right path to heaven, since Christ Himself chose that path. All His apostles, martyrs, confessors and virgins, and all who ever came to Heaven, passed along the path of tribulation, and she desired nothing so much as Heaven. Then she was glad in her conscience when she believed that she was entering the path that would lead her to the place that she most desired. And this creature had contrition and great remorse, with plenteous tears and many loud sobs for her sins and for her unkindness to her maker. She contemplated her unkindness since her childhood, which our Lord would many times bring to her mind. And then she, beholding her own wickedness, could only lament and weep and keep praying for mercy and forgiveness. Her weeping was so plenteous and so continual that many people thought that she could weep and stop weeping at will, and therefore many people said she was a false hypocrite and wept for show, for support and worldly good. And then a great many forsook her who had loved her before, when she was in the world, and would not acknowledge her, and she continually thanked God for everything, desiring nothing but mercy and forgiveness of sin.

¹ haircloth Coarse shirt made from animal hair and worn by penitents.

from CHAPTER 4

The first two years when this creature was drawn to our Lord in this way, she had great rest in spirit with regard to temptations. She could easily endure fasting, it did not cause her suffering. She hated the joys of the world. She felt no rebellion in her flesh. She was so strong, it seemed to her, that she feared no devil in hell, for she did such great bodily penance. She thought that she loved God more than He loved her. She was struck with the deadly wound of vainglory and did not feel it, for she desired many times that the crucifix should free His hands from the Cross and embrace her as a sign of love. Our merciful Lord Jesus Christ, seeing this creature's presumption, sent her, as is written above, three years of great temptations, of which I propose to write about one of the hardest, as an example to those who come after that they should not trust in themselves or have joy in themselves as this creature had, for assuredly our spiritual enemy does not sleep, but very busily searches our characters and our dispositions, and wherever he finds us weakest, there, by our Lord's permission, he lays his snare, which no one can escape by his own power. And so he laid before this creature the snare of lechery, when she thought that all fleshly lust had been wholly quenched in her. And for a long time she was tempted with the sin of lechery, in spite of anything she could do. And yet she often went to confession, she wore the haircloth and did great bodily penance and wept many a bitter tear, and very often prayed to our Lord that he should preserve her and keep her so that she should not fall into temptation, for she thought she would rather be dead than consent to that. And all this time she had no desire to have intercourse with her husband, but found it very painful and horrible.

In the second year of her temptations it so happened that a man she loved well said to her on the eve of St. Margaret's Day, before evensong,¹ that come what may he would lie by her and have his bodily pleasure, and she would not withstand him, for if he could not have his will this time, he said, he would have it another time, she had no choice. And he did it to test what she would do, but she thought he meant it entirely in earnest at that time, and said little in reply. So then they parted from one another and both went to hear evensong, for she attended St. Margaret's Church. This woman was so intent on the man's words that she could not hear evensong, or say her Lord's Prayer, or think any other good thought, but was more troubled than she had ever been before. The devil put it into her mind that God had forsaken her, and otherwise she would not have been so tempted. She believed the devil's persuasion and began to consent because she could not think any good thought. Therefore she believed that God had forsaken her. And when evensong was over, she went to the man and said that he should have his desire, as she thought he had wished, but he dissimulated² so that she did not know what he meant, and so they parted from one another for the night.

This creature was so troubled and vexed all that night that she had no idea what to do. She lay beside her husband, and having intercourse with him was so loathsome to her that she could not endure it, although it was lawful for her and at a lawful time³ if she had wished. But she was continually thinking about the other man and about sinning with him, since he had spoken to her about it. At last she was overcome by the pressure of temptation and a lack of control, and consented in her mind, and went to the man to see if he would consent to her. And he said he would not do it for all the wealth in the world; he would rather be chopped up as small as meat for the cooking pot. She went away all ashamed and confused, seeing his stability and her own weakness. Then she thought of the grace

¹ St. Margaret's Day June 20th, feast of St. Margaret of Antioch, patron saint of pregnant women; evensong Vespers, or evening prayer.

² dissimulated Pretended not to understand her.

³ at a lawful time I.e., not during one of the many times when sex was prohibited—feast days, etc.

God had given her before, how she had had two years of great rest in her soul, repentance for her sins with many bitter tears of compunction,¹ and a perfect will never to return to her sins, but to be dead rather than do so, it seemed to her. And now she saw how she had consented to do sin in her will. Then she fell half into despair. She thought she was in hell, she had such sorrow. She thought she was not worthy of any mercy because her consent was so willingly given, and not worthy to do him service because she was so false to him. Nevertheless she was absolved² many times and often, and did whatever penance her confessor would order her to do, and was guided by the rules of the Church. God gave this creature that grace, blessed may He be, but He did not withdraw her temptation, but instead increased it, it seemed to her. And therefore she believed He had forsaken her and dared not trust in His mercy, but was oppressed by horrible temptations of lechery and despair for almost the whole rest of the year, except that our Lord, in His mercy, as she said herself, gave her almost every day two hours of compunction for her sins, with many bitter tears. And then she was troubled by the temptation to despair, as she had been before, and was as far from feeling grace as those who never felt it at all. And that she could not bear, and therefore she continually despaired. Except when she felt grace, her troubles were so overwhelming that she could hardly manage them, but continually mourned and lamented as though God had forsaken her. . . .

from CHAPTER II

It happened one Friday, on Midsummer Eve in very hot weather, as this creature was coming from the direction of York, carrying a bottle of beer in her hand, and her husband with a cake tucked in his coat, that he asked his wife this question: "Margery, if a man came along with a sword and was going to cut off my head unless I had natural intercourse with you as I have done before, tell me the truth of your conscience—for you say you will not lie: would you allow my head to be cut off, or would you allow me to sleep with you again as I once did?"

"Alas, sir," she said, "why do you raise this matter, we having been chaste these eight weeks?"

"Because I want to know the truth of your heart."

And then she said with great sorrow, "Truly I would rather see you be killed than that we should go back to our uncleanness."

And he said to her, "You are no good wife."

And then she asked her husband why he had not slept with her for eight weeks before, since she lay beside him every night in his bed. And he said he was so afraid when he went to touch her that he dared do no more.

"Now, good sir, amend yourself and ask God's mercy, for I told you nearly three years ago that you³ would be killed, and here it is the third year, and still I hope I shall have my wish.⁴ Good sir, I beg that you grant me what I ask, and I will pray that you may be saved through the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ, and you will have greater reward in heaven than if you wore a hairshirt or a coat of mail. I beg you, allow me to make a vow of chastity by the hand of whatever bishop God wills."

"No," he said, "that I will not grant you, for now I can sleep with you without deadly sin, and then I could not do so."

Then she said again, "If it is the will of the Holy Spirit to fulfil what I have said, I pray God that you may consent to it; and if it is not the will of the Holy Ghost, I pray God you never consent."

Then they went on toward Bridlington in very hot weather, the aforesaid creature in a state of great sorrow and great fear for her chastity. And as they passed by a Cross, her husband sat himself down under the Cross, calling his wife to him and saying these words to her: "Margery, grant me my desire, and I shall grant you yours. My first desire is that we should continue to lie together in one bed as we have done before; the second that you shall pay my debts before you go to Jerusalem; and the third that you should eat and drink with me on a Friday as you used to do."

"Nay, sir," she said, "to break the Friday I will never grant you while I live."

"Well," he said, "then I shall sleep with you again."

¹ compunction Remorse.

² she was absolved I.e., absolved of her sins through the sacrament of Confession.

³ you I.e., your sexual desire.

⁴ my wish To live chastely.

She asked him to give her leave to make her prayers, and he granted it willingly. Then she kneeled down beside a Cross in the field and prayed in this manner, with a great abundance of tears: "Lord God, You know all things; You know what sorrow I have had to be chaste in my body for You these three years, and now I could have my will and I dare not for love of You. For if I were to break that custom of fasting that You commanded me to keep on Fridays, without meat or drink, I would now have my desire. But, blessed Lord, you know I will not go against Your will, and now my sorrow is great unless I find comfort in You. Now, blessed Jesus, make Your will known to me unworthy, that I may follow it and fulfil it with all my might."

And then our Lord Jesus Christ with great sweetness spoke to this creature, commanding her to go back to her husband and ask him to grant what she desired. "And he shall have what he desires. For, my most worthy daughter, this was the reason that I told you to fast, so that you should sooner obtain and get your desire, and it is granted you. I do not wish you to fast any longer, therefore I bid you in the name of Jesus, eat and drink as your husband does."

Then this creature thanked our Lord Jesus Christ for His grace and His goodness, and then rose up and went to her husband, saying to him, "Sir, if it please you, you shall grant me my desire, and you shall have your desire. Grant me that you shall not come into my bed, and I grant you to pay your debts before I go to Jerusalem. And put my body at God's disposal so that you never make any claims on me to ask me for any marriage debt after this day as long as you live, and I will eat and drink on Fridays at your bidding."

Then her husband said in reply, "May your body be as much at God's disposal as it has been at mine." This creature greatly thanked God, rejoicing that she had her desire, and asking her husband that they might say three Our Fathers in honor of the Trinity for the great grace that He had given them. And so they did, kneeling under a Cross, and then they ate and drank together in great gladness of spirit. This was on a Friday, on Midsummer Eve. Then they went on toward Bridlington and also to many other regions and spoke with God's servants, both hermits and recluses and many other lovers of our Lord, as well as many worthy clerks, doctors of divinity, and also scholars in many various places. And this creature showed to various of them her experiences and her contemplations, as she was commanded to do, to know if there were any deception in her experiences. . . .

CHAPTER 50

When she got to York, she went to an anchoress who had loved her well before she went to Jerusalem to find out about her spiritual progress, and also wishing, for more spiritual conversation, to eat with the anchoress that day nothing but bread and water, for it was Our Lady's Eve.¹ And the anchoress would not receive her, for she had heard so much evil spoken of her. So she went off to other strangers and they made her very welcome for the love of our Lord.

One day, as she sat in a church in York, our Lord Jesus Christ said in her soul, "Daughter, there is much tribulation coming to you."

She was somewhat dejected and upset at that, and therefore, sitting still, she did not answer. Then our blessed Lord said again, "What, daughter, are you unwilling to suffer more tribulation for love of Me? If you do not wish to suffer any more, I will take it away from you."

And then she said in reply, "Nay, good Lord, let me be at Your will and make me mighty and strong to suffer all that You will ever wish me to suffer, and grant me meekness and patience as well."

And so, from that time forward, knowing it was our Lord's will that she suffer more tribulation, she received it willingly when our Lord wished to send it, and thanked Him greatly for it, being truly glad and merry on any day when she suffered any misfortune. And over the course of time, she was not as merry nor as glad on a day when she suffered no tribulation as on a day when she did suffer tribulation.

Then, when she was in the aforementioned Minster² at York, a clerk came to her, saying, "Damsel, how long will you stay here?"

¹ Our Lady's Eve The eve of the Feast of St. Mary, i.e., 1 September.

² Minster Large church.

"Sir," she said, "I plan to stay for the next fourteen days."

And so she did. And in that time many good men and women asked to meet her and made her warmly welcome and were very glad to hear her conversation, marvelling greatly at the fruitfulness of her speech. And she also had many enemies who slandered, scorned and despised her, of whom one, a priest, came to her while she was in the said minster and, taking her by the collar of her gown, said, "You wolf, what is this cloth that you have on?"¹

She stood still and would say nothing on her own behalf. Young men from the monastery who were going by said to the priest, "Sir, it is wool."

The priest was annoyed because she would not answer, and began to swear many great oaths. Then she spoke on God's behalf; she was not afraid. She said, "Sir, you should keep God's commandments and not swear so carelessly as you do."

The priest asked her who kept the commandments.

She said, "Sir, those who keep them."

Then he said, "Do you keep them?"

She said in reply, "Sir, it is my will to keep them, for I am bound to do so, and so are you and every man who will be saved at last."

When he had grumbled at her for some time, he went away secretly before she was aware of it, so that she did not know what became of him.

CHAPTER 52

There was a monk who was going to preach in York, who had heard much slander and much evil talk about the said creature. And when he was going to preach there was a great multitude of people there to hear him, and she was present with them. And so, when he was giving his sermon, he discussed many matters so openly that the people easily gathered that it was because of her, for which reason her friends who loved her well were very distressed and upset about it, and she was much happier, for she had something to test her patience and her charity, by which she hoped to please our Lord Jesus Christ. When the sermon was done, a doctor of divinity who loved her well, along with many others, also came to her and said, "Margery, how are things with you today?"

"Sir," she said, "very well, blessed be God. I have reason to be truly merry and glad in my soul if I can suffer anything for His love, for He suffered much more for me."

Soon after there came a man who loved her well with a good will, along with his wife and others, and led her seven miles from there to the Archbishop of York, and brought her into a handsome room, and a good clerk came in, saying to the good man who had brought her there, "Sir, why have you and your wife brought this woman here? She will sneak away from you, and cause you to be disgraced."

The good man said, "I dare well say that she will remain, and be here to answer for herself with a good will."

The next day she was brought into the Archbishop's chapel, and many of the Archbishop's household came in, scorning her, calling her "Lollard"² and "heretic," and they swore many a horrible oath that she would be burned. And she, through the strength of Jesus, said in reply to them, "Sirs, I fear you will be burned endlessly in hell unless you improve yourselves with regard to your swearing, for you do not keep God's commandments. I would not swear as you do for all the goods of this world."

Then they went away as if they were ashamed. She then, making a silent prayer, asked grace to behave herself that day in the way that would be most pleasing to God and profit to her own soul and a good example to her fellow Christians. Our Lord, answering her, said it would be just so. At last the said Archbishop came into the chapel with his clerks, and said sharply to her, "Why do you wear white? Are you a maiden?"³

She, kneeling on her knees before him, said, "No, sir, I am no maiden; I am a wife."

¹ "You wolf ... have on?" See Matthew 7.15: "Beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves."

² Lollard Follower of theologian John Wycliffe (1330–84), considered by some to be a heretic because of his severe criticisms of corruption in the institutional church and the failings of the clergy, as well as his views on certain church doctrines.

³ maiden Virgin.

He commanded his people to fetch a pair of shackles and said she would be shackled, for she was a false heretic. And then she said, "I am no heretic, nor shall you prove me to be one."

The Archbishop went away and let her stand there alone. Then she prayed for a long while to our Lord God Almighty to help her and support her against all her enemies, spiritual and bodily, and her flesh trembled and shuddered terribly so that she wanted to put her hands under her clothing in order that it would not be seen.

Then the Archbishop came back into the chapel with many worthy clerks, among whom was the same doctor who had examined her before and the monk who had preached against her a little while before in York. Some of the people asked whether she was a Christian woman or a Jew; some said she was a good woman and some said not. Then the Archbishop took his seat, and her clerks also, each of them according to his rank, there being many people present. And in the time while the people were gathering together and the Archbishop taking his seat, the said creature stood to the back, making her prayers with deep devotion for help and succor against her enemies, for such a long time that she melted all into tears. And at last she cried out loudly as well, so that the Archbishop and his clerks and many people were astonished at her, for they had not heard such crying out before.

When her crying had passed she came before the Archbishop and fell on her knees, the Archbishop saying rudely to her, "Why do you weep like that, woman?"

She, answering, said, "Sir, you will wish some day that you had wept as hard as I."

And shortly, after the Archbishop had put to her the articles of our faith, which God gave her grace to answer well and truly and readily without any great thought so that he could not find fault with her, then he said to the clerks, "She knows her faith well enough. What shall I do with her?"

The clerks said, "We know well that she knows the articles of the faith, but we will not allow her to remain among us, for the people have great faith in her conversation, and perhaps she might lead some of them astray."

Then the Archbishop said to her, "I hear bad reports of you; I hear tell that you are a very wicked woman."

And she said back to him, "Sir, so I hear tell that you are a wicked man. And if you are as wicked as men say, you shall never get to heaven unless you mend your ways while you are here."

Then he said very rudely, "Why, you, what do people say about me?"

She answered, "Other people, sir, can tell you well enough."

Then a great clerk with a furred hood said, "Peace! You speak of yourself and let him be."

Then the Archbishop said to her, "Lay your hand on the book here in front of me and swear that you will leave my diocese as soon as you can."

"Nay, sir," she said, "I beg you, give me leave to go back to York to take leave of my friends."

Then he gave her leave for a day or two. She thought it was too short a time, so she said again, "Sir, I cannot leave this diocese so hastily, for I must stay and speak with good men before I go, and I must, sir, by your leave, go to Bridlington and speak with my confessor, who was the confessor of the good prior who is now canonized."

Then the Archbishop said to her, "You shall swear that you will not teach or scold the people in my diocese."

"Nay, sir, I will not swear," she said, "for I shall speak of God and rebuke those who swear great oaths wherever I go, until the time that the Pope and Holy Church have ordained that no one shall be so bold as to speak of God, for God Almighty does not forbid, sir, that we shall speak of Him. And moreover the Gospel mentions that when the woman had heard our Lord preach, she came before Him with a loud voice and said, 'Blessed be the womb that bore you and the breasts that gave you suck.' Then our Lord said in reply to her, 'Truly, so are they blessed who hear the word of God and keep it.'¹ And therefore, sir, it seems to me that the Gospel gives me leave to speak of God."

"Ah, sir," said the clerks, "here we truly think that she has a devil in her, for she speaks of the Gospel."²

¹ Blessed be the womb ... and keep it From Luke 11.27–28.

² she has a devil ... Gospel Reading the Scriptures in English was one of the major points of debate in the Lollard conflict. The Catholic Church did not wish the Bible to be [continued ...]

At once a great clerk brought forth a book and for his part quoted St. Paul against her, that no woman should preach.¹ She, in response to this, said, "I do not preach, sir; I go into no pulpit. I use only conversation and good words, and that I will do as long as I live."

Then a doctor who had examined her previously said, "Sir, she told me the worst stories about priests that I ever heard."

The Bishop commanded her to tell that story.

"Sir, with all due respect, I spoke only of one priest by way of example, whom, as I have been told, God allowed to go astray in a wood, for the profit of his soul, until night came upon him. He, lacking in shelter, found a pleasant garden in which he rested that night, which had a lovely pear tree in the middle, all covered and adorned with flowers and blooms delightful to see, to which there came a big, rough bear, huge to behold, shaking the pear tree and knocking down the flowers. This dreadful beast greedily ate and devoured those fair flowers. And when he had eaten them, turning his tail end toward the priest, he excreted them out again from his hind parts.

"The priest, greatly disgusted at this loathsome sight, and struck with great doubt about its meaning, went on his way the next day melancholy and pensive, when it happened that it met with a handsome, aged man who looked like a palmer² or pilgrim, who asked the priest the cause of his melancholy. The priest, telling him what is written above, said he was struck by great fear and melancholy when he saw that loathsome beast defoul and devour such fair flowers and blooms and afterward excrete them from his backside so horribly in front of him, and that he did not understand what this could mean.

"Then the palmer, showing himself to be the messenger of God, explained it to him in this way: 'Priest, you yourself are the pear tree, partly flourishing and flowering by saying your service and administering the sacraments, though you do so undevoutly, for you pay little attention to how you say your matins³ and your service, so long as you babble your way through it. Then you go to your Mass without devotion, and you have little contrition for your sin. You receive there the fruit of everlasting life, the Sacrament of the altar, in a most inappropriate state of mind. Then the whole day afterward you spend your time badly, devoting yourself to buying and selling, chopping and changing, as if you were a worldly man. You sit at your ale, giving yourself over to gluttony and excess, to bodily pleasure, through lechery and uncleanness. You break God's commandments by swearing, lying, slander, and backbiting and practicing other such sins. Thus through your misconduct you, like the loathsome bear, devour and destroy the flowers and blooms of virtuous living, to your endless damnation and the detriment of many people, unless you get the grace of repentance and amendment.'"

Then the Archbishop liked the story well and commended it, saying it was a good story. And the clerk who had examined her before in the absence of the Archbishop said, "Sir, this story strikes me to the heart."

The aforesaid creature said to the clerk, "Ah, honorable sir doctor, in the place where I mostly live there is a worthy clerk, a good preacher, who boldly speaks against the misconduct of the people and will flatter no one. He says many times in the pulpit, 'If any man dislikes my preaching, let him take note, for he is guilty.' And just so, sir," she said to the clerk, "is your experience with me, God forgive you."

The clerk did not know what to say to her. Afterward the same clerk came to her and asked her forgiveness for having been so much against her. He also asked her especially to pray for him.

And then soon after the Archbishop said, "Where can I find a man who will take this woman away from me?"

At once many young men jumped up, and every one of them said, "My lord, I will go with her."

The Archbishop answered, "You are too young; I will not have you." Then a good solid man of the Archbishop's household asked his lord what he would give him if he would take her. The Archbishop offered made available in the vernacular or for anyone other than the clergy to engage in Biblical interpretation. The Lollards took issue with the established Church on both counts.

St. Paul ... preach See 1 Timothy 2.11–12.

² palmer Pilgrim to the Holy Land.

³ matins Morning services.

him five shillings and the man asked for a noble.¹ The Archbishop, answering, said, "I will not spend so much on her body." "Yes, good sir," said the aforesaid creature, "our Lord shall reward you well in return." Then the Archbishop said to the man, "See, here is five shillings, and take her quickly out of this region." She, kneeling down on her knees, asked his blessing. He, asking her to pray for him, blessed her and let her go. When she then went back to York she was welcomed by many people and worthy clerks, who rejoiced that our Lord had given her, who was unlearned, wit and wisdom to answer so many learned men without disgrace or blame, thanks be to God.

CHAPTER 53

Then the good man who was escorting her brought her out of town and then they went on to Bridlington to her confessor, who was called Sleytham, and spoke with him and with many other good men who had entertained her previously and done much for her. Then she did not wish to stay but took her leave, to proceed on her journey. And then her confessor asked if she did not dare stay on account of the Archbishop of York, and she said, "No, indeed."

Then the good man gave her money, beseeching her to pray for him. And so she went on toward Hull. And there at one time, as they went in procession, a woman of high rank treated her with great contempt, and she said not a word. Many other people said she should be put in prison, and made great threats. And despite all their malice, a good man came and asked her to eat with him and made her very welcome. Then the malicious people who had scorned her before came to this man and told him not to be kind to her, for they believed that she was not a good woman. The next day in the morning her host led her out to the edge of town, for he did not dare entertain her any longer. And so she went to Hessle and wanted to cross the water at Humber.² Then she happened to find there two Dominican friars and two yeomen³ of the Duke of Bedford. The friars told the yeomen who she was, and the yeomen arrested her as she was about to take her boat, and also arrested a man who was with her.

"For our lord the Duke of Bedford," they said, "has sent for you. And you are considered the greatest Lollard in this whole area and around London as well. And we have looked for you in many places, and we will have a hundred pounds for bringing you before our lord."

She said to them, "Sirs, I will willingly go with you where you want to take me."

Then they took her back to Hessle, and there people called her a Lollard, and women came running out of their houses with their distaffs,⁴ crying out to the people, "Burn this false heretic."

And as she went on toward Beverley with the aforesaid yeomen and friars, they repeatedly met with people of that area who said, "Damsel, give up this life you are living, and go spin and card as other women do, and do not suffer so much shame and sorrow. We would not suffer so much for anything on earth."

Then she said to them, "I do not suffer as much sorrow as I wish to for our Lord's love, for I suffer only harsh words, and our merciful Lord Jesus Christ, worshipped be His name, suffered hard blows, bitter scourging, and at last shameful death for me and for all mankind, blessed may He be. And therefore what I suffer is truly nothing compared to what He suffered."

And so, as she went along with the aforesaid men, she said good things to them, until one of the Duke's men who had arrested her said, "I regret that I came upon you, for it seems to me that you say right good words."

Then she said to him, "Sir, do not regret or repent having come upon me. Do your lord's will, and I trust that all will be for the best, for I am very well pleased that you came upon me."

He said in reply, "Damsel, if ever you are a saint in heaven, pray for me."

She answered, saying to him in reply, "Sir, I hope you will be a saint yourself, and everyone that shall come to heaven."

So they went on until they came into Beverley, where the wife of one of the men who had arrested her lived. And they took her there and took her purse and

¹ noble English gold coin worth six shillings eightpence.

² Humber I.e., the River Humber.

³ yeomen Attendants; men of high rank who serve a lord.

⁴ distaffs Rods used for spinning wool.

her ring away from her. They prepared a pleasant room for her and a clean bed in it with the necessities, locking the door with the key and taking the key away with them. Then they took the man whom they had arrested with her, who was the Archbishop of York's man, and put him in prison. And soon after, that same day, word came that the Archbishop had come into the town where his man was in prison. The Archbishop was told of his man's imprisonment, and at once had them let him out. Then the man went angrily to the aforesaid creature, saying, "Alas that ever I knew you. I have been put in prison on your account."

She, comforting him, said, "Be meek and patient, and you will get a great reward in heaven for it."

So he went away from her. Then she stood looking out a window, saying many good words to those who wished to hear her, so that women wept hard and said with great sorrow in their hearts, "Alas, woman, why must you be burned?"

Then she asked the good woman of the house to give her something to drink, for she was ill with thirst. And the woman said her husband had taken the key away, and so she could not get to her nor give her anything to drink. And then the women got a ladder and put it up to the window and gave her a pint of wine in a pot and gave her some bread, beseeching her to put the pot and bread away secretly so that when the man of the house came he would not see it.

from CHAPTER 54

The aforesaid creature, lying in her bed on the following night, heard with her bodily ears a loud voice calling, "Margery." At that voice she awoke, very frightened, and lying still in silence she made her prayers as devoutly as she could at the time. And soon our merciful Lord, who is present everywhere, comforting his unworthy servant, said to her, "Daughter, it is more pleasing to Me that you endure contempt and scorn, shame and reproof, wrongs and misfortunes than if your head were struck off three times a day, every day for seven years. And therefore, daughter, do not fear what any man may say to you; rather you have great reason to rejoice in My goodness and in the sorrows you have suffered for it, for when you come home to heaven, then every sorrow will turn to joy for you."

The next day she was brought into the chapterhouse of Beverley, and the Archbishop of York was there and many great clerks with him, priests, canons, and secular men. Then the Archbishop said to the aforesaid creature, "What, woman, have you come back? I would willingly be rid of you."

And then a priest brought her before him, and the Archbishop said, in the hearing of everyone present, "Sirs, I had this woman before me at Cawood, and there I and my clerks examined her in the faith and found no error in her. Furthermore, sirs, I have since that time spoken with good men who consider her a righteous woman and a good woman. Nevertheless, I gave one of my men five shillings to lead her out of this area to keep the people quiet. And as they were going on their journey, they were taken and arrested, my man put in prison on her account, and her gold and silver taken away from her, as well as her prayer beads and her ring, and she is brought before me again. Is there anyone here who can say anything against her?"

Then other men said, "Here is a friar who knows many things against her."

The friar came forth and said that she led everyone astray from Holy Church, and uttered many bad things about her at that time. He also said that she would have been burnt at Lynn if his order, that is, the Dominicans, had not been there. "And sir, she says that she can weep and feel contrition when she wishes."

Then the two men who had arrested her came, saying like the friar that she was Cobham's¹ daughter and was sent to carry letters around the country. And they said she had not been to Jerusalem nor in the Holy Land nor on other pilgrimages,² when in truth she had been. They denied all truth and insisted on what was wrong, as many others had done before. When they had said enough for a great while and a long time, they held their peace.

¹ Cobham Sir John Oldcastle, Lord Cobham, one of the leaders of the Lollards in the early fifteenth century; he was executed as a heretic in 1417.

² pilgrimages Lollards did not condone pilgrimages.

Then the Archbishop said to her, "Woman, what do you say to this?"

She said, "My lord, with all due respect, every word they say is a lie."

Then the Archbishop said to the friar, "Friar, these are not heretical words; they are slanderous and erroneous words."

"My lord," said the friar, "she knows her faith well enough. Nevertheless, my lord of Bedford is angry with her, and he wishes to see her."

"Well, friar," said the Archbishop, "then you shall take her to him."

"Nay, sir," said the friar, "it is not for a friar to lead a woman around."

"And I do not wish," said the Archbishop, "for the Duke of Bedford to be angry with me on her account."

Then the Archbishop said to his men, "Keep watch on the friar until I wish to see him again," and commanded another man to keep the aforesaid creature as well, until he wished to see her again another time at his pleasure. Then the aforesaid creature asked him by his lordship not to have her put among men, for she was a man's wife. And the Archbishop said, "No, you will not be harmed."

Then he who was entrusted with her took her by the hand and led her home to his house and asked her to sit with him at meat and drink, making her welcome. Soon afterwards many priests and other people came there to see her and speak with her, and many people felt great compassion that she was treated so badly.

Shortly afterward the Archbishop sent for her, and she came into his hall. His retinue was dining, and she was taken into his room and up to his bedside. Then she, obeying, thanked him for his gracious lordship that he had shown to her before.

"Yes, yes," said the Archbishop; "I am told worse of you than I ever was before."

She said, "My lord, if you would like to question me, I will tell the truth, and if I am found guilty, I will submit to your correction."

Then a Dominican who was a diocesan bishop¹ came forward and the Archbishop said to him, "Now, sir, say while she is present what you said to me when she was not present."

"Shall I really?" said the bishop.

"Yes," said the Archbishop.

Then the bishop said to the aforesaid creature, "Damsel, you were with Lady Westmoreland."

"When, sir?" she said.

"At Easter," said the suffragan.

She, not answering, said, "Well, sir?"

Then he said, "My lady herself was very pleased with you and liked your words, but you counselled Lady Greystoke to leave her husband, and she is a baron's wife and the daughter of Lady Westmoreland, and now you have said enough to be burnt for it." And so he spoke many harsh words in front of the Archbishop; it is not useful to repeat them.

At last she said to the Archbishop, "My lord, by your leave, I have not seen Lady Westmoreland for the past two years and more. Sir, she sent for me before I went to Jerusalem and, if you like, I will go to her again so she can attest that I never brought up any such matter."

"Nay," said those who stood about, "have her put in prison, and we will send a letter to the noble lady, and if what she says is true, let her go without any objection."²

And she said she was quite happy for it to be so. Then a great clerk who stood just beside the Archbishop, "Put her in prison for forty days and she will love God better all her life."

The Archbishop asked her what tale it was she had told Lady Westmoreland when she spoke with her.

She said, "I told her a good tale of a lady who was damned because she would not love her enemies and of a bailiff who was saved because he loved his enemies and forgave their trespasses against him, and yet he was considered a bad man."

The Archbishop said it was a good tale. Then his steward and many others said, crying out with a loud voice to the Archbishop, "Lord, we pray you, let her go away at this time, and if she should ever come back, we will burn her ourselves."

The Archbishop said, "I believe there was never a woman in England who was so much feared as she is and has been."

¹ diocesan bishop Bishop suffragan: a bishop under the Archbishop's jurisdiction.

objection I.e., resistance.

Then he said to the aforesaid creature, "I do not know what to do with you."

She said, "My lord, I pray you, let me have your letter and your seal to witness that I have defended myself against my enemies and nothing has been alleged against me, neither error nor heresy, that can be proved against me, thanked be our Lord, and have John, your man, take me back across the water."

And the Archbishop very kindly granted her all her desire, may our Lord reward him, and gave back her purse with her ring and prayer beads that the Duke of Bedford's men had taken from her before. The Archbishop was surprised that she had the means to travel around the country, and she said good men gave it to her asking her to pray for them.

Then she, kneeling down, received his blessing and took her leave in very good spirits, going out of his room. And the Archbishop's people asked her to pray for them, but the steward was angry because she laughed and was cheerful, and said to her, "Holy folk should not laugh."

She said, "Sir, I have great reason to laugh, for the more shame and contempt I suffer, the merrier I am in our Lord Jesus Christ."

Then she went down into the hall and there stood the Dominican friar who had caused her all that trouble. And so she left the town with one of the Archbishop's men, carrying the letter that the Archbishop had granted her as a witness, and the man brought her to the River Humber, and there he took his leave of her, returning to his lord and taking the letter back with him, and so she was left alone without anyone she knew. All this misfortune came to her on a Friday,¹ thanked be God of all.

CHAPTER 55

When she had crossed the River Humber she was immediately arrested as a Lollard and taken toward prison. There happened to be a person who had seen her stand before the Archbishop of York, and he obtained permission for her to go where she wished and defended her against the bailiff and vouched for her that she was no Lollard. And so she escaped in the name of Jesus.

Then she met a man from London and his wife. And she went along with them until she got to Lincoln, and there she suffered much scorn and many injurious words, answering back in God's cause at once so wisely and prudently that many people marveled at her cleverness.

There were lawyers who said to her, "We have gone to school for many years, and we are still not capable of answering as you do. Where do you get such cleverness?"

And she said, "From the Holy Spirit."

Then they asked, "Do you have the Holy Spirit?"

"Yea, sirs," she said, "no one can say a good word without the gift of the Holy Spirit, for our Lord Jesus Christ said to his disciples, 'Do not worry about what you will say, for it will not be your spirit that speaks in you, but the spirit of the Holy Ghost.'² And thus our Lord gave her the grace to answer them, worshiped may He be.

Another time a great lord's men came to her and swore many great oaths, saying, "We have been told that you can tell us whether we shall be saved or damned."

She said, "Yes, indeed I can, for as long as you swear such horrible oaths and knowingly break the commandment of God as you do and will not give up your sin, I dare well say you will be damned. And if you will be contrite and confess your sin, willingly do penance and give it up while you can, with no intention of returning to it, I dare well say you will be saved."

"What, can you tell us nothing else but this?"

"Sirs," she said, "this is very good, it seems to me."

And then they went away from her.

After this she went on toward home again until she got to West Lynn. Once she was there, she sent to Bishop's Lynn for her husband, for Master Robert, her confessor, and for Master Alan, a doctor of divinity, and told them in part of her difficulties. And then she told them that she could not come home to Bishop's Lynn until she had gone to the Archbishop of Canterbury to get his letter and his seal. "For when I was called before the Archbishop of York," she said, "he would not believe what I said because I did not have a letter and seal from my lord of Canterbury. And so I promised him that I would not go to Bishop's Lynn until I had my lord's letter and the seal of Canterbury.”

¹ on a Friday The day of Christ's Passion.

² Do not worry ... Holy Ghost From Matthew 10.19–20.

And then she took her leave of the aforesaid clerks, asking for their blessing, and went on with her husband to London. When she got there, she was provided with her letter at once by the Archbishop of Canterbury. And so she stayed in the city of London for a long time and was made very welcome by many worthy people.

Then she went toward Ely in order to get home to Lynn, and when she was three miles from Ely a man came riding after them at great speed and arrested her husband and her as well, intending to take them to prison. He cruelly rebuked and thoroughly insulted them, saying many chiding words. And at last she asked her husband to show him my lord of Canterbury’s letter. When the man had read the letter, he spoke politely and kindly to them, saying, “Why didn’t you show me your letter before?”

And so they left him and went on to Ely and from there home to Lynn, where she suffered much contempt, much reproach, many a slander, many a harsh word, and many a curse. And one time a reckless man, thinking little of his own shame, wilfully and on purpose threw a bowlful of water on her head as she came down the street. She, not at all bothered by it, said, “May God make you a good man,” greatly thanking God for that, as she did for many other occasions. . . .

—1436–38

RELIGIOUS AND SPIRITUAL LIFE

CONTEXTS

Religion was so central to life in the Middle Ages that it is impossible in a section of this sort to do more than touch on a few important developments and themes.

Celtic culture forms a strong thread through the Christian culture of the early Middle Ages; several striking visual examples are included here. Among the most important developments in the transition from the Christianity of the Early to that of the High Middle Ages was a dramatic change in religious architecture; again, illustrations are provided below.

The prayers that Christians were expected to be able to recite and two excerpts from works of advice and instruction may give some sense of the reality of religious life for the laity. The Canons of the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 were of enormous importance in regularizing Church practice throughout Western Europe; several of these are reproduced below.

Corruption within the Church was a recurring complaint—and a recurring reality—throughout the medieval period. During the fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries it was a particularly pressing concern both for reformist clerics such as John Wycliffe and the Lollards and for lay writers such as William Langland; in both cases relevant excerpts are included below.

The regularizing of Christian practice in the later Middle Ages was accompanied by the growth of exclusionist attitudes towards those who did not follow the designated path; as several of the readings at the end of this section illustrate, attitudes towards both heretics and Jews hardened significantly.

Celtic Christianity

Celtic art is characterized by formal intricacy and an extraordinarily high level of decorative skill. Its most famous expressions in a Christian context are in Gospels such as the Book of Kells and the Lindisfarne Gospels, but for centuries Celtic designs also featured prominently in a variety of forms of stone and metalwork.

Decorative page from the Book of Durrow (c. 670).

Carpet page from the Lindisfarne Gospels (eighth century).

First text page, Gospel of Saint Luke, from the Lindisfarne Gospels (eighth century).

St. John from The Book of Kells (ninth century).

St. John, from The Macdurnan Gospels (ninth century).

Ardagh chalice (c. 700). This extraordinarily elaborate chalice was discovered in a hoard in a ring-fort in Limerick County in Ireland.

Pictish memorial stone (seventh century?). This stone stands at Glamis in Scotland; accompanying the "Celtic cross" are a variety of pictograms, the meaning of which is unknown.

Church and Cathedral

Greensted Church at Ongar, Essex (c. 850). Thought to be the oldest wooden church in the world, the walls of Greensted Church are formed of tree trunks split in two, erected curved-side outward.

Interior, Durham Cathedral (1093–1133). Durham is the most spare and imposing of the Norman cathedrals in England.

The Norman Crypt, Canterbury Cathedral (twelfth century). Round arches and heavy stone work are characteristic of Romanesque church architecture of the Norman Period.

Roger Fenton, "Salisbury Cathedral" (1858). Salisbury Cathedral was built in the thirteenth century, with work beginning in 1220. The spire, which was completed near the end of the century, remains the tallest in England at 404 feet. Until the latter part of the nineteenth century it was one of the world's tallest structures. (From the late medieval period until the 1890s all but one of the world's tallest buildings were churches—the exception being the Pyramid of Cheops at Giza.)

Roger Fenton, Cloisters, Westminster Abbey (c. 1858). The cloisters date from the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. Like Salisbury and York Minster, Westminster Abbey is built in the Gothic style, with pointed rather than rounded arches and extensive vaulting giving a stronger sense of verticality than in Romanesque architecture.

Roger Fenton, York Minster, from the South East (c. 1856). Built in the late thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, York Minster remains one of Britain's leading cathedrals.

Religion for All: The Apostles' Creed, the Pater Noster, and the Hail Mary

In the Middle Ages the Apostles' Creed was believed to have been jointly composed by the apostles, with each contributing one verse. Its origins are in fact unknown, though in its earliest forms the Creed almost certainly dates back to at least the fourth century. The following Latin text and English translation show the Creed divided into twelve constituent articles.

By the later medieval period all Christians were required to be able to recite the Apostles' Creed, the Pater Noster (or Lord's Prayer), and the Hail Mary in Latin rather than in the vernacular. The Pater Noster derives from two passages in the Gospels that were believed to contain Jesus' very words, Matthew 6.9–13 and Luke 11.2–4. The Pater Noster was ubiquitous throughout society, but few understood precisely what they were saying (the word "patter" derives from the sounds people made as they recited the Pater Noster quickly and without understanding); even among the clergy a working knowledge of Latin was far from universal.

The Hail Mary had come into wide use by the eleventh century, but it was not until the twelfth century that it became common for lay people to be required to be able to recite it.

The Apostles' Creed

Credo in Deum Patrem omnipotentem, Creatorem
cæli et terræ.

Et in Jesum Christum, Fílium eius unicum,

Dominum nostrum,

qui conceptus est de Spiritu Sancto, natus ex Maria Virgine,

passus sub Pontio Pilato, crucifixus, mortuus, et sepultus,

descendit ad infernos, tertia die resurrexit a mortuis, ascendit ad cælos, sedet ad dexteram Dei Patris omnipotentis,

inde venturus est iudicare vivos et mortuos.

Credo in Spiritum Sanctum,

sanctam Ecclesiam catholicam, sanctorum
communione,

remissionem peccatorum,
carnis resurrectionem,
vitam æternam. Amen.

I believe in God the Father Almighty, creator of heaven and earth,
and in Jesus Christ, His only Son, our Lord;
who was conceived by the Holy Spirit,
born of the Virgin Mary,
suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, died,
and was buried.
He descended into hell; on the third day He arose
again from the dead;
He ascended into heaven and sits at the right hand
of God the Father Almighty.
From thence He shall come to judge the living and the dead.

I believe in the Holy Spirit,
the Holy Catholic Church,
the Communion of Saints,
the forgiveness of sins,
the resurrection of the body,
and life everlasting. Amen.

The Pater Noster

Pater noster, qui es in caelis, sanctificetur nomen tuum. Adveniat regnum tuum. Fiat voluntas tua, sicut in caelo et in terra. Panem nostrum quotidianum da nobis hodie, et dimitte nobis debita nostra, sicut et nos dimittimus debitoribus nostris. Et ne nos inducas in tentationem: sed libera nos a malo. Amen.

Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name.
Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. Amen.

[The following verse, which has never been part of the Roman Catholic Pater Noster, began to be added by various Protestant groups in the sixteenth century.]

For thine is the kingdom, the power and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

Illuminated page, Genesis-Job volume, Lambeth Bible (c. 1150). This page illustrates the centrality of the Virgin Mary to medieval Christianity. During the Middle Ages the Latin words virga (stem) and virgo (virgin) were often assumed to be related. Here the illustration shows the stem of genealogy passing from Jesse through the Virgin Mary to Christ, with the four prophets (lower roundels), the four virtues of Mercy, Truth, Righteousness and Peace (middle roundels), and Moses with representatives of the Church Triumphant (upper roundels) looking on. In the corners are the four apostles.

The Hail Mary

Ave Maria, gratia plena, Dominus tecum, benedicta tu in mulieribus et benedictus fructus ventris tui.

Hail Mary, full of grace, the Lord is with thee, blessed art thou among women and blessed is the fruit of thy womb.

[The following verse began to be added during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.]

Sante Maria, Mater Dei, ora pro nobis peccatoribus, nunc et in hora mortis nostrae.

Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners now and at the hour of our death.

from Robert Manning of Brunne, Handlyng Synne (early fourteenth century)

Robert Manning (c. 1264–c. 1340) was a Gilbertine monk at an abbey near Brunne (now Bourne) in Lincolnshire. Manning's poem Handlyng Synne, written in English but very largely a translation of a similar work in French by William of Waddington, is an educational text designed to set out in everyday terms what is entailed in following the Ten Commandments, avoiding the Seven Deadly Sins, and so forth. Whereas most religious writing of the time was in Latin, Manning wrote in the vernacular for "lewd" men "that tales and rhyme will blithely hear" rather than for the educated minority who were literate in Latin. The extracts below set out specific examples of forbidden or morally questionable activities. Interestingly, miracle plays performed outside the church are included here on the list of proscribed activities—though depicting the birth and resurrection of Jesus within the church is "without danger."

... Of tournaments that are forbade in holy church, as men do read,
of tournaments I shall prove therein,
seven points of deadly sin:
first is pride, as thou well know'st,
vanity, pomp, and many a boast;
of rich attire there is great flaunting,
spurring her horse with much vaunting.
Know you well this is envy

10 when one sees another do mastery,
some in words, some in deeds;
envy most of all him leads.
Ire and wrath cannot be late;
oft are tournaments made for hate.
15 If all knights loved each other well, tournaments would never be held;
And of course they fall into slothfulness,
they love it more than God or Mass;
And truly, there can be no doubt,
20 they spend more gold thereabout—that is, they give it all to folly—than on any deed of mercy.
And yet be very careful lest you forget Dame Covetousness, 25 for she shall be foolish, in all ways,
to win a horse and some harness.
And a man shall also do robbery,
or beguile his host where he shall stay.
Gluttony also is them among,
30 delicious meats do make him strong;
and gladly he drinks wine untold,
with gluttony to make him bold.
Also is there Dame Lechery;
from here comes all her mastery.
35 Many times, for women's sake, knights these tournaments do make;
and when he goes to the tournament
she sends him some secret present,
and bids him do, if he loves her best, 40 all that he can at her behest,
for which he gets so much the worst,
that he may not sit upon his horse,
and that peradventure, in all his life,
shall he never after thrive.
45 Consider whether such tournaments should more truly be called torments? ...

It is forbidden him, in the decree, miracle plays for to make or see,
for, miracles if thou begin,
50 it is a gathering, a site of sin.
He may in the church, through this reason,
portray the resurrection—
that is to say, how God rose,
God and man in strength and loss—

55 to make men hold to belief good,
that he rose with flesh and blood;
and he may play, without danger,
how God was born in the manger,
to make men to believe steadfastly 60 that he came to us through the Virgin Mary. ...

A parson is slothful in holy church who on his sheep will not work
how they should heed his own word and please the church and their Lord.
65 The high Shepherd shall him blame,
for how he lets them go to shame.
If he should see in anything that they have a lack of chastising, unless he teach them and chastise so 70 that they from henceforth better do,
for them he shall, at God's assize,
be punished before the high Justice.
Also it behooves him to pray that God, of grace, show him the way. ...

75 Man or woman that has a child that with bad manners grows too wild,
that will both mis-say and—do,
chastisement behooves them too;
But chastise them with all your might,
80 Otherwise you'll be in their plight.
Better were the child unborn
than lack chastising, and thus be forlorn.
Thus says the wise king Solomon to men and women every one, 85 "If you want your children to be good,
give them the smart end of the rod";
and teach them good manners each one;
but take care that you break no bone. ...

Everywhere I see this custom:
90 that rich men have shrews for sons—
shrews in speech and in act—
Why? They hold no one in respect.
In his youth shall he mis-say and scorn others by the way;
95 then says the father, "This child's story doesn't hang together—sorry!"

And if he learns guilefulness, false words and deceitful looks,
his father shouldn't acquit him then;
100 his sly wit will be his only friend.
If he injures foes in rages,
then says his father, "He shall be courageous,
he shall be hardy, and no man dread,
he begins early to be doughty in deed." 105 But right so shall it him befall as it did with Eli's bad sons all. ...

from William of Pagula, Priest's Eye (c. 1320)

William of Pagula was an English curate who wrote a work entitled Oculus Sacerdotis (Priest's Eye) between 1320 and 1323, intended for use as a handbook of instruction for parish priests—many of whom remained poorly educated. Both the full book and excerpts taken from it circulated widely; the following constituted a selection of twenty-one instructions taken from the larger work and issued independently in 1385.

1. A parish priest should recommend as many things to his parishioners on Sundays as seem useful to him for their instruction, and he should repeat them often so they will not slip from memory. First he should teach them the formula for baptizing infants in the absence of a priest if it becomes necessary. This is the vernacular version: I crysten thee in the name of the fadyr and the sone and the holy ghost. While saying this, sprinkle water over the child or immerse it in water three times or at the very least once. Anyone, whether cleric or lay person, may baptize a child in an emergency. Even the father of the child or its mother may do so without putting restrictions on their conjugal relations unless there is someone else present who knows how and wishes to do it. And if someone must baptize a child in an emergency using the above formula, he should speak the words distinctly and clearly only once, in no manner repeating the words of the rite or anything like them over the child. And if an infant baptized in this manner recovers, it should be taken to the church, and those who bring it should tell the priest that the child was baptized at home so that the priest will not baptize it again. But, excluding the immersion in water, he should perform the exorcism, the anointing, and the other customary actions that accompany baptism but were omitted. Let the priest teach his parishioners that they should baptize using only water, no other liquids. Likewise let him warn men and women who are appointed the godparents of children at baptism that, except in an emergency they should not delay having their godchildren confirmed by a bishop. They should teach them or have them be taught the Lord's Prayer and the Creed, and admonish them when they reach adulthood or are capable of learning that they should guard their chastity, love justice, and practice charity.

The baptism of children born within eight days of Easter or Pentecost should be postponed for a week if it is convenient and they may be held back without danger, and then they should be baptized.

2. He should also warn them that anyone who has children who are not confirmed should make arrangements to have them confirmed by the time they are five years old if it is possible.

3. Also he should warn them that they should never put their children in bed with them in case through negligence they should roll over and smother them, which would be reckoned a case of homicide according to canon law. Nor should they thoughtlessly bind them in swaddling clothes or leave them alone by day or by night without someone watching them because of various dangers.

4. Also the priest should teach his parishioners that a spiritual kinship is established among godparents, godchildren, and the parents of the godchildren. The same is true for sponsors at confirmation. Because of this kinship, marriage between any of these parties is prohibited. A spiritual kinship is established among ten people in baptism and the same number in confirmation.

5. He should also teach them that if a man and a woman shall have given their legitimate consent to contract a marriage by an exchange of words in the present tense, even though there has been no betrothal but only an oath, and even though, as is the custom, no carnal relations have occurred, still they have contracted a true marriage—so much so that if afterwards one of them should contract a second marriage and even have carnal relations with the new partner, they should be separated and that person should return to the first marriage. Also he should teach them that marriages should not be contracted except in the presence of a priest and legitimate witnesses. Prior to the marriage ceremony banns should be solemnly published to the people in the church on three consecutive feast days. And any cleric or priest or other person who is present at a clandestine marriage shall be suspended from his office for three years.

6. Also he should warn them that boys and girls older than seven years should not lie together in the same bed because of the danger of fornication, nor should a brother share a bed with his sister because of the danger of incest.

7. Also he should publicly announce that any member of the faithful who has reached the age of discretion [i.e., fourteen] ought to confess all his sins to his own parish priest at least once a year and he should fulfill the penance imposed on him for his vices. During Eastertide he should receive the Body of Christ unless, with the counsel of his priest, for some reason he should abstain; otherwise while he is alive he should be barred from entering a church, and when he dies he should be without Christian burial. But if anyone does not wish to confess to his parish priest for a specific and well-founded reason, he should seek and obtain permission from his own priest to confess to another suitable priest.

8. Also he should teach them that pregnant women should be confessed beforehand so that they are prepared to receive the Eucharist if life-threatening danger should arise during their delivery, since it would seem improper for the priest to stay with them [hearing confession] during the course of their labor.

9. Also he should teach his parishioners that when the Host is elevated during the consecration of the Mass, they should genuflect if they can comfortably do so, and, adoring the Host, they should say in a low voice: "Hail salvation of the world, Word of the Father, true sacrifice, living flesh, fully God, truly man" or "Glory to you Lord who is born" or the Lord's Prayer or some other devout words. And they should also do this when they see the Body of Christ, preceded by lights and a ringing bell, carried to the sick.

10. Also he should warn his parishioners that they should faithfully pay their tithes on goods legitimately acquired. For faithfully paying tithes brings a fourfold reward: the first is an abundance of crops; the second is bodily health, according to Augustine; the third is the remission of sins; the fourth is reward in the kingdom of heaven. But those who tithe badly are punished in four ways: first because they transgress a divine commandment. Second because once they had an abundance of all things when they tithed well, but now since they tithe badly they will be forced to tithe. Third, when tithes are poorly paid, God does not ward off locusts or other harmful things, nor does he dispel plagues or bring rain, except short-lived ones. Fourth, because of a lack of tithes, men justly collect taxes and tolls from the people since what Christ does not take, taxes will. Besides, those who do not pay their tithes are cursed by God. And merchants and artisans as much as carpenters, blacksmiths, weavers, alewives and other such people, and all other hired laborers and boon laborers all ought to be admonished to pay tithes from their earnings or else reach a settlement with the rector of their church.

11. And the priest ought to announce to his people which days are feast days and which are days of fast.

12. Also he should instruct his parishioners that they should not practice the magical arts, incantations, or sorcery, since these things have no power to cure either man or beast and besides are utterly worthless and unlawful. Moreover clerics who do these things shall be degraded and lay people shall be excommunicated.

13. Also he should warn everyone not to lend money, grain, wine, oil or any other thing whatsoever by usury; namely by entering into a contract or having the intention to receive back more in repayment than he lent out.

And if a cleric shall do this he shall be suspended from office; and a lay person shall be excommunicated until he makes restitution. To be sure, usury is forbidden in both the Old and the New Testaments.

14. He should also warn his parishioners that they should not wait in order to sell their goods at a higher price, for they are obliged to repay what they have gained by this type of withholding. Likewise they should not sell their goods to travelers, pilgrims, and other wayfarers for a higher price than they charge to their neighbors or than they can receive at market.

15. Let him also warn them that if anyone shall receive land or a dwelling as a pledge for a loan of money, after deducting his expenses, he should return the pledge; and if he receives more than that, it is to be reckoned as usury.

16. Also he shall publicly announce three times yearly that all those men who wish to enjoy the privileges of the clergy shall be duly tonsured, displaying the crown of their head suitably shaved especially in the presence of their ordinaries and in churches and in congregations of the clergy.

17. Also one day during Lent he should publicly preach the Creed, that is to say, the articles of faith.

18. And he should admonish his parishioners that they should enter church humbly and devoutly and should behave reverently, peacefully, and devoutly while in it. And when they hear named the Name of Jesus they should genuflect at the very least in their hearts, or by bowing their head, or beating their breast.

19. He should admonish them that no one should cause a disturbance, or a disagreement, or hold discussions, or useless and profane conversations in a church or its graveyard; nor should they provoke disputes or fights or anything else which could interrupt the divine services or dishonor the holiness of the place. Likewise business should not be conducted in the church or its graveyard and especially not fairs or markets, nor should courts, pleas, or secular judgments be held there. And dishonorable dances should not take place there, nor should improper songs be sung during the vigils of saints days or at other times, nor should there take place anything else by which the church or the graveyard could be dishonored.

20. Also he should instruct them that neither a husband nor a wife should make an oath swearing to practice chastity, to fast, or to go on pilgrimage (except for a vow to go to the Holy Land) without the consent of the other. For a man and a wife are to be judged as equals in this regard.

21. He should also warn his parishioners that no one should harbor or defend in his home anyone who he knows has committed a known robbery.

from The Canons of the Fourth Lateran Council (1215)

The following selections touch on the behavior of clerics, on confession, and on regulating the display and sale of the relics of saints. The final selection, Canon 68, is an illustration of the manner in which, as the canons of the Council acted to unify and strengthen the practices of Christians, equally they strengthened Christian hostility towards non-Christians.

Canon 14. That the morals and general conduct of clerics may be better reformed, let all strive to live chastely and virtuously, particularly those in sacred orders, guarding against every vice of desire, especially that on account of which the anger of God came from heaven upon the children of unbelief so that in the sight of Almighty God they may perform their duties with a pure heart and chaste body. But lest the facility to obtain pardon be an incentive to do wrong, we decree that whoever shall be found to indulge in the vice of incontinence, shall, in proportion to the gravity of his sin, be punished in accordance with the canonical statutes, which we command to be strictly and rigorously observed, so that he whom divine fear does not restrain from evil, may at least be withheld from sin by a temporal penalty. If therefore anyone suspended for this reason shall presume to celebrate the divine mysteries, let him not only be deprived of his ecclesiastical benefices but for this twofold offense let him be forever deposed. Prelates who dare support such in their iniquities, especially in view of money or other temporal advantages, shall be subject to a like punishment. But if those, who according to the practice of their country [i.e., the Latin East] have not renounced the conjugal bond, fall by the vice of impurity, they are to be punished more severely, since they can use matrimony lawfully.

Canon 15. All clerics shall carefully abstain from drunkenness. Wherefore, let them accommodate the wine to themselves, and themselves to the wine. Nor shall anyone be encouraged to drink, for drunkenness banishes reason and incites to lust. We decree, therefore, that that abuse be absolutely abolished by which in some localities the drinkers bind themselves in their manner to an equal portion of drink and he in their judgment is the hero of the day who outdrinks the others. Should anyone be culpable in this matter, unless he heeds the warning of the superior and makes suitable satisfaction, let him be suspended from his benefice or office.

We forbid hunting and fowling to all clerics: wherefore, let them not presume to keep dogs and birds for these purposes.

Canon 21. All the faithful of both sexes shall after they have reached the age of discretion [then accepted to be fourteen] faithfully confess all their sins at least once a year to their own [parish] priest and perform to the best of their ability the Penance imposed, receiving reverently at least at Easter the sacrament of the Eucharist, unless perchance at the advice of their own priest they may for a good reason abstain for a time from its reception; otherwise they shall be [barred from entering] the church during life and deprived of Christian burial in death. Wherefore, let this salutary decree be published frequently in the churches, that no one may find in the plea of ignorance a shadow of excuse. But if anyone for good reason should wish to confess his sins to another priest, let him first seek and obtain permission from his own priest, since otherwise the other priest cannot absolve or bind him.

Let the priest be discreet and cautious, ... carefully inquiring into the circumstances of the sinner and the sin, from the nature of which he may understand what kind of advice to give and what kind of remedy to apply, making use of different means to heal the sick one. But let him exercise the greatest precaution that he does not in any degree by word, sign, or any other manner make known the sinner, but should he need more prudent counsel, let him seek it cautiously without any mention of the person. He who dares to reveal a sin confided to him in the tribunal of penance, we decree that he be not only deposed from the priestly office but also relegated to a monastery of strict observance to do penance for the remainder of his life ...

Canon 62. From the fact that some expose for sale and exhibit promiscuously the relics of the saints, great injury is sustained by the Christian religion. That this may not occur hereafter, we ordain in the present decree that in the future old relics may not be exhibited outside of a vessel or exposed for sale. And let no one presume to venerate publicly new ones unless they have been approved by the Roman pontiff. In the future prelates shall not permit those who come to their churches [for the sake of venerating relics] to be deceived by worthless fabrications or false documents as has been done in many places for the sake of gain. We forbid also that seekers of alms, some of whom, misrepresenting themselves, preach certain abuses, be admitted, unless they exhibit genuine letters either of the Apostolic See or of the diocesan bishop, in which case they may not preach anything to the people but what is contained in those letters. We give herewith a form which the Apostolic See commonly uses in granting such letters, that the diocesan bishops may model their own upon it...

Canon 68. In some provinces a difference of dress distinguishes the Jews and Saracens from the Christians, but in others confusion has developed to such a degree that no difference is discernible. Whence it happens sometimes through error that Christians mingle with the women of Jews and Saracens, and, on the other hand, Jews and Saracens mingle with those of the Christians. Therefore, that such religious commingling through error of this kind may not serve as a refuge for further excuse for excesses, we decree that such people of both sexes (that is, Jews and Saracens) in every Christian province and at all times be distinguished in public from other people by a difference in dress, since this was also enjoined on them by Moses. On the days of the Lamentations and on Passion Sunday they may not appear in public, because some of them, as we understand, on those days are not ashamed to show themselves more ornately attired and do not fear to amuse themselves at the expense of Christians, who in memory of the sacred passion go about attired in robes of mourning. That we most strictly forbid, lest they should presume in some measure to burst forth in contempt of the Redeemer. And, since we ought not be ashamed of him who blotted out our offenses, we command that the secular princes restrain presumptuous persons of this kind by condign punishment, lest they presume to blaspheme in some degree the one crucified for us.

Sin, Corruption, and Indulgence

from William Langland, Piers Plowman (B-text, c. 1377–81)

Langland's Piers Plowman is one of the major English literary texts of the fourteenth century—and also one of the most important historical documents in the overlapping histories of religious and secular developments during the period. The full poem is a long and in many ways a challenging and confusing text. It is framed as a Christian allegory, with characters such as Truth and Reason pronouncing on the ills of the world, and on the way to salvation. An important thread running through the poem is the attempt of an individual soul to seek out the stages that will lead to salvation; each of the various parts of the poem is called a “passus,” or “step.” The poem also includes powerful elements of social satire, in which many of the ways of the fourteenth-century world are harshly criticized. Chief among these are corrupt religious practices—perhaps most notably the practice of purchasing “indulgences” from the Church. (The principle of an indulgence was that a sacrifice of money, meant to help the Church with its financial obligations to the community, could ensure the forgiveness of the giver's sins.) Langland's text also includes wide-ranging criticisms of the greed and lack of charity that he saw as characterizing the behavior of the rich and privileged, nobles and clergy alike.

Langland did not advocate any revolutionary program to remedy society's ills and injustices; he intended to prick the consciences of the powerful to encourage them to mend their ways and carry out good works, but he did not intend to aid in any overthrow of their authority. Indeed, when it became clear that Piers Plowman was providing inspiration to the leaders of the uprising of 1381, Langland revised the poem in ways that made it less inflammatory.

Though Langland lived in London (he is believed to have held a modest position in the church), he eschewed the rhymed style of poetry that Chaucer and other Londoners had come to favor, preferring instead to write alliterative verse in a style reminiscent of that of Old English. (Piers Plowman is a key text in what scholars have come to refer to as the "alliterative revival" of the fourteenth century.) Piers Plowman has come down to us in many manuscripts, and exists in three versions, known as the A-, B-, and C- texts. The concise A-text and the considerably longer B-text are both more sharply critical of authority than is the C-text, which dates from after the 1381 rebellion (and in which Langland distances himself from the rebels' agenda).

Much as Piers Plowman is a central text of late medieval social protest, it is also a religious text and a spiritual allegory. The excerpts below give some sense both of the roots of social protest and of the degree to which what we would see as secular and religious elements are virtually inseparable in a text of this sort.

The first sixteen lines of the first Passus of the poem are provided below in the original as well as in a modernized version. As the selection from Passus 5 suggests, the poem has harsh advice for the common folk as well as for the well-to-do. But the prevailing note of criticism in the poem is of the sort seen in the excerpt below from Passus 7; these lines give some sense of the degree to which Piers Plowman takes in a broad sweep of the religious and social life of the fourteenth century.

from PASSUS I

What this mountaigne bymeneth and the merke dale
 And the feld ful of folk, I shal yow faire shewe.
 A lovely lady of leere in lynnyn yclothed
 Cam down from castel and called me faire,
 5 And seide, "Sone, slepestow? Sestow this peple—

How bisie they ben aboute the maze?
 The mooste partie of this peple that passeth on this erthe,
 Have thei worship in this world, thei wilne no better;
 Of oother hevene than here holde thei no tale."

10 I was afered of hire face, theigh she faire weere,
 And seide, "Mercy, madame, what this to mene?"
 "The tour upon the toft," quod she, "Truthe is therinne,
 And wolde that ye wroughte as his word techeth,
 For he is fader of feith and formed yow alle
 15 Bothe with fel and with face and yaf yow fyve wittes
 For to worshiþe hymn therwith while that ye ben here."

What this mountain means, and the dark dale
 And the field full of folk¹ I fairly will show.
 A lady, lovely of looks, in linen clothed,
 Came down from a castle, and called me fairly And said, "Son, are you sleeping? Do you see these people,

How busy they are, all thronging about?
 Most of the people that pass their time on earth,

Have honor in this world, and they wish for no better
 They don't care about any heaven but the one here
 on earth."

I was afraid of her face, though she was fair,
 And I said, "Mercy, madam, what does this mean?"
 "The tower on the hill," she said, "Truth is therein

And he would like you to do as his word teaches;
 For he is Father of Faith, who formed you all
 Both with flesh and with face, and gave you five senses
 To worship him with, while you are here."

¹ What this ... of folk The Prologue introduces the narrative as a dream vision, in which Piers recounts that he has seen a tower on a hilltop, and another in a valley, and a fair field full of folk between the two:

A faire field full of folk found I there between,
 Of all manner of men, the mean and the rich ...

from PASSUS 5

The king and his knights to the church went
 To hear matins of the day, and the Mass after.
 Then waked I from my winking, and felt woeful
 That I had not slept sounder, and so seen more.
 But ere I had traveled a furlong, faintness so seized me
 That I could not go further on foot, for lack of my sleep,
 And I sat softly down, and said my belief,
 And as I babbled on my beads,¹ they brought me asleep.
 And then saw I much more than I have already told,
 For I saw the field full of folk that I before spoke of,
 And how Reason got ready to preach to the realm,
 And with a cross before the king commenced in this way
 to teach.
 He proved that these pestilences had to do purely with sin,
 And the south-west wind on Saturday evening
 Had plainly to do with pride, and for no point else.
 Pear-trees and plum-trees were puffed to the earth
 To show you people that you should do better.
 Beeches and broad oaks were blown to the ground,
 Their tails torn upwards, a dreadful sign
 That at doomsday deadly sin shall be the sinners' undoing.
 Of this matter I may mumble at length
 But I will say as I saw, God help me!
 How plainly before the people Reason began to preach.
 He told Waster go work as best he could
 And redeem himself for laziness with some sort of craft.
 And prayed that Pernele take off her costly array
 And keep it in her box, in case she might need money later.
 Tom Stowe he taught to take two staves
 And bring home Phyllis from women's punishment.
 He warned Wat that his wife was to blame, Saying that her hat was worth half a mark, but his hood
 cost not even a groat.
 And he bade Batt cut down a bough or even two
 With which to beat Betty unless she would work. . .

¹ beads It is the practice of Roman Catholics to say their prayers to the Virgin Mary on a set of prayer beads called a rosary. The Apostles' Creed, or the "belief," as Piers says, is one of the prayers one recites when one says his or her rosary.

from PASSUS 7

Truth heard what was happening, and sent word to Piers
 To take his team and to till the earth;
 And Truth provided a pardon *a poena et a culpa*²
 For him, and for his heirs, for evermore after.
 And told him to stay at home, and plow up his fields,
 And those that helped him to plow, to plant, or to sow,
 Or any other work that might help Piers—
 They too were granted pardon with Piers Plowman.
 Kings and knights that keep Holy Church
 And rightfully in realms rule over the people
 Have pardon to pass through purgatory lightly,
 And to join patriarchs and prophets in paradise.
 Bishops are most blessed, if they be as they should, . . .
 Merchants had many years to the good,
 But none were pardoned a poena et a culpa by the pope,
 For they do not always observe the holy days, as the Holy Church teaches, . . .
 Under his secret seal Truth sent them a letter
 Saying they should buy boldly what they liked best,
 And afterwards sell again, and save their profits
 To use in helping maisons Dieu,³ and in helping folk in misery;
 In helping to repair rotten roads, where plainly needed;
 And to build up bridges that were broken down;
 In helping maidens to marry, or to become nuns;
 In helping poor people and prisoners find their food;
 And helping send scholars to school, or to some other craft;
 In helping poor religious souls, and in lowering their rents . . .
 Now has the Pope power to grant the people
 Remission of penance, to pass directly into Heaven:
 This is our belief, as lettered men teach us:
 . . . I believe loyally (the Lord forbids anything else!)
 That pardon, penance, and prayers cause people to be saved.

² a poena et a culpa Latin: from punishment and from guilt, i.e., absolving the holder of the pardon.

³ maisons Dieu French: houses of God, i.e., hospitals, houses of charity, etc.

For souls that have sinned the seven deadly sins.
To trust to indulgences—truly I think
Is not so safe for the soul as it is to do well.

- 35 Therefore I advise all that are rich and
That trust of your treasure ...
And especially you masters, mayors, and judges,
Who are held to be wise, and have the world's wealth Available to purchase your pardons, and the Pope's bulls:¹
- 40 At the dreadful Doom, when the dead shall arise
And you all will come before Christ, to have it reckoned
How you have led your life, and kept His laws,
And how you behaved day by day, the doom will declare That however many pardons ... of all the friars' orders
- 45 Promising two-fold indulgence—unless you have
Also good deeds to help you, I rate your patents
And pardons at one pea-pod's value!
Therefore I counsel Christians to cry to God for mercy,
And to Mary His mother to mediate for us,
- 50 That God grant us grace here, before that we depart,
That we may do such good works, while we are here
That after our death-day Do-well will declare
At the day of Doom that we did as he told us.

from Thomas Wimbleton, Sermon (c. 1388)

The sermon from which the following passages are taken was preached by Thomas Wimbleton at Paul's Cross in London; it survives in over a dozen English (and two Latin) manuscripts.

... As I see, the first question that shall be purposed [to a new curate or prelate] is this: how hast thou entered? Who brought thee into this office? Truth other simony? God or the devil? Grace or money? The flesh or the spirit?...

And if we taken heed truly what abominations been scattered in the church nowadays among priests, we should well wit² that they all cometh nought into the

Pope's bulls Declarations by the Pope; specifically in this case, declarations providing "indulgences," granting pardon for sins in exchange for money.

² wit Know.

fold of Christ by Christ's clepyng³ for the profit but by other ways to get him worldly wealth; and this is cause of many errors among the people. ... When were [pride, envy, wrath, and covetousness] so great as they are now, and so of all other sins? ...

The second question that every curate and prelate of holy church shall answer to is this: how hast thou ruled, that is to say the souls of the subjects and the goods of poor men? Give now thine account. First, how hast thou governed God's folk that was taken thee to keep? As a [shep]herd or as a hired man that doth all for the love of his bodily hire? As a father [or] as a wolf that eateth the sheep and keepeth them nought? ...

The third question that this first [curate or prelate] shall answer to is this: how hast thou lived? What light of holiness hast thou showed in thy living to the people? ... Reckon how thou hast lived. As a priest [or] as a lewd man? As a man or as a beast? It is a wonder truly how the life of priests is changed. They beith clothed as knights; they speak as dishonestly as churls, [or] of winning as merchants; they ride as princes; and all this that is thus spent is of the goods of poor men and of Christ's heritages.

Lollardy

One of the earliest movements in the direction of the Reformation of Christianity was that of John Wycliffe and the Lollards. Over a century before the upheavals brought on by Martin Luther, Wycliffe spoke out strongly against corruption and in favor of bringing all Christians into more direct contact with the Word of God. In Wycliffe's view the veneration of saints and of relics, the drawing of a veil of mystery around the Bible by refusing to authorize translations into the vernacular, and the acceptance of vast levels of wealth and privilege for members of the clergy were all of a piece—and all deserved to be brought to an end. Those who followed and extended Wycliffe's teachings came to be known as "Lollards"; their "heresies" were ruthlessly stamped out in the fifteenth century.

³ clepyng Calling, bidding.

from Account of the Heresy Trial of Margery Baxter

On April 1, 1429 Johanna Clifland, wife of William Clifland, who lives in the parish of St. Mary the Less in Norwich, being cited, appeared in person before the reverend father and lord in Christ William, by the grace of God Bishop of Norwich [1426–36], holding court in his palace chapel. At the command of the bishop she placed her hand on God's Holy Gospels and swore that she would tell the truth about any and all questions asked of her that concerned matters of faith.

After swearing this oath, Johanna Clifland said that on the Friday [January 28] before the most recent feast of the Purification of the Blessed Mary, Margery Baxter, the wife of William Baxter the wright, recently living at Martham in the diocese of Norwich, was sitting and sewing near the fireplace with the witness in the witness's room. In the presence of the witness and her servants Johanna Grymell and Agnes Bethom, she told the witness and her servants that they should never swear oaths, saying in English: "Dame, beware of the bee, for every bee will sting; and therefore see that you swear neither by God nor by Our Lady nor by any other saint; and if you do the contrary the bee will sting your tongue and poison your soul."

Then the witness said Margery asked her what she did daily in church. The witness told her that as soon as she entered, after kneeling before the Cross it was her habit to say five Our Fathers in honor of the crucifix and the same number of Hail Marys in honor of Blessed Mary, the Mother of Christ. Then Margery scolded her and told the witness, "You act badly by kneeling like that and praying before images in these churches, because God has never been in such a church, and He never has gone forth from heaven nor will He ever. And He will not give or offer you any more merit for the genuflectings, and adorations, and prayers that you do in these churches than a lit candle hidden away under the cover of a baptismal font can give any light to people inside a church at nighttime." ...

Next the witness said that the aforesaid Margery told her no child or infant born of Christian parents ought to be baptized in water according to the common custom since such a child had been sufficiently baptized in its mother's womb. So the image-worshipping and idolatry these false and accursed priests do when they dip babies in fonts in churches is done solely to wrench money from people in order to maintain these priests and their concubines.

Next the witness said Margery told her there that the consent of mutual love alone between a man and a woman sufficed to make the sacrament of marriage; no other exchange of words or ceremonies in a church were necessary.

Next she said Margery told her that no faithful man or woman was obliged to fast during Lent, Ember Days, Fridays, the vigils of saints, or other days indicated by the church; and that anyone could eat meat or any other kind of food during these times and on these days; and that on fast days it was better for someone to eat scraps of meat left over from Thursday than to go to the market and run up debts buying fish ...

The witness also said Margery asked her and her servant Johanna to come secretly at night to Margery's house, and there they could hear her husband read the law of Christ to them, the law written in a book [i.e., the Bible] which her husband read to her at night; and she said her husband is an excellent teacher of Christianity.

Margery also said that she had spoken with Johanna West, a woman living near the churchyard of St. Mary-in-the-Marsh, about the law of Christ, and that Johanna is on the good road to salvation.

Furthermore, Margery said this to the witness: "Johanna, from your expression it looks like you plan to reveal what I've told you to the bishop." And the witness swore that she wished never to reveal her counsels in this regard unless Margery gave her cause to do so. Then Margery told her: "If you accuse me to the bishop, I'll do to you what I did to this Carmelite friar from Yarmouth who was the wisest friar in the land." The witness asked her what she had done to the friar. Margery answered that she had spoken with the friar, upbraiding him because he begged for his living, and telling him that it wasn't an act of charity to do good to someone or give him aid unless he himself wanted to take off his friar's habit and get behind a plow to work for a living, which would be more pleasing to God than following the way of life of some of these friars. Then the friar asked her whether she had anything else to tell him or teach him. So Margery, as the witness said, explained the Gospels to him in English. After that, the friar left Margery, so the witness said. Later this friar accused Margery of heresy. But Margery, hearing that the friar had denounced her, accused him of wanting to have sex with her, and since she would not give in to him, he accused her of heresy. Margery said this was the reason her husband wanted to kill the friar. Out of fear the friar shut up and left these parts in shame.

Margery also told the witness she had often made false confessions to the Dean of St. Mary-in-the-Fields so that he would think she led a good life. Because of this, he often gave Margery money. Then the witness asked her whether she had confessed all her sins to a priest. Margery told her she had never done harm to any priest, so she had never wanted to confess to a priest or be obedient to any priest, since a priest had no power to absolve anyone from sins; and in fact priests sinned more grievously every day than other people. Margery also said that every man and woman who shared Margery's opinion were good priests, and that the Holy Church exists only wherever all those people were who believed as she did. For that reason, Margery said she was obliged to confess only to God, not to any priest.

Next Margery told the witness that people honor the devils that fell from heaven with Lucifer who, when they fell to earth, entered into the statues standing in churches. They have dwelled in them since then and are still hiding in them, so that people who adore statues are committing idolatry.

Next the witness said Margery informed her that holy water and blessed bread were just trifles with no power, and that every church bell should be pulled down and destroyed, and that all those who set up bells in churches are excommunicated.

Margery also said that even if she were convicted of Lollardy, she shouldn't be burned because she, so the witness said, had and still has a charter of salvation in her womb.

Next Margery said she had won a judgment against the Lord Bishop of Norwich, and Henry Inglese, and the Lord Abbots associated with them.

Next the witness said she had sent Agnes Bethom, her servant, to Margery's house on the Saturday after last Ash Wednesday. Margery wasn't home but Agnes found a kitchen kettle on the fire, and boiling inside it were a piece of salt pork and oat flour—so Agnes reported to the witness.

[Margery confessed on 7 October 1429. Her sentence included being flogged on four consecutive Sundays as she walked barefoot around her parish church.]

The Persecution of the Jews

The twelfth and thirteenth centuries were tumultuous and difficult times for Jews in Britain. Early Norman kings had encouraged the emigration of Jews from continental Europe, but in the latter part of the twelfth century attacks on Jews on the Continent by crusading Christians became common, and in Britain vicious propaganda against Jews (such as that found in Thomas of Monmouth's Life and Miracles of St. William of Norwich) began to be widely disseminated. Physical attacks on Jews (the most horrific of which was the massacre/mass suicide of approximately 150 Jews on 16 March 1190, described below by Roger of Howden) became widespread in Britain in the late twelfth century. New taxes and restrictions (such as the 1194 Ordances) began to be placed on Jews, and even more "favorable" developments (such as King John's Charter of 1201 confirming certain Jewish rights) were couched in such terms as to make clear that relations between Christians and Jews would remain entirely on an "us and them" footing. Restrictions became far more extreme with the Ordances of Henry III, and in 1290 all Jews were expelled from the country by order of Edward I.

from Thomas of Monmouth, The Life and Miracles of St. William of Norwich (c. 1173)

When therefore [William] was flourishing in this blessed boyhood of his, and had attained to his eighth year [about 1140], he was entrusted to the skinners to be taught their craft. Gifted with a teachable disposition and bringing industry to bear upon it, in a short time he far surpassed lads of his own age in the craft aforesaid, and he equaled some who had been his teachers. So leaving the country, drawn by a divine urge he betook himself to the city and lodged with a very famous master of that craft, and some time passed away. He was seldom in the country, but was occupied in the city and sedulously gave himself to the practice of his craft, and thus reached his twelfth year.

Now, while he was staying in Norwich, the Jews who were settled there and required their cloaks or their robes or other garments (whether pledged to them, or their own property) to be repaired, preferred him before all other skimmers. For [the Jews] esteemed him to be especially fit for their work, either because they had learnt that he was guileless and skillful, or, because attracted to him by their avarice, they thought they could bargain with him for a lower price. Or, as I rather believe, because by the ordering of divine Providence he had been predestined to martyrdom from the beginning of time, and gradually step by step was drawn on, and chosen to be made a mock of and to be put to death by the Jews, in scorn of the Lord's Passion. . . .

For I have learnt from certain Jews, who were afterwards converted to the Christian faith, how that at that time they had planned to do this very thing with some Christian, and in order to carry out their malignant purpose, at the beginning of Lent they had made choice of the boy William, being twelve years of age and a boy of unusual innocence. . . .

Then the boy, like an innocent lamb, was led to the slaughter. He was treated kindly by the Jews at first, and, ignorant of what was being prepared for him, he was kept till the morrow. But on the next day [Tuesday, 21 March], which in that year was the Passover for them, after the singing of the hymns appointed for the day in the synagogue, the chiefs of the Jews . . . suddenly seized hold of the boy William as he was having his dinner and in no fear of any treachery, and ill-treated him in various horrible ways. For while some of them held him behind, others opened his mouth and introduced an instrument of torture which is called a teazle [a wooden gag] and, fixing it by straps through both jaws to the back of his neck, they fastened it with a knot as tightly as it could be drawn.

After that, taking a short piece of rope of about the thickness of one's little finger and tying three knots in it at certain distances marked out, they bound round that innocent head with it from the forehead to the back, forcing the middle knot into his forehead and the two others into his temples, the two ends of the rope being most tightly stretched at the back of his head and fastened in a very tight knot. The ends of the rope were then passed round his neck and carried round his throat under his chin, and there they finished off this dreadful engine of torture in a fifth knot.

But not even yet could the cruelty of the torturers be satisfied without adding even more severe pains. Having shaved his head, they stabbed it with countless thorn points, and made the blood come horribly from the wounds they made. And so cruel were they and so eager to inflict pain that it was difficult to say whether they were more cruel or more ingenious in their tortures. For their skill in torturing kept up the strength of their cruelty and ministered arms thereto.

And thus, while these enemies of the Christian name were rioting in the spirit of malignity around the boy, some of those present adjudged him to be fixed to a Cross in mockery of the Lord's Passion, as though they would say: "even as we condemned the Christ to a shameful death, so let us also condemn the Christian, so that, uniting the lord and his servant in a like punishment, we may retort upon themselves the pain of that reproach which they impute to us."

Conspiring, therefore, to accomplish the crime of this great and detestable malice, they next laid their blood-stained hands upon the innocent victim, and having lifted him from the ground and fastened him upon the Cross, they vied with one another in their efforts to make an end of him.

And we, after enquiring into the matter very diligently, did both find the house, and discovered some most certain marks in it of what had been done there. . . .

As a proof of the truth and credibility of the matter we now adduce something which we have heard from the lips of Theobald, who was once a Jew, and afterwards a monk. He verily told us that in the ancient writings of his fathers it was written that the Jews, without the shedding of human blood, could neither obtain their freedom, nor could they ever return to their fatherland. Hence it was laid down by them in ancient times that every year they must sacrifice a Christian in some part of the world to the Most High God in scorn and contempt of Christ. . . .

from Roger Howden, Chronicle (1190)

In the same month of March [1190] . . . the Jews of the city of York, in number five hundred men, besides women and children, shut themselves up in the tower of York, with the consent of the sheriff, in consequence of their dread of the Christians; but when the sheriff and the constable sought to regain possession of it, the Jews refused to deliver it up. In consequence of this, the people of the said city, and the strangers who had come within the jurisdiction thereof, at the exhortation of the sheriff and the constable, with one consent made an attack upon the Jews.

After they had made assaults upon the tower day and night, the Jews offered the people a large sum of money to allow them to depart with their lives; but this the others refused to receive. Upon this, one skilled in their laws arose and said, "Men of Israel, listen to my advice. It is better that we should kill one another, than fall into the hands of the enemies of our law." Accordingly, all the Jews, both men and women, gave their assent to his advice, and each master of a family, beginning with the chief persons of his household, with a sharp knife first cut the throats of his wife and sons and daughters, and then of all his servants, and lastly his own. Some of them also threw their slain over the walls among the people; while others shut up their slain in the king's house and burned them, as well as the king's houses. Those who had slain the others were afterwards killed by the people. In the meantime, some of the Christians set fire to the Jews' houses, and plundered them; and thus all the Jews in the city of York were destroyed, and all acknowledgments of debts due to them were burnt.

from The Ordinances of the Jews (1194)

All the debts, pledges, mortgages, lands, houses, rents, and possessions of the Jews shall be registered. The Jew who shall conceal any of these shall forfeit to the King his body and the thing concealed, and likewise all his possessions and chattels, neither shall it be lawful to the Jew to recover the thing concealed.

Likewise six or seven places shall be provided in which they shall make all their contracts, and there shall be appointed two lawyers that are Christians and two lawyers that are Jews, and two legal registrars, and before them and the clerks of William of the Church of St. Mary's and William of Chimilli, shall their contracts be made.

And charters shall be made of their contracts by way of indenture. And one part of the indenture shall remain with the Jew, sealed with the seal of him, to whom the money is lent, and the other part shall remain in the common chest: wherein there shall be three locks and keys, whereof the two Christians shall keep one key, and the two Jews another, and the clerks of William of the Church of St. Mary and of William of Chimilli shall keep the third. And moreover, there shall be three seals to it, and those who keep the seals shall put the seals thereto.

Moreover the clerks of the said William and William shall keep a roll of the transcripts of all the charters, and as the charters shall be altered so let the roll be likewise. For every charter there shall be threepence paid, one moiety thereof by the Jews and the other moiety by him to whom the money is lent; whereof the two writers shall have twopence and the keeper of the roll the third.

And from henceforth no contract shall be made with, nor payment, made to, the Jews, nor any alteration made in the charters, except before the said persons or the greater part of them, if all of them cannot be present. And the aforesaid two Christians shall have one roll of the debts or receipts of the payments which from henceforth are to be made to the Jews, and the two Jews one and the keeper of the roll one.

Moreover every Jew shall swear on his Roll, that all his debts and pledges and rents, and all his goods and his possessions, he shall cause to be enrolled, and that he shall conceal nothing as is aforesaid. And if he shall know that anyone shall conceal anything he shall secretly reveal it to the justices sent to them, and that they shall detect, and shew unto them all falsifiers or forgers of the charters and clippers of money, where or when they shall know them, and likewise all false charters.

from The Charter of King John to the Jews (1201)

1. John, by the grace of God, &c. Know that we have granted to all the Jews of England and Normandy to have freely and honourably residence in our land, and to hold all that from us, which they held from King Henry, our father's grandfather, and all that now they reasonably hold in land and fees and mortgages and goods, and that they have all their liberties and customs just as they had them in the time of the aforesaid King Henry, our father's grandfather, better and more quietly and more honourably.

from The Ordinances of Henry III (1253)

The king has provided and decreed ... that no Jew dwell in England unless he do the king service, and that as soon as a Jew shall be born, whether male or female, in some way he shall serve the king. And that there be no communities of the Jews in England save in those places wherein such communities were in the time of the lord King John, the king's father. And that in their synagogues the Jews, one and all, worship in subdued tones according to their rite, so that Christians hear it not. And that all Jews answer to the rector of the parish in which they dwell for all parochial dues belonging to their houses. And that no Christian nurse hereafter suckle or nourish the male child of any Jew, and that no Christian man or woman serve any Jew or Jewess, nor eat with them, nor dwell in their house. And that no Jew or Jewess eat or buy meat in Lent. And that no Jew disparage the Christian faith, nor publicly dispute touching the same. And that no Jew have secret intercourse with any Christian woman, nor any Christian man with a Jewess. And that every Jew wear on his breast a conspicuous badge. And that no Jew enter any church or any chapel save in passing through, nor stay therein to the dishonor of Christ. And that no Jew in any wise hinder another Jew willing to be converted to the Christian faith. And that no Jew be received in any town without the special licence of the king, save in those towns wherein Jews have been wont to dwell.

And the justices appointed to the guardianship of the Jews are commanded to cause these provisions to be carried into effect and straitly kept on pain of forfeiture of the goods of the Jews aforesaid. Witness the king at Westminster on the 31st day of January. By the king and council.

Edward I's Order (1290)

Edward ... to the treasurer and barons of the Exchequer, greeting. Whereas formerly in our Parliament at Westminster on the quinzaine of St. Michael in the third year of our reign, to the honor of God and the profit of the people of our realm, we ordained and decreed that no Jew thenceforth should lend anything at usury to any Christian on lands, rents or other things, but that they should live by their commerce and labor; and the same Jews, afterwards maliciously deliberating among themselves, contriving a worse sort of usury which they called courtesy, have depressed our people aforesaid on all sides under color thereof, the last offense doubling the first; whereby, for their crimes and to the honor of the Crucified, we have caused those Jews to go forth from our realm as traitors: we, wishing to swerve not from our former choice, but rather to follow it, do make totally null and void all manner of penalties and usuries and every sort thereof, which could be demanded by actions by reason of the Jewry from any Christians of our realm for any times whatsoever; wishing that nothing be in any wise demanded from the Christians aforesaid by reason of the debts aforesaid, save only the principal sums which they received from the Jews aforesaid; the amount of which debts we will that the Christians aforesaid verify before you by the oath of three good and lawful men by whom the truth of the matter may the better be known, and thereafter pay the same to us at terms convenient to them to be fixed by you. And therefore we command you that you cause our said grace so piously granted to be read in the aforesaid exchequer, and to be enrolled on the rolls of the same exchequer, and to be straitly kept, according to the form above noted. ...

Illustration from Flores Historiarum (fourteenth century). Three Jews (all depicted with beards, as was customary) are attacked by a soldier.

THE YORK CORPUS CHRISTI PLAY:

The Crucifixion

c. 1376 – 1569

The Crucifixion play was produced by the Pinners' craft, and their more talented members may have acted in it as well (though there is evidence also of the hiring of more seasoned performers for various pageants). Pinners made pins, needles, and similar items. Even though The Crucifixion is not about the Pinners' craft in any literal sense, the theme of work and its consequences still drives this version of the crucifixion narrative, which draws both from the Gospel accounts and from legendary and apocryphal material. The soldiers are simultaneously the Roman men who blindly obeyed orders and also late medieval workmen who seek only to get the day's work over and done with, however shoddily, and regardless of consequences. Such purposeful anachronism is a technique common to late medieval art and literature, especially drama, that seeks to make biblical narratives resonate for late medieval audiences.

Dark humor is also a common trait of medieval drama; even here, in this most violent of sacred episodes, it may be found. Critics have debated the meaning of this cringe-inducing humor. Some have argued that it lulls audience members into unthinking identification with the soldiers until they realize their complicity in the crucifixion in history, through their sin, and also in the play (most of which occurs below a crowded audience's sight-lines until the cross is raised, making them belatedly aware of the target of their laughter). Others insist that the laughter heightens the violence and makes it more terrible; thus the play participates in a form of late medieval devotion known as "affective piety," whereby the audience or reader is meant to come to an understanding of God's love through deep feeling and empathy. Still others see the potential for laughter as both mocking the ignorant soldiers and looking forward to the joy of the resurrection; the cycle as a whole is a comedy in the classical sense, after all, ending triumphantly for Jesus and the faithful.

The York Crucifixion is also unusual in its isolation of the crucifixion from other events and characters of the Passion narrative. Although individual poems, such as the Old English "Dream of the Rood," do this also, the York play is the only drama to depict the crucifixion process separately from Jesus' death on the cross, and to depict it without those who mourn for him, who usually include the women in his life. In isolating the crucifixion this way, the York play seems to offer a contrast between competing types of masculinity: the garrulous, social masculinity of the quick-tempered soldiers, concerned with their public reputation and status, versus the stoic, emotionally contained, individual Jesus, set apart from all others.

The Crucifixion is written in 12-line stanzas rhyming ababababcdcd. Jesus alone speaks in full stanzas. For their part, the soldiers divide stanzas between them, although at times their individual speeches span successive stanzas, masking the play's form and giving their speech a naturalistic effect.

A page from the York Pinners' Crucifixion play, from the "Register," or official copy, of the York cycle (York, c. 1463–77), London, British Library MS Add. 35290, f. 184r. In this selection the soldiers (identified by an abbreviated form of miles, Latin for soldier) are making their first attempt to raise the cross. The soldiers are numbered in medieval-style Roman numerals: i^o, ii^o, iii^o, and iiij^o for 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 4th. One of the main scribes of the manuscript has added some lines that he apparently had forgotten when first copying the play.

*The York Crucifixion*¹

CHARACTERS

Soldier 1
 Soldier 2
 Soldier 3
 Soldier 4
 Jesus

[Enter four Roman Soldiers with Jesus.]

SOLDIER 1. Sir knights, take heed; hither^o come here in hiel!^o haste
 This deed on dergh^o we may not draw.² aside
 Ye wor^o yourself as well as I know
 How lords and leaders of our law
 Has^o given doom^o that this have / judgment
 dote^o shall die. fool

SOLDIER 2. Sir, all their counsel well we know.
 Since we are come to Calvary³
 Let ilk^o man help now as him owe.⁴ each

SOLDIER 3. We are all ready, lo,
 That forward^o to fulfill. contract, agreement

SOLDIER 4. Let^o hear how we shall do, let's
 And go we tite^o there-til.^o quickly / to it

SOLDIER 1. It may not help here for to hone^o delay
 If we shall any worship^o win. honor

SOLDIER 2. He must be dead needling^o necessarily by none.^o canonical hour of none, i.e., 3 p.m.

SOLDIER 3. Then is good time that we begin.

SOLDIER 4. Let ding^o him down, then is he beat done.^o finished, done for

He shall not dere^o us with his din. hurt

SOLDIER 1. He shall be set and learnèd soon,

20 With care^o to him and all his kin.⁵ sorrow

SOLDIER 2. The foulest death of all

Shall he die for his deeds.

SOLDIER 3. That means cross him⁶ we shall.

SOLDIER 4. Behold, so right^o he redes.^o rightly / counsels

25 SOLDIER 1. Then to this work us must take heed,

So that our working be not wrong.

SOLDIER 2. None other note^o to neven^o task / mention is need,^o needed

But let us haste him for to hang.

SOLDIER 3. And I have gone for gear, good speed,⁷

30 Both hammers and nails large and long.

SOLDIER 4. Then may we boldly do this deed.

Come on, let kill this traitour strong.^o villainous

SOLDIER 1. Fair might ye fall in fere^o together

That has wrought on this wise.^{o8} way

35 SOLDIER 2. Us needs not for to lere⁹
 Such faitours^o to chastise. vagrants

SOLDIER 3. Since ilka thing¹⁰ is right arrayed,^o set in place

The wiselier now work may we.

SOLDIER 4. The cross on ground is goodly^o well
 graid^o prepared

40 And bored even as it oweth^o to be. ought

SOLDIER 1. Look that the lad on length be laid

And made^o me^o then secured / for me, i.e., at my command
 unto this tree.^o cross

SOLDIER 2. For all his fare^o he shall be actions

flayed,^o defeated

That on assay^o soon shall ye see. trial

45 SOLDIER 3. [To Jesus.] Come forth thou cursèd knave,
 Thy comfort soon shall keel.^o cool, diminish

¹ The York Crucifixion The present text has been edited by Christina M. Fitzgerald. Spelling and punctuation of this text have been modernized in accordance with the practices of this volume. Stage directions do not appear in the original text, which exists in one manuscript, the "Register" of the York Corpus Christi Play, created c. 1463–77, now a British Library manuscript. Where stage directions have been added for clarity, they are presented in square brackets.

² on dergh ... draw We may not put off.

³ Calvary Anglicized Latin name for the place of Jesus' crucifixion. See Luke 23.33: "And when they were come to the place which is called Calvary, they crucified him there."

⁴ him owe He ought to.

⁵ He shall be set ... his kin He will be set straight and educated soon, with sorrow to him and all his kin (as a result).

⁶ cross him Crucify him.

⁷ good speed With great haste.

⁸ Fair might ... on this wise May good befall you together who have worked in this way.

⁹ Us ... lere It is not necessary for us to be taught how.

¹⁰ ilka thing Every thing.

SOLDIER 4. Thine hire^o here shall thou payment, wages
have.

SOLDIER 1. Walk on! Now work we well.

JESUS. Almighty God, my father free,^o noble
50 Let these matters be made in mind:¹
Thou bade that I should buxom^o be obedient
For Adam's plight for to be pined.^o pained, punished
Here to dead^o I oblige^o me^o death / obligate / myself
From that sin for to save mankind,
55 And sovereignly beseech I thee²
That they^o for^o me may i.e., all humankind / because of favour find.
And from the fiend them fend,^o defend
So that their souls be safe
In wealth^o withouten^o end. spiritual bounty / without 60 I keep not else to crave.³

SOLDIER 1. Wey,⁴ hark^o sir knights, for listen
Mahound's⁵ blood,

Of Adam-kind is all his thought.

SOLDIER 2. The warlow^o waxes^o worse traitor, felon / grows than wood,^o insane

This doleful^o dead^o ne dreadeth he not.⁶ sorrowful / death

65 SOLDIER 3. Thou should have mind,^o with remembrance main and mood,⁷

Of wicked works that thou hast wrought.

SOLDIER 4. I hope^o that he had been as good think

Have ceased of saws^o that he up-sought.^o sayings / made up

SOLDIER 1. Those saws shall rue him sare⁹

70 For all his sauntering^o sone.^o babbling / sound

made in mind Considered.

² And ... thee Principally I beg you.

³ I ... crave I desire nothing more.

⁴ Wey Interjection for getting attention, akin to the modern "hey."

⁵ Mahound's Mohammad (c. 570–632), prophet and founder of Islam. Medieval English texts often depict all non-Christian and non-Jewish characters as worshipping or otherwise calling on Mohammad.

⁶ ne dreadeth he not He does not dread.

⁷ with main and mood Fervently, with determination.

⁸ I hope ... up-sought I think that he would have been as good (i.e., better off) to have ceased those sayings that he made up.

⁹ shall rue him sare He shall sorely regret.

SOLDIER 2. Ill speed them¹⁰ that^o him spare who Till he to dead be done.

SOLDIER 3. Have done belive^o boy, and make quickly thee boon,^o ready
And bend thy back unto this tree.

[Jesus lies down on the cross.]

75 SOLDIER 4. Behold, himself has laid him down
In length and breadth as he should be.

SOLDIER 1. This traitor here tainted^o of treason, convicted
Go fest^o and fetter him then ye three; fasten

And since he claimeth kingdom with crown,

80 Even as a king here hang shall he.

SOLDIER 2. Now, certes,^o I shall not fine^o certainly / finish
Or^o his right hand be fest.^o ere, before / fastened

[Soldier 2 stands at the right hand of the cross.]

SOLDIER 3. The left hand then is mine—
Let see who bears him best.

[Soldier 3 stands at the left hand of the cross.]

85 SOLDIER 4. His limbs^o on length then shall i.e., legs
I lead,

And even unto the bore^o them bring. nail hole

[Soldier 4 stands at the foot of the cross.]

SOLDIER 1. Unto his head I shall take heed,
And with mine hand help him to hang.

[Soldier 1 stands at the head of the cross.]

SOLDIER 2. Now since we four shall do this deed

90 And meddle with this unthrifty^o thing, unprofitable

Let no man spare for special speed¹¹

Till that we have made ending.

SOLDIER 3. This forward^o may not fail; agreement
Now are we right arrayed.^o prepared

¹⁰ Ill speed them Bad luck to them.

¹¹ Let ... speed Let none of us refrain from all due speed.

SOLDIER 4. This boy here in our bail° custody
 Shall bide° full bitter braid.° experience / blow

SOLDIER 1. Sir knights, say, how work we now?

SOLDIER 2. Yis,° certes, I hope° I hold indeed / think this hand,

And to the bore I have it brought Full buxomly° withouten band.° obediently / rope

SOLDIER 1. Strike on then hard, for him thee bought.¹

SOLDIER 2. Yis, here is a stub° will stiffly stand, nail
 Through bones and sinew it shall be sought.° found
 This work is well, I will warrant.° guarantee

[Soldier 2 nails Jesus' right hand.]

SOLDIER 1. Say sir, how do we thore?° there (i.e., at left side of cross)

This bargain° may not blin.° business / cease

SOLDIER 3. It fails° a foot and more, falls short
 The sinews are so gone° in. shrunk

SOLDIER 4. I hope° that mark amiss be bored. think

SOLDIER 2. Than must he bide in bitter bale.° misery

SOLDIER 3. In faith, it was over-scantly° inadequately scored,° marked

That makes it foully for to fail.

SOLDIER 1. Why carp° ye so? Fast° on a cord talk / fasten
 And tug him to, by top and tail.²

[Soldier 3 tugs Jesus' left hand to reach the poorly bored nail hole.]

SOLDIER 3. Ya, thou commands lightly° as a lord; easily Come help to haul, with ill hail.³

SOLDIER 1. Now certes that shall I do—
 Full snelly as a snail.⁴

¹ for him thee bought For the sake of him (i.e., Jesus) who redeemed you. Refers anachronistically to medieval Christian redemption theology, in which Jesus' death on the cross ransomed souls from eternal death.

² And tug ... tail And tug him to (the holes) from top to bottom.

³ with ill hail Bad luck to you! Interjection of displeasure and impatience.

⁴ Full snelly as a snail As quickly as a snail.

SOLDIER 3. And I shall tach° him to,° tack, nail / to (the cross)
 120 Full nemely° with a nail. nimbly

[Soldier 3 nails Jesus' left hand to the cross.]

This work will hold, that dare I here,° promise

For now are fest fast° both his hend.° firmly / hands

SOLDIER 4. Go we all four then to his feet,
 So shall our space° be speedily spend.° time / spent

125 SOLDIER 2. Let see what bourd° his bale might jest bete;⁵

There-to° my back now would I bend. to that (task)

SOLDIER 4. Oh, this work is all unmeet!° unworthy

This boring° must all be amend. the bore-holes

SOLDIER 1. Ah, peace man, for Mahound, 130 Let no man wot° that know about

wonder.° marvel (i.e., poorly bored holes)

A rope shall rug° him down yank

If° all his sinews go asunder. even if

SOLDIER 2. That cord full kindly° can I thoroughly knit,° tie

The comfort of this carl° to churl, base fellow keel.° cool, diminish

135 SOLDIER 1. Fest on then fast that all be fit,
 It is no force how fell° he feel. terrible

[They pull down on his feet to stretch his body to fit the incorrectly bored holes.]

SOLDIER 2. Lug on ye both a little yet.

SOLDIER 3. I shall not cease, as I have sele.° bliss

SOLDIER 4. And I shall fond° him for to hit.⁶ test

140 SOLDIER 2. Oh, hail!° heave!

SOLDIER 4. Ho° now, I hold it well.⁷ hold, stop

SOLDIER 1. Have done, drive in that nail,
 So that no fault be found.

SOLDIER 4. This working would not fail
 If four bulls here were bound.

⁵ Let see ... bete Let's see what jest can mend his sorrow (i.e., the soldiers treat stretching Jesus as a game to amuse him).

⁶ fond him for to hit Test him by hitting (him).

⁷ I hold it well I think it (i.e., the task) has been done well.

[Soldier 4 nails Jesus' feet to the cross.]

145 SOLDIER 1. There cords have evil^o increased evilly
 his pains,
 Or^o he were till^o the borings brought. before / to SOLDIER 2. Ya, asunder are both sinews and veins
 On ilka side, so have we sought.
 SOLDIER 3. Now all his gauds^o nothing him gains, tricks
 150 His sauntering^o shall with bale be bought. babbling
 SOLDIER 4. I will go say to our sovereigns
 Of all this work how we have wrought.
 SOLDIER 1. Nay sirs, another thing
 Falls first to you and me—
 155 They bade we should him hang
 On height that men might see.

SOLDIER 2. We wot^o well so^o their know / thus, such words wore,^o were
 But sir, that deed will do us dere!^o harm

SOLDIER 1. It may not mend^o for to moot^o help / argue more,
 160 This harlot^o must be hangèd here. base fellow, rogue SOLDIER 2. The mortise^o is made hole (to hold base of cross) fit therefore.
 SOLDIER 3. Fest on your fingers then, in fere.

[They try unsuccessfully to lift the cross.]

SOLDIER 4. I ween^o it will never come believe thore;^o (up) there
 We four raise it not right to-year.¹
 165 SOLDIER 1. Say man, why carps^o thou so? talk
 Thy lifting was but light.^o little
 SOLDIER 2. He means there must be mo^o more (men)
 To heave him up on height.

SOLDIER 3. Now certes, I hope it shall not need^o be necessary
 170 To call to us more company.
 Methinks^o we four should do this deed it seems to me
 And bear him to yon^o hill² on high. yonder

SOLDIER 1. It must be done, withouten dread.

No more, but look ye be ready,
 175 And this part^o shall I lift and lead. i.e., the head
 On length^o he shall no longer lie. prone
 Therefore now make you boun;^o ready
 Let bear him to yon hill.
 SOLDIER 4. Then will I bear here down,^o i.e., at the feet 180 And tend his toes until.

SOLDIER 2. We two^o shall see till i.e., Soldiers 2 and 3
 either side,

For else this work will wry^o all wrong. go awry

SOLDIER 3. We are ready.

SOLDIER 4. Good sirs, abide,^o wait
 And let me first his feet up fang.^o take

185 SOLDIER 2. Why tend ye so to tales^o talking this tide?^o time

SOLDIER 1. Lift up!

[They try again to lift the cross.]

SOLDIER 4. Let see!^o watch out!

SOLDIER 2. Oh, lift along.^o lengthwise

SOLDIER 3. From all this harm he should him^o himself hide

And^o he were God. if

SOLDIER 4. The devil him hang!

SOLDIER 1. For great harm have I hent^o— received

190 My shoulder is in-sunder.^o asunder

SOLDIER 2. And certes I am near shent,^o disgraced, ruined
 So long have I borne under.³

SOLDIER 3. This cross and I in two must twin,^o separate Else breaks my back in-sunder soon.

195 SOLDIER 4. Lay^o down again and leave your set (the cross)
 din,

This deed for us will never be done.

[They put the cross down.]

SOLDIER 1. Assay^o sirs, let see if any gin^o try / device
 May help him up withouten hone,^o hesitation
 For here should wight^o men worship^o win, strong / honor

¹ We ... to-year We four will not raise it right in a year.

² yon hill Refers either to the pageant wagon (if the action so far has taken place on the ground) or the opposite end of the wagon if the nailing scene is performed on the wagon.

³ borne under Borne under the weight of the cross.

And not with gauds° all day to gone. nonsense

SOLDIER 2. More wighter men than we Full few I hope ye find.

SOLDIER 3. This bargain° will not be, business
For certes me wants wind.¹

SOLDIER 4. So wil° of work never we bewildered wore.° were

I hope this carl some cautels° cast. tricks, spells

SOLDIER 2. My burden set me wonder sore;
Unto the hill I might not last.

SOLDIER 1. Lift up, and soon he shall be thore;° there
Therefore fest on your fingers fast.

SOLDIER 3. Oh, lift!

[They try again to lift the cross.]

SOLDIER 1. Wey, lo!

SOLDIER 4. A little more.

SOLDIER 2. Hold then!

SOLDIER 1. How now?

SOLDIER 2. The worst is past.

SOLDIER 3. He weighs a wicked weight.

[They reach the place where the cross will be erected on the "hill."]

SOLDIER 2. So may we all four say,
Or° he was heaved on height already
And raised in this array.° manner

SOLDIER 4. He made us stand° as any stones, motionless
So boustous° was he for to bear. awkward, huge

SOLDIER 1. Now raise him nemely° for the nimbly nones²

And set him° by this mortise here, i.e., Jesus on the cross
And let him fall in all at once,

For certes that pain shall have no peer.

SOLDIER 3. Heave up!

[They raise the cross upright and maneuver it into the mortise.]

SOLDIER 4. Let down, so all his bones
Are asunder now on sides sere.³

[They drop the cross into the mortise.]

225 SOLDIER 1. This falling was more fell° wicked, harmful Than all the harms he had.

Now may a man well tell° count
The least lith° of this lad. limb

SOLDIER 3. Methinketh this cross will not abide° hold steady

230 Ne° stand still in this mortise yet. nor

SOLDIER 4. At the first time was it made over-wide;
That makes it° wave, thou may well i.e., the cross

wit.° perceive

SOLDIER 1. It shall be set° on ilka side stabilized

So that it shall no further flit.° move from side to side

235 Good wedges shall we take this tide° time

And fest the foot,° then is all fit. i.e., of the cross

SOLDIER 2. Here are wedges arrayed° laid out

For that, both great and small.

SOLDIER 3. Where are our hammers laid 240 That we should work withal?° with

SOLDIER 4. [Picking up hammer.] We have them here even at our hand.

SOLDIER 2. [Picking up wedge.] Give me this wedge, I shall it in drive.

SOLDIER 4. [Picking up another wedge.] Here is another yet orland.° ordained, prepared

SOLDIER 3. Do take° it me° hither give / to me
belive.° at once

245 SOLDIER 1. Lay on then fast.

SOLDIER 3. Yis, I warrant.

I thring° them same,° so mote° I thrive. knock / together / must

Now will this cross full stably stand,

All° if he rave they° will not rive.° even / i.e., the wedges / split

SOLDIER 1. [To Jesus.] Say sir, how likes you now,

250 This work that we have wrought?

¹ me wants wind I am lacking breath; i.e., I need to catch my breath.

² for the nones At once.

³ on sides sere Into many sections.

SOLDIER 4. [To Jesus.] We pray you say us how Ye feel, or° faint ye ought.° before / need to

JESUS. [To audience.] All men that walk by way or street,
Take tent° ye shall no travail tine.¹ heed
255 Behold mine head, mine hands, and my feet,
And fully feel now, or ye fine,° finish
If any mourning may be meet,° matched with Or mischief° measured° unto mine. misfortune / compared [He prays.] My father, that all bales may bete,° make better, put right
260 Forgives° these men that do me pine.° forgive / pain
What they work wot they not;²
Therefore, my father, I crave,
Let never their sins be sought,° examined
But see their souls to save.

265 SOLDIER 1. Wey, hark, he jangles° like a jay. chatters

SOLDIER 2. Methinks he patters³ like a pie.° magpie

SOLDIER 3. He has been doing all this day,
And made great moving° of mercy. prompting

SOLDIER 4. Is this the same that gun° us° say did / to us
That he was God's son almighty?

SOLDIER 1. Therefore he feels full fell° affray,° fierce / attack
And deemèd° this day for to die. judged

SOLDIER 2. Vah! qui destruis templum!⁴

SOLDIER 3. His saws were so, certain.° certainly

275 SOLDIER 4. And sirs, he said to some
He might raise it° again. i.e., the temple

SOLDIER 1. To muster that he had no might,
For all the cautels that he couth° cast. knew how to
All if he were in word so wight,° strong

280 For° all his force now he is fest.° despite / fastened, caught
As Pilate⁵ deemed is done and dight,° dealt with Therefore I rede° that we go rest. counsel, advise

SOLDIER 2. This race° mon° be action / must rehearsed° right, reported

Through the world both east and west.

285 SOLDIER 3. Ya, let him hang here still
And make moues° on° the moon. grimaces / at

SOLDIER 4. Then may we wend° at will. go

SOLDIER 1. Nay good sirs, not so soon,

For certes us needs another note:° advantage

290 This kirtle° would I of you crave. tunic (i.e., Jesus' tunic)

SOLDIER 2. Nay, nay sir, we will look by lot° lottery, draw
Which of us four falls° it to have. chances

SOLDIER 3. I rede° we draw cut° for counsel / lots, straws this coat.

Lo, see how soon°—all sides to save.° quickly / be fair to

295 SOLDIER 4. The short cut shall win, that well ye wot,
Whether it fall to knight or knave.

SOLDIER 1. Fellows, ye thar° not flyte,° need / argue
For this mantle is mine.

SOLDIER 2. Go we then hence tite,° quickly

300 This travail° here we tine.° labor / lose

—C. 1463–77

Take tent ... tine Take heed you do not lose the work (of my suffering); i.e., do not lose the meaning and message of this.

² Forgives ... wot they not See Luke 23.34: "And Jesus said: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

³ patters Chatters; but also, recites a prayer. Play on the Latin version of the Lord's Prayer, which begins "Pater noster," often used derogatively to mean mumbling prayers indistinctly.

Vah! qui destruis templum! Latin: Hah! You who destroy the temple! See Mark 15.29: "And they that passed by blasphemed him, wagging their heads, and saying: Vah, thou that destroyest the temple of God, and in three days buildest it up again." See also Matthew 27.40.

⁵ Pilate Pontius Pilate, Roman prefect (governor) of Judea (26–36? CE), before whom Jesus was brought for judgment in all four Gospel accounts and in the plays preceding this one. According to the Gospel accounts, he evaded responsibility for Jesus' final judgment, but he would have overseen executions nevertheless, and so the crucifixion is "done and dight" as "Pilate deemed."

THE WAKEFIELD MASTER

c. 1400 – 1450

Much is unclear about the identity of the “Wakefield Master” and about the group of plays ascribed to this individual. That group of plays is brought together in a manuscript that is believed to date from the mid sixteenth century. Nothing is sure about its origin, but by the seventeenth century it was in the library of a well-to-do Catholic family, the Towneleys of Towneley Hall near Burnley, Lancashire, from which the Towneley manuscript (now in the Huntington Library in San Marino, CA) takes its name. The manuscript includes thirty-two short plays based largely on biblical story material.

In the manuscript the plays appear in a sequence that approximates that of the Bible, beginning with a play depicting the story of the Creation. For that reason the Towneley Plays were long assumed to represent a cycle similar to that of the York and Chester cycles, in which a sequence of pageant plays was performed once every year, with performances beginning early in the day and running until dark, and with each play mounted under the auspices of one of the trade guilds of the town. Largely because the name “Wakefield” appears on the first page of two of the plays, the assumption took root that all thirty-two plays constituted a unified group that had been performed in that town, and the Towneley plays became widely referred to as the “Wakefield Cycle.” As recent scholarship has emphasised, however, the thirty-two form a very disparate group. The plays have a variety of sometimes-incompatible staging requirements; several have been borrowed virtually intact from the York cycle of pageant plays; several exhibit inconsistencies suggesting that they were unlikely ever to have been performed as they now appear. It is thus now thought to be entirely possible that the manuscript collection simply represents a group of plays from various sources, assembled in quasi-chronological order. Some have speculated that the collection may have been brought together in one manuscript with a view more to reading than to performance (though marks in some plays suggest a performance history, it is not clear when these were added to the manuscript). It is now regarded as highly improbable that the thirty-two were all performed together as part of a unified cycle, in Wakefield or in any other town.

Within the Towneley Plays, however, are five plays with strong points of similarity: Noah, The First Shepherds’ Play, The Second Shepherds’ Play, Herod the Great, and The Buffeting of Christ. A sixth, The Killing of Abel, is sometimes also linked with these five, though it is not written in the same stanzaic form as the others. The two shepherds plays and The Killing of Abel (unlike other plays in the Towneley manuscript) contain textual allusions to the Wakefield area. The five maintain a strong metrical structure, presented in the manuscript in the form of nine-line stanzas, with a consistent a a a b c c c b rhyming pattern throughout. The first four manuscript lines also contain rhyming half lines; in the light of this, recent scholarship is in agreement that an appropriate alternative to the way in which the lines are laid out in the manuscript is to read them as forming thirteen-line stanzas, rhymed a b a b a b c d d d c. These plays are also acknowledged to be distinguished by their lively characterization—and by the sheer skill of their composition. Since the nineteenth century they have generally been ascribed to a single author, now conventionally referred to as the “Wakefield Master.” Here too, however, recent scholarship has challenged old assumptions. While the commonality of all five plays has not been questioned, we have no firm evidence as to authorship. The quotation marks placed around the name "Wakefield Master" are thus to be taken to indicate that the ascription of authorship is the product of convention rather than proven fact. All that can be said with confidence is that there seems clearly to have been a common force involved in the shaping of all five of these plays.

Whether through the medium of a single author or the shaping editorial hand of the compiler, the five plays demonstrate an extensive and sophisticated knowledge of the Bible. It is also possible that the author or editor had some knowledge of continental literature, as the structures suggest some influences from the French comic theater of the time. The plays are written in a northern dialect of Middle English.

The Second Shepherds' Play is the best known and most widely read of the English biblical pageant plays. As with all such plays, it seems to have been intended to make biblical stories interesting to a largely illiterate population. It is noteworthy, however, that the play contains a very significant amount of material that has no biblical source. The play interweaves a touching presentation of Christ's nativity (extrapolated from the biblical account) with a farcical plot involving the thief and trickster Mak. The story material that has been added has considerable entertainment value, but it also offers social commentary.

*The Second Shepherds' Play*¹

CHARACTERS:

First Shepherd
Second Shepherd
Third Shepherd
Mak
Gill
An Angel
Mary

(Here begins their second.)

The Second Shepherds' Play For the present text spelling and punctuation have been substantially modernized from the original Towneley text. The stage directions in Latin in the Towneley text are here translated into English and shown in parentheses. For clarity some other stage directions have been added; these appear in square brackets. The editors present this play and Herod the Great attributed to the Wakefield Master in the 13-line stanza format that evidence indicates was the Master's own conception of his stanza form. These plays have sometimes been printed in a 9-line format, combining the first 8 short lines into 4 long ones, as the scribe of the Towneley Manuscript usually did; but Martin Stevens has demonstrated that this scribal practice is a space-saving device rather than an authoritative representation of the playwright's stanza form.

[A field near Bethlehem. Enter First Shepherd.]

FIRST SHEPHERD. Lord! what these weathers are cold!
And I am ill-happed;^o poorly clothed
I am near-hand dold,^o numb
So long have I napped;
My legs they fold,
My fingers are chapped;
It is not as I would,
For I am all lapped^o wrapped
In sorrow.
In storms and tempest,
Now in the east, now in the west,
Woe is him has never rest,
Mid-day nor morrow.

But we seely husbands²
That walk on the moor,
In faith, we are near-hands
Out of the door;
No wonder, as it stands,
If we be poor,
For the tilth of our lands

² seely husbands Poor farm workers.

Lies fallow as the floor,¹

As ye ken.^o

We are so hamed^o

For-taxed and ramed,²

We're made hand-tamed

With^o these gentlery men.^o

Thus they reave³ us our rest,

Our Lady them wary!^o

These men that are lord-fast,⁴

They cause the plough tarry.

What men say is for the best,

We find it contrary;

Thus are husbands^o oppressed,

In point to miscarry

In life.

Thus hold they us under,

Thus they bring us in blunder;^o

It were great wonder,

And^o ever should we thrive.

For may he get a paint sleeve,

Or a brooch nowadays,

Woe is him that him grieve,

Or once again-says!⁵

Dare no man him reprieve,^o

What mast'ry he makes;

And yet may no man lefe^o

One word that he says,

No letter.

He can make purveyance,⁶

With boast and bragance,

And all is through maintenance

know

hamstrung

by / gentry

curse

farmers confusion

if reprove

believe

Of men that are greater.⁷

There shall come a swain,

As proud as a po,^o

55 He must borrow my wain,^o

My plough also;

Then I am full fain^o

To grant ere he go.

Thus live we in pain,

60 Anger, and woe,

By night and day.

He must have if he longed,

If I should forgo it;⁸

I were better be hanged

65 Than once say him nay.

It does me good, as I walk

Thus by mine own,

Of this world for to talk

In manner of moan.⁹

70 To my sheep will I stalk

And hearken anon,

There abide on a balk,^o

Or sit on a stone

Full soon.

75 For I trow,^o pardie,¹⁰

True men if they be, We get more company

Or^o it be noon.

[Enter Second Shepherd. He does not see the First Shepherd.]

SECOND SHEPHERD. Benste and Dominus!¹¹

80 What may this bemean?^o

Why fares this world thus?

Oft have we not seen,

Lord, these weathers are spiteous,^o

And the winds full keen;

peacock wagon

delighted ridge

trust

before indicate nasty

¹ the tilth ... floor I.e., all of our land—the arable land (tilth) as much as the low-lying areas, is lying fallow; no crops are being grown there. During the fifteenth century many landowners were converting farmland to grazing land.

² For-taxed and ramed Overburdened and oppressed.

³ reave Take away from.

⁴ lord-fast Attached to lords.

⁵ For ... again-says! For, if anyone gets a painted sleeve or a brooch (i.e., wears livery) woe to the man who gives grief to or contradicts that person!

⁶ purveyance The requisition and purchase of provisions, specifically the right of the crown or of a lord to buy supplies for the household at a price set by a purveyor.

⁷ through maintenance ... greater Through the support of those with greater power.

⁸ He must ... forgo it If he has longed for a thing he must have it, even if I have to do without.

⁹ In manner of moan In a complaining way.

¹⁰ pardie By God (a corruption of the French "Pardieu").

¹¹ Benste Bless us (a corruption of the Latin "Benedicte"); Dominus Latin: Lord.

85	And the frost so hideous They water mine eeyen, ^o No lie. Now in dry, now in wet, Now in snow, now in sleet, 90 When my shone ^o freeze to my feet It is not all easy.	eyes	125	Some men will have two wives, And some men three, In store. Some are woe ^o that have any; But so far can I, ⁴ Woe is him that has many, 130 For he feels sore.	sad, woeful
	But as far as I ken, Or yet as I go, We seely wed-men 95 Dre mekill woe; ¹ We have sorrow then and then, It falls ^o oft so. Seely Capel, our hen, Both to and fro 100 She cackles; But begins she to croak, To groan or to cluck, Woe is him, our cock, For he is in the shackles. ²	happens		[To the audience.] But young men, of wooing, For God that you bought, ⁵ Be well ware of wedding, And think in your thought: 135 "Had I wist" ^o is a thing That serves of nought; Mekill still ^o mourning Has wedding home brought, And griefs, 140 With many a sharp shower, ^o For thou may catch in an hour That shall sow ^o thou full sour ^o As long as thou liffys. ^o	known much steady pang grieve / bitterly you live
105	These men that are wed Have not all their will; When they are full hard stead, ³ They sigh full still; ^o God wayte ^o they are led 110 Full hard and full ill, In bower ^o nor in bed They say nought theretill, ^o This tide. ^o My part have I fun ^o — 115 I know my lesson: Woe is him that is bun ^o For he must abide. ^o	continually knows bedroom in reply time found bound stay that way	145	For, as ever read I pistill, I have one to my fere ⁶ As sharp as a thistle, As rough as a brier; She is browed like a bristle, With a sour-loten ^o cheer; 150 Had she once wet her whistle She could sing full clear Her pater-noster. ⁷ She is as great as a whall, ^o She has a gallon of gall; 15 By him that died for us all, ^o I would I had run to ^o I had lost her!	looking whale i.e., Jesus till
120	But now late in our lives— A marvel to me, That I think my heart rives ^o Such wonders to see, What that destiny drives, It should so be!—	breaks		FIRST SHEPHERD. God look over the row! ^o Full deafly ye stand.	audience

seely ... woe We poor married men suffer a great deal.

² Seely Capel ... in the shackles The husband is in servitude to his wife, who is likened to a silly hen.

³ full hard stead Hard pressed, stricken by misfortune.

⁴ so far can I This much I know.

⁵ you bought Redeemed you.

⁶ as ever ... fere As surely as I read the Epistle, I have one as my companion.

⁷ pater-noster Latin: Our Father; the Lord's Prayer.

SECOND SHEPHERD. Yea, the devil in thy maw,

So tarryand!¹ tarrying

Saw thou anywhere of Daw?

FIRST SHEPHERD. Yea, on a lea² land

Heard I him blow;³

He comes here at hand,

Not far;

Stand still.

SECOND SHEPHERD. Why?

FIRST SHEPHERD. For he comes, hope I.

SECOND SHEPHERD. He will make^o us both a lie tell

But if^o we beware. unless

[Enter Third Shepherd, a boy. He does not see the others.]

THIRD SHEPHERD. Christ's cross me speed,

And Saint Nicholas!

Thereof had I need,

It is worse than it was.

Whoso could, take heed,

And let the world pass:

It is ever in dread

And brekill^o as glass, brittle

And slithes.^o slides away

This world fared never so,

With marvels more and more,

Now in weal, now in woe,

And all thing writhes.⁴

Was never since Noah's flood

Such floods seen,

Winds and rains so rude,

And storms so keen;

Some stammered, some stood

In doubt, as I ween;^o think

Now God, turn all to good!

I say as I mean.

For ponder:

These floods so they drown

Both in fields and in town,

And bear all down,

And that is a wonder.

[He sees the others, but at first does not recognize them.]

We that walk in the nights,

Our cattle to keep,

We see sudden sights,

When other men sleep.

Yet methink my heart lights— 200

I see shrews^o peep. villains

Ye are two all-wights!^o monsters

I will give my sheep

A turn.

But full ill have I meant;

As I walk on this bent,^o heath

I may lightly repent

My toes if I spurn.⁵

Ah, sir, God you save,

And master mine! 210

A drink fain would I have,

And somewhat to dine.

FIRST SHEPHERD. Christ's curse, my knave,

Thou art a lither hind!⁶

SECOND SHEPHERD. What, the boy list^o ravel! likes to

(To the Third Shepherd.)

Abide unto sine;^o later

We have made it.

Ill thrift^o on thy pate!^{o7} luck / head

(To the First Shepherd.)

Though the shrew^o came late, rascal

Yet is he in state 220

To dine, if he had it.⁸

⁵ But full ill ... spurn The meaning here is obscure; the suggestion seems to be that a comical penance (of stubbing his toes) is to be imposed on the shepherd for having taken his fellow shepherds to be monsters.

⁶ lither hind Wicked farm servant.

⁷ Abide ... pate Wait a while; we have had food already—bad luck to you.

⁸ in state ... had it Would like to eat, if he had food.

¹ maw ... tarryand Belly, for taking so long.

² lea Fallow, unploughed.

³ Heard ... blow I heard him blow (his horn).

⁴ all thing writhes Everything keeps turning.

THIRD SHEPHERD. Such servants as I,
 That sweats and swinks,^o
 Eats our bread full dry, 225 And that me forthinks;¹
 We are oft wet and weary
 When mastermen winks,^o
 Yet comes full lately^o
 Both dinners and drinks.
 230 But naitly^o
 Both our dame and our sire,
 When we have run in the mire,^o
 They can nip at our hire,²
 And pay us full lately.

235 But hear my truth, master:
 For the fare that ye make,
 I shall do thereafter
 Work as I take;³
 I shall do a little, sir,
 240 Emang ever lake;⁴
 For yet lay my supper
 Never on my stomach
 In fields.⁵
 Where to should I threap?^o
 245 With my staff can I leap,
 And men say "light cheap
 Litherly foryields."⁶

FIRST SHEPHERD. Thou were an ill lad—
 To ride on wowing
 250 With a man that had
 But little of spending—

SECOND SHEPHERD. Peace, boy, I bade;
 No more jangling,^o
 Or I shall make thee afraid, 255 By the heaven's king,

*labors, toilssleep
very slowlythoroughlymuckcomplainchattering*With thy gauds!^o*pranks*

Where are our sheep, boy? We scorn—
 THIRD SHEPHERD. Sir, this same day at morn
 I left them in the corn,
 260 When they rang Lauds;⁷

They have pasture good—
 They cannot go wrong.

FIRST SHEPHERD. That is right. By the rood,^o
 These nights are long!
 265 Yet I would, ere we yode,^o
 One gave us a song.

SECOND SHEPHERD. So I thought as I stood,
 To mirth us among.⁸

THIRD SHEPHERD. I grant.

270 FIRST SHEPHERD. Let me sing the tenory.^o tenor

SECOND SHEPHERD. And I the treble so high.

THIRD SHEPHERD. Then the mean^o falls to me; middle part
 Let's see how ye chant.

(Enter Mak, with a cloak thrown over his smock.)

MAK. Now, Lord, for thy names seven,

275 That made both moon and stars,
 Well more than I can neven,⁹
 Thy will, Lord, of me tharnys;¹⁰
 I am all uneven,^o

That moves^o oft my harns;^o
 280 Now would God I were in heaven,
 For there weep no bairns^o
 So still!^o

FIRST SHEPHERD. Who is that pipes so poor?^o

MAK. Would God ye wist^o how I foor!^o

285 Lo, a man that walks on the moor,
 And has not all his will!¹¹

upset / brainschildren incessantlycries so wretchedlyknew / fared

¹ me forthinks Upsets me.

² nip at our hire Reduce our wages.

³ I shall do ... take I will only work as well as I am being paid for it.

⁴ Emang ever lake Keep playing continually.

⁵ For yet ... fields For I have never had such a full stomach that it weighed me down in the fields.

⁶ light cheap / Litherly foryields Proverbial saying: Low costs yield low returns, i.e., you get what you pay for.

⁷ Lauds "Laud" was the first hour of the Church day, and it ended with the singing of a Psalm of praise (from the Latin for praise, laus, laudem).

⁸ To mirth us among To have mirth among us.

⁹ neven Refer to, especially by name.

¹⁰ of me tharnys Is unclear to me.

¹¹ Lo ... will Look, I am just a man out walking, who does not know what to do; or, does not have all he wants.

Tell us tidings.

THIRD SHEPHERD. Is he come? Then each one Take heed to his thing.¹

(Takes his cloak from him.)

MAK. What! *Ich*² be a yeoman,
I tell you, of the king;
The self and the some,[°]
Sent from a great lording
Und sich.[°]
Fie on you! Goeth hence!
Out of my presence!
I must have reverence.
Why, who be Ich?

FIRST SHEPHERD. Why make ye it so quaint?[°] Mak, ye do wrong.

SECOND SHEPHERD. But, Mak, play ye the saint?
I trow that ye long.³

THIRD SHEPHERD. I trow the shrew can paynt,⁴
The devil might him hang!

MAK. I shall make complaint,
And make you all to thwang⁵
At a word.

And tell even how ye doth.⁶

FIRST SHEPHERD. But, Mak, is that truth?
Now take out that southern tooth,⁷
And set[°] in a turd!

SECOND SHEPHERD. Mak, the devil in your eye!
A stroke would I lean[°] you.

THIRD SHEPHERD. Mak, know ye not me?
By God, I could teen⁸ you.

¹ Then ... thing In that case everyone should look out for his belongings.

² Ich The use of this word (together with "sich") suggests that Mak is affecting a southern English dialect.

³ play ... long Are you pretending to be a saint? I believe that's what you long to be.

⁴ paynt Feign, deceive.

⁵ thwang Be flogged.

⁶ tell ... doth I will even tell (the authorities) how you are acting.

⁷ southern tooth Southern dialect.

⁸ teen Vex, cause physical injury to.

[Mak now pretends to recognize the shepherds for the first time.]

MAK. God look you all three!
Methought I had seen you.
Ye are a fair company.

320 FIRST SHEPHERD. Can ye now mene you?⁹

SECOND SHEPHERD. Shrew, peep![°]
Thus late as thou goes,
What will men suppose?
And thou has an ill noise
Of stealing of sheep.¹⁰

MAK. And I am true as steel,
All men watt![°]
But a sickness I feel,
That holds me full hatt[°]

330 My belly fares not well,
It is out of estate.[°]

THIRD SHEPHERD. Seldom lies the devil
Dead by the gate.¹¹

MAK. Therefore 335 Full sore am I and ill,
If I stand stone still;
I eat[°] not a needle
This month and more.

FIRST SHEPHERD. How fares thy wife? By my hood, 340 How fares sho?[°]

MAK. Lies weltering,[°] by the rood,
By the fire, lo!
And a house full of brood;[°]
She drinks well, too;
345 Ill speed other good
That she will do!

But so
Eats as fast as she can,
And each year that comes to man,
350 She brings forth a lakan[°]

⁹ Can ye now mene you? Are you now able to recognize yourself too?

¹⁰ And thou ... stealing of sheep And you have a bad reputation as a sheep stealer.

¹¹ Seldom ... gate Proverbial: When the devil seems to lie dead, it is more likely that he is feigning.

And some years two.

But were I now more gracious,
And richer by far,

would be

355 And of harbour;^o

home

Yet is she a foul douce,^o

woman

If ye come near.

There is none that trows

Nor knows a worse

360 Than ken I.

Now will ye see what I proffer?

To give all in my coffer

To-morn next to offer

Her head-mass penny.¹

365 SECOND SHEPHERD. I know so forwaked²

Is none in this shire:

I would sleep if I took

Less to my hire.³

THIRD SHEPHERD. I am cold and naked,

370 And would have a fire.

FIRST SHEPHERD. I am weary, for-raked,^o exhausted

And run in the mire.

Wake thou!

SECOND SHEPHERD. Nay, I will lie down-by,

375 For I must sleep, truly.

THIRD SHEPHERD. As good a man's son was I

As any of you.⁴

[Lies down.]

But, Mak, come hither! between

Shall thou lie down.

380 MAK. Then might I lett you bedene

Of that ye would rowne;⁵

No dread.

From my top to my toe

Manus tuas commendo,

¹ head-mass penny Payment for her funeral mass.

² forwaked Tired from lack of sleep.

³ I would ... to my hire I would take less wages if I could sleep.

⁴ As good ... any of you I am just as good as you are (and therefore just as deserving of a rest).

⁵ lett you ... would rowne Hinder your whispering round me.

385 *Pontio Pilate!*⁶

Christ's cross me speed!

(Then he rises, while the shepherds are asleep, and says:)

Now were time for a man

That lacks what he would,

To stalk privily then

390 Into a fold,^o

sheepfold

And nimbly to work then,

And be not too bold,

For he might aby the bargain,

If it were told

395 At the ending.⁷

Now is the time to reyll^o

act quickly

But he needs good counsel

That fain would fare well,

And has but little spending.⁸

[Mak casts a spell on the sleeping shepherds.]

400 But about you, a circle

As round as a moon!

Till I have done that I will,

Till that it be noon,

That ye lie stone-still,

405 To^o that I have done.

till

And I shall say there-till

Of good words a fayne:^o few

"On height,

Over your heads my hand I lift,

410 Out go your eyes, fordo^o your sight!"

lose

But yet I must make better shift,^o

arrangements

And^o it be right.

if

[Shepherds snore. Mak addresses the audience.]

⁶ Manus tuas commendo, Pontio Pilate Latin: Into thy hands I commend (my spirit), Pontius Pilate. Mak misquotes Luke 23.46 ("Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit") and substitutes Pontius Pilate for God.

⁷ he might ... ending He (who is too bold) may pay a high price for it in the end.

⁸ he needs ... spending Someone who would like to fare better but has few resources needs to follow good advice.

Lord, what they sleep hard!
That may ye all hear.

Was I° never a shepherd,

But now will I lere.°

If the flock be scared,

Yet shall I nip° near.

How! Draw hitherward!

Now mends our cheer

From sorrow.

A fat sheep, I dare say,

A good fleece, dare I lay.°

Eft-whyte° when I may,

But this will I borrow.

[Carries the sheep to the door of his house.]

How, Gill, art thou in?

Get us some light.

WIFE. Who makes such din

This time of the night?

I am set for to spin.

I doubt that I might Rise a penny to win;

I shrew them on height!

So fares

A huswiff that has been

To be raced thus between!¹

Here may no note° be seen

For such small chares.°

MAK. Good wife, open the hek!°

Sees thou not what I bring?

WIFE. I may let thee draw the sneck.°

Ah, come in, my sweeting!

MAK. Yea, thou there not reck

Of my long standing!²

WIFE. By the naked neck art

Thou like for° to hang!

MAK. Do way!°

I am worthy my meat,

For in a strait° can I get

I was learn come wager

repay

benefit, profit

chores

door

latch

likely stop that!

tight spot

450 More than they that swink and sweat
All the long day.

Thus it fell to my lot,

Gill: I had such grace!³

WIFE. It were a foul blot 455 To be hanged for the case.

MAK. I have scaped, Gillot,

Oft as hard a glace.°

WIFE. But so long goes the pot

To the water, men says,

At last

460 Comes it home broken.

MAK. Well know I the token,

But let it never be spoken.

But come and help fast.

465 I would he were flayn;°

I list° well eat:

This twelvemonth was I not so fain

Of one sheep-meat.

WIFE. Come they ere he be slain,

470 And hear the sheep bleat—

MAK. Then might I be ta'en:

That were a cold sweat!

Go spar°

The gate door.

WIFE. Yes, Mak,

475 For and they come at thy back—

MAK. Then might I buy, fro all the pack,

The devil of the war!⁴

WIFE. A good bowrde° have I spied,

Since thou ken° none:

480 Here shall we him hide

Too they be gone,

In my cradle abide.

Let° me alone,

And I shall lie beside 485 In childbed and groan.

MAK. Thou red°

And I shall say thou was lighted°

Of a knave°-child this night.

skinned wish fasten trick

know

leave

ready yourself

delivered

male

¹ I am set ... between I am all in a tizzy. I don't see how I can gain anything from this; I curse them mightily! This is how it goes for a housewife who has been interrupted like this!

² Yea ... standing Yes, don't let it bother you how long I've been standing here!

³ I had such grace I was so blessed.

⁴ Then might ... war Then I might receive, from the pack of them, a hellishly bad experience.

WIFE. Now, well is me! Day bright
That ever I was bred!

This is a good guise
And a far cast;^o
Yet a woman avyse^o
Helps at the last!

clever trick advice

I wote never who spies;
Again, go thou fast!¹

MAK. But I come ere they rise,
Else blows a cold blast!
I will go sleep.

[Mak returns to the Shepherds.]

Yet sleeps all this meneye^o
And I shall go stalk privily,^o
As it had never been I
That carried their sheep.

*group
stealthily*

[He lies down among them. The shepherds begin to wake up.]

FIRST SHEPHERD. *Resurrex a mortuis!*²

Have hold my hand!
*Judas carnas dominus!*³
I may not well stand.
My foot sleeps, by Jesus!
And I water fastand.

I thought that we laid us
Full near England.⁴

SECOND SHEPHERD. Ah, yea!
Lord, what, I have slept well!
As fresh as an eel,
As light I me feel
As leaf on a tree.

THIRD SHEPHERD. Benste be herein!
So me quakes,
My heart is out of skin;

¹ I wote never ... fast I don't know who may be looking; go back (to the shepherds) again quickly!

² Resurrex a mortuis Garbled Latin: He has risen from the dead!

³ Judas carnas dominus Corrupted Latin: Judas, lord of the flesh!

⁴ I water ... England I have eaten so little that I thought we had been lying down very close to England.

What so it makes!
Who makes all this din?
So my brows blakes
To the door will I win.⁵
Hark, fellows, wake!

We were four:

See ye anywhere of Mak now?

FIRST SHEPHERD. We were up ere thou.

SECOND SHEPHERD. Man, I give God a vow,
That yede he nowhere.

THIRD SHEPHERD. Methought he was lapt
In a wolfskin.

FIRST SHEPHERD. So are many happed
Now: namely, within.

THIRD SHEPHERD. When we had long napped,

Methought with a gin^o
A fat sheep he trapped,
But he made no din.

trap

SECOND SHEPHERD. Be still!^o

Thy dream makes thee wood;^o

quiet insane

It is but phantom, by the rood.

FIRST SHEPHERD. Now God turn all to good,
If it be his will!

[They turn to wake up Mak.]

SECOND SHEPHERD. Rise, Mak, for shame!
Thou lies right long.

MAK. Now Christ's holy name
Be us emang!^o

among

What is this? For Saint James,
I may not well go!
I trow I be the same.

Ah, my neck has lain wrang^o
Enough,

wrong

Mekill thank, since yester-even.^o

yesterday evening

Now, by Saint Stephen,

I was flayed^o by a sweven^o

scared / dream

My heart out of slough.^o

skin

I thought Gill began to croak,
And travail^o full sad,
Well near at the first cock,^o lad

*labor
cock-crow*

⁵ So my brows ... will I win My brows furrow (out of fear at the commotion) and I will run away.

Of a young
 For to mend our flock.
 Then be I never glad;
 I have tow on my rok¹
 More than ever I had.

Ah, my head!
 A house full of young tharms,[°]
 The devil knock out their harns![°]
 Woe is him has many bairns,
 And so little bread!

I must go home, by your leave,
 To Gill, as I thought.
 Pray you: look up my sleeve,
 That I steal nought:
 I am loth you to grieve,
 Or from you take aught.

[Exits.]

THIRD SHEPHERD. Go forth; ill might thou cheve.[°]
 Now would I we sought,
 This morn,
 That we had all our store.²

FIRST SHEPHERD. But I will go before.
 Let us meet.

SECOND SHEPHERD. Where?

THIRD SHEPHERD. At the crooked thorn.

[They leave to check on their sheep. The scene shifts to Mak's house.]

MAK. (Knocking.) Undo this door! Who is here?
 How long shall I stand?

WIFE. Who makes such a bere?[°]

Go walk in the wanyand!³

MAK. Ah, Gill, what cheer?
 It is I, Mak, your husband.

WIFE. Then may we see here
 The devil in a band.[°]

Sir Guile!

Lo, he comes with a lote,[°]
 As[°] he were holden in[°] the throat.
 I may not sit at my note[°]
 A hand-long[°] while.

595 MAK. Will ye hear what fare she makes
 To get her a gloze?[°]
 And does nought but lakys,[°]
 And claws[°] her toes.

WIFE. Why, who wanders, who wakes,
 600 Who comes, who goes?
 Who brews, who bakes?
 What makes me thus hose?

And then
 It is sad to behold,
 605 Now in hot, now in cold—
 Full woeful is the household
 That wants[°] a woman!

But what end hast thou made
 With the herds,[°] Mak?
 610 MAK. The last word that they said
 When I turned my back:
 They would look that they had
 Their sheep, all the pack.

I hope[°] they will not be well paid 615 When they their sheep lack,
 Per Die![°]

But howso the game goes,
 It's me they will suppose,[°]
 And make a foul noise,
 620 And cry out upon me.

But thou must do as thou hight.[°]
 WIFE. I accord me theretill;
 I shall swaddle him right
 In my cradle.

625 If it were a greater sleight,[°]
 Yet could I help till.
 I will lie down straight;
 Come hap me.

MAK. I will.

WIFE. Behind!
 630 Come Coll and his marroo,[°]
 They will nip us full narroo.[°]

¹ tow on my rok Flax on my distaff (i.e., trouble).

² Now would I... store Now I would (think we should) check, this morning, that we have all our belongings.

³ wanyand Waning of the moon (an unlucky time).

noise
 as if / held by work little an excuse plays scratches

lacks herders

expect

by God

suspect promised trick

mate
 pinch us hard

MAK. But I may cry out "Harroo!"^o
The sheep if they find.

help

WIFE. Hearken, aye, when they call:

635 They will come anon.
Come and make ready all,
And sing by thine own;
Sing "Lullay!" thou shall,
For I must groan,
640 And cry out by the wall
On Mary and John,
Full sore.
Sing "Lullay" on fast
When thou hears at the last;
645 And but^o I play a false cast,
Trust me no more.

unless

[The shepherds meet in a field.]

THIRD SHEPHERD. Ah, Coll, good morn!
Why sleeps thou not?

FIRST SHEPHERD. Alas, that ever was I born!

650 We have a foul blot!
A fat wether^o have we lorn.^o sheep / lost

THIRD SHEPHERD. Marry, Gods forbott!^o God forbid!

SECOND SHEPHERD. Who should do us that scorn?

That were a foul spot.

655 FIRST SHEPHERD. Some shrew.^o villain

I have sought with my dogs
All Horbury Shrogs,¹
And of fifteen hogs^o young sheep
Found I but one ewe.

660 THIRD SHEPHERD. Now trow me if ye will:

By Saint Thomas of Kent,²
Either Mak or Gill
Was at that assent!^o was involved!

FIRST SHEPHERD. Peace, man, be still!

665 I saw when he went.
Thou slanders him ill;
Thou ought to repent
Good speed.^o speedily

SECOND SHEPHERD. Now as ever might I the^o thrive

670 If I should even here die,
I would say it were he
That did that same deed.

THIRD SHEPHERD. Go we thither, I rede,^o advise

And run on our feet;
675 Shall I never eat bread,
The sooth till I wit.³

FIRST SHEPHERD. Nor drink in my head
With him till I meet.

SECOND SHEPHERD. I will rest in no stead^o place
680 Till that I him greet.

My brother,
One thing I hight:^o promise

Till I see him in sight
Shall I never sleep one night

685 There I do another.⁴

[They approach Mak's house. They hear Gill groaning and Mak singing a lullaby.]

THIRD SHEPHERD. Will ye hear how they hack?⁵
Our sire list croon.^o likes to sing

FIRST SHEPHERD. Heard I never none crack
So clear out of tune.

690 Call on him.

SECOND SHEPHERD. Mak!

Undo your door soon.

MAK. Who is that spake,

As it were noon,

On loft?^o loudly

695 Who is that, I say?

THIRD SHEPHERD. Good fellows, were it day!

[Opening the door.]

MAK. As far as ye may,

Good,^o speak soft, good fellows

Over a sick woman's head

700 That is at malease;

¹ All Horbury Shrogs All the hedges of Horbury (a town near Wakefield).

² Saint Thomas of Kent Thomas à Becket (1118?–70), Archbishop of Canterbury.

³ The sooth till I wit Until I know the truth.

⁴ Shall I ... do another I will never sleep in the same place two nights in succession.

⁵ hack To break a note, i.e., sing badly.

I had liefer^o be dead
Than she had any disease.^o

WIFE. Go to another stead;
I may not well quease.^o
Each foot that ye tread
Goes through my nose,
So hee!^o

FIRST SHEPHERD. Tell us, Mak, if ye may,
How fare ye, I say?

MAK. But are ye in this town today?
Now how fare ye?

Ye have run in the mire,
And are wet yit?^o
I shall make you a fire,
If ye will sit.
A nurse would I hire—
Think ye on it?
Well quit is my hire—
My dream, this is it!

[Points to the cradle.]

A season.¹
I have bairns, if ye knew,
Well more than a few;
But we must drink as we brew,
And that is but reason.^o

I would ye dined ere ye yode;
Methink that ye sweat.
SECOND SHEPHERD. Nay, neither mends our mood,
Drink nor meat.

MAK. Why, sir, ails you aught but good?²

THIRD SHEPHERD. Yea, our sheep that we get
Are stolen as they yode;
Our loss is great.

MAK. Sirs, drinks!
Had I been there,
Some should have bought it^o full sore.

rather discomfort, distress

breathe

loudly

yet reasonable

paid the price

FIRST SHEPHERD. Marry, some men trows^o that ye were,
And that us forthinks.^o

believe

displeases us

SECOND SHEPHERD. Mak, some men trows
That it should be ye.

740 THIRD SHEPHERD. Either ye or your spouse;
So say we.

MAK. Now, if ye have suspowse
To^o of Gill or of me,
Come and rip our house,

suspicion of 745 And then may ye see

Who had^o her.

took

If I any sheep got,
Either cow or stot^o—

heifer

And Gill, my wife, rose not 750 Here since she laid her³—

As I am both true and lele,^o loyal

To God here I pray,
That this be the first meal
That I shall eat this day.

755 FIRST SHEPHERD. Mak, as I have zeal,
Watch out, I say;
He learned timely to steal,
That could not say nay.

[They begin to search.]

WIFE. I swelt!^o

faint

760 Out, thieves, from my wonys!^o
Ye come to rob us, for the nonce.^o

home

on purpose

MAK. Hear ye not how she groans?
Your hearts should melt.

[They approach the cradle.]

WIFE. Out, thieves, from my barn!^o child

765 Nigh^o him not there!

approach

MAK. Wist ye how she had farne,^o
Your hearts would be sore.

labored

Ye do wrong, I you warn,
That thus comes before

¹ A nurse ... season I would like to hire a nursemaid—what do you think of the idea? I've got what was coming to me—just what I had dreamt of—another child every year.

² Why, sir ... good? Sir, does something that is not good trouble you?

³ And Gill ... laid her And my wife Gill has not gotten up since she lay down here.

770 To a woman that has farne¹—
But I say no more!

WIFE. Ah, my middle!

I pray to God so mild,

If ever I you beguiled,

780 That I eat this child

That lies in this cradle.

MAK. Peace, woman, for God's pain,

And cry not so:

Thou spills thy brain,

780 And makes me full woe.

SECOND SHEPHERD. I trow our sheep be slain.

What find ye two?

THIRD SHEPHERD. All work we in vain;

As well may we go.

785 But hatters!²

I can find no flesh,

Hard nor nesh,³

Salt nor fresh,

But³ two bare platters ...

soft except

[Peers into cradle.]

790 Whik³ cattle like this,

Tame nor wild, None, as I have bliss,

As loud³ as he smiled.³

live

strongly / smelled

WIFE. No, so God give me bliss,

And give me joy of my child!

795 FIRST SHEPHERD. We have marked amiss;

I hold us beguiled.

SECOND SHEPHERD. Sir, done!

Sir, Our Lady him save!

Is your child a knave?³

boy

800 MAK. Any lord might him have,

This child, to³ his son.

as

When he wakens, he kippis³—

What joy to see.

grips

THIRD SHEPHERD. In good time to his hips,

805 And in seel!³

But who was his gossips,³

godparents

So soon ready?

MAK. So fair fall their lips!⁴

FIRST SHEPHERD. (Aside.) Hark now, a lie.

810 MAK. So God them thank,

Parkin, and Gibbon Waller, I say,

And gentle John Horne,⁵ in good fay³—faith

He made all the garray³

noise

With his great shank.³

legs

815 SECOND SHEPHERD. Mak, friends will we be,

For we are all one.

MAK. [Aside.] We! Now I hold for me,

For mends³ get I none.

amends

[To the Shepherds.] Farewell all three! [Aside again.]

820 All glad were ye gone.

[They leave the house.]

THIRD SHEPHERD. Fair words may there be,

But love is there none

This year.

FIRST SHEPHERD. Gave ye the child anything?

825 SECOND SHEPHERD. I trow, not one farthing.

THIRD SHEPHERD. Fast again will I fling—

Abide ye me there.

[Goes back into the house.]

Mak, take it to no grief³

don't be upset

If I come to thy bairn.

830 MAK. Nay, thou does me great reprefe,³ reproof

And foul has thou farn.³

done

THIRD SHEPHERD. The child will it not grieve,

That little day-star.

Mak, with your leave,

835 Let me give your bairn

But sixpence.

MAK. Nay, do way: he sleeps.

THIRD SHEPHERD. Methinks he peeps.

MAK. When he wakens he weeps.

840 I pray you go hence.

¹ Ye do wrong ... has farne I warn you, you do wrong, coming like this before a woman who has given birth.

² But hatters An exclamation, "by God's clothing."

³ In good time ... in seel Good fortune to him, and happiness!

⁴ So fair ... lips Blessings on their lips.

⁵ John Horne A character with this same name appears in The First Shepherds' Play.

[First and Second Shepherds return.]

THIRD SHEPHERD. Give me leave him to kiss,
And lift up the clout.^o cloth

[Lifts the covering.]

What the devil is this?
He has a long snout!

FIRST SHEPHERD. He is marked amiss.¹
We wait ill about.

SECOND SHEPHERD. Ill-spun weft, I wis,
Ay comes foul out.²

Aye, so? [Recognizes the sheep.]

He is like to our sheep!

THIRD SHEPHERD. How, Gib, may I peep?

FIRST SHEPHERD. I trow, kind^o will creep
Where it may not go.^o walk (go in a forthright way)

nature

SECOND SHEPHERD. This was a quaint gaud,^o
And a far cast^o—
It was a high fraud!

cunning prank

clever trick

THIRD SHEPHERD. Yea, sirs, was't.

Let burn this bawd,
And bind her fast. (To Gill.)

A false skawde^o scold

Hangs at the last;

So shall thou.

Will ye see how they swaddle

His four feet in the middle?

Saw I never in a cradle

A horned lad ere now.

MAK. Peace, bid I! What,

Let go your blare!

I am he that him got,

And yond woman him bare.^o

bore him

FIRST SHEPHERD. What devil shall ye hat^o Mak?

be called

Lo, God, Mak's heir!

SECOND SHEPHERD. Let be all that.

Now God give him care,

I sagh.^o

saw

WIFE. A pretty child is he, marked amiss Deformed, misshapen.

² Ill-spun weft ... foul out Proverbial: I.e., the deformity of the parents comes out in the offspring.

As sits on a woman's knee;
A dilly-down³ par Die,
To make a man laugh.

880 THIRD SHEPHERD. I know him by the ear-mark—
That is a good token.

MAK. I tell you, sirs, hark,

His nose was broken.

Sithen told me a clerk

885 Afterwards, he was forsoken.^o

bewitched

FIRST SHEPHERD. This is a false work—

I would fain be wroken.^o

avenged

Get a weapon!

WIFE. He was taken with^o elf,

by

890 I saw it myself;

When the clock struck twelve,

Was he forshapen.^o

deformed

SECOND SHEPHERD. Ye two are well feft^o endowed

Same in a stead.^o

together

895 FIRST SHEPHERD. Since they maintain their theft,

Let's do them to dead.

MAK. If I trespass eft,^o

again

Fird^o off my head!

cut

With you will I be left.

900 FIRST SHEPHERD. Sirs, do my rede:^o take my advice

For this trespass,

We will neither ban^o nor flyte,^o

curse / quarrel

Fight nor chite,^o

chide

But have done as tight,^o

quickly

905 And cast him in canvas.

[They toss Mak up and down in a sheet, and then leave his house.]

FIRST SHEPHERD. Lord, what! I am sore,

In point for to brist;^o burst

In faith, I may no more;

Therefore will I rist.^o rest

910 SECOND SHEPHERD. As a sheep of seven score

He weighed in my fist.

For to sleep anywhere,

Methink that I list.

THIRD SHEPHERD. Now I pray you,

915 Lie down on this green.

³ dilly-down Term of endearment.

FIRST SHEPHERD. On these thieves yet I mene.^o think

THIRD SHEPHERD. Whereto should ye tene?^o be angry

Do as I say you.

[The shepherds lie down.]

(An angel sings "Glory to God in the highest"; then let him say:)

ANGEL. Rise, herdmen kind,

920 For now is he born
Who shall take from the fiend

That which Adam had lorn.^o

That warlock to sheynd,^o lost

This night is he born. destroy

925 God is made your friend

Now at this morn.

He behests

At Bedlam^o go see, Bethlehem

There lies that free^o noble one

930 In a crib full poorly,

Betwixt two beasts.

FIRST SHEPHERD. This was a quaint stevyn^o voice

That ever yet I heard.

It is a marvel to nevyn,^o report

935 Thus to be scared.

SECOND SHEPHERD. Of God's son of heaven,

He spake upward.

All the wood on a leynn,^o lighting

Methought that he gard^o made

940 Appear.¹

THIRD SHEPHERD. He spake of a bairn

In Bedlam, I you warn.^o tell

FIRST SHEPHERD. That betokens yond star;

Let us seek him there.

945 SECOND SHEPHERD. Say, what was his song?

Heard ye not how he cracked it,

Three breves^o to a long? short notes

THIRD SHEPHERD. Yea, marry, he hacked^o it. sang

Was no crochet^o wrong, note

950 Nor nothing that lacked it.

FIRST SHEPHERD. For to sing us among,

Right as he knacked it,²

I can.

SECOND SHEPHERD. Let see how ye croon.

955 Can ye bark at the moon?

THIRD SHEPHERD. Hold your tongues; have done!

FIRST SHEPHERD. Hark after, then.

SECOND SHEPHERD. To Bedlam he bade

That we should gang;^o go

960 I am full fard^o afraid

That we tarry too lang.^o long

THIRD SHEPHERD. Be merry and not sad;

Of mirth is our sang.^o song

Everlasting glad

965 To mede^o may we fang^o reward / get

Without noise.

FIRST SHEPHERD. Hie we thither, forthy,

If we be wet and weary,

To that child and that lady;

970 We have it not to lose.

SECOND SHEPHERD. We find by the prophecy—

Let be your din!—

Of David and Isaiah,

And more than I min^o— mind

975 They prophesied by clergy,

That in a virgin

Should he light^o and lie, alight

To slokyn^o our sin quench

And slake it,

980 Our kind from woe;

For Isaiah said so:

Ecce virgo

*Concipiet*³ a child that is naked.

THIRD SHEPHERD. Full glad may we be 985 And abide^o that day, wait for

That Lovely One to see

That all mights may.⁴

Lord, well were me

For once and for ay,^o always

² knacked it Sang it in a lively or ornate manner.

³ Ecce virgo Concipiet Latin: Behold, a virgin shall conceive... (Isaiah 7.14).

⁴ That Lovely One ... mights may To see that lovely one that is able to do all things that can be done.

¹ Methought ... Appear It seemed to me that he made the whole wood light up in a flash.

Might I kneel on my knee
 Some word for to say
 To that child.
 But the angel said:
 In a crib was he laid,
 He was poorly arrayed,
 Both mener° and mild.

poor

FIRST SHEPHERD. Patriarchs that have been,
 And prophets befor°,
 They desired to have seen
 This child that is born.
 They are gone full clean;°
 That have they lorn.°
 We shall see him, I ween,
 Ere it be morn,
 To° a token.
 When I see him and feel,
 Then wot I full well
 It is true as steel
 That prophets have spoken:

before now completely lost

as a

The warlock so wild,¹
 The false guiler° of teyn°

deceiver / suffering

1030 Now goes he beguiled.

Lo, he merries!²

Lo, he laughs, my sweeting!
 A well-fare meeting!

I have holden my heting°—
 Have a bob° of cherries!

kept my promise

bunch

1035

SECOND SHEPHERD. Hail, sovereign saviour,
 For thou has us sought!
 Hail, freely foyde° and flower,
 That all thing has wrought!
 Hail, full of favour,
 That made all of nought!
 Hail! I kneel and I cower.
 A bird have I brought
 To my bam.

noble child

1040

Hail, little tiny mop,°
 Of our creed thou art crop!°
 I would drink in thy cup,
 Little day-star!

moppet

harvest

1045

THIRD SHEPHERD. Hail, darling dear,
 Full of godhead!

1050

I pray thee be near,
 When that I have need.
 Hail! sweet is thy cheer!
 My heart would bleed

1055 To see thee sit here

In so poor weed,°
 With no pennies.

clothes

Hail! put forth thy dall,°
 I bring thee but a ball;

hand

1060 Have and play thee withall,
 And go to the tennis.

MARY. The Father of Heaven,
 God omnipotent,
 That made all in seven,
 His son has he sent.
 My name couth he neven,° uttered

1065 born of cursed

FIRST SHEPHERD. Hail, comely and clean!
 Hail, young child!
 Hail, Maker, as I mean,
 Of° a maiden so mild!
 Thou has varied,° I ween,

[They enter the stable in Bethlehem.]

¹ The warlock so wild I.e., the devil.

² Lo, he merries! Look, he (Christ) is merry.

And light ere he went.¹

I conceived him full even,

Through might, as he meant;

1070 And now he is born.

He keep you from woe!

I shall pray him so;

Tell forth as ye go,

And mind on° this morn.

1075 FIRST SHEPHERD. Farewell, lady,

So fair to behold,

walked

With thy child on thy knee.

SECOND SHEPHERD. But he lies full cold.

Lord, well is me!

1080 Now we go, thou behold.

THIRD SHEPHERD. Forsooth, already

It seems to be told

Full oft.

remember

FIRST SHEPHERD. What grace we have fun!°

found

1085 SECOND SHEPHERD. Come forth, now have we won.

THIRD SHEPHERD. To sing are we bun°—

bound

Let take on loft! [They exit, singing.]

(Here ends the shepherds' pageant.)

—C. 1400–50

¹ And light ere he went And he could leap before he could walk. The allusion is to the medieval idea of the Seven Leaps of Christ, one of which was the Incarnation: Christ was thought of as having miraculously "leapt" down from heaven into Mary's womb.

Opening page, The Second Shepherds' Play, Towneley Plays 1F.38. (Reprinted by permission of The Huntington Library, San Marino, California.)

IN CONTEXT

Biblical Source Material

The Second Shepherds' Play supplements Biblical source material very extensively. Here is the relevant Biblical text, in the Douay-Rheims version.

from the Douay-Rheims Bible, Luke 2.8–21

8 And there were in the same country shepherds watching, and keeping the night watches over their flock.

9 And behold an angel of the Lord stood by them, and the brightness of God shone round about them; and they feared with a great fear.

10 And the angel said to them: Fear not; for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, that shall be to all the people:

11 For, this day, is born to you a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord, in the city of David.

12 And this shall be a sign unto you. You shall find the infant wrapped in swaddling clothes, and laid in a manger.

13 And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly army, praising God, and saying:

14 Glory to God in the highest; and on earth peace to men of good will.

15 And it came to pass, after the angels departed from them into heaven, the shepherds said one to another: Let us go over to Bethlehem, and let us see this word that is come to pass, which the Lord hath shewed to us.

16 And they came with haste; and they found Mary and Joseph, and the infant lying in the manger.

17 And seeing, they understood of the word that had been spoken to them concerning this child.

18 And all that heard, wondered; and at those things that were told them by the shepherds.

19 But Mary kept all these words, pondering them in her heart.

20 And the shepherds returned, glorifying and praising God, for all the things they had heard and seen, as it was told unto them.

21 And after eight days were accomplished, that the child should be circumcised, his name was called JESUS, which was called by the angel, before he was conceived in the womb.

EVERYMAN

c. 1500

Everyman is the best-known example of the genre of medieval religious drama commonly referred to as the morality play. The play depicts the journey of a human being toward death and poses the question, “What in this life will last beyond the grave?” Like other morality plays, it does not dramatize individual human characters in the usual sense, but rather personifies abstract concepts such as Good Deeds and Fellowship. Likewise, it does not concern itself with one person’s particular experience, but rather attempts to explore universal spiritual truths for all human beings through the central representative character. Instead of presenting and enlarging on well-known biblical stories, morality plays such as Everyman dramatize complex moral questions and individual spiritual development. The focus of Everyman is specifically on death, and the ars moriendi, or “art of dying.” It expresses high praise for the priesthood and holds to medieval teaching that good deeds will help one’s journey toward heaven—a view that soon became a point of contention for Protestant factions. The play takes the inevitability of death to be a central presence in human life, as did much of the literature and art of the time, both Roman Catholic and reformist.

Four printed copies of Everyman survive from c. 1515–c. 1535. No record of performance has come down to us, and nothing is known of the author—though it is increasingly believed by scholars that the “authorship” of the play in English was a matter of translation rather than of original composition. The play strongly resembles a Middle Dutch play named Elckerlijc, one of the many Rederijkers’ (Rhetoricians’) plays of the low countries surviving from this period. Whether the English or the Flemish version came first has been disputed, but almost all scholars now accept that it is probable that Everyman is a translation from the Middle Dutch play. On those grounds it should perhaps be accorded a less central place in the canon of medieval English literature than it has traditionally been given. Certainly Everyman is in several respects unlike any other extant morality play in English, for example in its lack of Vice figures.

Linguistically, the play is a bridge between eras. It has come down to us in early modern English rather than in a regional dialect of Middle English. It is notable as well that parts of the text, particularly the voice of God, are written in a verse structure that resembles the sonnet form.

*Everyman*¹

CHARACTERS

God
 Death
 Everyman
 Fellowship Kindred Cousin
 Goods
 Good Deeds
 Knowledge
 Confession
 Beauty
 Strength Discretion
 Five-wits
 Angel
 Messenger
 Doctor

Here beginneth a treatise how the High Father of Heaven sendeth Death to summon every creature to come and give account of their lives in this world and is in manner of a moral play.

MESSINGER. I pray you all give your audience,
 And hear this matter with reverence,
 By figure^o a moral play:
 The Summoning of Everyman called it is,
 That of our lives and ending shows
 How transitory we be all day.^o
 This matter is wondrous precious,
 But the intent of it is more gracious,
 And sweet to bear away.
 10 The story saith: Man, in the beginning,
 Look well, and take good heed to² the ending,
 Be you never so gay;³

form always

¹ Everyman Like all modern editions, this text derives from the earliest printed text of the play as reproduced by W.W. Greg in 1904. Spelling and punctuation have been modernized in accordance with the practice of this anthology.

² Look well ... heed to Pay attention, and be aware of.

³ Be you never so gay No matter how merry you are (i.e., be serious about this).

Ye think sin in the beginning full sweet,
 Which in the end causeth the soul to weep,
 15 When the body lieth in clay^o earth
 Here shall you see how Fellowship and Jollity,
 Both Strength, Pleasure, and Beauty,
 Will fade from thee as flower in May.
 For ye shall hear, how our Heaven^o King heavenly 20 Calleth Everyman to a general reckoning.
 Give audience, and hear what he doth say.

(God speaketh.)

GOD. I perceive here in My Majesty,
 How that all creatures be to Me unkind,
 Living without dread in worldly prosperity;
 25 Of ghostly sight the people be so blind,⁴
 Drowned in sin, they know Me not for their God;
 In worldly riches is all their mind.
 They fear not My righteousness, the sharp rod;
 My law that I showed, when I for them died,
 30 They forget clean, and shedding of My blood red;
 I hanged between two, it cannot be denied;
 To get them life I suffered to be dead;
 I healed their feet, with thorns hurt was My head;
 I could do no more than I did truly.
 35 And now I see the people do clean forsake Me:
 They use the seven deadly sins damnable,
 As pride, covetise, wrath, and lechery,
 Now in the world be made commendable,
 And thus they leave of angels the heavenly company;
 40 Every man liveth so after his own pleasure,
 And yet of their life they be nothing sure.
 I see—the more that I them forbear,
 The worse they be from year to year;
 All that liveth appaireth^o fast; deteriorates, weakens
 45 Therefore I will, in all the haste,
 Have a reckoning of every man's person.
 For if I leave the people thus alone
 In their life and wicked tempests,
 Verily^o they will become much worse than beasts, truly
 50 For now one would by envy another up eat;
 Charity they all do clean forget.
 I hoped well that every man
 In My glory should make his mansion,

⁴ Of ghostly sight ... blind People are blind to spiritual matters.

And thereto I had them all elect;^o chosen
 But now I see, like traitors deject,^o object
 They thank Me not for the pleasure that I to them meant,¹
 Nor yet for their being that I them have lent.
 I proffered the people great multitude of mercy,
 And few there be that ask it heartily.
 They be so cumbered^o with worldly overwhelmed, hindered riches
 That needs on them I must do justice,
 On every man living without fear.
 Where art thou, Death, thou mighty messenger?
 DEATH. Almighty God, I am here at Your will,
 Your commandment to fulfil.
 GOD. Go thou to Everyman,
 And show him in My Name
 A pilgrimage he must on him take,
 Which he in no wise^o may escape; manner
 And that he bring with him a sure reckoning
 Without delay or any tarrying.^o loitering
 DEATH. Lord, I will in the world go run over all,
 And cruelly out search both great and small.
 Every man will I beset^o that liveth beastly entrap
 Out of God's laws, and dreadeth not folly.
 He that loveth riches I will strike with my dart,
 His sight to blind, and from Heaven to depart,
 Except that alms be his good friend,
 In hell for to dwell, world without end.
 Lo, yonder I see Everyman walking;
 Full^o little he thinketh on my coming; very
 His mind is on fleshly lusts and his treasure,
 And great pain it shall cause him to endure
 Before the Lord, Heaven King.

[Enter Everyman.]

Everyman, stand still! Whither art thou going Thus gaily?^o Hast thou thy Maker forgot? so happily
 EVERYMAN. Why askest thou?
 Wouldest thou wit?^o know
 DEATH. Yea, sir, I will show you;
 In great haste I am sent to thee
 From God, out of His Majesty.
 EVERYMAN. What, sent to me?
 DEATH. Yea, certainly.
 Though thou have forgot Him here,

¹ that I to them meant That I intended for them.

95 He thinketh on thee in the Heavenly sphere,
 As, ere^o we depart, thou shalt know. before
 EVERYMAN. What desireth God of me?
 DEATH. That shall I show thee:
 A reckoning He will needs have,
 100 Without any longer respite.^o delay
 EVERYMAN. To give a reckoning longer leisure I crave;
 This blind matter troubleth my wit.
 DEATH. On thee thou must take a long journey;
 therefore thy book of 'count² with thee thou bring,
 105 For turn again thou can not by no way;
 And look thou be sure of thy reckoning,
 For before God thou shalt answer, and show
 Thy many bad deeds and good but a few,
 How thou hast spent thy life, and in what wise,
 110 Before the Chief Lord of Paradise.
 Have ado that we were in that way,
 For, wit thou well, thou shalt make none attorney.³
 EVERYMAN. Full unready I am such reckoning to give.
 I know thee not; what messenger art thou?
 115 DEATH. I am Death, that no man dreadeth.⁴
 For every man I rest,^o and no man spare; arrest
 For it is God's commandment
 That all to me should be obedient.
 EVERYMAN. O Death, thou comest when I had thee least in mind!
 120 In thy power it lieth me to save;
 Yet of my good will I give thee, if thou will be kind,
 Yea, a thousand pound shalt thou have,
 And defer this matter⁵ till another day.
 DEATH. Everyman, it may not be by no way.⁶
 125 I set not⁷ by gold, silver, nor riches,
 Nor by pope, emperor, king, duke, nor princes;
 For if I would receive gifts great,
 All the world I might get,
 But my custom is clean contrary.
 130 I give thee no respite; come hence, and not tarry.

² book of 'count Account book of deeds.

³ For ... attorney For, you know well, you will have no attorney to defend you.

⁴ that no man dreadeth That fears no man.

⁵ And defer this matter If you defer this matter.

⁶ it ... way It may not be prevented this way.

⁷ I set not I am not interested in, I care not for.

- EVERYMAN. Alas, shall I have no longer respite?
 I may say Death giveth no warning.
 To think on thee, it maketh my heart sick,
 For all unready is my book of reckoning,
 135 But twelve year and I might have abiding,¹
 My counting book I would make so clear,
 That my reckoning I should not need to fear.
 Wherefore, Death, I pray thee, for God's mercy, Spare me till I be provided of° equipped, prepared with remedy.
- 140 DEATH. Thee availeth° not to cry, weep, and pray, profit
 But haste thee lightly° that thou were quickly
 gone that journey,
 And prove thy friends if thou can.
 For, wit thou well, the tide abideth° no man, waits for
 And in the world each living creature
 145 For Adam's sin must die of nature.²
- EVERYMAN. Death, if I should this pilgrimage take,
 And my reckoning surely make,
 Show me, for Saint Charity,
 Should I not come again° shortly? return
- 150 DEATH. No, Everyman; and thou be once there, Thou mayst never more come here,
 Trust me verily.
- EVERYMAN. O gracious God, in the high seat celestial,
 Have mercy on me in this most need!
 155 Shall I have no company from this vale° terrestrial valley
 Of mine acquaintance that way me to lead?³
- DEATH. Yea, if any be so hardy,
 That would go with thee and bear thee company.
 Hie° thee that thou were gone to hasten, hurry
 God's Magnificence,
 160 Thy reckoning to give before His presence.
 What, weenest° thou thy life is given thee, think
 And thy worldly goods also?
- EVERYMAN. I had wend° so, verily. thought
- DEATH. Nay, nay; it was but lent thee;
 165 For as soon as thou art gone,
- Another a while shall have it, and then go therefrom,⁴
 Even as thou hast done.
 Everyman, thou art mad! Thou hast thy wits five,
 And here on earth will not amend thy life!
 170 For suddenly I do come.
- EVERYMAN. O wretched caitiff,° whither villain, wretch
 shall I flee,
 That I might 'scape° this endless sorrow? escape
 Now, gentle Death, spare me till to-morrow,
 That I may amend me
 175 With good advisement.° warning
- DEATH. Nay, thereto I will not consent,
 Nor no man will I respite;° delay
 But to the heart suddenly I shall smite° strike
 Without any advisement.
- 180 And now out of thy sight I will me hie;
 See thou make thee ready shortly,
 For thou mayst say this is the day
 That no man living may 'scape away.
- EVERYMAN. Alas! I may well weep with sighs deep;
 185 Now have I no manner of company
 To help me in my journey, and me to keep;° protect, save
 And also my writing is full unready.
 How shall I do now for to excuse me?
 I would to God I had never been got!° born 190 To my soul a full great profit it had been,
 For now I fear pains huge and great.
 The time passeth; Lord, help, that all wrought!° created
 For though I mourn, it availeth nought.° helps nothing
 The day passeth, and is almost agone;
- 195 I wot not well what for to do.
 To whom were I best my complaint to make?
 What if I to Fellowship thereof spake,
 And showed him of this sudden chance?
 For in him is all mine affiance;° trust
 200 We have in the world so many a day
 Been good friends in sport and play.
 I see him yonder, certainly;
 I trust that he will bear me company;
 Therefore to him will I speak to ease my sorrow.
 205 Well met, good Fellowship, and good morrow!

(Fellowship speaketh.)

¹ But twelve ... abiding If I could delay twelve years.

² must die of nature Must die because they are descended from Adam and Eve, who chose death when they disobeyed God in the Garden of Eden.

³ way me to lead Guide me on my way.

⁴ Another a while ... therefrom Another will have it, and eventually lose it.

FELLOWSHIP. Everyman, good morrow! By this day,
 Sir, why lookest thou so piteously?
 If any thing be amiss, I pray thee me say,^o you tell me
 That I may help to remedy.

EVERYMAN. Yea, good Fellowship, yea,
 I am in great jeopardy.

FELLOWSHIP. My true friend, show to me your mind;
 I will not forsake thee, to my life's end,
 In the way of good company.

EVERYMAN. That was well spoken, and lovingly.

FELLOWSHIP. Sir, I must needs know your heaviness;^o grief

I have pity to see you in any distress.
 If any have you wronged ye shall revenged be,
 Though I on the ground be slain for thee,
 Though that I know before that I should die.

EVERYMAN. Verily, Fellowship, gramercy.^o thank you

FELLOWSHIP. Tush! by thy thanks I set not a straw.¹
 Show me your grief, and say no more.

EVERYMAN. If I my heart should to you break,
 And then you do turn your mind from me,
 And would not me comfort, when ye hear me speak,
 Then should I ten times sorrier be.

FELLOWSHIP. Sir, I say as I will do indeed.

EVERYMAN. Then be you a good friend at^o need. in
 I have found you true here before.

FELLOWSHIP. And so ye shall evermore;
 For, in faith, and thou go to hell,
 I will not forsake thee by the way.

EVERYMAN. Ye speak like a good friend, I believe you well;
 I shall deserve^o it, if I may. requite

FELLOWSHIP. I speak of no deserving, by this day.
 For he that will say and nothing do
 Is not worthy with good company to go.
 Therefore show me the grief of your mind,
 As to your friend most loving and kind.

EVERYMAN. I shall show you how it is:
 Commanded I am to go a journey,
 A long way, hard and dangerous,
 And give a strait^o count without delay precise
 Before the high judge Adonai.^o God (Hebrew)

Wherefore I pray you, bear me company,
 As ye have promised, in this journey.

FELLOWSHIP. That is matter indeed! Promise is duty,
 But if I should take such a voyage on me,

250 I know it well, it should be to my pain;
 Also it makes me afeard,^o certain. frightened
 But let us take counsel here as well as we can,
 For your words would fear^o a strong man. frighten

EVERYMAN. Why, ye said, if I had need,
 255 You would me never forsake, quick^o nor dead, alive
 Though it were to hell, truly.

FELLOWSHIP. So I said, certainly.
 But such pleasures be set aside, the sooth^o to say; truth
 And also, if we took such a journey,
 260 When should we come again?

EVERYMAN. Nay, never again till the day of doom.^o judgment day

FELLOWSHIP. In faith, then will not I come there!
 Who hath you these tidings brought?

EVERYMAN. Indeed, Death was with me here.

265 FELLOWSHIP. Now, by God that all hath bought,
 If Death were the messenger,
 For no man that is living to-day
 I will not go that loath^o journey— unpleasant
 Not for the father that begat me!

270 EVERYMAN. Ye promised otherwise, pardie!²

FELLOWSHIP. I wor^o well I say so, truly; know
 And yet if thou wilt eat, and drink, and make good cheer,

Or haunt to women the lusty company,³
 I would not forsake you while the day is clear,
 275 Trust me verily!

EVERYMAN. Yea, thereto ye would be ready!
 To go to mirth, solace, and play,
 Your mind will sooner apply,
 Than to bear me company in my long journey.

280 FELLOWSHIP. Now, in good faith, I will not that way.
 But if thou will murder, or any man kill,
 In that I will help thee with a good will!

EVERYMAN. Oh, that is a simple advice indeed!
 Gentle Fellow, help me in my necessity;

285 We have loved long, and now I need;
 And now, gentle Fellowship, remember me.

FELLOWSHIP. Whether ye have loved me or no,
 By Saint John, I will not with thee go!

² pardie I.e., par Dieu (French: by God).

³ Or haunt ... the lusty company Or seek the company of lusty women.

¹ by thy thanks ... a straw Your thanks are not necessary.

EVERYMAN. Yet I pray thee, take the labour and do so much for me

290 To bring me forward,¹ for Saint Charity,
And comfort me till I come without^o the town. outside

FELLOWSHIP. Nay, if^o thou would give me a even if new gown,

I will not a foot with thee go;
But if thou had tarried, I would not have left thee so.

295 And as now, God speed thee in thy journey!
For from thee I will depart as fast as I may.

EVERYMAN. Whither away, Fellowship? will thou forsake me?

FELLOWSHIP: Yea, by my fay!^o To God I faith
betake^o thee. entrust

EVERYMAN. Farewell, good Fellowship; for thee my heart is sore.

300 Adieu^o for ever, I shall see thee no more. goodbye

FELLOWSHIP. In faith, Everyman, farewell now at the end;
For you I will remember that parting is mourning.

EVERYMAN. Alack! shall we thus depart indeed?

Ah, Lady,^o help! without any more comfort, Virgin Mary

305 Lo, Fellowship forsaketh me in my most need.

For help in this world whither shall I resort?^o go

Fellowship here before with me would merry make,

And now little sorrow for me doth he take.

It is said, "In prosperity men friends will find,

310 Which in adversity be full unkind."

Now, whither for succor^o shall I flee, help

Since Fellowship hath forsaken me?

To my kinsmen^o I will truly, family, blood relations

Praying them to help me in my necessity;

315 I believe that they will do so,

For kind will creep where it may not go.²

I will go say, for yonder I see them go.

Where be ye now, my friends and kinsmen?

KINDRED. Here be we now at your commandment.

320 Cousin, I pray you show us your intent

In any wise,^o and not spare. way

COUSIN. Yea, Everyman, and to us declare

If ye be disposed to go any whither,^o anywhere

For wit^o you well, we'll live and die together. understand

325 KINDRED. In wealth and woe we will with you hold,

For over his kin a man may be bold.

EVERYMAN. Gramercy, my friends and kinsmen kind;
Now shall I show you the grief of my mind.

I was commanded by a messenger,

330 That is an high king's chief officer:

He bade me go a pilgrimage to my pain,

And I know well I shall never come again;

Also I must give a reckoning, straight,

For I have a great enemy that hath me in wait,

335 Which^o intendeth me to hinder. who

KINDRED. What account is that which ye must render?

That would I know.

EVERYMAN. Of all my works I must show

How I have lived and my days spent;

340 Also of ill deeds, that I have used

In my time, since life was me lent;

And of all virtues that I have refused.

Therefore, I pray you, go thither with me,

To help to make mine account, for Saint Charity.

345 COUSIN. What, to go thither? Is that the matter?

Nay, Everyman, I had liefer^o fast bread and water rather

All this five year and more.

EVERYMAN. Alas, that ever I was born!

For now shall I never be merry

350 If that you forsake me.

KINDRED. Ah, sir! What? Ye be a merry man!

Take good heart to you, and make no moan.

But one thing I warn you, by Saint Anne:

As for me, ye shall go alone.

355 EVERYMAN. My Cousin, will you not with me go?

COUSIN. No, by Our Lady! I have the cramp in my toe.

Trust not to me, for, so God me speed,^o God help me

I will deceive you in your most need.

KINDRED. It availeth not us to entice.

360 Ye shall have my maid with all my heart;

She loveth to go to feasts, there to be nice,

And to dance, and abroad to start:

I will give her leave to help you in that journey—

If that you and she may agree.

365 EVERYMAN. Now show me the very effect of your mind—

Will you go with me, or abide behind?

KINDRED. Abide behind? yea, that will I, if I may!

Therefore farewell till another day.

EVERYMAN. How should I be merry or glad?

370 For fair promises men to me make,

But when I have most need, they me forsake.

¹ To bring me forward To accompany me.

² For kind ... it may not go Family can be relied on.

I am deceived; that maketh me sad.

COUSIN. Cousin Everyman, farewell now,
For verily I will not go with you.
Also of mine own an unready reckoning
I have to account; therefore I make tarrying.
Now, God keep thee, for now I go.

EVERYMAN. Ah, Jesus, is all come hereto?
Lo, fair words make fools fain;^o
They promise, and nothing will do certain.¹
My kinsmen promised me faithfully
For to abide with me steadfastly,
And now fast away do they flee—
Even so Fellowship promised me.
What friend were best for me to provide?²
I lose my time here longer to abide.
Yet in my mind a thing there is...
All my life I have loved riches.
If that my Good now help me might,
He would make my heart full light.
I will speak to him in this distress.
Where art thou, my Goods and Riches?

GOODS. Who calleth me? Everyman? what hast thou haste?

I lie here in corners, trussed^o and piled so high, packed up
And in chests I am locked so fast,^o tight
Also sacked in bags, thou mayst see with thine eye
I cannot stir; in packs low I lie.

What would ye have, lightly^o me say. quickly

EVERYMAN. Come hither, Good, in all the haste thou
may,

For of counsel I must desire thee.

GOODS. Sir, if ye in the world have sorrow or adversity,
That can I help you to remedy shortly.

EVERYMAN. It is another disease that grieveth me;
In this world it is not, I tell thee so.

I am sent for another way to go,

To give a strait count general

Before the highest Jupiter^o of all. deity

And all my life I have had joy and pleasure in thee;

Therefore, I pray thee, go with me—

For, peradventure,^o thou mayst before God perhaps

Almighty

My reckoning help to clean and purify,

For it is said ever among,^o among people

That money maketh all right that is wrong.

GOODS. Nay, Everyman, I sing another song!

415 I follow no man in such voyages;

For if I went with thee,

Thou shouldst fare much the worse for me!

For because on me thou did set thy mind,

Thy reckoning I have made blotted^o and blind, blurred

420 That thine account thou cannot make truly;^o clearly

And that hast thou for the love of me.

EVERYMAN. That would grieve me full sore,

When I should come to that fearful answer.

Up, let us go thither together!

425 GOODS. Nay, not so; I am too brittle, I may not endure;

I will follow no man one foot, be ye sure.

EVERYMAN. Alas, I have thee loved, and had great pleasure

All my life-days in goods and treasure.

GOODS. That is to thy damnation without lesing,^o lying

430 For my love is contrary to the love everlasting.

But if thou had me loved moderately during,

And to the poor given part of me,

Then shouldst thou not in this dolour^o be, suffering

Nor in this great sorrow and care.

435 EVERYMAN. Lo, now was I deceived ere I was ware,^o aware

And all I may blame on my spending³ of time.

GOODS. What, weenest^o thou that I am thine? think

EVERYMAN. I had wend so.

GOODS. Nay, Everyman, I say no;

440 As for a while I was lent thee,

A season thou hast had me in prosperity.

My condition^o is man's soul to kill;

If I save one, a thousand do I spill.^o character

Weenest thou^o that I will follow thee? destroy, ruin

445 Nay, from this world not verily. do you suppose

EVERYMAN. I had wend^o otherwise. believed

GOODS. Therefore to thy soul Goods are a thief;

For when thou art dead, this is my guise^o— manner

Another to deceive in the same wise^o manner

450 As I have done thee, and all to his soul's reproof.^o shame

EVERYMAN. O false Good, cursed thou be!

Thou traitor to God, that hast deceived me,

And caught me in thy snare.

¹ nothing will do certain Will do nothing definite.

² for me to provide To provide for me.

³ spending Wasting.

GOODS. Marry, thou brought thyself in care^o— trouble

455 Whereof I am glad!

I must needs laugh; I cannot be sad.

EVERYMAN. Ah, Good, thou hast had long my heartly^o love; earnest

I gave thee that which should be the Lord's above.

But wilt thou not go with me, indeed?

460 I pray thee truth to say.

GOODS. No, so God me speed.

Therefore farewell, and have good day.

EVERYMAN. Oh, to whom shall I make my moan

For to go with me in that heavy journey?

465 First Fellowship said he would with me go;

His words were very pleasant and gay,

But afterward he left me alone.

Then spake I to my kinsmen, all in despair,

And also they gave me words fair—

470 They lacked no fair speaking,

But all forsake me in the ending.

Then went I to my Goods, that I loved best,

In hope to have comfort, but there had I least;

For my Goods sharply did me tell

475 That he bringeth many into hell!

Then of myself I was ashamed,

And so I am worthy to be blamed;

Thus may I well myself hate.

Of whom shall I now counsel take?

480 I think that I shall never speed^o succeed

Till that I go to my Good Deed.

But alas, she is so weak,

That she can neither go nor speak;

Yet will I venture on her now.

485 My Good Deeds, where be you?

GOOD DEEDS. Here I lie, cold in the ground;

Thy sins have me so bound

That I cannot stir.

EVERYMAN. O Good Deeds, I stand in fear;

490 I must you pray of counsel,

For help now should come right well.

GOOD DEEDS. Everyman, I have understanding

That ye be summoned account to make

Before Messias,^o of Jerusalem King; messiah

495 If you do by me,¹ that journey with you will I take.

EVERYMAN. Therefore I come to you, my moan to make;²

I pray you that ye will go with me.

GOOD DEEDS. I would full fain,^o but I very gladly cannot stand, verily.

EVERYMAN. Why, is there anything on you fallen?

500 GOOD DEEDS. Yea, sir, I may thank you of^o all; for

If ye had perfectly cheered me,

Your book of 'count now full ready had been.

Look, the books of your works and deeds eke^o— also

Ah, see how they lie under the feet,

505 To your soul's heaviness.

EVERYMAN. Our Lord Jesus, help me!

For one letter here I cannot see.

GOOD DEEDS. There is a blind reckoning in time of distress!

EVERYMAN. Good Deeds, I pray you, help me in this need,

510 Or else I am forever damned indeed.

Therefore help me to make reckoning

Before the Redeemer of all thing,

That King is, and was, and ever shall.

GOOD DEEDS. Everyman, I am sorry of your fall,

515 And fain would I help you, and I were able.

EVERYMAN. Good Deeds, your counsel I pray you give me.

GOOD DEEDS. That shall I do verily;

Though that on my feet I may not go,

I have a sister, that shall with you also,

520 Called Knowledge, which shall with you abide,

To help you to make that dreadful reckoning.

KNOWLEDGE. Everyman, I will go with thee, and be thy guide,

In thy most need to go by thy side.

EVERYMAN. In good condition I am now, in everything,

525 And am wholly content with this good thing;

Thanked be God my Creator!

GOOD DEEDS. And when he hath brought you there,

Where thou shalt heal thee of thy smart,^o pain

Then go you with your reckoning and your Good

Deeds together,

530 For to make you joyful at heart

Before the Blessed Trinity.

EVERYMAN. My Good Deeds, gramercy;

I am well content, certainly,

With your words sweet.

¹ If you do by me If you do what I say.

² my moan to make To make my complaint.

KNOWLEDGE. Now go we together lovingly,
To Confession, that cleansing river.

EVERYMAN. For joy I weep; I would° we were there. wish
But, I pray you, give me cognition° knowledge
Where dwelleth that holy man, Confession.

KNOWLEDGE. In the house of salvation:
We shall find him in that place,
That shall us comfort by God's grace.

[Enter Confession.]

Lo, this is Confession. Kneel down and ask mercy,
For he is in good conceit° with God almighty. esteem

EVERYMAN. O glorious fountain that all uncleanness doth clarify,

Wash me from the spots of vice unclean,
That on me no sin may be seen.

I come with Knowledge for my redemption,
Redempt with hearty and full contrition;
For I am commanded a pilgrimage to take,
And great accounts before God to make.

Now, I pray you, Shrift,¹ mother of salvation,
Help my good deeds for my piteous exclamation.

CONFESSION. I know your sorrow well, Everyman.

Because with Knowledge ye come to me,
I will you comfort as well as I can,
And a precious jewel I will give thee,
Called penance, voider of adversity;
Therewith shall your body chastised be,
With abstinence and perseverance in God's service:
Here shall you receive that scourge° of me, whip

Which is penance strong, that ye must endure,
To remember thy Saviour was scourged for thee
With sharp scourges, and suffered it patiently;

So must thou, ere thou 'scape that painful pilgrimage.
Knowledge, keep him in this voyage,

And by that time Good Deeds will be with thee.
But in any wise, be certain of mercy,

For your time draweth fast; and ye will saved be.
Ask God mercy, and He will grant truly.

When with the scourge of penance man doth him bind,
The oil of forgiveness then shall he find.

EVERYMAN. Thanked be God for His gracious work,
For now I will my penance begin;

This hath rejoiced and lighted° my heart, lightened

Though the knots be painful and hard within.

KNOWLEDGE. Everyman, look your penance that ye fulfil,

What pain that ever it to you be,
And Knowledge shall give you counsel at will,
How your account ye shall make clearly.

EVERYMAN. O Eternal God, O Heavenly Figure,
O Way of Righteousness, O Goodly Vision,
Which descended down in a virgin pure
Because He would Everyman redeem,
Which Adam forfeited by his disobedience,
O blessed Godhead, Elect and High-Divine,
Forgive my grievous offence;

Here I cry Thee mercy in this presence.
O Ghostly Treasure, O Ransomer and Redeemer,
Of all the world Hope and Conductor,
Mirror of Joy, Founder of Mercy,
Which illumineth Heaven and earth thereby,
Hear my clamorous° complaint, though it urgent, loud
late be!

Receive my prayers; unworthy in this heavy life
Though I be, a sinner most abominable,
Yet let my name be written in Moses' table.° tablet

O Mary, pray to the Maker of all thing,
Me for to help at my ending,
And save me from the power of my enemy,
For Death assaileth me strongly;
And, Lady, that I may by means of thy prayer
Of your Son's glory to be partner,
By the means of His passion I it crave,
I beseech you, help my soul to save!

Knowledge, give me the scourge of penance,
My flesh therewith shall give acquaintance.
I will now begin, if God give me grace.

KNOWLEDGE. Everyman, God give you time and space:

Thus I bequeath you in the hands of Our Saviour,
Now may you make your reckoning sure.

EVERYMAN. In the name of the Holy Trinity,
My body sore punished shall be:

[Scourges himself.]

Take this, body, for the sin of the flesh;
Also thou delightest to go gay and fresh,
And in the way of damnation thou did me bring;
Therefore suffer now strokes of punishing.

¹ Shrift Penance, absolution.

Now of penance I will wade the water clear,
To save me from purgatory, that sharp fire.

GOOD DEEDS. [Rises up from prostrate posture.]

620 I thank God, now I can walk and go,
And am delivered of my sickness and woe.
Therefore with Everyman I will go, and not spare;
His good works I will help him to declare.

KNOWLEDGE. Now, Everyman, be merry and glad;
625 Your Good Deeds cometh now, ye may not be sad;
Now is your Good Deeds whole and sound,
Going upright upon the ground.

EVERYMAN. My heart is light, and shall be evermore;
Now will I smite faster than I did before.

630 GOOD DEEDS. Everyman, pilgrim, my special friend,
Blessed be thou without end;
For thee is prepared the eternal glory.
Ye have me made whole and sound,
Therefore I will bide by thee in every stound.^o moment

635 EVERYMAN. Welcome, my Good Deeds! Now I hear thy voice,
I weep for very sweetness of love.

KNOWLEDGE. Be no more sad, but ever rejoice:
God seeth thy living in His throne above.

Put on this garment to thy behoof,^o benefit 640 Which is wet with your tears,
Or else before God you may it miss,
When ye to your journey's end come shall.

EVERYMAN. Gentle Knowledge, what do ye it call?

KNOWLEDGE. It is a garment of sorrow,
645 From pain it will you borrow;
Contrition it is,

That getteth^o forgiveness; brings
It pleaseth God passing^o well. exceedingly

GOOD DEEDS. Everyman, will you wear it for your heal?

650 EVERYMAN. [Puts on robe of contrition.] Now blessed be Jesu, Mary's Son,
For now have I on true contrition.

And let us go now without tarrying.

Good Deeds, have we clear our reckoning?

GOOD DEEDS. Yes, indeed I have it here.

655 EVERYMAN. Then I trust we need not fear.
Now, friends, let us not part in twain.¹

KNOWLEDGE. Nay, Everyman, that will we not, certain.

GOOD DEEDS. Yet must thou lead with thee
Three persons of great might.

660 EVERYMAN. Who should they be?

GOOD DEEDS. Discretion and Strength they high,^o are called

And thy Beauty may not abide behind.

KNOWLEDGE. Also ye must call to mind
Your Five-wits as for your counsellors.

665 GOOD DEEDS. You must have them ready at all hours.

EVERYMAN. How shall I get them hither?

KNOWLEDGE. You must call them all together,
And they will hear you incontinent.^o instantly

EVERYMAN. My friends, come hither and be present,

670 Discretion, Strength, my Five-wits, and Beauty.

BEAUTY. Here at your will we be all ready.

What will ye that we should do?

GOOD DEEDS. That ye would with Everyman go,
And help him in his pilgrimage.

675 Advise you: will ye with him or not in that voyage?

STRENGTH. We will bring him all thither,

To his help and comfort, ye may believe me.

DISCRETION. So will we go with him all together.

EVERYMAN. Almighty God, loved might Thou be!

680 I give Thee laud^o that I have hither brought praise Strength, Discretion, Beauty, and Five-wits; lack I nought.

And my Good-Deeds, with Knowledge clear,

All be in my company at my will here;

I desire no more to my business.

685 STRENGTH. And I, Strength, will by you stand in distress,

Though thou would in battle fight on the ground.

FIVE-WITS. And though it were through the world round,
We will not depart for sweet nor sour.

BEAUTY. No more will I unto death's hour,

690 Whatsoever thereof befall.

DISCRETION. Everyman, advise you first of all;

Go with a good advisement and deliberation.

We all give you virtuous 'monition^o warning
That all shall be well.

695 EVERYMAN. My friends, hearken what I will tell:

I pray God reward you in his Heavenly Sphere.

Now hearken,^o all that be here, hear, listen

For I will make my testament

Here before you all present.

700 In alms, half my good I will give with my hands twain

In the way of charity, with good intent;

And the other half still shall remain

In bequest to be returned where it ought to be.

¹ part in twain Separate.

This I do in despite of the fiend of hell,
 To go quite out of¹ his peril
 Ever after and this day.

KNOWLEDGE. Everyman, hearken to what I say:

Go to Priesthood, I you advise,
 And receive of him in any wise
 The holy Sacrament and ointment together,
 Then shortly see ye turn again hither.
 We will all abide you here.

FIVE-WITS. Yea, Everyman, hie you that ye ready were.

There is no emperor, king, duke, nor baron,
 That of God hath commission,[°] authority
 As hath the least[°] priest in the world being; lowliest
 For of the blessed Sacraments pure and benign[°] gentle
 He beareth the keys, and thereof hath the cure
 For man's redemption, it is ever sure,
 Which God for our soul's medicine
 Gave us out of His heart with great pain.
 Here in this transitory life, for thee and me
 The blessed Sacraments seven there be:
 Baptism, Confirmation, with Priesthood good,
 And the Sacrament of God's precious flesh and blood;²
 Marriage, the holy Extreme Unction,³ and Penance.
 These seven be good to have in remembrance—
 Gracious Sacraments of high divinity.

EVERYMAN. Fain would I receive that holy body,
 And meekly to my ghostly[°] father I will go. spiritual

FIVE-WITS. Everyman, that is the best that ye can do.

God will you to salvation bring,
 For priesthood exceedeth all other thing;
 To us Holy Scripture they do teach,
 And convert man from sin, Heaven to reach.
 God hath to them more power given
 Than to any angel that is in Heaven.
 With five words⁴ he may consecrate
 God's Body in flesh and blood to make,
 And handleth his Maker between his hands.
 The priest bindeth and unbindeth all bands,

Both in earth and in Heaven.
 Thou ministers all the Sacraments seven.
 Though we kiss thy feet thou were worthy.
 Thou art surgeon that cureth sin deadly:
 No remedy we find under God
 But all only priesthood.

Everyman, God gave priests that dignity,
 And setteth them in His stead[°] among us to be; place
 Thus be they above angels in degree.[°] status

[Everyman goes to receive Sacraments.]

KNOWLEDGE. If priests be good, it is so surely.
 But when Jesus hanged on the cross with great smart,[°] pain

There He gave, out of His Blessed Heart,
 The same Sacrament in great torment;
 He sold them not to us, that Lord Omnipotent.[°] all-powerful
 Therefore Saint Peter the apostle doth say That Jesus' curse have all they
 Which God their Saviour do buy or sell,
 Or they for any money do take or tell.
 Sinful priests give the sinners example bad,
 Their children sit by other men's fires, I have heard,
 And some haunt women's company,
 With unclean life, as lusts of lechery;
 These be with sin made blind.

FIVE-WITS. I trust to God no such⁵ may we find.
 Therefore let us priesthood honour,
 And follow their doctrine for our souls' succour;
 We be their sheep, and they shepherds be,
 By whom we all be kept in surety.
 Peace, for yonder I see Everyman come,
 Which hath made true satisfaction.

[Re-enter Everyman.]

GOOD DEEDS. Methink it is he indeed.

EVERYMAN. Now Jesu be your alder speed.⁶
 I have received the Sacrament for my redemption,
 And then mine Extreme Unction:
 Blessed be all they that counselled me to take it!
 And now, friends, let us go without longer respite;

¹ To go quite out of To escape.

² Sacrament of God's precious flesh and blood The Eucharist.

³ Extreme Unction Last Rites of the Church, administered to the dying or those near death.

⁴ five words I.e., Hoc est enim corpus meum (Latin: For this is my body), the words of Institution spoken by the priest in order to transform sacramental bread into the Body of Christ.

⁵ such I.e., such bad priests.

⁶ Now Jesu ... speed May Jesus aid you all.

I thank God that ye have tarried so long.
 Now set each of you on this rod^o your hand, rood, cross
 And shortly follow me.

I go before; there I would be. God be your guide.

STRENGTH. Everyman, we will not from you go,
 Till ye have done this voyage long.

DISCRETION. I, Discretion, will bide by you also.

KNOWLEDGE. And though this pilgrimage be never so strong,

I will never part you from.

Everyman, I will be as sure by thee

As ever I did by Judas Maccabee.¹

EVERYMAN. Alas, I am so faint I may not stand,

My limbs under me do fold.

Friends, let us not turn again to this land,

Not for all the world's gold,

For into this cave must I creep,

And turn to earth, and there to sleep.

BEAUTY. What, into this grave? alas!

EVERYMAN. Yea, there shall ye consume^o be consumed more and less.

BEAUTY. And what, should I smother^o here? suffocate

EVERYMAN. Yea, by my faith, and never more appear.

In this world live no more we shall,

But in Heaven before the highest Lord of all.

BEAUTY. I cross out^o all this! Adieu, by Saint John! reject

I take my tap in my lap and am gone.²

EVERYMAN. What, Beauty, whither will ye?

BEAUTY. Peace! I am deaf, I look not behind me,

Not if thou wouldest give me all the gold in thy chest.

EVERYMAN. Alas, whereto may I trust?

Beauty goeth fast away from me—

She promised with me to live and die.

STRENGTH. Everyman, I will thee also forsake and deny;

Thy game liketh^o me not at all. pleases

EVERYMAN. Why, then ye will forsake me all!

Sweet Strength, tarry a little space.^o while

STRENGTH. Nay, sir, by the rood of grace,

I will hie me^o from thee fast, make haste

Though thou weep to^o thy heart until

tobrast.^o break to pieces

EVERYMAN. Ye would ever bide by me, ye said.

STRENGTH. Yea, I have you far enough conveyed;

Ye be old enough, I understand,

Your pilgrimage to take on hand.

I repent me that I hither came.

EVERYMAN. Strength, you to displease I am to blame;

Will you break promise that is debt?

STRENGTH. In faith, I care not;

Thou art but a fool to complain.

You spend your speech and waste your brain;

Go, thrust thee into the ground!

EVERYMAN. I had wend surer I should you have found.³

He that trusteth in his Strength,

She him deceiveth at the length.^o eventually

Both Strength and Beauty forsake me,

Yet they promised me fair and lovingly.

DISCRETION. Everyman, I will after Strength be gone;

As for me, I will leave you alone.

EVERYMAN. Why, Discretion, will ye forsake me?

DISCRETION. Yea, in faith, I will go from thee,

For when Strength goeth before,

I follow after evermore.

EVERYMAN. Yet, I pray thee, for the love of the Trinity,

Look in my grave once, piteously.

DISCRETION. Nay, so nigh^o will I not come. near

Farewell, every one!

EVERYMAN. Oh, all thing faileth, save God alone,

Beauty, Strength, and Discretion;

For when Death bloweth his blast,

They all run from me full fast.

FIVE-WITS. Everyman, my leave now of thee I take;

I will follow the other, for here I thee forsake.

EVERYMAN. Alas! then may I wail and weep,

For I took you for my best friend.

FIVE-WITS. I will no longer thee keep;

Now farewell, and there an end.

EVERYMAN. O Jesu, help! all have forsaken me!

GOOD DEEDS. Nay, Everyman, I will bide with thee,

I will not forsake thee indeed;

Thou shalt find me a good friend at need.

EVERYMAN. Gramercy, Good Deeds, now may I true friends see;

They have forsaken me every one;

I loved them better than my Good Deeds alone.

Knowledge, will ye forsake me also?

¹ Judas Maccabee Judas Maccabeus, Jewish leader; see I Maccabees 2.4.

² I take my tap ... am gone Depart quickly (a proverbial expression).

³ I had wend ... found I had thought I would have found you more reliable.

60 KNOWLEDGE. Yea, Everyman, when ye to death shall go;
But not yet for no manner of danger.

EVERYMAN. Gramercy, Knowledge, with all my heart.

KNOWLEDGE. Nay, yet I will not from hence depart,
Till I see where ye shall be come.

165 EVERYMAN. Methink, alas, that I must be gone,
To make my reckoning and my debts pay,
For I see my time is nigh spent away.

Take example, all ye that this do hear or see,
How they that I love best do forsake me,

370 Except my Good Deeds that bideth truly.

GOOD DEEDS. All earthly things is but vanity:
Beauty, Strength, and Discretion, do man forsake,
Foolish friends and kinsmen that fair spake,
All flee save Good Deeds, and that am I.

375 EVERYMAN. Have mercy on me, God Most Mighty,
And stand by me, thou Mother and Maid, Holy Mary.

GOOD DEEDS. Fear not, I will speak for thee.

EVERYMAN. Here I cry God mercy.

GOOD DEEDS. Short^o our end, and shorten
minish^o our pain; diminish

880 Let us go and never come again.

EVERYMAN. Into thy hands, Lord, my soul I commend;
Receive it, Lord, that it be not lost!

As thou me boughtest,^o so me defend, redeemed

And save me from the fiend's boast,

885 That I may appear with that blessed host

That shall be saved at the day of doom.

In manus tuas—of might's most,

Forever—commendo spiritum meum.¹

[Dies.]

KNOWLEDGE. Now hath he suffered that^o what we all shall endure;

890 The Good Deeds shall make all sure.

Now hath he made ending;

Methinketh that I hear angels sing

And make great joy and melody
Where Everyman's soul received shall be.

895 ANGEL. Come, excellent elect^o spouse² to Jesu; chosen

Here above thou shalt go,

Because of thy singular virtue.

Now the soul is taken the body from,

Thy reckoning is crystal-clear.

900 Now shalt thou into the heavenly sphere,

Unto the which all ye shall come

That live well before the day of doom.

DOCTOR. This moral men may have in mind;

Ye hearers, take it of worth, old and young,

905 And forsake Pride, for he deceiveth you in the end.

And remember Beauty, Five-wits, Strength, and

Discretion—

They all at the last do Everyman forsake,

Save his Good Deeds; there doth he take.

But beware: if they be small

910 Before God, he hath no help at all.

None excuse may be there for Everyman.

Alas, how shall he do, then?

For after death, amends may no man make,

For then mercy and pity do him forsake.

915 If his reckoning be not clear when he doth come,

God will say—Ite maledicti in ignem Aeternum.³

And he that hath his account whole and sound,

High in heaven he shall be crowned;

Unto which place God bring us all thither,

920 That we may live, body and soul together.

Thereto help the Trinity!

Amen, say ye, for Saint Charity.

THUS ENDETH THIS MORAL PLAY OF EVERYMAN.

—C. 1500

¹ In manus ... spiritum meum Latin: Into Thy hands I commend my spirit (Luke 23.46).

² Come, excellent elect spouse An echo of the liturgy for the Assumption, which celebrated the Virgin Mary's arrival in Heaven. The liturgy, in turn, likens Mary to the Bride of the biblical Songs of Songs.

³ Ite maledicti in ignem Aeternum Latin: "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire" (Matthew 25.41).

Here beynneth a treatyse how the hpe vader of heuen sendeth de the to somon every creature to come and gyue a counte of theyr lyues in this Worlde and is in maner of a morall
playe.

Title page, early edition of Everyman.

SIR THOMAS MALORY

c. 1415 – 1471

Arguably no medieval English literary work has had as far and wide a reach as Sir Thomas Malory's Morte Darthur. Among the many adaptations are Tennyson's Idylls of the King, Matthew Arnold's Tristram and Iseult, T.H. White's The Once and Future King, and the Lerner and Lowe musical Camelot. The Pre-Raphaelite painters Dante Gabriel Rossetti and Edward Burne-Jones are perhaps the best known of a great many visual artists strongly influenced by Malory's work. It might also be argued that the late twentieth- and early twenty-first-century tradition of fantasy literature—from Tolkien's The Lord of the Rings to George Lucas's Star Wars and beyond—owes much to the Arthurian tradition, rooted in English most strongly in Malory's Morte Darthur.

While the Morte Darthur itself has survived admirably intact, we know little of its author. The manuscript version of the book gives all that is known with any certainty. In the “explicit” that close five of the main narrative sequences, the Morte's author identifies himself by name and rank as “Sir Thomas Malleorré, Knyght.” He once calls himself “prisoner,” and twice asks God for “deliveraunce,” which most take to mean, given his earlier disclosure, release from prison. The author also says that he finished his book in “the ninth year of the reign of King Edward the Fourth,” which was between 4 March 1469 and 3 March 1470. Beyond this, there are some things to be gleaned from the historical records, but precisely what they show is often unclear. A few men named Thomas Malory appear in documents from the time of the Morte, and while the debate over the candidacy of each as the book's author has not been settled with complete certainty, scholarly consensus now favors one: Sir Thomas Malory of Newbold Revel, Warwickshire—at once a fitting and a surprising choice.

It must be remembered that fifteenth-century records weren't necessarily always reliable; we can't even know beyond all doubt if their various mentions of a Warwickshire Thomas Malory all refer to the same man. According to the most widely accepted account, however, Thomas was born to John Malory, esquire, of Newbold Revel, and his wife, Philippa Chetwynd, probably between 1415 and 1418. Thomas Malory grew up to become a landowner and member of parliament, and sometime before 1441, a knight. But his life seems to have taken a downward turn in the 1450s; between 1450 and 1452 Thomas Malory was several times accused of stealing livestock, money, and goods, and twice he was charged with helping to raid an abbey. He may have attempted to murder the Duke of Buckingham. And he was accused of having raped a married woman, Joan Smith, on two occasions. He was imprisoned several times, escaping twice, the first time by swimming the prison's moat at night and the second time making good his escape with a variety of sharp weapons. Although he was once included in a general pardon by Edward IV, he was subsequently excluded by name from two more of the king's pardons, finishing the Morte apparently while still in prison. He died shortly after his release, in March of 1471.

As intriguing as these unsavory details are, not much can be said about them without some equivocation. As a knight in the mid- to late fifteenth century, Malory was undoubtedly involved in some way in England's great internal conflict of the time: the Wars of the Roses, so-called because the flower was the emblem of both warring sides—a white rose for the House of York and its supporters, and a red for the Lancastrians. Each house had a candidate with some claim to the throne of England, and the long hostilities between the two broke out into open war in 1455. The situation was far murkier than this, however; within each of the two large factions, lesser houses and families had their own feuds and competitions for power and influence, and these became more freely expressed as the political situation degenerated into civil war. In the face of rapidly shifting fortunes, it was not uncommon for men to switch allegiances if it was to their advantage, and Malory seems to have done just that; various lines of evidence suggest that he was first allied with the Lancastrian Duke of Buckingham, then the Duke of York and the Yorkist Edward IV—indeed, we have a record of Malory's fighting on the Yorkist side in a 1462 siege of Lancastrian holdings in the North. However, Malory's exemptions from two of Edward's general pardons point to Malory's having shifted loyalties yet again, in the late 1460s, to the Lancastrian side, perhaps in response to growing friction between the king and the Earl of Warwick. It is thus unclear if Malory was, at each point of trouble, accused of and imprisoned for crimes he actually committed, or if he was perhaps being punished with trumped-up charges for having treasonously changed allegiances. Was he guilty of some of these crimes, all of them, or none? Did he steal goods and livestock for personal gain or in support of one side in the dynastic wars? Even the rape charges are not without ambiguity, given that the law under which Malory was charged designated consensual elopement a kind of rape.

Some readers, swayed by the Morte Darthur's ideals of courtly behavior, have argued that Malory must have been acting with nobler intentions than the bald records suggest. But no such argument can ever rest on entirely firm ground; if Malory were in fact shown to have been dishonorable in his personal life, it would surely not have been the only time that a work has upheld an ethical standard far above that of its author. In any case, in the absence of firmer evidence as to Malory's character, the Morte must largely speak for itself.

Medieval writers were accustomed to finding their story material in already existing tales, some of them with a long tradition of telling and retelling; longevity and prestigious origins went a long way in recommending stories to medieval audiences, who gave their praise to writers not for inventing stories but for telling and adapting them especially well. Many writers were therefore explicit in stating that they were working from older sources. Malory is, in this way, a writer of his time. He makes several references to a source he identifies only as "the French book," lending authority to his own work by pointing out its ties to a distinguished literary tradition.

In fact Malory's use of his sources is much more sophisticated than these references suggest. Scholars have identified several of Malory's sources, major and minor; many of these sources are indeed French. Four come from a monumental Arthurian romance in Old French, now known as the Lancelot-Grail Cycle. Material for Malory's "Launcelot and Guinevere" and "The Death of Arthur" comes in part from the Lancelot-Grail's final part, La Mort le Roi Artu, and in large part from an English poem Malory does not mention, the Stanzaic Morte Arthur, itself based on the French La Mort. Another English poem, the Alliterative Morte Arthure, is the basis for an episode recounting Arthur's conquering of the Emperor of Rome. Malory may also have turned to the Alliterative Morte in his book's final pages.

Malory used his sources in a variety of ways. He omitted and condensed material, changed the sequencing of episodes and names of characters, and, when his sources appear to have pleased him, translated them almost word for word. At other times, he was equally capable of abridging, adapting or ignoring his sources; many of the invocations of the so-called "French book" actually hide passages where Malory is freely inventing, and even when translating he frequently adds one or two key sentences that change the meaning of the source to something uniquely Malory's own. Thus these changes are not haphazard; together, they comprise a considerable and consistent difference in the narrative's emphasis. Perhaps the most notable departure from the French sources is Malory's avoidance of entrelacement, a narrative structure in which, rather than one story following another, several simultaneous story threads are interwoven with one another. Malory simplifies the structure, favoring a more straightforward presentation in which one storyline is completed before the next one begins.

While scholars have shown that Malory drew to some extent on his own experiences and the contemporary knight's life in general for his telling of the Arthur story, the Morte Darthur is largely removed from actual life in fifteenth-century England. Most obviously out of accord with the lived experiences of readers of his time is the story's abundance of Christian miracles and pagan magic. Every tract of forested wilderness offers encounters with marvels—monsters, magic swords, enchanted castles, messengers from heaven—all are presented on a par as sources of wonder and none is shown as wholly unexpected. But even the more mundane aspects of Malory's world are imaginatively rendered and highly idealized; perhaps most striking is the almost complete absence of what was known as the "third estate"—the commons, encompassing everyone from peasants to business people. The world of the Morte Darthur, like that of medieval romance in general, almost exclusively features the gentry and nobility, and, to a lesser extent, the clergy, who are typically also from the ranks of the high born. The details of who grows these people's food, makes their meals, cares for their clothing and arms, nurses their children, and so on, are almost entirely absent, as is the vibrant life of the medieval town, with its merchants, innkeepers, scribes, and millers, among many others. In the Morte, as in most romances, we do not even see noble men and women doing the work of administering their households and land holdings. Instead, we see the nobility in the context of a single occupation, albeit one of great complexity: fulfilling the requirements of chivalry, a code of conduct that governs the lives of royal and noble-born men and women, serves as the standard of behavior against which their characters and actions are judged, and dominates Malory's literary world.

Malory's imaginative world has been called homosocial, a world in which a man's most important relationships are with other men. The great majority of interpersonal bonds and interactions in the book are indeed among men. But this is not to say that women in the Morte are of little significance. A few women wield considerable direct power, and, in the chivalric world, women are also crucial in their role as recipients of a knights' duty specifically to women. The "Pentecostal Oath," a vow of service performed by every Round Table knight once a year at the feast of Pentecost, explicitly requires knights to protect and assist women, at least those of the higher classes, whether single, married, or widowed. Although Malory's knights and kings are first and foremost fighters, a knight is also prized for his cultivation and manners—his courtly behavior in other words—especially as that is directed toward women, and most especially when devotion to women takes the extreme form of a passionate love for one woman, esteemed beyond all others. Most strongly, the Morte interests us in the responses of those trying to live up to the ideal but who succumb to moments of all-too-human weaknesses, who find themselves in conflicts of heartfelt loyalty, and who nonetheless do their utmost to negotiate through the resulting tangle. Chivalry drives these men and women's noble achievements but is also, tragically, the means by which the fragile greatness of Camelot is destroyed.

from *Morte Darthur*¹

from BOOK I: FROM THE MARRIAGE OF KING Uther UNTO KING ARTHUR²

It befell in the days of Uther Pendragon, when he was King of all England and so reigned, that there was a mighty duke in Cornwall that held war against him long time, and the duke was called the Duke of Tintagel. And so by means King Uther send for this duke, charging him to bring his wife with him, for she was called a fair lady and a passing³ wise. And her name was called Igraine. So when the duke and his wife were comen unto the king, by the means of great lords they were accorded⁴ both. The king liked and loved this lady well, and he made them great cheer out of measure,⁵ and desired to have lain by her. But she was a passing good woman and would not assent unto the king.

And then she told the duke her husband, and said, "I suppose that we were sent for that I should be dishonoured; wherefore, husband, I counsel you that we depart from hence suddenly, that we may ride all night unto our own castle."

¹ Morte Darthur The present text has been edited for The Broadview Anthology of British Literature by Maureen Okun. The selections included here are derived from the Morte Darthur as it appears in the Winchester manuscript. The textual divisions and their titles follow Eugène Vinaver's major divisions in his influential edition of the Winchester manuscript. These divisions are not always supported by the manuscript itself, but Vinaver's contribution is such that they have become standard ways of dividing and referring to Malory's work.

The intent here is to make Malory accessible to readers with little or no knowledge of Middle English, but also to allow them to experience much of the flavor of the original; orthography and spelling have been modernized, and difficult words and phrases have been glossed at the foot of each page.

² from ... Arthur Several folio pages at the beginning and end of the Winchester manuscript are missing; the text of the selection that follows is therefore taken from Caxton's edition of the Morte Darthur.

means Intermediaries; charging Commanding; passing Exceedingly.

³ they I.e., the king and the duke; accorded Reconciled.

⁵ made them great cheer Welcomed and entertained them very hospitably; out of measure To excess.

And in like wise as she said, so they departed, that neither the king nor none of his council was ware⁶ of their departing. Also, soon as King Uther knew of their departing so suddenly, he was wonderly wroth.⁷ Then he called to him his privy council⁸ and told them of the sudden departing of the duke and his wife.

Then they avised the king to send for the duke and his wife by a great charge:⁹ "And if he will not come at your summons, then may ye do your best. Then have ye cause to make mighty war upon him."

So that was done, and the messengers had their answers, and that was this, shortly: that neither he nor his wife would not come at¹⁰ him. Then was the king wonderly wroth. And then the king sent him plain word again and bade him be ready and stuff him and garnish him,¹¹ for within forty days he would fetch him out of the biggest castle that he hath.

When the duke had this warning, anon he went and furnished and garnished two strong castles of his, of the which the one high¹² Tintagel and the other castle high Terrabil. So his wife Dame Igraine he put in the castle of Tintagel, and himself he put in the castle of Terrabil, the which had many issues and posterns out.¹³ Then in all haste came Uther with a great host and laid a siege about the castle of Terrabil, and there he pight many pavilions.¹⁴ And there was great war made on both parties and much people slain.

Then for pure anger and for great love of fair Igraine, the King Uther fell sick. So came to the King Uther Sir Ulfius, a noble knight, and asked the king why he was sick.

⁶ like wise The same manner; ware Aware.

⁷ Also Therefore; wonderly wroth Extraordinarily angry.

⁸ privy council Advisors appointed by the king.

⁹ avised Advised; charge Command.

¹⁰ at To.

¹¹ bade Commanded; stuff him ... garnish him Supply his castles, for their defense, with provisions, fighters, and equipment.

¹² anon Immediately; furnished Provisioned for defense; high Was called.

¹³ issues and posterns out Concealed exits or tunnels.

¹⁴ pight Pitched; pavilions Large tents.

"I shall tell thee," said the king. "I am sick for anger and for love of fair Igraine, that I may not be whole."¹

"Well, my lord," said Sir Ulfius, "I shall seek Merlin and he shall do you remedy, that your heart shall be pleased."

So Ulfius departed, and by adventure he met Merlin in a beggar's array.² And there Merlin asked Ulfius whom he sought, and he said he had little ado³ to tell him.

"Well," said Merlin, "I know whom thou seekest, for thou seekest Merlin. Therefore seek no further, for I am he. And if King Uther will well reward me and be sworn unto me to fulfil my desire, that shall be his honour and profit more than mine, for I shall cause him to have all his desire."

"All this will I undertake," said Ulfius, "that there shall be nothing reasonable but thou shall have thy desire."⁴

"Well," said Merlin, "he shall have his intent and desire, and therefore," said Merlin, "ride on your way, for I will not be long behind."

Then Ulfius was glad and rode on more than apace⁵ till that he came to King Uther Pendragon, and told him he had met with Merlin.

"Where is he?" said the king.

"Sir," said Ulfius, "he will not dwell⁶ long."

Therewithal Ulfius was ware where Merlin stood at the porch of the pavilion's door, and then Merlin was bound⁷ to come to the king. When King Uther saw him, he said he was welcome.

"Sir," said Merlin, "I know all your heart, every deal.⁸ So ye will be sworn unto me, as ye be a true king anointed,⁹ to fulfil my desire, ye shall have your desire."

Then the king was sworn upon the four Evangelists.¹⁰

"Sir," said Merlin, "this is my desire: the first night that ye shall lie by Igraine ye shall get a child on her, and when that is born, that it shall be delivered to me for to nourish thereas I will have it."¹¹ For it shall be your worship and the child's avail, as mickle as the child is worth."¹²

"I will well,"¹³ said the king, "as thou wilt have it."

"Now make you ready," said Merlin. "This night ye shall lie with Igraine in the castle of Tintagel; and ye shall be like¹⁴ the duke her husband, Ulfius shall be like Sir Brascias, a knight of the duke's, and I will be like a knight that hight Sir Jordanus, a knight of the duke's. But wait ye make not many questions with her nor her men, but say ye are diseased, and so hie¹⁵ you to bed and rise not on the morn till I come to you, for the castle of Tintagel is but ten mile hence."

So this was done as they devised.

But the Duke of Tintagel espied how the king rode from the siege of Terrabil, and therefore that night he issued out of the castle at a postern for to have distressed¹⁶ the king's host. And so through his own issue the duke himself was slain or¹⁷ ever the king came at the castle of Tintagel. So after the death of the duke, King Uther lay with Igraine more than three hours after his death and begat¹⁸ on her that night Arthur. And, or day came, Merlin came to the king and bade him make many responsibilities and obligations, among them the obligation to keep one's word.

¹⁰ four Evangelists Saints Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, believed to be the respective authors of the four Gospels of the Bible; Uther, in other words, is swearing on a copy of the Gospels.

¹¹ get Father; nourish ... it Have raised in the way I wish to arrange.

¹² it shall ... worth It will further your honor and be to the child's advantage, as noble as he is.

¹³ will well Gladly wish it to be.

¹⁴ like I.e., magically disguised to seem to be.

¹⁵ wait ye make not Watch that you don't ask; diseased Feeling unwell or troubled; hie Hurry.

¹⁶ distressed Harassed or pressed in battle.

¹⁷ issue Sortie out of the castle; or Before.

¹⁸ begat Fathered.

¹ that ... whole To such a degree that I cannot become well.

² adventure Chance; array Clothing.

³ ado Concern.

⁴ there shall ... desire I.e., you will have what you desire as long as it is within reason.

⁵ more than apace Very swiftly.

⁶ dwell Stay.

⁷ Therewithal With that; bound Ready.

⁸ deal Part.

⁹ So If; anointed Anointing was a special ceremony in which a high church official, usually an archbishop, applied holy oil, a mix of fine plant oils, to the head of a newly crowned monarch as an indication of his or her divine right to rule. With that right came him ready. And so he kissed the lady Igraine and departed in all haste. But when the lady heard tell of the duke her husband, and by all record he was dead or ever King Uther came to her, then she marvelled who that might be that lay with her in likeness of her lord. So she mourned privily¹ and held her peace.

Then all the barons by one assent prayed the king of accord² betwixt the Lady Igraine and him. The king gave them leave, for fain³ would he have been accorded with her. So the king put all the trust in Ulfius to entreat⁴ between them. So by the entreaty, at the last the king and she met together.

"Now will we do well," said Ulfius. "Our king is a lusty knight and wifeless, and my Lady Igraine is a passing⁵ fair lady. It were great joy unto us all and⁶ it might please the king to make her his queen."

Unto that they all well accorded and moved it to the king.⁷ And anon, like a lusty knight, he assented thereto with good will, and so in all haste they were married in a morning with great mirth and joy.

And King Lot of Lothian and of Orkney then wedded Morgause that was Gawain's mother,⁸ and King Nentrys of the land of Garloth wedded Elaine. All this was done at the request of King Uther. And the third sister, Morgan le Fay, was put to school in a nunnery, and there she learned so much that she was a great clerk of necromancy.⁹ And after she was wedded to King Uriens of the land of Gore that was¹⁰ Sir Uwain le Blanche Mains' father.

¹ privily Secretly.

² barons Men of the lowest rank of nobility, often acting as members of the king's council; prayed ... of accord Formally asked the king for reconciliation.

³ gave them leave Granted them permission; fain Very gladly.

⁴ entreat Negotiate.

⁵ lusty Vigorous; passing Exceedingly.

⁶ and If.

⁷ accorded Agreed; moved it to the king Told the king of their agreement.

⁸ Morgause ... Gawain's mother Morgause, Elaine, and Morgan le Fay are all daughters of Igraine by the Duke of Tintagel. Gawain will be Morgause and Lot's first child.

⁹ clerk Scholar; necromancy Sorcery.

¹⁰ that was I.e., that later became (Morgan and Uriens will be Uwain's parents).

Then Queen Igraine waxed¹¹ daily greater and greater. So it befell after within half a year, as King Uther lay by his queen, he asked her, by the faith¹² she owed to him, whose was the child within her body. Then was she sore abashed to give answer.

"Dismay you not," said the king, "but tell me the truth, and I shall love you the better, by the faith of my body."¹³

"Sir," said she, "I shall tell you the truth. The same night that my lord was dead, the hour of his death, as his knights record, there came into my castle of Tintagel a man like my lord in speech and in countenance,¹⁴ and two knights with him in likeness of his two knights Brascias and Jordanus. And so I went unto bed with him as I ought to do with my lord, and the same night, as I shall answer unto God, this child was begotten upon me."

"That is truth," said the king, "as ye say, for it was I myself that came in the likeness. And therefore dismay you not, for I am the father to the child."

And there he told her all the cause, how it was by Merlin's counsel. Then the queen made great joy when she knew who was the father of her child.

Soon came Merlin unto the king and said, "Sir, ye must purvey you for the nourishing¹⁵ of your child."

"As thou wilt," said the king, "be¹⁶ it."

"Well," said Merlin, "I know a lord of yours in this land that is a passing true man and a faithful, and he shall have the nourishing of your child; and his name is Sir Ector, and he is a lord of fair livelihood in many parties¹⁷ in England and Wales. And this lord Sir Ector, let him be sent for, for to come and speak with you, and desire him yourself, as he loveth you, that he will put his own child to nourishing to another woman, and that his ¹¹ waxed Grew.

¹² faith Loyalty.

¹³ Dismay you not Do not be dismayed; by the faith of my body An oath, giving surety to the promise that follows.

¹⁴ record Tell; countenance Face.

¹⁵ purvey you Arrange; nourishing Fostering.

¹⁶ wilt Wish; be So be.

¹⁷ livelihood Possessions of land from which income is derived; parties Areas.

wife nourish yours. And when the child is born, let it be delivered to me at yonder privy postern,¹ unchristened.”

So like as Merlin devised, it was done. And when Sir Ector was come, he made fiance² to the king for to nourish the child like as the king desired, and there the king granted Sir Ector great rewards.

Then when the lady was delivered, the king commanded two knights and two ladies to take the child, bound in a cloth of gold, “and that ye deliver him to what poor man ye meet at the postern gate of the castle.”

So the child was delivered unto Merlin, and so he bore³ it forth unto Sir Ector and made an holy man to christen him, and named him Arthur. And so Sir Ector’s wife nourished him with her own pap.⁴

Then, within two years, King Uther fell sick of a great malady, and in the meanwhile his enemies usurped upon him and did a great battle upon his men and slew many of his people.

“Sir,” said Merlin, “ye may not lie so as ye do, for ye must to the field, though ye ride on an horse-litter.⁵ For ye shall never have the better of your enemies but if⁶ your person be there, and then shall ye have the victory.”

So it was done as Merlin had devised, and they carried the king forth in an horse-litter with a great host toward his enemies. And at St Albans there met with the king a great host of the north. And that day Sir Ulfius and Sir Brascias did great deeds of arms, and King Uther’s men overcome the northern battle,⁷ and slew many people and put the remnant to flight. And then the king returned unto London and made great joy of his victory.

And then he fell passing sore sick, so that three days and three nights he was speechless, wherefore⁸ all the barons made great sorrow and asked Merlin what council were best.

“There nis none⁹ other remedy,” said Merlin, “but God will have His will. But look ye all barons be before King Uther to-morn, and God and I shall make him to speak.”

So on the morn all the barons with Merlin came tofore¹⁰ the king.

Then Merlin said aloud unto King Uther, “Sir, shall your son Arthur be king, after your days, of this realm with all the appurtenance?”¹¹

Then Uther Pendragon turned him and said in hearing of them all, “I give him God’s blessing and mine, and bid him pray for my soul, and righteously and worshipfully¹² that he claim the crown, upon forfeiture of my blessing.”

And therewith he yielded up the ghost.¹³ And then was he interred as longed to¹⁴ a king, wherefore the queen, fair Igraine, made great sorrow, and all the barons.

Then stood the realm in great jeopardy long while, for every lord that was mighty of men made him strong, and many wend to have been¹⁵ king. Then Merlin went to the Archbishop of Canterbury and counselled him for to send for all the lords of the realm and all the gentlemen of arms, that they should to London come by Christmas, upon pain of cursing,¹⁶ and for this cause: that Jesu, that was born on that night, that He would of His great mercy show some miracle, as He was come to be king of mankind, for to show some miracle who should be rightwise¹⁷ king of this realm. So the archbishop, by the advice of Merlin, sent for all the lords and gentlemen of arms that they should come by

¹ privy postern Concealed or secluded gate.

² made fiance Gave a promise.

³ bore Carried.

⁴ pap Breast.

⁵ horse-litter Bed for the sick or wounded, carried between two horses.

⁶ but if Unless.

⁷ battle Army.

⁸ passing sore Very terribly; wherefore Because of which.

⁹ nis none Is no.

¹⁰ tofore Before.

¹¹ appurtenance Rights and privileges belonging to the kingship.

¹² turned him Turned himself; bid Entreat; righteously and worshipfully Justly and honorably.

¹³ yielded up the ghost Died.

¹⁴ interred as longed to Buried as was fitting for.

¹⁵ wend to have been Intended to become.

¹⁶ Archbishop of Canterbury Head of the Church in England; cursing Excommunication, i.e., loss of access to the services and rituals of the Church.

¹⁷ cause Reason; show some miracle Show through some miracle; rightwise Rightful.

Christmas Even unto London, and many of them made them clean of their life,¹ that their prayer might be the more acceptable unto God.

So in the greatest church of London, whether it were Paul's or not the French book maketh no mention, all the estates were long ere day² in the church for to pray. And when matins and the first Mass was done, there was seen in the churchyard, against the high altar, a great stone four square, like unto a marble stone, and in midst thereof was like an anvil of steel a foot on high, and therein stuck a fair sword naked by the point, and letters there were written in gold about the sword that said thus: "Whoso pulleth out this sword of this stone and anvil is rightwise king born³ of all England." Then the people marvelled and told it to the archbishop.

"I command," said the archbishop, "that ye keep you within your church and pray unto God still; that no man touch the sword till the high Mass be all done."

So when all Masses were done, all the lords went to behold the stone and the sword. And when they saw the scripture, some essayed, such as would have been⁴ king, but none might stir the sword nor move it.

"He is not here," said the archbishop, "that shall achieve the sword, but doubt not God will make him known. But this is my counsel," said the archbishop, "that we let purvey ten knights, men of good fame, and they to keep⁵ this sword."

So it was ordained, and then there was made a cry that every man should essay that would for to⁶ win the sword. And upon New Year's Day the barons let make a jousts and a tournament, that all knights that would joust or tourney there might play. And all this was ordained for to keep the lords together and the commons, for the archbishop trusted that God would make him known that should⁷ win the sword.

So upon New Year's Day, when the service was done, the barons rode unto the field, some to joust and some to toumey. And so it happed that Sir Ector, that had great livelihood about London, rode unto the jousts, and with him rode Sir Kay, his son, and young Arthur that was his nourished brother; and Sir Kay was made knight at All Hallowmass afore.⁸ So as they rode to the jousts-ward Sir Kay had lost his sword, for he had left it at his father's lodging, and so he prayed⁹ young Arthur for to ride for his sword.

"I will well,"¹⁰ said Arthur, and rode fast after the sword.

And when he came home the lady and all were out to see the jousting. Then was Arthur wroth,¹¹ and said to himself, "I will ride to the churchyard and take the sword with me that sticketh in the stone, for my brother Sir Kay shall not be without a sword this day." So when he came to the churchyard Sir Arthur alighted and tied his horse to the stile,¹² and so he went to the tent and found no knights there, for they were at jousting. And so he handled the sword by the handles, and lightly and fiercely¹³ pulled it out of the stone, and took his horse and rode his way until he came to his brother Sir Kay and delivered him the sword.

And as soon as Sir Kay saw the sword he wist¹⁴ well it was the sword of the stone, and so he rode to his father Sir Ector and said, "Sir, lo, here is the sword of ¹ Christmas Even Probably Christmas Eve, though "come by Christmas even" could also mean "come by Christmas directly"; made them clean of their life Were absolved of their sins.

² Paul's Old St. Paul's Cathedral, seat of the bishops of London, on the site of the present-day St. Paul's Cathedral; French book Unnamed French source from which Malory supposedly takes his material, actually a group of thirteenth-century Old French texts; estates There were three "estates of the realm," or broad social categories recognized in the middle ages: the clergy, the nobility, and the commons; ere day Before dawn.

³ matins Church service conducted at daybreak; four square Having four equal sides; naked Unsheathed; Whoso Whoever; born By right of birth.

⁴ the scripture I.e., the message written in gold letters; essayed Tried; would have been Wished to be.

⁵ let purvey Arrange to have; fame Reputation; keep Guard.

⁶ cry Formal summons; would for to Wished to.

⁷ commons Commoners; that should Who would.

⁸ happed Happened; nourished brother Foster brother; All Hallowmass All Saint's Day, Christian holiday honoring saints, celebrated on November 1; afore Before.

⁹ jousts-ward Toward the jousting-place; lost Realized he had forgotten; prayed Asked.

¹⁰ will well Gladly agree to do so.

¹¹ wroth Very angry.

¹² alighted Dismounted; stile Steps or rungs allowing access through or over a fence.

¹³ lightly and fiercely Quickly and eagerly.

¹⁴ wist Knew.

the stone, wherefore¹ I must be king of this land."

When Sir Ector beheld the sword he returned again and came to the church, and there they alighted all three and went into the church, and anon he made Sir Kay to swear upon a book how he came to² that sword.

"Sir," said Sir Kay, "by my brother Arthur, for he brought it to me."

"How got ye this sword?" said Sir Ector to Arthur.

"Sir, I will tell you. When I came home for my brother's sword, I found nobody at home to deliver me his sword, and so I thought my brother Sir Kay should not be swordless, and so I came hither eagerly and pulled it out of the stone without any pain."³

"Found ye any knights about this sword?" said Sir Ector.

"Nay," said Arthur.

"Now," said Sir Ector to Arthur, "I understand ye must be king of this land."

"Wherefore⁴ I?" said Arthur, "and for what cause?"

"Sir," said Ector, "for God will have it so, for there should never man have drawn out this sword but he that shall be rightwise king of this land. Now let me see whether ye can put the sword thereas⁵ it was and pull it out again."

"That is no mastery,"⁶ said Arthur, and so he put it in the stone. Therewithal⁷ Sir Ector essayed to pull out the sword, and failed.

"Now essay," said Sir Ector unto Sir Kay. And anon he pulled at the sword with all his might, but it would not be.

"Now shall ye essay," said Sir Ector to Arthur.

"I will well," said Arthur, and pulled it out easily.

And therewithal Sir Ector kneeled down to the earth, and Sir Kay.

"Alas!" said Arthur, "my own dear father and brother, why kneel ye to me?"

"Nay, nay, my lord Arthur, it is not so. I was never your father nor of your blood, but I wot well ye are of an higher blood than I weened⁸ ye were."

And then Sir Ector told him all how he was betaken him for to nourish him, and by whose commandment, and by Merlin's deliverance.⁹ Then Arthur made great dole¹⁰ when he understood that Sir Ector was not his father.

"Sir," said Ector unto Arthur, "will ye be my good and gracious lord when ye are king?"

"Else were I to blame," said Arthur, "for ye are the man in the world that I am most beholding¹¹ to, and my good lady and mother your wife that as well as her own hath fostered me and kept. And if ever it be God's will that I be king as ye say, ye shall desire of me what I may do, and I shall not fail you. God forbid I should fail you."

"Sir," said Sir Ector, "I will ask no more of you but that ye will make my son, your foster brother Sir Kay, seneschal¹² of all your lands."

"That shall be done," said Arthur, "and more, by the faith of my body, that never man shall have that office but he while he and I live."

Therewithal they went unto the archbishop and told him how the sword was achieved and by whom. And on Twelfth-day all the barons came thither,¹³ and to essay to take the sword who that would essay, but there afore them all there might none take it out but Arthur. Wherefore there were many lords wroth, and said it was great shame unto them all and the realm to be over-governed with a boy of no high blood born. And so they fell out at that time, that it was put off till Candlemas,¹⁴

⁸ wot Know; weened Supposed.

⁹ betaken Entrusted to; nourish Foster, raise; deliverance I.e., delivering of Arthur to Sir Ector.

¹⁰ dole Sorrow.

¹¹ beholding Bound in duty.

¹² seneschal Steward, official overseeing the administration of a king's lands and court.

¹³ Twelfth-day Twelfth day after Christmas, or the Feast of the Epiphany, marking the end of Christmas festivities and celebrating the three wise men's visit to Jesus and their recognition of his divinity; thither There.

¹⁴ fell out Quarreled; that So that; Candlemas Holiday, celebrated on 2 February, commemorating the Virgin Mary's purification after the birth of Jesus, and Jesus' Temple presentation.

¹ lo Behold; wherefore For which reason.

² anon Immediately; book Bible or book containing parts of the Bible; came to Came to have.

³ eagerly Quickly; pain Difficulty.

⁴ Wherefore Why.

⁵ thereas Where.

⁶ mastery Action requiring great skill.

Therewithal That being done.

and then all the barons should meet there again; but always the ten knights were ordained to watch the sword day and night, and so they set a pavilion over the stone and the sword, and five always watched.

So at Candlemas many more great lords came thither for to have won the sword, but there might none prevail. And right as Arthur did at Christmas he did at Candlemas, and pulled out the sword easily, whereof the barons were sore aggrieved and put it off in delay till the high feast of Easter. And as Arthur sped¹ afore, so did he at Easter. Yet there were some of the great lords had indignation that Arthur should be king, and put it off in a delay till the feast of Pentecost.² Then the Archbishop of Canterbury, by Merlin's providence, let purvey³ then of the best knights that they might get, and such knights as Uther Pendragon loved best and most trusted in his days, and such knights were put about Arthur as Sir Baldwin of Britanny, Sir Kaynes, Sir Ulfius, Sir Brascias; all these with many other were always about Arthur day and night till the feast of Pentecost.

And at the feast of Pentecost all manner of men essayed to pull at the sword that would essay, but none might prevail but Arthur, and pulled it out afore all the lords and commons that were there.

Wherefore all the commons cried at once, "We will have Arthur unto⁴ our king. We will put him no more in delay, for we all see that it is God's will that he shall be our king, and who that holdeth against⁵ it we will slay him."

And therewithal they kneeled at once, both rich and poor, and cried Arthur mercy⁶ because they had delayed him so long. And Arthur forgave them, and took the sword between both his hands and offered it upon the altar where the archbishop was, and so was he made knight of the best man that was there.

And so anon was the coronation made, and there was he sworn unto his lords and the commons for to be a true king, to stand with true justice from thenceforth the days⁷ of this life. Also then he made all lords that held of the crown⁸ to come in and to do service as they ought to do. And many complaints were made unto Sir Arthur of great wrongs that were done since the death of King Uther, of many lands that were bereaved lords, knights, ladies, and gentlemen.⁹ Wherefore King Arthur made the lands to be given again unto them that ought them.

When this was done, that the king had stablished all the countries about London, then he let make Sir Kay seneschal of England, and Sir Baldwin of Britanny was made constable, and Sir Ulfius was made chamberlain, and Sir Brascias was made warden to wait upon the north, from Trent forwards, for it was that time the most party¹⁰ the king's enemies. But within few years after, Arthur won all the north, Scotland, and all that were under their obeisance; also Wales, a part of it, held against Arthur, but he overcame them all, as he did the remnant, through the noble prowess of himself and his knights of the Round Table.¹¹

¹ sped Succeeded.

² Pentecost Christian celebration that takes place the seventh Sunday after Easter, Pentecost is the anniversary of the Holy Ghost's descent upon Jesus' disciples which miraculously gave them the ability to speak the languages of all nations.

³ providence Foresight and guidance; let purvey Arranged to procure the services.

⁴ unto As.

⁵ holdeth against Prevents.

⁶ cried Arthur mercy Begged Arthur's forgiveness.

⁷ thenceforth the days From then on all the days.

⁸ held of the crown Had been given their titles and lands by the crown.

⁹ were bereaved Had been taken from; gentlemen Men of high rank, allowed to bear a coat of arms.

¹⁰ stablished Brought into order; countries Territories; constable Chief administrative or military officer of the king; chamberlain Chief steward to the king; warden Governor; wait Watch over; from Trent forwards North of the River Trent; the most party For the most part.

¹¹ obeisance Rule; Round Table Originally belonging to Uther, the Round Table, at which one hundred and fifty knights may be seated, is first given as a gift to Lodegrance, King of Camelard and Guinevere's father; Guinevere then brings it to Arthur as part of her dowry when they marry.

BOOK 8: THE DEATH OF KING ARTHUR

In May, when every heart flourisheth and burgeoneth—for as the season is lusty to behold and comfortable, so man and woman rejoiceth and gladdeth of summer coming with his fresh flowers, for winter with his rough winds and blasts causeth lusty men and women to cower and to sit by fires—so this season it befell in the month of May a great anger and unhap that stinted¹ not till the flower of chivalry of all the world was destroyed and slain. And all was long upon two unhappy² knights which were named Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred, that were brethren unto Sir Gawain. For this Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred had ever a privy³ hate unto the queen, Dame Guinevere, and to Sir Launcelot; and daily and nightly they ever watched upon Sir Launcelot.

So it misfortuned Sir Gawain and all his brethren were in King Arthur's chamber, and then Sir Agravain said thus openly, and not in no counsel,⁴ that many knights might hear, "I marvel that we all be not ashamed both to see and to know how Sir Launcelot lieth daily and nightly by the queen. And all we know well that it is so, and it is shamefully suffered⁵ of us all that we should suffer so noble a king as King Arthur is to be shamed."

Then spake Sir Gawain and said, "Brother, Sir Agravain, I pray you and charge you, move no such matters no more afore me, for wit you well, I will not be of your counsel."⁶

"So God me help," said Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth, "we will not be known of⁷ your deeds."

"Then will I!" said Sir Mordred.

"I lieve you well," said Sir Gawain, "for ever unto all unhappiness, sir, ye will grant.⁸ And I would that ye left all this and make you not so busy, for I know," said Sir Gawain, "what will fall⁹ of it."

"Fall whathomever fall may,"¹⁰ said Sir Agravain, "I will disclose it to the king!"

"Not by my counsel," said Sir Gawain, "for, and there arise war and wrake betwixt Sir Launcelot and us, wit you well, brother, there will many kings and great lords hold¹¹ with Sir Launcelot. Also, brother, Sir Agravain," said Sir Gawain, "ye must remember how oftentimes Sir Launcelot hath rescued the king and the queen; and the best of us all had been full cold at the heart-root had not Sir Launcelot been better than we, and that hath he proved himself full oft.¹² And as for my part," said Sir Gawain, "I will never be against Sir Launcelot for one day's deed: that was when he rescued me from King Carados of the Dolorous Tower¹³ and slew him and saved my life. Also, brother Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred, in like wise Sir Launcelot rescued you both and three score and two¹⁴ from Sir Tarquin. And therefore, brother, methinks¹⁵ such noble deeds and kindness should be remembered."

"Do you as ye list," said Sir Agravain, "for I will lain¹⁶ it no longer."

So with these words came in Sir Arthur.

"Now, brother," said Sir Gawain, "stint¹⁷ your strife."

"That will I not," said Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred.

"Well, will ye so?" said Sir Gawain. "Then God speed you, for I will not hear of your tales, neither be of your counsel."¹⁸

⁸ lieve Believe; ever Always; grant Consent.

⁹ would Wish; fall Come.

¹⁰ Fall ... may Come whatever may come.

¹¹ and If; wrake Strife; hold Side.

¹² had been ... heart-root Would have been dead; full oft Very often.

¹³ Dolorous Tower Tower of Sorrow.

¹⁴ like wise The same way; three ... two Sixty-two.

¹⁵ methinks It seems to me.

¹⁶ list Please; lain Hide.

¹⁷ stint Cease.

¹⁸ speed Help; neither ... counsel Nor will I participate in your plans.

¹ lusty Delightful; comfortable Pleasant; gladdeth Are glad; lusty men and women (Otherwise) joyful and vigorous men and women; unhap Misfortune; stinted Ceased.

² long upon Because of; unhappy Causing misfortune.

³ privy Secret.

⁴ misfortuned Unfortunately happened; not ... counsel Not in private.

⁵ it ... suffered It is shameful to us that we should allow.

⁶ pray Beg; charge Order; move ... more Suggest no such thing anymore; afore Before; wit you well You may be certain that; I ... counsel I will not go along with you.

⁷ not ... of Not know about.

"No more will I," said Sir Gaheris.

"Neither I," said Sir Gareth, "for I shall never say evil by¹ that man that made me knight."

And therewithal they three departed, making great dole.²

"Alas!" said Sir Gawain and Sir Gareth, "now is this realm wholly destroyed and mischieved, and the noble fellowship of the Round Table shall be disparted."³

So they departed, and then King Arthur asked them what noise⁴ they made.

"My lord," said Sir Agravain, "I shall tell you, for I may keep it no longer. Here is I and my brother Sir Mordred brake⁵ unto my brother Sir Gawain, Sir Gaheris and to Sir Gareth—for this is all, to make it short—we know all that Sir Launcelot holdeth your queen, and hath done long, and we be your sister's sons, we may suffer it no longer. And all we wot⁶ that ye should be above Sir Launcelot; and ye are the king that made him knight, and therefore we will prove it that he is a traitor to your person."

"If it be so," said the king, "wit you well, he is none other. But I would be loath to begin such a thing but I might have proofs of it, for Sir Launcelot is an hardy knight, and all ye know that he is the best knight among us all, and but if he be taken with the deed he will fight with him that bringeth up the noise,⁷ and I know no knight that is able to match him. Therefore, and it be sooth⁸ as ye say, I would that he were taken with the deed."

For, as the French book sayeth, the king was full loath that such a noise should be upon Sir Launcelot and his queen; for the king had a deeming of it, but he would not hear thereof, for Sir Launcelot had done so much for him and for the queen so many times that wit

you well the king loved him passingly⁹ well.

"My lord," said Sir Agravain, "ye shall ride to-morn an-hunting, and doubt ye not, Sir Launcelot will not go with you. And so when it draweth toward night ye may send the queen word that ye will lie out all that night, and so may ye send for your cooks. And then, upon pain of death, that night we shall take him with the queen, and we shall bring him unto you, quick¹⁰ or dead."

"I will well," said the king. "Then I counsel you to take with you sure¹¹ fellowship."

"Sir," said Sir Agravain, "my brother Sir Mordred and I will take with us twelve knights of the Round Table."

"Beware," said King Arthur, "for I warn you, ye shall find him wight."¹²

"Let us deal,"¹³ said Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred.

So on the morn King Arthur rode an-hunting and sent word to the queen that he would be out all the night. Then Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred got to them twelve knights and hid themselves in a chamber in the castle of Carlisle. And these were their names: Sir Collgrevice, Sir Mador de la Porte, Sir Gingalin, Sir Meliot de Logres, Sir Petipace of Winchelsea, Sir Galleron of Galway, Sir Melion de la Mountaine, Sir Ascamour, Sir Gromore Somer Jour, Sir Curselalain, Sir Florence, and Sir Lovell. So these twelve knights were with Sir Mordred and Sir Agravain, and all they were of Scotland, other ellis of Sir Gawain's kin, other well-willers to his brother.¹⁴

So when the night came Sir Launcelot told Sir Bors how he would go that night and speak with the queen.

"Sir," said Sir Bors, "ye shall not go this night by my counsel."¹⁵

"Why?" said Sir Launcelot.

⁹ as the French book sayeth In Malory's French source, Agravain is reluctant to tell Arthur what he and his brothers have been talking about, and speaks only when Arthur threatens to kill him. Arthur then wants revenge, and spurs his nephews on to set a trap for Launcelot; noise Scandal; deeming Suspicion; passingly Exceedingly.

¹⁰ take Catch; quick Alive.

¹¹ will well Agree willingly; sure Trustworthy.

wight Strong and courageous.

¹² deal Take action.

other ellis Or else; other Or; well-willers ... brother I.e., supporters of Agravain.

¹³ counsel Advice.

¹ by Of.

² therewithal With that; dole Sorrow.

³ mischieved Ruined; disparted Dispersed.

⁴ noise Fuss.

⁵ brake Made known.

wot Know.

⁷ but Unless; hardy Bold, courageous, and strong; but if ... the deed Unless he is caught in the act; bringeth up the noise Voices the scandal.

⁸ and If; sooth True.

"Sir, for I dread me ever of Sir Agravain that waiteth upon you¹ daily to do you shame and us all. And never gave my heart against no going that ever ye went to the queen so much as now, for I mistrust that the king is out this night from the queen because peradventure² he hath lain some watch for you and the queen. Therefore I dread me sore³ of some treason."

"Have ye no dread," said Sir Launcelot, "for I shall go and come again and make no tarrying."⁴

"Sir," said Sir Bors, "that me repents, for I dread me sore that your going this night shall wrath⁵ us all."

"Fair nephew," said Sir Launcelot, "I marvel me much why you say thus, sithen⁶ the queen hath sent for me. And wit you well, I will not be so much a coward, but she shall understand I will see her good grace."

"God speed you well," said Sir Bors, "and send you sound and safe again."

So Sir Launcelot departed and took his sword under his arm, and so he walked in his mantle,⁷ that noble knight, and put himself in great jeopardy. And so he passed on till he came to the queen's chamber, and so lightly⁸ he was had into the chamber. For, as the French book sayeth, the queen and Sir Launcelot were together, and whether they were abed at other manner of disports me list not thereof make no mention,⁹ for love at that time was not as love is nowadays.

But thus as they were together there came Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred with twelve knights with them of the Round Table, and they said with great crying and scaring voice, "Thou traitor, Sir Launcelot, now are thou taken!" And thus they cried with a loud voice, that all the court might hear it. And these fourteen knights all were armed at all points, as they should¹⁰ fight in a battle.

"Alas," said Queen Guinevere, "now are we mischieved¹¹ both!"

"Madam," said Sir Launcelot, "is there here any armour within you that might cover my body withal?¹² And if there be any, give it me and I shall soon stint their malice, by the grace of God!"

"Now, truly," said the queen, "I have none armour nother helm, shield, sword, nother spear, wherefore I dread me sore our long love is come to a mischievous¹³ end. For I hear by their noise there be many noble knights, and well I wot they be surely¹⁴ armed, and against them ye may make no resistance. Wherefore ye are likely to be slain, and then shall I be brent!¹⁵ For and ye might escape them," said the queen "I would not doubt but that ye would rescue me in what danger that I ever¹⁶ stood in."

"Alas," said Sir Launcelot, "in all my life thus was I never bestead¹⁷ that I should be thus shamefully slain for lack of mine armour."

But ever Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred cried, "Traitor knight, come out of the queen's chamber! For wit thou well thou art beset¹⁸ so that thou shalt not escape."

"Ah, Jesu mercy!" said Sir Launcelot, "this shameful cry and noise¹⁹ I may not suffer, for better were death at once than thus to endure this pain."

Then he took the queen in his arms and kissed her and said, "Most noblest Christian queen, I beseech you, as ye have been ever my special good lady, and I at all times your poor knight and true unto my power,²⁰ and never ... now Never before now did my heart warn me so much against you visiting the queen; mistrust Suspect; peradventure Perhaps.

¹ I ... ever I fear always; that ... you Who lies in wait for you.

³ sore Terribly.

make no tarrying Not stay.

me repents I regret; wrath Bring to disaster.

⁶ I marvel me It makes me marvel; sithen Since.

mantle Cloak, i.e., not wearing armor.

⁸ lightly Quickly.

⁹ as the French book sayeth Malory's French source says plainly that Launcelot undressed and got into Guinevere's bed; disports Amusements; me ... mention I do not wish to say.

¹⁰ armed ... should Armed completely as if to.

¹¹ mischieved Ruined.

¹² within you I.e., here in your chamber; withal With.

¹³ none ... nother No ... nor; wherefore Because of which; mischievous Wretched.

¹⁴ surely Well.

¹⁵ brent Burnt (at the stake).

¹⁶ and If; what ... ever Whatever danger I.

¹⁷ bestead So hard pressed.

¹⁸ beset Surrounded.

¹⁹ noise Scandal.

²⁰ unto my power To the utmost of my ability.

as I never failed you in right nor in wrong sithen the first day King Arthur made me knight, that ye will pray for my soul if that I be slain. For well I am assured that Sir Bors, my nephew, and all the remnant of my kin, with Sir Lavain and Sir Urry, that they will not fail you to rescue you from the fire. And therefore, mine own lady, recomfort yourself,¹ whatsomever come of me, that ye go with Sir Bors, my nephew, and they all will do you all the pleasure that they may, and ye shall live like a queen upon my lands.”

“Nay, Sir Launcelot, nay!” said the queen. “Wit thou well that I will never live long after thy days. But and² you be slain I will take my death as meekly as ever did martyr take his death for Jesu Christ’s sake.”

“Well, madam,” said Sir Launcelot, “sith it is so that the day is come that our love must depart, wit you well I shall sell my life as dear³ as I may. And a thousand-fold,” said Sir Launcelot, “I am more heavier⁴ for you than for myself. And now I had liefer than to be lord of all Christendom that I had sure armour upon me, that men might speak of my deeds or ever I were slain.”⁵

“Truly,” said the queen, “and⁶ it might please God, I would that they would take me and slay me and suffer you to escape.”

“That shall never be,” said Sir Launcelot. “God defend⁷ me from such a shame! But, Jesu Christ, be thou my shield and mine armour!”

And therewith Sir Launcelot wrapped his mantle about his arm well and surely; and by then they had gotten a great form out of the hall, and therewith⁸ they all rushed at the door.

“Now, fair lords,” said Sir Launcelot, “leave your noise and your rushing, and I shall set open this door, and then may ye do with me what it liketh you.”⁹

“Come off,¹⁰ then,” said they all, “and do it, for it availeth thee not to strive against us all. And therefore let us into this chamber, and we shall save thy life until thou come to King Arthur.”

Then Sir Launcelot unbarred the door, and with his left hand he held it open a little, that but one man might come in at once. And so there came striding a good knight, a much¹¹ man and a large, and his name was called Sir Collgrevice of Gore. And he with a sword struck at Sir Launcelot mightily, and so he put aside the stroke, and gave him such a buffet upon the helmet that he fell grovelling¹² dead within the chamber door. Then Sir Launcelot with great might drew the knight within the chamber door, and then Sir Launcelot, with help of the queen and her ladies, he was lightly armed in Collgrevice¹³ armour. And ever stood Sir Agravaing and Sir Mordred, crying, “Traitor knight! Come forth out of the queen’s chamber!”

“Sirs, leave your noise,” said Sir Launcelot, “for wit you well, Sir Agravaing, ye shall not prison me this night! And therefore, and ye do by my counsel, go ye all from this chamber door and make you no such crying and such manner of slander¹⁴ as ye do. For I promise you by my knighthood, and ye will depart and make no more noise, I shall as to-morn appear afore you all and before the king, and then let it be seen which of you all, other ellis ye all, that will deprave me of¹⁵ treason. And there shall I answer you, as a knight should, that hither I came to the queen of no manner of malengine, and that will I prove and make it good upon you with my hands.”¹⁶

“Fie upon thee, traitor,” said Sir Agravaing and Sir Mordred, “for we will have thee maugre thine head and slay thee, and we list!”¹⁷ For we let thee wit, we have the

¹ recomfort yourself Regain your courage.

² and If.

³ sith Since; depart Be severed; as dear At as high a price.

⁴ more heavier More sorrowful.

⁵ liefer Rather; sure Trusty; or ever ... slain Before I was killed.

⁶ and If.

⁷ defend Keep.

⁸ form Bench; therewith With that.

leave Cease; what ... you What pleases you.

¹⁰ Come off Come on.

¹¹ much Big.

¹² so he I.e., so Sir Launcelot; buffet Stroke; grovelling Face down.

¹³ Collgrevice Collgrevice’s.

¹⁴ and ye do If you act; slander Slander.

¹⁵ and ye will If you will; other ellis ye all Or else all of you; deprave me of Defame me with the accusation of.

¹⁶ of no manner of malengine With no manner of bad intent; make ... hands I.e., prove it in trial by combat.

¹⁷ Fie Shame; maugre ... head I.e., despite all you can do; and we list If we wish.

choice of King Arthur to save thee other slay thee."

"Ah, sirs," said Sir Launcelot, "is there none other grace with you? Then keep¹ yourself!"

And then Sir Launcelot set all open the chamber door, and mightily and knightly he strode in among them. And anon² at the first stroke he slew Sir Agravain, and anon after twelve of his fellows. Within a while he had laid them down cold to the earth, for there was none of the twelve knights might stand Sir Launcelot one buffet. And also he wounded Sir Mordred, and therewithal he³ fled with all his might. And then Sir Launcelot returned again unto the queen and said, "Madam, now wit you well, all our true love is brought to an end, for now will King Arthur ever⁴ be my foe. And therefore, madam, and it like you that I may have you with me, I shall save you from all manner adventurous⁵ dangers."

"Sir, that is not best," said the queen, "meseemeth, for now ye have done so much harm it will be best that ye hold you still⁶ with this. And if ye see that as to-morn they will put me unto death, then may ye rescue me as ye think best."

"I will well," said Sir Launcelot, "for have ye no doubt, while I am a man living I shall rescue you."

And then he kissed her, and either of them gave other a ring, and so the queen he left there and went until⁷ his lodging.

When Sir Bors saw Sir Launcelot, he was never so glad of his home-coming.

"Jesu mercy!" said Sir Launcelot, "why be ye all armed? What meaneth this?"

"Sir," said Sir Bors, "after ye were departed from us, we all that been of your blood and your well-willers were so adreamed⁸ that some of us leapt out of our beds naked, and some in their dreams caught naked swords in their hands. And therefore," said Sir Bors, "we deemed there was some great strife on hand, and so we deemed that ye were betrayed with some treason; and therefore we made us thus ready, what need that ever ye were in."⁹

"My fair nephew," said Sir Launcelot unto Sir Bors, "now shall ye wit all that this night I was more hard bestead than ever I was days¹⁰ of my life. And thanked be God, I am myself escaped their danger."

And so he told them all how and in what manner, as ye have heard toforehand.¹¹

"And therefore, my fellows," said Sir Launcelot, "I pray you all that ye will be of heart good, and help me in what need that ever I stand, for now is war comen¹² to us all."

"Sir," said Sir Bors, "all is welcome that God sendeth us, and as we have taken much weal with you and much worship,¹³ we will take the woe with you as we have taken the weal."

"And therefore," they said, all the good knights, "Look ye take no discomfort! For there is no bands of knights under heaven but we shall be able to grieve them as much as they us,¹⁴ and therefore discomfort not yourself by no manner. And we shall gather together all that we love and that loveth us, and what that ye will have done shall be done. And therefore let us take the woe and the joy together."

"Gramercy,"¹⁵ said Sir Launcelot, "of your good comfort, for in my great distress, fair nephew, ye comfort me greatly. But thus, my fair nephew, I would that ye did in all haste that you may or it is far days past: that ye will look in their lodging that been lodged nigh here about the king, which¹⁶ will hold with me and which will not. For now I would know which were my friends from my foes."

"Sir," said Sir Bors, "I shall do my pain, and or it be seven of the clock I shall wit of such as ye have done

¹ keep Defend.

² anon Immediately.

³ therewithal he With that Sir Mordred.

⁴ ever Always.

⁵ and it like you If it pleases you; adventurous Hazardous.

⁶ meseemeth It seems to me; hold ... still Do not proceed.

⁷ until To.

⁸ well-willers Supporters; so adreamed I.e., visited by such a dream.

⁹ deemed Suspected; what need ... in I.e., to help in whatever way you might need.

¹⁰ bestead Pressed; days I.e., in all the days.

¹¹ toforehand Beforehand.

¹² is war comen Has war come.

¹³ weal Prosperity; worship Praise, honor.

¹⁴ grieve Injure; they us I.e., they may injure us.

¹⁵ Gramercy Thank you.

¹⁶ would Wish; or ... past Before too much time goes by; nigh Near; which I.e., to see which.

for,¹ who that will hold with you."

Then Sir Bors called unto him Sir Lionel, Sir Ector de Maris, Sir Blamour de Ganis, Sir Bleoberis de Ganis, Sir Gahalantine, Sir Galihodin, Sir Galihud, Sir Menaduke, Sir Villiers the Valiant, Sir Hebes le Renowne, Sir Lavain, Sir Urry of Hungary, Sir Neroveus, Sir Plenorius (for these two were knights that Sir Launcelot won² upon a bridge, and therefore they would never be against him), and Sir Harry le Fize Lake, and Sir Selises of the Dolorous Tower, Sir Melias de Lyle, and Sir Bellinger le Beuse, that was Sir Alisaunder le Orphelin's son; because his mother kin unto Sir Launcelot, he held with him. So came Sir Palomides and Sir Saphir, his brother; Sir Clegis, Sir Sadok, Sir Dinas, and Sir Clarrus of Claremont.

So these two-and-twenty knights drew them together, and by then they were armed and on horseback they promised Sir Launcelot to do what he would.³ Then there fell to them, what of North Galis and of Cornwall, for Sir Lamorak's sake and for Sir Tristram's sake, to the number of a four score⁴ knights.

Then spake Sir Launcelot: "Wit you well, I have been ever since I came to this court well-willed unto my lord Arthur and unto my lady Queen Guinevere unto my power.⁵ And this night because my lady the queen sent for me to speak with her—I suppose it was made by treason, howbeit I dare largely excuse her person—notwithstanding, I was thereby nearhand slain but as⁶ Jesu provided for me."

And then that noble knight Sir Launcelot told them how he was hard bestead in the queen's chamber, and how and in what manner he escaped from them.

"And therefore wit you well, my fair lords, I am sure there nis⁷ but war unto me and to mine. And for cause⁸ I have slain this night Sir Agravain, Sir Gawain's brother, and at the least twelve of his fellows, and for this cause now am I sure of mortal war. For these knights were sent by King Arthur to betray me, and therefore the king will in this heat and malice judge the queen unto brenning, and that may not I suffer⁹ that she should be brent for my sake. For and I may be heard and suffered and so taken, I will fight for the queen, that¹⁰ she is a true lady until her lord. But the king in his heat, I dread, will not take¹¹ me as I ought to be taken."

"My lord, Sir Launcelot," said Sir Bors, "by mine advice, ye shall take the woe with the weal. And sithen it is fallen as it is, I counsel you to keep yourself, for and ye will¹² yourself, there is no fellowship of knights christened that shall do you wrong. And also I will counsel you, my lord, that my lady Queen Guinevere, and she be in any distress, insomuch as she is in pain for your sake, that ye knightly rescue her; for and ye¹³ did any other wise all the world would speak you shame to the world's end. Insomuch as ye were taken with her, whether ye did right other wrong, it is now your part to hold with the queen, that she be not slain and put to a mischievous¹⁴ death. For and¹⁵ she so die, the shame shall be evermore yours."

"Now Jesu defend me from shame," said Sir Launcelot, "and keep and save my lady the queen from villainy and shameful death, and that she never be destroyed in my default.¹⁶ Wherefore,¹⁷ my fair lords, my kin and my friends," said Sir Launcelot, "what will ye do?"

⁷ nis Is nothing.

⁸ for cause Because.

⁹ heat Anger; brenning Burning; suffer Allow.

¹⁰ and I ... taken If I may be allowed to be heard and so understood; that To prove that.

¹¹ take Accept or understand.

¹² sithen ... is I.e., Since the situation has become what it has; keep Defend; and ye will If you will (defend).

¹³ and she If she; and ye If you.

¹⁴ that I.e., to ensure that; mischievous Shameful.

¹⁵ and If.

¹⁶ default Failure (to attempt the queen's rescue).

¹⁷ Wherefore This being the case.

¹ I ... pain I will strive to do so; or Before; wit Know; have done for Have helped.

² won I.e., defeated in combat.

³ two-and-twenty As some editors have pointed out, this may be a scribal error; there are twenty-five knights in total; by then When; would Wished.

⁴ fell to ... of Fell in with them, what with those of; four score Eighty.

⁵ well-willed Well-disposed; unto my power As far as it was in my power.

⁶ made by Made to happen by; largely Freely; nearhand Nearly; but as Had not.

And anon they said all with one voice, "We will do as ye will do." "Then I put this case unto you,"¹ said Sir Launcelot, "that my lord King Arthur by evil counsel will to-morn in his heat put my lady the queen unto the fire, and there to be brent. Then, I pray you, counsel me what is best for me to do."

Then they said all at once with one voice, "Sir, us thinks best that ye knightly rescue the queen. Insomuch as she shall be brent, it is for your sake; and it is to suppose, and ye might be handled,² ye should have the same death, other ellis a more shamefuller death. And, sir, we say all that ye have rescued her from her death many times for other men's quarrels; therefore us seemeth it is more your worship³ that ye rescue the queen from this quarrel, insomuch that she hath it for your sake."

Then Sir Launcelot stood still and said, "My fair lords, wit you well I would be loath to do that thing⁴ that should dishonour you or my blood, and wit you well I would be full loath that my lady the queen should die such a shameful death. But and it be so that ye will counsel me to rescue her, I must do much harm or I rescue her, and peradventure⁵ I shall there destroy some of my best friends. And if so be that I may win the queen away,⁶ where shall I keep her?"

"Sir, that shall be the least care of us all," said Sir Bors, "for how did the most noble knight Sir Tristram?⁷ By your good will, kept not he with him La Beale Isolde near three year in Joyous Gard, the which was done by your althers advice?⁸ And that same place is your own, and in like wise may ye do, and ye list,⁹ and take the queen knightly away with you, if so be that the king will judge her to be brent. And in Joyous Gard may ye keep her long enough until the heat be past of the king, and then it may fortune you to bring the queen again to the king with great worship, and peradventure ye shall have then thank for your bringing home, where other may happen to have maugre."¹⁰

"That is hard for to do," said Sir Launcelot, "for by Sir Tristram I may have a warning: for when by means of treatise Sir Tristram brought again La Beale Isolde unto King Mark from Joyous Gard, look ye now what fell on the end, how shamefully that false traitor King Mark slew him as he sat harping afore¹¹ his lady, La Beale Isolde. With a grounden glaive he thrust him in behind to the heart, which grieveth sore me,"¹² said Sir Launcelot, "to speak of his death, for all the world may not find such another knight."

"All this is truth," said Sir Bors, "but there is one thing shall courage you and us all: you know well that King Arthur and King Mark were never like of conditions,¹³ for there was never yet man that ever could prove King Arthur untrue of his promise."

But so, to make short tale, they were all condescended that, for better other¹⁴ for worse, if so were that the queen were brought on that morn to the fire, shortly they all would rescue her. And so by the advice of Sir Launcelot they put them all in a wood as nigh Carlisle as they might, and there they abode still to wit¹⁵ what the king would do.

Now turn we again, that when Sir Mordred was escaped from Sir Launcelot he got his horse and came to King Arthur sore wounded and all forbled,¹⁶ and there he told the king all how it was, and how they were all slain save himself alone.

¹ put this case unto you Present you with this possible scenario.

² to suppose To be supposed; and ye If you; handled Captured.

³ quarrels Legal cases; us seemeth It seems to us; worship Honor.

⁴ that thing I.e., any thing.

⁵ or Before; peradventure I.e., possibly.

⁶ win the queen away I.e., win the battle and take the queen away.

⁷ how ... Tristram What did the most noble knight Sir Tristram do; Tristram Knight who has an adulterous affair with La Beale (The Beautiful) Isolde, the wife of his uncle King Mark. Malory recounts this episode, not included in this volume, in The Book of Sir Tristram De Lyones.

⁸ Joyous Gard Joyous Keep or Castle, Launcelot's castle; your ... advice The advice of you all.

⁹ like wise The same way; and ye list If you wish.

¹⁰ fortune you to happen that you; thank Gratitude; other Others; have maugre I.e., a hostile reaction (from the king).

¹¹ treatise Negotiation of terms; fell on Happened in; afore Before.

¹² grounden glaive Sharpened spear or lance; grieveth sore me Makes me terribly sorrowful.

¹³ courage Encourage; like of conditions Similar in disposition and character.

¹⁴ condescended In agreement; other Or.

¹⁵ abode Waited; wit Know, i.e., find out.

¹⁶ forbled Covered with blood.

"Ah, Jesu, mercy! How may this be?" said the king. "Took ye him in the queen's chamber?"

"Yea, so God me help," said Sir Mordred, "there we found him unarmed, and anon he slew Sir Collgrevice and armed him¹ in his armour."

And so he told the king from the beginning to the ending.

"Jesu mercy!" said the king, "he is a marvellous knight of prowess. And alas," said the king, "me sore repenteth² that ever Sir Launcelot should be against me, for now I am sure the noble fellowship of the Round Table is broken forever, for with him will many a noble knight hold. And now it is fallen so," said the king, "that I may not with my worship but my queen must suffer death," and was sore amoved.³

So then there was made great ordinance in this ire, and the queen must needs be judged⁴ to the death. And the law was such in those days that whatsoever they were, of what estate or degree, if they were founden guilty of treason there should be none other remedy but death, and other the mainour other the taking with the deed should be causer of their hasty⁵ judgement. And right so was it ordained for Queen Guinevere: because Sir Mordred was escaped sore wounded, and the death of thirteen knights of the Round Table, these proofs and experiences caused King Arthur to command the queen to the fire, and there to be brent.

Then spake Sir Gawain and said, "My lord Arthur, I would counsel you not to be over-hasty, but that ye would put it in respite, this judgement of my lady the queen, for many causes.⁶ One is this, though it were so that Sir Launcelot were found in the queen's chamber, yet it might be so that he came thither for none⁷ evil. For ye know, my lord," said Sir Gawain, "that my lady the queen has oftentimes been greatly beholden unto Sir unarmed Without armor; anon Immediately; him Himself.

me ... repenteth I greatly regret.

it is fallen so Circumstances are such; I may ... worship I may not keep my honor unless; sore amoved Greatly moved to emotion.

¹ ordinance Decree; ire Anger; must needs Must necessarily; judged Condemned.

whatsoever Whatever sort of person; estate or degree Social status or rank; other ... deed Either strong circumstantial evidence or being caught in the act; causer of Reason for; hasty Speedy.

⁶ put ... respite Delay; causes Reasons.

none No.

Launcelot, more than to any other knight; for oftentimes he hath saved her life and done battle for her when all the court refused the queen. And peradventure she sent for him for goodness and for none evil, to reward him for his good deeds that he had done to her in times past. And peradventure my lady the queen sent for him to that intent, that Sir Launcelot should come privily to her, weening that it had be best in eschewing and dreading of slander;⁸ for oftentimes we do many things that we ween for the best be, and yet peradventure it turneth to the worst. For I dare say," said Sir Gawain, "my lady, your queen, is to you both good and true. And as for Sir Launcelot, I dare say he will make it good upon any knight living that will put upon him⁹ villainy or shame, and in like wise he will make good for my lady the queen."

"That I believe well," said King Arthur, "but I will not that way work with Sir Launcelot, for he trusteth so much upon his hands and his might that he doubteth¹⁰ no man. And therefore for my queen he shall nevermore fight, for she shall have the law. And if I may get¹¹ Sir Launcelot, wit you well he shall have as shameful a death."

"Jesu defend me," said Sir Gawain, "that I never see it nor know it!"

"Why say you so?" said King Arthur. "For, pardé,¹² ye have no cause to love him! For this night last past he slew your brother, Sir Agravaing, a full good knight, and almost he had slain your other brother, Sir Mordred, and also there he slew thirteen noble knights. And also remember you,¹³ Sir Gawain, he slew two sons of yours, Sir Florence and Sir Lovell."

"My lord," said Sir Gawain, "of all this I have a knowledge, which of their deaths sore repents me. But insomuch as I gave them warning and told my brother and my sons afore-hand what would fall on the end, and insomuch as they would not do by my counsel, I will not meddle me thereof, nor revenge me nothing of their ⁸ privily Privately, secretly; weening Believing; eschewing Avoiding; slander Scandal.

⁹ put ... him Accuse him of.

¹⁰ that way work Deal in that manner; trusteth ... upon Has so much confidence in; might Strength; doubteth Fears.

¹¹ get Capture.

¹² pardé Old French: by God.

¹³ remember you Take into consideration that.

deaths; for I told them there was no boot to strive¹ with Sir Launcelot. Howbeit² I am sorry of the death of my brother and of my two sons, but they are the causers of their own death; and oftentimes I warned my brother Sir Agravain, and I told him of the perils.”

Then said King Arthur unto Sir Gawain, “Make you ready, I pray you, in your best armour, with your brethren, Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth, to bring my queen to the fire and there to have her judgement.”

“Nay, my most noble king,” said Sir Gawain, “that will I never do, for wit you well I will never be in that place where so noble a queen as is my lady Dame Guinevere shall take such a shameful end. For wit you well,” said Sir Gawain, “my heart will not serve me for to see her die, and it shall never be said that ever I was of your counsel³ for her death.”

“Then,” said the king unto Sir Gawain, “suffer your brethren Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth to be there.”

“My lord,” said Sir Gawain, “wit you well they will be loath to be there present, because of many adventures that is like to fail,⁴ but they are young and full unable to say you nay.”

Then spake Sir Gaheris and the good knight Sir Gareth unto King Arthur, “Sir, you may well command us to be there, but wit you well it shall be sore⁵ against our will. But and we be there by your straight commandment, ye shall plainly hold us there excused: we will be there in peaceable wise, and bear none harness⁶ of war upon us.”

“In the name of God,” said the king, “then make you ready, for she shall have soon her judgement.”

“Alas,” said Sir Gawain, “that ever I should endure to see this woeful day!”

So Sir Gawain turned him⁷ and wept heartily, and so he went into his chamber. And so the queen was led forth without Carlisle, and anon she was despoiled into her smock.⁸ And then her ghostly father was brought to her to be shriven⁹ of her misdeeds. Then was there weeping and wailing and wringing of hands of many lords and ladies; but there were but few in comparison that would bear any armour for to strength¹⁰ the death of the queen.

Then was there one that Sir Launcelot had sent unto that place, which went to espy what time the queen should go unto her death. And anon as he saw the queen despoiled into her smock and shriven, then he gave Sir Launcelot warning anon. Then was there but spurring and plucking up of horse, and right so¹¹ they came unto the fire. And who that stood against them, there were they slain, full many a noble knight. For there was slain Sir Beliance le Orgulous; Sir Segwarides; Sir Griflet; Sir Brandiles; Sir Aglovale; Sir Tor; Sir Gauter, Sir Gillimere, Sir Reynold, three brethren; and Sir Damas; Sir Priamus; Sir Kay l’Estrange; Sir Driaunt; Sir Lambegus; Sir Herminde; Sir Pertolope, Sir Perimones, two brethren which were called the Green Knight and the Red Knight.

